We have hitherto taken a view of the several parts of the ancient churches within the walls: it now remains that we consider a little such buildings as were distinct from the main body, and yet within the bounds of the church taken in the largest sense, which buildings are all comprised under one general name of the exedrae of the church. For Eusebius, speaking of the church of Paulinus at Tyre, says, When that curious artist had finished his famous structure within, he then set himself about the exedrae, or buildings¹ that joined one to another by the sides of the church: by which buildings, he tells us, he chiefly meant the place, which was for the use of those who needed the purgation and sprinkling of water and the Holy Ghost, that is, doubtless, the baptistery of the church. He describes the church of Antioch, built by Constantine, after the same manner, telling us, that it was surrounded with exedrae,² and buildings that had lower and upper stories in them. So that, as Valesius and other critics have rightly observed, exedra is a general name for any buildings that stand round about the church. And hence it is easy to conclude, that the baptistery, which Eusebius reckons the chief of the exedrae, was anciently a building without the walls of the church. Which observation, because I find it questioned by some, who place the font, after the modern way, in the narthex of the ancient churches, it will not be improper here to confirm by a few plain instances out of other authors. Paulinus, bishop of Nola, setting forth the great munificence of his friend Severus, says, He built two churches and a baptistery between them both.³ And so Cyril of Jerusalem describes the baptistery as a building by itself, which had first⁴ its προαύλιον οίκον, that is, its porch or ante-room, where the catechumens made their renunciation of Satan, and confession of faith; and then its εσωτερικον οίκον, its inner room,⁵ where the ceremony of baptism was performed. Sidonius Apollinaris also speaks of it as a distinct building;⁶ and St. Austin seems to intimate⁷ that there were bilationis patet (leg. parat). Altera post sacerdotem, (leg. post sacrificium,) capaci sinu receptat orantes.

Sect. 1.
Baptisteries anciently buildings distinct from the church.

¹⁶⁷ Chron. Alexand. p. 892. Vid. Coteler. Not. in Const. Apost. lib. 7. c. 12.

¹⁶⁸ Liturg. Marci, Bibl. Patr. Gr. Lat. t. 2. p. 41. Liturg. Chrysost. ibid. p. 88.

¹⁶⁹ Liturg. Jacobi, ibid. p. 23. Εὐχὴ λεγομένη ἐν τῷ σκευοφυλάκιῳ μετὰ τὴν ἀπόλυσι.

¹⁷⁰ Du Fresne, Com. in Paul. Silentiari. p. 581.

¹⁷¹ Con. Laod. can. 21. ¹⁷² See before, sect. 4. of this chap.

¹ Euseb. lib. 10. c. 4. p. 381. Ἐπὶ τὰ ἐκτὸς τοῦ νεῶ με-

τῆει, ἐξέδρας καὶ οἴκους τοὺς παρ' ἐκάτερα μεγίστους ἐπισκευάζων, &c. ² Euseb. de Vit. Constant. lib. 3. c. 50.

³ Paulin. Ep. 12. ad Sever. Tu vero etiam baptisterium basilicis duabus interpositum condidisti.

⁴ Cyril. Catech. Mystag. 1. n. 2. Εἰσέλθειτε πρῶτον εἰς τὸν προαύλιον τοῦ βαπτιστηρίου οἴκον, &c.

⁵ Id. Catech. 2. n. 1.

⁶ Sidon. lib. 4. Ep. 15. Baptisterium quod olim fabricabamini, scribitis, jam posse consecrari.

⁷ Aug. de Civ. Dei, lib. 22. c. 8. In parte fœminarum observanti ad baptisterium, &c.

distinct apartments in it for men and women likewise. Which perhaps is the reason why St. Ambrose speaks of it in the plural, styling it⁸ the baptisteries of the church. In the time of Justin Martyr and Tertullian we are not certain that the church had any of these baptisteries; but this is past all doubt, however, from their authority, that the place of baptism was not in the church, but some where distinct from it. For Tertullian, speaking of the ceremonies of baptism, says, It was their custom to renounce the devil and his pomp and his angels first in the church, and then⁹ again when they came to the water. Which implies, that the place of baptism was without the church. And so Justin Martyr¹⁰ represents it, when he speaks of carrying the catechumen to the place where there was water; which perhaps was unlimited in those days; it being an indifferent thing, as Tertullian¹¹ words it, whether a man was baptized in the sea or in a lake, in a river or in a fountain, in Jordan or in Tiber, as St. Peter and St. John baptized their converts. So that the first ages all agreed in this, that whether they had baptisteries or not, the place of baptism was always without the church. And after this manner baptisteries continued to the sixth age, as appears from what Durantus observes out of Gregory¹² of Tours, that he speaks of baptisteries still without the walls of the church. Though some now began to be taken into the church porch, as that wherein he says,¹³ Remigius baptized King Clodoveus, and thence they were afterward removed into the church itself. Though now the baptistery of St. John Lateran at Rome is still after the ancient model, if Durantus rightly inform us.

These baptisteries were anciently very capacious, because, as Dr. Cave truly observes,¹⁴ the stated times of baptism returning but seldom, there were usually great multitudes to be baptized at the same time. And then the manner of baptizing by immersion, or dipping under water, made it necessary to have a large font likewise. Whence the author of the Chronicon Alexandrinum¹⁵ styles the baptistery, whither Basilicus fled to take sanctuary, μέγα φωτισήριον, the great illuminary or school of baptism.

Sect. 2.
These very capacious, and why.

⁸ Ambros. Ep. 33. Symbolum aliquibus competentibus in baptisteriis tredebam basilicæ.

⁹ Tertul. de Coron. Mil. c. 3. Aquam adituri, ibidem, sed et aliquanto prius in ecclesia sub antistitis manu contestamur nos renunciare diabolo et pompæ et angelis ejus.

¹⁰ Justin. Apol. 2. p. 93.

¹¹ Tertul. de Bapt. c. 4. Nulla distinctio est, mari quis an stagno, flumine an fonte, lacu an alveo diluatur, nec quicquam refert inter eos quos Johannes in Jordane, et quos Petrus in Tiberi tinxit.

¹² Durant. de Ritib. Eccl. lib. 1. c. 19. n. 4. Greg. Turon. Hist. lib. 6. c. 11.

¹³ Gregor. Turon. Histor. Franc. lib. 2. c. 31.

And in Venantius Fortunatus¹⁶ it is called aula baptismatis, the large hall of baptism. Which was indeed so capacious, that we sometimes read of councils meeting and sitting therein, as Du Fresne¹⁷ shows out of the Acts of the Council of Chalcedon, and Suicerus has observed the same in the Acts of the Council of Carthage,¹⁸ which speaks of a council at Constantinople held in the baptistery of the church.

We may observe also in the fore-mentioned authors, how the baptisteries were commonly called φωτισήρια, Sect. 3. Why called φωτισήρια, places of illumination. places of illumination, that is, baptism. For baptism itself in ancient writers is very usually styled φώτισμα; and hence the place of baptism called φωτισήριον, from the administration of baptism there, which was always attended with a Divine illumination of the soul; whence persons baptized were also called, the illuminate, as has been observed¹⁹ in another place. But the baptisteries might also have this name for another reason, because they were the places of an illumination or instruction preceding baptism. For here the catechumens seem to have been trained up and instructed in the first rudiments of the Christian faith. At least they were here taught the Creed, as is evident from that noted passage of St. Ambrose,²⁰ where he says, that after the Lessons and Homily he went into the baptistery of the church, to make the candidates of baptism learn the Creed. Therefore from this illumination preceding baptism, as well as that which was consequent to it, the baptisteries might reasonably be called φωτισήρια, and, as some think, φροντισήρια, schools of learning, or the illuminatories of the church.

It will be easy now for the reader to observe, from what has been said, what difference there was anciently between a baptistery and a font, though the names be sometimes confounded together. For the baptistery, properly speaking, was the whole house of building, in which the font stood, and where all the ceremonies of baptism were performed; but the font was only the fountain or pool of water, wherein persons were immersed or

Sect. 4. Of the difference between a baptistery and a font. And why the font called piscina and κολυμβήθρα.

¹⁴ Cave, Primit. Christ. par. 1. c. 10. p. 312.

¹⁵ Chron. Alexandr. in Basilico, p. 753.

¹⁶ Fortunat. de Baptister. Moguntin. Biblioth. Patr. t. 8. p. 780.

¹⁷ Du Fresne, Com. in Paul. Silentiar. p. 592. Conc. Chalced. Act. 1.

¹⁸ Suicer. Thesaur. Eccl. voce Φωτισήριον, ex Actis Concilii Carthag. p. 118. 'Εν τῷ φωτισηρίῳ τὴν κατὰ Κωνσταντινάπολιν ἀγιωτάτης καθολικῆς ἐκκλησίας καθέσθεντων τῶν ἀγιωτάτων ἐπισκόπων.

¹⁹ Book I. chap. 4. sect. 1.

²⁰ Ambros. Ep. 33. ad Marcellin. Post lectiones atque tractatum, dimissis catechumenis, symbolum aliquibus competentibus in baptisteriis tradebam basilicæ.

baptized. This in the Greek writers is commonly called²¹ κολυμβήθρα, and by the Latins,²² piscina, and is sometimes expressly distinguished from the baptistery, as a part from the whole. For Socrates²³ expressly styles it κολυμβήθραν τοῦ βαπτιστηρίου, the pool of the baptistery. Which name Dr. Beverege²⁴ thinks was given to the font by way of allusion to the pool of Bethesda. But Optatus²⁵ has a more mystical reason for it: he says, it was called piscina, in allusion to our Saviour's technical name, ἰχθύς, which was an acrostic composed of the initial letters of our Saviour's several titles, Jesus Christ, the Son of God, our Saviour, of which I have given an account²⁶ in another place. But whether either of these reasons be true, or whether the font was not rather so called, because piscina and κολυμβήθρα are common names of fountains, and baths, and pools in Greek and Latin writers, I leave to the determination of the judicious reader. Du Fresne has observed several other names,²⁷ such as ὑπονόμος, lavacrum, natoria, and cloaca, a term peculiar to Gregory the Great: but these are modern names, and so I pass them over, only remarking one thing out of him, that whereas Procopius, in his Historia Arcana, gives it the name of δέξαμενῆ, the receptacle, Suidas mistakes it for the communion table; which I note, only because it is easy for any one to be led into the like mistake by the authority of that celebrated writer.

Sect. 5.
How fonts and baptisteries anciently adorned. What form the ancient baptisteries were built in, I find no where mentioned in any ancient writer; and almost as little of their ornament, that may be depended on as genuine. Durantus indeed has a very formal story out of the Pontifical, under the name of Damasus, how Constantine gave a rich font to the church, wherein he himself was baptized; it was made,²⁸ the author says, of porphyretic marble, overlaid with silver; in the middle of it was a marble pillar, and on it a vial of pure gold, filled with balsam to burn as in a lamp. On the brim of the font was a lamp of pure gold pouring out water. On the right hand of that a silver image of Christ, and on the left hand a silver image of St. John Baptist, holding a label with this inscription, "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sins of the world." Besides all these, there were seven silver harts pouring out water into the fountain. But now all this is a mere fabulous legend, and has just as much truth in it as the story of Constantine's leprosy, and his being cured by Pope Sylvester's baptizing him in this font at Rome. And I only mention it to show what sort of tales are urged by the Romish ritualists many times for ancient history. For every one now knows this mock-Damasus to be a spurious author. Perhaps in the sixth or seventh century, such sort of ornaments might be set up in the baptisteries of the church: for in the acts of the council of Constantinople²⁹ under Mennas, anno 536, there is mention made of silver and gold doves hanging in the baptistery, as well as at the altar. But as no pictures or images were set up in churches in the time of Constantine, so we cannot suppose any Roman baptisteries to be adorned by him according to the foresaid pretended description: but if the garments of the ministers baptizing, or the white robes of persons newly baptized, which were reserved in these baptisteries as monuments and tokens of their profession, or the vessels of chrism used for unction in baptism, may be reckoned ornaments of these places; the baptisteries had always these things from their first erection, as will be showed more particularly when we come to treat of the rites of baptism in its proper place.

All that I have further to add about baptisteries here, is an observation Sect. 6.
Baptisteries anciently more peculiar to the mother church. made by some learned men, that anciently there was but one baptistery in a city, and that at the bishop's church. Vicecomes³⁰ thinks it was so even at Rome itself for many ages. Dr. Maurice³¹ says no city had more, unless where the magnificence of emperors or bishops made, as it were, many cathedrals. And therefore, when the author³² of the Pontifical under the name of Damasus says of Pope Marcellus, that he made twenty-five titles in Rome, as so many dioceses, for baptism and penance; that learned person thinks it imports, that those services indeed belonged only to a cathedral; and therefore the granting of those privileges to parishes made them seem like dioceses. Some remains of this ancient custom are yet to be observed in several great cities of Italy. For both Durantus³³ and Vicecomes³⁴ tell us, that at Pisa, Bononia, Orvieto, Parma, and even at Florence itself, they have but one font or baptistery for a whole city at this day. Which is also noted by Onuphrius³⁵ and Du Fresne,³⁶ and by Dr. Maurice out of Leander Alberti, Mercator, Lassels, ²¹ Vid. Cyril. Catech. Mystag. 2. n. 4. Catech. 3. n. 1. Chrysost. Hom. 64 t. 5. p. 970.

²² Optat. lib. 3. p. 62. ²³ Socrat. lib. 7. c. 17.

²⁴ Bevereg. Pandect. Not. in Concil. Nicen. c. 11.

²⁵ Optat. lib. 3. p. 62. Hic est piscis qui in baptisate per invocationem fontalibus undis inseritur, ut quæ aqua fuerat, a pisce etiam piscina vocietur.

²⁶ Book I. chap. 1. sect. 2.

²⁷ Du Fresne, Com. in Paul. Silentiar. p. 593.

²⁸ Damas. Pontifical. Vit. Sylvestri.

²⁹ Conc. Constant. Act. 5. t. 5. p. 159.

³⁰ Vicecom. de Ritib. Bapt. lib. 1. c. 8.

³¹ Maurice, Dioces. Episc. p. 41 et 43.

³² Pontifical. Vit. Marcelli. Viginti quinque titulos in urbe Roma constituit, quasi dioceses, propter baptismum et pœnitentiam multorum, &c.

³³ Durant. de Ritib. Eccles. lib. 1. c. 19. n. 3.

³⁴ Vicecomes de Ritib. Bapt. lib. 1. c. 8.

³⁵ Onuphr. de Ecclesiis Urb. Romæ.

³⁶ Du Fresne, Glossar. voce Baptistarium.

and some other modern writers. I have observed³⁷ before, that this distinction was anciently made between a catholic church and a private oratory, that the one was a place of public baptism, and the other not; which argues that every church had not a distinct baptistery, but only such as were called baptistal churches. And this is the reason why anciently men commonly resorted for baptism to the bishop's church, at the two great festivals, Easter and Pentecost, which were the two solemn times of its administration. In after ages, baptisteries were set up in country parishes: for the council of Auxerre³⁸ speaks of baptizing in villages at Easter by allowance; but this privilege was not granted to every place, but only to such as the bishop appointed, except in cases of necessity, as Vicecomes³⁹ has observed out of the synod of Meaux,⁴⁰ and the council in Verno Palatio.⁴¹ Whence probably these got the name of mother churches also, in respect of such others as depended on them for the administration of baptism, as anciently all churches did on the bishop's church. Thus much of the baptisteries of the ancient church.

Sect. 7.
Of the secretarium, or diaconicum magnum, the vestry.

Another noted building, commonly reckoned among the exedrae of the church, was that which is usually called secretarium or diaconicum, concerning which learned men are not exactly agreed. For Valesius takes it⁴² for a place within the church; Gothofred⁴³ and others, for a place without; but Du Fresne⁴⁴ seems more justly to determine the controversy between them, by distinguishing the diaconicum bematis within the chancel, which we have spoken of before, from the diaconicum magnum without the church, which is to be considered here. It is of this Philostorgius is to be understood, when he says, The Christians of Paneas, or Cæsarea-Philippi, translated the statue of our Saviour, erected by the woman whom he cured of an issue of blood, into the *diaconicum*⁴⁵ of the church, that is, into the vestry or repository of the church. It was so named, because all things here repositied were under the care of the deacons, part of whose office was to look after the vestments, vessels, and utensils belonging to the altar, and all things of value given to the church; the chief overseer of which seems generally to have been a presbyter, dignified with the title of ceimeliarches, or scuophylax, as I have showed before⁴⁶ in another place. And hence the diaconicum, or rather, as Du Fresne⁴⁷ observes out of an ancient Greek writer, the innermost part of it, was the ceimeliarchium, or scuophylacium, of the church, the repository of the sacred vessels, and such anathemata or presents, as were reputed among the chiefest treasures of the church. It was otherwise called secretarium, as Du Fresne⁴⁸ conjectures, because the consistory or tribunal of the church was here kept; the secretum or secretarium being a known name for the courts of the civil magistrate, whence this perhaps might take its denomination. The whole building was large and capacious enough to receive not only a private consistory, but a provincial or general council, many of which we find have been held in this apartment of the church, as the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth councils of Carthage are said to be kept in secretario basilicæ restitute, with a great many others collected by Du Fresne, who observes the sessions of councils to be called secretaria upon this account, from the place of their session or convention.

It was otherwise called receptorium and salutatorium, as we find in Sidonius Apollinaris,⁴⁹ Sulpicius Severus,⁵⁰ the first council of Mascon,⁵¹ Theodoret, and many others. Particularly Theodoret,⁵² speaking of Theodosius coming to St. Ambrose to petition for absolution, says, he found him sitting ἐν τῷ οἴκῳ ἀσπαρτικῷ, in the saluting house; which Scaliger mistakes for the bishop's house, where strangers were entertained; whereas it was a place adjoining to the church, where the bishop and presbyters sat to receive the salutations of the people, as they came to desire their blessing or prayers, or consult them about important business. As appears from Sulpicius Severus, who, speaking of St. Martin, says, He sat in one secretarium, and the presbyters⁵³ in another, receiving the people's salutes, and hearing their causes.

Du Fresne thinks these secretaria, or at least some part of them, were also used as ecclesiastical prisons, or places of confinement sometimes for delinquent clergymen; and that then they were called decaneta, or decanica; which is a term used in both the Codes and some councils, as Gothofred⁵⁴ and some others explain it, for a prison belonging to the church. In the Theodosian Code there is a law of Arcadius, which orders heretics to be expelled from all places

Sect. 9.
Of the decanica, or prisons of the church.

³⁷ Book VIII. chap. 1. sect. 4.

³⁸ Conc. Antissiodor. an. 578. can. 18.

³⁹ Vicecom. de Ritib. Eccles. l. 1. c. 9.

⁴⁰ Conc. Meldens. can. 48.

⁴¹ Conc. in Verno Palatio, c. 7.

⁴² Vales. Not. in Philostorg. lib. 7. c. 3.

⁴³ Gothofred. ibid.

⁴⁴ Du Fresne, Com. in Paul. Silentiar. p. 593.

⁴⁵ Philostorg. lib. 7. c. 3. ⁴⁶ Book III. chap. 13. sect. 3.

⁴⁷ Passio SS. Patrum Sabaitarum ap. Du Fresne, Com. in Paulum Silentiar. p. 597. Ἐσώτερον δὲ τοῦ διακονικοῦ κειμελιάρχειον ἦτοι σκενοφυλάκιον.

⁴⁸ Du Fresne, ibid. p. 594. ex Gestis de nomine Acacii.

⁴⁹ Sidon. lib. 5. Ep. 17. ⁵⁰ Sulpic. Dialog. 2. c. 1.

⁵¹ Concil. Matiscon. l. can. 2. ⁵² Theodor. lib. 5. c. 18.

⁵³ Sulpic. Dial. 2. c. 1. Cum in alio secretario presbyteri sederent, vel salutationibus vacantes, vel audiendis negotiis occupati, &c.

⁵⁴ Gothofred. Com. in Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 5. de Hær. Leg. 30.

which they possessed,⁵⁵ whether under the name of churches, or diaconica, or decanica. Now, that the decanica here means a place of custody or restraint for delinquents belonging to the church, Gothofred proves from another law among Justinian's Novels,⁵⁶ which orders such delinquents to be shut up in the decanica of the church, there to suffer condign punishment. And by this we are led to understand what is meant by the decanica spoken of in the Acts of the Council⁵⁷ of Ephesus, which the Latin translator by mistake renders tribunal, whereas it should be the prison of the church. Some take it to be no more but another name for the diaconicum, or a corruption of it; others derive it from δικη, and so make it denote a tribunal: which are errors both alike. For it seems to have been a more general name than the diaconicum, including all such places of the church, as were made use of to put offending clerks into a more decent confinement, which was not any one place, but several that were made use of to that purpose, such as the catechumenia, as well as the diaconica, or secretaria, in which respect they had all the name of decanica, or carceres, the prisons of the church. Which seems pretty evident from what Du Fresne⁵⁸ has observed out of an epistle of Pope Gregory II. to the emperor Leo Isaurus, where he says, When any one had offended, the bishops were used to confine him as in a prison in one of the secretaria,⁵⁹ or diaconia, or catechumena of the church. Which implies, that all these places were made use of upon occasion for the confinement and punishment of delinquents, and then they had peculiarly the name of decanica, or prisons of the church.

Sect. 10.
Of the mutatorium, or mensatorium.

There is another name for a place belonging to the church in Theodorus Lector,⁶⁰ which has as much puzzled interpreters as the former. That is μετατόριον, or μετατόριον, as the modern Greeks call it. Goar, in his Notes upon the Euchologium, thinks it should be minsatorium, from μίνσος, a dish, or mensa, a table; and so he expounds it, a place of refreshment for the singers, where they might have bread and wine to recreate them after service. Du Fresne⁶¹ deduces it from metatum, which is a term of frequent use in the civil law, and signifies a station in the cursus publicus, where entertainment was given to those that travelled upon public business. Suicerus makes it⁶² to be the same with the diaconicum, or salutatorium, the saluting house, and thinks with Goar it should be read minsatorium, from mensa, because here was a table erected, not for entertainment, but for receiving such things as were brought and laid upon it. But I like best the conjecture of Musculus, who renders it mutatorium, as supposing it to be a corruption of that Latin word, which signifies what we call an apodyterium, or vestry, where the ministers change their habit: and so it is agreed on all hands, that it was a part of the diaconicum, or but another name for it, though men differ so much in their sentiments, when they come to account for the reason of it.

The author of the Constitutions, in his description of the church, mentions also certain places⁶³ called pastophoria, which, according to his account, were buildings on each side of the church, toward the east end of it. But what use they were put to we can learn no further from that author, save only that he tells us in another place, the deacons⁶⁴ were used to carry the remains of the eucharist thither when all had communicated. Whence Durantus, measuring ancient customs by the practice of his own times, absurdly concludes, that the pastophoria was the ark where the pyx and wafer were laid,⁶⁵ as if there was any similitude betwixt a pyx and a building on each side of the temple. Bona,⁶⁶ with a little more reason, thinks the pastophorium was only another name for scuophylacium, or diaconicum. But, indeed, it seems to have been a more general name, including not only the diaconicum, but also the gazophylacium, or treasury, and the habitations of the ministers, and custodes ecclesie, or, as some think they are otherwise called, paramonarii, mansionarii, and martyrarii, the mansionaries or keepers of the church. For the word pastophorium is a name taken from the Septuagint translation of the Old Testament, Ezek. xl. 17, where it is used for the chambers in the outward court of the temple. And St. Jerom, in his comment⁶⁷ upon the place, ob-

Sect. 11.
Of the gazophylacium
and pastophoria.

⁵⁵ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 5. Leg. 30. Cuncti hæretici proculdubio noverint, omnia sibi loca hujus urbis adimenda esse, sive sub ecclesiarum nomine teneantur, sive quæ diaconica appellantur, vel etiam decanica.

⁵⁶ Justin. Novel. 79. c. 3. Κατ'επιγέσθωσαν ἐν τοῖς καλουμένοις δεκανικαῖς, ποιῶν τὰς κατ'ἑκούσας ὑφ'ἕξοντες.

⁵⁷ Libell. Basilii Diaconi ad Theodos. in Conc. Ephes. par. 1. c. 30. Conc. t. 3. p. 427. 'Ἐν τῷ δικανικῷ τοῦ λαοῦ τυπτηθέντος διαφόρως, &c.

⁵⁸ Du Fresne, Com. in Paul. Silentiar. p. 594.

⁵⁹ Greg. Ep. 2. ad Leon. Isaur. Concil. t. 7. p. 26. Pontifices ubi quis peccarit, eum tanquam in carcerem, in secretaria, sacrorumque vasorum æraria conjiciunt, in ecclesia diaconia et in catechumena ablegant.

⁶⁰ Theodor. Lector. lib. 2. p. 559.

⁶¹ Du Fresne, Com. in Paul. Silentiar. p. 595.

⁶² Suicer. Thesaur. voce Μετατόριον.

⁶³ Constit. Apost. lib. 2. c. 57. 'Ἐκατέρων τῶν μερῶν τὰ παστοφόρια πρὸς ἀνατολὴν.

⁶⁴ Ibid. lib. 8. c. 13. Λαβόντες οἱ διάκονοι τὰ περισσεύοντα, εἰσφέρετ' αὐσαν εἰς τὰ παστοφόρια.

⁶⁵ Durant. de Ritib. Eccles. lib. 1. c. 16. n. 8.

⁶⁶ Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. 1. c. 24. n. 2.

⁶⁷ Hieron. Com. in Ezek. xl. 17. p. 640. Pro thalamis triginta quos vertere Septuaginta, sive gazophylacii atque cellarii, ut interpretatur est Aquila, Symmachus posuit ἐξέδρας—quæ habitationi Levitarum atque sacerdotum erant præparatæ. Id. Com. in Ezek. xlii. 1. p. 652. Eductus est serves, that what the Septuagint call pastophoria, and the Latins from them cubicula, is in the translations of Aquila and Symmachus rendered gazophylacium and exedra; and he tells us they were chambers of the treasury, and habitations for the priests and Levites round about that court of the temple. Therefore I think there is no question to be made, but that the pastophoria in the Christian church were places put to the same use as in the Jewish temple, from which the name is borrowed. For the church had her gazophylacia, or treasuries, as well as the temple; which appears from a canon of the fourth council of Carthage,⁶⁸ which forbids the offerings of persons at variance one with another to be received either in the treasury or the sanctuary. So that the treasury was a distinct place from the corban in the sanctuary, and therefore most probably to be reckoned among the pastophoria of the church. Here all such offerings of the people were laid up, as were not thought proper to be brought to the altar, but rather to be sent to the bishop's house, as some ancient canons give direction in the case. Particularly, among those called the Canons of the Apostles, we find two to this purpose: That beside bread and wine, nothing⁶⁹ should be brought to the altar, save only new ears of corn, and grapes, and oil for the lamps, and incense for the time of the oblation: but all other fruits should be sent εις οικον, to the repository, or treasury, it may be, as first-fruits for the bishop and presbyters, and not be brought to the altar, but be by them divided among the deacons and other clergy. The pastophoria were also habitations for the bishop and clergy, and the guardians or keepers of the church, as Schelstrate⁷⁰ rightly concludes from another passage in St. Jerom,⁷¹ where he explains pastophorium to be the chamber, or habitation, where the ruler of the temple dwelt. So that it seems to have been almost as general a name as that of the οικοι, or exedrae of the church.

Whether the libraries belonging to churches were any part of these pastophoria, is not easy to determine, but thus much we are certain of, that there were such places anciently adjoining to many churches, from the time that churches began to be erected among Christians. Alexander, bishop of Jerusalem, in the third century, built a library for the service of that church, where, Eusebius tells us,⁷² he found the best part of his materials to compose his Ecclesiastical History. Julius Africanus founded such another library at Cæsarea in Palestine, which Pamphilus and Eusebius much augmented. St. Jerom says,⁷³ Pamphilus wrote out almost all Origen's works for the use of this library, which were reserved there in his time. And he often mentions⁷⁴ his own consulting it upon necessary occasions in his emendations of the text of the Holy Scriptures; telling us further,⁷⁵ that there was a copy of St. Matthew's Gospel in the original Hebrew, as it was first written by him, extant in his time. Another of these libraries we find mentioned in the Acts of Purgation of Cæcilian and Felix, belonging to the church of Cirta Julia, or Constantina, in Numidia,⁷⁶ where Paulus the bishop is accused as a traditor, for delivering up the goods of the church in the time of the Diocletian persecution. These were all founded before the church had any settled times of peace. In the following ages we find St. Austin making mention of the library⁷⁷ of the church of Hippo, and St. Jerom⁷⁸ commending Euzoius, the Arian bishop of Cæsarea, for his care in repairing the library of Pamphilus, which was fallen to decay. St. Basil⁷⁹ speaks of the Roman libraries, or archives at least. And the author of the Pontifical,⁸⁰ if any credit may be given to him, ascribes the building of two to Pope Hilary, near the baptistery of the Lateran church. But that which exceeded all the rest, was the famous library of the church of S. Sophia, which Hospinian⁸¹ thinks was first begun by Constantine, but was afterward vastly augmented by Theodosius junior, who was another Ptolemy, in whose time there were no less than a hundred thousand in books in it, and a hundred and twenty thousand in the reign of Basiliscus and Zeno, when both the building and its furniture were all unhappily consumed together by the firing of the city in a popular tumult. He that would see a more ample account of these foundations in other ages, must consult Lomeier's Discourse de Bibliothecis, where he pursues the history of libraries⁸² from first to last, as well among Jews and heathens, as every ⁶⁸ Sect. 12.

Of the schools and libraries of the church.

in gazophylacium, sive ut Symmachus et LXX. transtulerunt exedram, vel ut Theodotio παστοφόριον, quod in thalamum vertitur.

⁶⁹ Conc. Carthag. 4. can. 93. Oblationes dissidentium fratrum, neque in sacrario, neque in gazophylacio recipiantur.

⁷⁰ Canon. Apost. c. 4 et 5.

⁷¹ Schelstrat. Concil. Antiochen. p. 186.

⁷² Hieron. Com. in Esai. ⁷³ Euseb. lib. 6. c. 20.

⁷⁴ Hieron. Catalog. Scriptor. Eccles. c. 75.

⁷⁵ Id. Ep. ad Marcel. t. 3. p. 113. It. Com. in Tit. c. 3.

⁷⁶ Id. de Scriptor. c. 3. Ipsum Hebraicum habetur usque hodie in Cæsariensi bibliotheca, quam Pamphilus martyr studiosissime confecit.

⁷⁷ Gesta Purgat. Cæciliani ad calcem Optati, p. 267.

Postea quam perventum est in bibliothecam, inventa sunt armaria inania, &c.

⁷⁷ Aug. de Hæres. c. 80. Audivi de hæresibus scripsisse sanctum Hieronymum, sed ipsum ejus opusculum in nostra bibliotheca invenire non potuimus.

⁷⁸ Hieron. Catal. Scriptor. c. 113. Plurimo labore corruptam bibliothecam Origenis et Pamphili in membranis instaurare conatus est.

⁷⁹ Basil. Ep. 82. t. 3. p. 152.

⁸⁰ Pontifical. Vit. Hilarii. Fecit oratorium S. Stephani in baptisterio Lateranensi. Fecit autem et bibliothecas duas in eodem loco.

⁸¹ Hospinian. Vit. Templis, lib. 3. c. 7. p. 101.

⁸² Lomeier. de Bibliothecis, Ultrajecti, 1680. 8vo.

age of Christians. It is sufficient to my present purpose to have hinted here, briefly, a succinct account of such of them as were anciently reckoned parts or appendants of the Christian churches. And for the same reason I take notice of schools in this place, because we find them sometimes kept in the churches, or buildings adjoining to the church: which is evident from the observation which Socrates makes upon the education of Julian the apostate, that in his youth he frequented the church,⁸³ where, in those days, the schools were kept. He speaks of the schools of grammar and rhetoric, which, it seems, were then taught at Constantinople in some apartment belonging to the church. Here also it is probable those famous catechetic schools of Alexandria and Cæsarea were kept. For Demetrius, bishop of Alexandria, is said by Ruffin⁸⁴ to have authorized Origen to teach as catechist in the church. Which, as I have noted in another place,⁸⁵ cannot be understood of preaching publicly in the church; for Origen was then but eighteen years old, and not in orders, when he first entered upon the catechetic school; but it must mean his private teaching in the school of the church. Which, whether it was in the catechumenia within the church, or in the baptisteria or pastophoria without the church, is not very easy nor very material to be determined, since it appears to have been in some place belonging to the church, but not precisely determined by any ancient writers. Whilst I am upon this head, I cannot but take notice of a canon attributed to the sixth general council of Constantinople, which promotes the setting up of charity schools in all country churches. For among those nine canons which are ascribed to this council in some ancient collections, and published by Crab, there is one to this purpose,⁸⁶ that presbyters in country towns and villages should have schools to teach all such children as were sent to them, for which they should exact no reward, nor take any thing, except the parents of the children thought fit to make them any charitable present by way of voluntary oblation. And another of those canons⁸⁷ speaks of schools in churches and monasteries subject to the bishop's care and direction. From which we may conclude, that schools were anciently very common appendants both of cathedral and country churches; and therefore it was not improper to hint thus much of them here, though a more full account of other things relating to them will make a part in this work hereafter in its proper place.

Eusebius, in his description of the church of the twelve apostles, built by Constantine at Constantinople, takes notice of some other buildings and places belonging to the church. For that church, he says, was surrounded with a large atrium, or area, on each side of which were porticos or cloisters, and along by them⁸⁸ first οἶκοι βασιλικοί, which Valesius renders basilicæ, but I think Musculus something better, domus basilicæ; for they seem not to mean royal palaces, but the houses of the clergy adjoining to the church. Then he adds λουτρά, which in this place neither signifies the baptistery, nor the fountain before the church, but baths belonging to the church, which, in a law of Theodosius,⁸⁹ that speaks also of the several parts of the church, where men should be allowed to take sanctuary, is called more plainly balnea, and in the Greek copy λουτρά, as well in the Code as in the Acts of the Council of Ephesus, where the same law is recited. Eusebius adds to these ἀνακαμπτήρια, which Musculus translates deambulatorii recessus, taking them, I presume, for walks about the church: but Valesius more properly renders them diversoria; for they seem to mean the little hospitals, or houses of entertainment for the poor and strangers; which are the cellulae, the little cells or lodgings, if I mistake not, spoken of in the foresaid law of the Theodosian Code. And perhaps they might serve as lodgings also for such as fled to take sanctuary in the church. For these might neither eat nor lodge within the church, but only in some of these outward buildings, which, upon that account, were made as safe a retreat as the very altar itself, by the fore-mentioned law of Theodosius. And so were the καταγώγια, as Eusebius calls them, the habitations of the porters, or keepers of the church; and likewise the gardens, and area, and cloisters enjoyed the same privilege, being within the bounds of the περίβολος, or outward enclosure of the church. And so far, as to what concerns the privilege of yielding sanctuary, all these places were reckoned as parts of the church. But of this, more in the last chap-⁸⁴ Ruffin. lib. 6. Hist. Euseb. c. 3. Demetrius catechizandi ei, id est, docendi magisterium in ecclesia tribuit.

⁸³ Socrat. lib. 3. c. 1. Εἰς βασιλικήν, ἔνθα τότε τὰ παι- δευτήρια ἦν, &c.

⁸⁵ Book III. chap. 10. sect. 4.

⁸⁶ Conc. 6. General. can. 5. ap. Crab. t. 2. p. 415. Presbyteri per villas et vicus scholas habeant. Et si quis fidelium suos parvulos ad discendas literas eis commendare vult, eos non renuant suscipere, &c. Nihil autem ab eis pretii exigant, nec aliquid ab eis accipiant, excepto quod eis parentes eorum charitatis studio sua voluntate obtulerint.

⁸⁷ Ibid. can. 4. Si quis ex presbyteris voluerit nepotem suum aut aliquem consanguineum ad scholas mittere in ecclesiis sanctorum, aut in cœnobiis, quæ nobis ad regendum commissa sunt, licentiam id faciendi concedimus.

⁸⁸ Euseb. Vit. Constant. lib. 4. c. 59. Οἶκοί τε βασιλικοὶ ταῖς στοαῖς, λουτρά τε, καὶ ἀνακαμπτήρια παρέξεινέτο, ἀλλὰ τε πλείστα καταγώγια τοῖς τοῦ τόπου φρουροῖς, &c.

⁸⁹ Cod. Th. lib. 9. Tit. 45. De his qui ad ecclesias confugiunt, Leg. 4. Ut inter templum quod parietum descripsimus cinctu, et januas primas ecclesiæ, quicquid fuerit interjacens sive in cellulis, sive in domibus, hortulis, balneis, areis atque porticibus, confugas interioris templi vice tueatur.

ter, which treats particularly of the laws relating to the asyla, and the privilege of taking sanctuary in the church.

I should here have put an end to this chapter, but that some readers would be apt to reckon it an omission, that I have taken no notice of organs and bells among the utensils of the church. But the true reason is, that there were no such things in use in the ancient churches for many ages. Music in churches is as ancient as the apostles, but instrumental music not so: for it is now generally agreed by learned men, that the use of organs came into the church since the time of Thomas Aquinas, anno 1250. For he in his Sums has these words, Our church does⁹⁰ not use musical instruments, as harps and psalteries, to praise God withal, that she may not seem to judaize. From which our learned Mr. Gregory, in a peculiar Dissertation⁹¹ that he has upon this subject, concludes, That there was no ecclesiastical use of organs in his time. And the same inference is made by Cajetan⁹² and Navarre⁹³ among the Romish writers. Mr. Wharton⁹⁴ also has observed, that Marinus Sanutus, who lived about the year 1290, was the first that brought the use of wind organs into churches, whence he was surnamed Torcellus, which is the name for an organ in the Italian tongue. And about this time Durandus, in his Rationale,⁹⁵ takes notice of them as received in the church, and he is the first author, Mr. Gregory thinks, that so takes notice of them. The use of the instrument indeed is much antienter, but not in church service; the not attending to which distinction is the thing that imposes upon many writers. In the East, the instrument was always in use in the emperors' courts, perhaps from the time of Julian, who has an epigram⁹⁶ giving a handsome description of it. But in the Western parts the instrument was not so much as known till the eighth century. For the first organ that was ever seen in France, was one sent as a present to King Pepin by Constantinus Copronymus, the Greek emperor, anno 766, as Bona himself⁹⁷ shows out of Sigebert⁹⁸ and the ancient Annals of France,⁹⁹ and Mr. Gregory adds Marianus Scotus, Martin Polonus, Aventine, Platina, and the Pontifical, for the same opinion. But now it was only used in princes' courts, and not yet brought into churches. Nor was it ever received into the Greek churches, there being no mention of an organ in all their liturgies, ancient or modern, if Mr. Gregory's judgment may be taken. But Durantus, however, contends for their antiquity both in the Greek and Western churches, and offers¹⁰⁰ to prove it, but with ill success. First from Julianus Halicarnassensis, a Greek writer, anno 510, whom he makes to say, that organs were used in the church in his time. But he mistakes the sense of his author, who speaks not of his own times, but of the times of Job and the Jewish temple. For commenting upon those words of Job xxx. 31, "My harp is turned to mourning, and my organ into the voice of them that weep;" he says, There was no prohibition to use musical instruments, or organs,¹⁰¹ if it was done with piety, because they were used in the temple. By which it is plain, he speaks of the Jewish temple in the singular, and not of Christian temples or churches in the plural, as Durantus mistakes him. Next, for the Latin church he urges the common opinion, which ascribes the invention of them to Pope Vitalian, anno 660. But his authorities for this are no better than Platina and the Pontifical, which are little to be regarded against clear evidences to the contrary. That which some urge out of Clemens Alexandrinus,¹⁰² I shall not answer as Suicerus¹⁰³ does, (who, with Hospinian¹⁰⁴ and some others, wholly decriing the use of instrumental music in Christian churches, says, it is an interpolation and corruption of that ancient author,) but only observe, that he speaks not of what was then in use in Christian churches, but of what might lawfully be used by any private Christians, if they were disposed to use it. Which rather argues, that instrumental music, the lute and harp, of which he speaks, was not in use in the public churches. The same may be gathered from the words of St. Chrysostom, who says¹⁰⁵ it was only permitted to the Jews as sacrifice was, for the heaviness and grossness of their souls: God condescended to their weakness, because they were lately drawn off from idols. But now, instead of organs,¹⁰⁶ we may use our own bodies to praise him withal. Theodoret¹⁰⁷ has

⁹⁰ Aquin. 2da 2dæ Quæst. 91. Artic. 2. Ecclesia nostra non assumit instrumenta musica, sicut citharas et psalteria in Divinas laudes, ne videatur judaizare.

⁹¹ Gregory, Discour. of the Singing of the Nicene Creed, Inter Oper. Posthuma, p. 51.

⁹² Cajetan. in Loc. Aquin. et in summula.

⁹³ Navar. de Orat. et Horis Canonicis, cap. 16.

⁹⁴ Wharton, Append. ad Cave, Histor. Literar. p. 13. Marinus Sanutus, cognomento Torcellus, Germani cujusdam artificis opera usus, organa illa pneumatica, quæ hodie usurpantur, Italice Torcellos dicta, primus omnium in ecclesiam induxit: inde datum ei Torcelli nomen.

⁹⁵ Durand. Rational. lib. 4. c. 34. lib. 5. c. 2.

⁹⁶ Vide Vitam Juliani per Morentinum, p. 11.

⁹⁷ Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. 1. c. 25. n. 19.

⁹⁸ Sigebert. an. 766. ⁹⁹ Annales Metenses, an. 757.

¹⁰⁰ Durant. de Ritib. lib. 1. c. 13. n. 2.

¹⁰¹ Julian. Catena in Job xxx. p. 465. Οὐδὲ κεχρησθαι ὄργανοις ἀπειρήτο, μετ' εὐσεβείας γνωμένου, ὅπουγε ἐν τῷ ναῷ τούτοις ἐκέχρητο.

¹⁰² Clem. Alex. Pædag. lib. 2. c. 4.

¹⁰³ Suicer. Thesaur. voce ὄργανον, p. 501.

¹⁰⁴ Hospin. de Templis, lib. 2. c. 11. p. 74.

¹⁰⁵ Chrysost. in Psal. cxlix. t. 3. p. 634.

¹⁰⁶ Id. in Psal. cxliv.

¹⁰⁷ Theod. in Psal. xxxii. et cl.

many the like expressions, in his comments upon the Psalms and other places. But the author under the name of Justin Martyr is more express in his determination, as to matter of fact, telling us plainly, that the use¹⁰⁸ of singing with instrumental music was not received in the Christian churches, as it was among the Jews in their infant state, but only the use of plain song. So that there being no use of organs till the twelfth century, I could not speak of them as utensils of the ancient churches.

For the same reason I reckon not bells among the ancient utensils, because they are known to be a modern invention. For the first three hundred years it is certain the primitive Christians did not meet in their assemblies by the notice of any public signal: though Amalarius¹⁰⁹ fancies they had some sounding instruments of wood for this purpose. But this is so absurd a fancy, and altogether groundless dream, to imagine that in an age of persecutions, when they met privately in the night, they should betray themselves, as it were, and provoke their enemies to destroy them, that neither Bona¹¹⁰ nor Baronius¹¹¹ himself could digest it. But Barenus has another fancy, which is not much better grounded. He supposes there was an order of men appointed on purpose to give private notice to every member, when and where the assembly was to be held; and these, he says,¹¹² are called cursores, or θεόδρομοι, couriers, in the ancient language of the church. His sole authority for this is Ignatius¹¹³ in his epistle to Polycarp, where he has indeed the name, but in a quite different sense from what Baronius explains it to be. For he speaks not of persons employed in calling together religious assemblies, but of messengers to be sent from one country to another upon the important affairs of the church, as any one that looks carefully into Ignatius will easily discern. These he in another place¹¹⁴ calls θεοπρεσβύτας, divine ambassadors, as all learned men agree that it ought to be read; and so the old Latin translation has it, sacros legatos, and Polycarp¹¹⁵ uses the same name when he speaks of those messengers of the churches. These were commonly some deacons, or others of the inferior clergy, whom the bishop thought fit to send upon the embassies of the church. But as to calling of religious assemblies, we are not sure how it was then performed, save only that it was done in a private way: and perhaps the deaconesses were the fittest persons to be employed therein, as being least known or suspected by the heathen; but for want of light we can determine nothing about it. In the following ages we find several other inventions before bells to call religious assemblies together. In Egypt they seem to have used trumpets, after the manner of the Jews. Whence Pachomius,¹¹⁶ the father of the Egyptian monks, makes it one article of his Rule, that every monk should leave his cell, as soon as he heard the sound of the trumpet calling to church. And the same custom is mentioned by Johannes Climacus,¹¹⁷ who was abbot of Mount Sinai in the sixth century; whence we may conjecture, that the old usage continued till that time in Palestine also. But in some monasteries they took the office by turns of going about to every one's cell, and with the knock of a hammer calling the monks to church, which custom is often mentioned by Cassian,¹¹⁸ and Palladius,¹¹⁹ and Moschus,¹²⁰ as used chiefly for their night assemblies, whence the instrument is termed by them the night signal, and the wakening mallet. In the monastery of virgins, which Paula, the famous Roman lady, set up and governed at Jerusalem, the signal was used to be given by one going about and singing hallelujah: for that word was their call to church, as St. Jerom¹²¹ informs us. In other parts of the East they had their sounding instruments of wood, as Bona¹²² shows at large out of the Acts of the second Council of Nice, and Theodorus Studita, and Nicephorus Blemides, and several other writers. And the use of bells was not known among them, as he observes out of Baronius,¹²³ till the year 865, when Ursus Patriciacus, duke of Venice, made a present of some to Michael the Greek emperor, who first built a tower to the church of Sancta Sophia to hang them in. But whether it be that this custom never generally prevailed among the Greeks, or whether it be that the Turks will not permit them to use any bells, so it is at present that they have none, but follow their old custom of using wooden boards or iron plates full of holes, which they call σήμαντρα, and χειροσήμαντρα, because they hold them in their hands, and knock them with a hammer or mallet to call the people together to church, as we are informed by

¹⁰⁸ Justin. Quæst. et Respons. ad Orthodox. qu. 107. Ἐν ταῖς ἐκκλησίαις προαίρεται ἐκ τῶν ἀσμάτων ἢ χρῆσις τῶν ποιήτων ὀργάνων, καὶ τῶν ἄλλων τῶν νῆπιος ὄντων ἀρμολίων, καὶ ὑπολείπεται τὸ ἀταί ἀπλῶς.

¹⁰⁹ Amalar. de Officiis, lib. 4. c. 21.

¹¹⁰ Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. 1. c. 22. n. 1.

¹¹¹ Baron. an. 58. n. 108.

¹¹² Ibid. n. 102.

¹¹³ Ignat. Ep. ad Polycarp, n. 7.

¹¹⁴ Ignat. Ep. ad Smyrn. n. 11.

¹¹⁵ Polycarp. Ep. ad Philip. n. 13.

¹¹⁶ Pachom. Regula, c. 3. Bibl. Patr. t. 15. p. 629. Cum audierit vocem tubæ ad collectam vocantis, statim egrediatur.

¹¹⁷ Climac. Scala Paradisi, Gradu 19. Bibl. Patr. t. 5. p. 244.

¹¹⁸ Cassian. Institut. lib. 2. c. 17. lib. 4. c. 12.

¹¹⁹ Pallad. Hist. Lausiac. c. 104. Ἐξυπνιασῆριον σφυρίον.

¹²⁰ Moschus, Prat. Spirit. Nocturnum pulsare signum, &c.

¹²¹ Hieron. Ep. 27. Epitaph. Paulæ, p. 178. Post alleluja cantatum, quo signo vocabantur ad collectam, nulli residere licitum erat.

¹²² Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. 1. c. 22. n. 2.

¹²³ Baron. an. 865. t. 10. p. 310.

Allatius, and a late learned writer¹²⁴ of our own, who has been an eye-witness of their customs. Who first brought bells into use in the Latin church, is a thing yet undetermined; some ascribing them to Pope Sabinianus, St. Gregory's successor, anno 604, and others to Paulinus, bishop of Nola, contemporary with St. Jerom. This last is certainly a vulgar error, and seems to owe its rise to no other foundation, but only that he was bishop of Nola in Campania, (where bells, perhaps, were first invented, and thence called nolæ and campanæ;) and some bold modern writer thence concluded that he was therefore the author of them. And it might make the story look a little more plausible, because that he also founded a church in Nola. But then it happened unluckily for this fiction, that he himself describes his church, and that very minutely, in his twelfth epistle to Severus, but takes no notice of tower or bells, though he is exact in recounting all other lesser edifices belonging to his church. Which, as Bona truly observes, is a shrewd argument, joined with the silence of all other ancient writers, to prove that he was not the inventor of them. Yet Bona after all would have it thought, that they began to be used in the Latin church immediately upon the conversion of Christian emperors, because the tintinnabula, or lesser sort of bells, had been used before by the heathens to the like purpose. Which is an argument, I think, that has very little weight in it, since there is no ancient author that countenances his conjecture. For he produces none before Audoenus Rothomagensis, that mentions the use of the tintinnabula, nor any before Bede, that uses the name campana: both which authors lived in the seventh century, and that is an argument that these things were not come into use among Christians long before, else we might have heard of them in writers before them, as we frequently do in those that follow after. I need not now tell any reader, that the popish custom of consecrating, and anointing, and baptizing of bells, and giving them the name of some saint, is a very modern invention. Baronius carries it no higher than the time of John XIII., anno 968, who consecrated the great bell of the Lateran church, and gave it the name of John,¹²⁵ from whence he thinks the custom was authorized in the church. Menardus¹²⁶ and Bona¹²⁷ would have it thought a little more ancient, but yet they do not pretend to carry it higher than one age more, to the time of Charles the Great, in whose time some rituals, Menardus says, had a form of blessing and anointing bells, under this title or rubric, Ad signum ecclesie benedicendum, A form for blessing of bells. And it is not improbable but that such a corruption might creep into the rituals of those times, because we find among the Capitulars of Charles the Great, a censure and prohibition of that practice, ut cloacas non baptizent,¹²⁸ that they should not baptize cloaks, which is the old German name for a bell. But what was then prohibited, has since been stiffly avowed and practised, and augmented also with some additional rites, to make bells a sort of charm against storms and thunder, and the assaults of Satan, as the reader that pleases may see the ceremony described by Sleidan¹²⁹ and Hospinian¹³⁰ out of the old Pontificals of the Romish church. But I fear my readers will begin to accuse me now, instead of an omission, of making too long a digression upon this subject, and therefore I return to the business of ancient churches.

CHAPTER VIII.

OF THE ANATHEMATATA, AND OTHER ORNAMENTS OF THE ANCIENT CHURCHES.

AFTER having taken a distinct survey of the chief parts and buildings, and common utensils, of the ancient churches, it will not be amiss to cast our eyes upon the ornamental parts thereof, and consider a little after what manner the first Christians beautified their houses of prayer. The richness and splendour of some of their fabrics, and the value of their utensils belonging to the altar, many of which were of silver and gold, I have already taken notice of: what therefore I shall further add in this place, concerns only the remaining ornaments of the church, some of which were a little uncommon, and but rarely mentioned by modern writers. The general name for all sorts of ornaments in churches, whether in the structure itself, or in the vessels and utensils belonging to it, was anciently anathemata; which though it most commonly signifies persons devoted or accursed by excommunication or separation from the church, yet it sometimes also denotes things given to God, and devoted to his honour and service. In which sense all the sacred vessels and utensils of the church, and all gifts and ornaments belonging to it, were called anathemata, because they were set apart from common use to God's honour and service. Some of the Greeks distinguish thus between ἀναθήματα and ἀναθεύματα, as Suicerus has ob-

Sect. I.
What the ancients meant by their anathemata in churches.

¹²⁴ Dr. Smith's Account of the Greek Church, p. 70.

¹²⁵ Baron. an. 968. t. 10. p. 810.

¹²⁶ Menard. Not. in Sacramental. Gregor. p. 207.

¹²⁷ Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. 1. c. 22. n. 7.

¹²⁸ Capitular. Caroli Magni, cited by Durantus de Ritibus, lib. 1. c. 22. n. 2.

¹²⁹ Sleidan. Commentar. lib. 21. p. 388.

¹³⁰ Hospin. de Templis, lib. 4. c. 9. p. 113.

served¹ out of Chrysostom,² and Hesychius,³ and Balzamon,⁴ and Zonaras, making the first to signify ornaments of the church, or things devoted to God's honour; and the other, things accursed, or devoted to destruction. But others of them do not so nicely observe this distinction, but use the same word to signify both things devoted to God's use, and things devoted to destruction, as Suicerus shows in the same place out of Theodoret, Cyril of Alexandria, the author of the questions ad Orthodoxos under the name of Justin Martyr, and some others. Here I take both words only as signifying gifts or ornaments of churches. In which sense ἀναθήματα is used by St. Luke, xxi. 5, for the gifts and ornaments of the temple. And so Eusebius, describing the hemisphere or altar part of the church of Jerusalem, and the twelve pillars which supported and surrounded it, says, The heads of the pillars were adorned with silver bowls, which Constantine set up as his beautiful ἀνάθημα, that is, his gift or offering⁵ to his God. And a little after he says again, He adorned it⁶ with innumerable gifts of silver and gold and precious stones. So that all the rich vessels and utensils of the altar, the rich vestment which the bishop put on when he administered the sacrament of baptism, which was interwoven with gold, and which, as Theodoret⁷ and Sozomen⁸ tell us, was one of Constantine's gifts to the church of Jerusalem; these, I say, and all other such like ornaments belonging to the church, as well as what contributed to the beauty and splendour of the fabric itself, were all reckoned among the anathemata of the church. But in a more restrained sense, the anathemata sometimes denote more particularly those gifts, which were hanged upon pillars and set in public view, as memorials of some great mercy which men had received from God. In allusion to which Socrates⁹ thinks the term anathema is used for excommunication, because thereby a man's condemnation is published and proclaimed, as if it were hanged up upon a pillar. St. Jerom also had his eye plainly upon this custom, when he speaks of men's gifts¹⁰ hanging in the church upon golden cords, or being set in golden sockets or sconces. For the word funale signifies both. And though he rather advises men to offer their gifts to the true temples of Christ, meaning the bodies and souls of the poor; yet that implies another way of offering their gifts to be in common use, that is, hanging up their anathemata, or donaria, (as he with other Latin writers calls them,) in the material temples. Vide Sidon. Apollinar. lib. 4. Ep. 18. et Paulin. Natali 6. Felicis.

Among these there was one particular kind of gifts, which they called ἐκτυπώματα, because they were a sort of symbolical memorials, or hieroglyphical representations of the kindness and favour, which in any kind they had received. When first they began to be offered and set up in churches, is not very easy to determine: but I think Bochart's conjecture is very probable,¹¹ that it was about the middle of the fifth age, because Theodoret is one of the first writers that takes notice of them. He tells us in one of his Therapeutics, or Discourses to the Gentiles,¹² that when any one obtained the benefit of a signal cure from God in any member of his body, as his eyes, or hands, or feet, &c., he then brought his ἐκτύπωμα, the effigies or figure of that part in silver or gold, to be hanged up in the church to God, as a memorial of his favour. This, Bochart thinks, was done by way of emulation of the Gentiles, among whom it was customary for such as had escaped any great peril or disaster, to consecrate some monument of their by-past evils to their gods that delivered them. As they that had escaped a shipwreck, dedicated a tablet to Neptune or Isis, representing the manner of their shipwreck. So gladiators hanged up their arms to Hercules; and slaves and captives, when they got their liberty and were made free, offered a chain to the lures. And so we read, 1 Sam. vi. 4, that the Philistines sent their golden emerods and mice, figures of the things by which they had suffered, as an offering to the God of Israel. I shall make no further observation upon this practice, but only remark how far the Romish church is degenerate in this matter to the ancient, who offer now to men more than they do to God, and fill their churches with gifts, acknowledging some tutelar saints as their chief patrons and benefactors.

But to proceed with the ancient churches: another ornament, which served for use as well as beauty, was their comely and pertinent inscriptions, many of which are preserved and still to be read in ancient authors. These were of two sorts, some taken out of Scripture; others, useful compositions of men's own inventing. The walls of the church seem commonly to have had some select

Sect. 2.
One particular kind of these, called ἐκτυπώματα, when first brought into churches.

Sect. 3.
Churches anciently adorned with portions of Scripture written upon the walls.

¹ Suicer. Thesaur. voce Ἀναθήμα.

² Chrysost. Hom. 16. in Rom. ³ Hesych. Lexicon.

⁴ Balzamon et Zonar. in Can. 3. Concil. in Templo Sophiæ.

⁵ Euseb. de Vita Constant. lib. 3. c. 38. Ἀνάθημα κάλιπον ἐποίητο τῷ αὐτοῦ Θεῷ.

⁶ Ibid. c. 40. Ἐκόσμηι δ' αὐτὸν ἀδιηγήτους κάλλεσι ἀναθημάτων χρυσοῦ, &c.

⁷ Theodor. lib. 2. c. 27.

⁸ Sozom. lib. 4. c. 25.

⁹ Socrat. lib. 7. c. 31.

¹⁰ Hieron. Ep. 27. ad Eustoch. in Epitaphio Paulæ. Jacent alii pecunias et in corbonam Dei æra congesta, funeralibus aureis dona pendencia, &c. Id. Ep. 13. ad Paulin. Verum Christi templum anima credentis est.—Illi offer donaria.

¹¹ Bochart. Hierozoic. part. 1. lib. 2. cap. 36. p. 368.

¹² Theodor. Serm. 8. de Martyr. t. 4. p. 606.

portions of Scripture written upon them, containing some proper admonition and instruction for all in general, or else more peculiar to that order of persons who had their station in such a particular part or division of the church. Thus I have observed before,¹³ out of St. Ambrose,¹⁴ that the place of the virgins had that text of St. Paul sometimes written by it on the walls, "There is difference between a wife and a virgin; the unmarried woman careth for the things of the Lord, how she may please the Lord," &c. And by this one place we may judge how other parts of the church were embellished and adorned with proper instructions out of the Holy Scripture.

But beside these lessons out of the inspired writings, it was very usual to have other inscriptions of human composure written on the several parts and utensils of many churches. Of which I have already given some instances out of Paulinus, speaking of the catechumenia and *secretaria*¹⁵ of the church. And the curious reader may find abundance more of the same nature, upon the baptistery, and the altar, and the frontispiece,¹⁶ too long to be here inserted. I shall only here repeat two short distichs written over the doors of the church, one on the outside, exhorting men to enter the church with pure and peaceable hearts, on this wise:

Pax tibi sit, quicumque Dei penetralia Christi
Pectore pacifico candidus ingrederis.

And the other on the inner side of the doors, requiring men, when they go out of the church with their bodies, to leave at least their hearts behind them.

Quisquis ab æde Dei perfectis ordine votis Egrederis, remea corpore, corde mane.

Many other the like inscriptions may be seen in Sidonius Apollinaris,¹⁷ and other writers of that age; but I will only add one more, which, for the curiosity of it, may deserve to be here inserted. It is the inscription which the emperor Justinian is said to have written round about the altar of the church of Sancta Sophia. The altar itself, Cedrenus tells us, was a most inimitable work: for it was artificially composed of all sorts of materials that either the earth or the sea could afford, gold, silver, and all kinds of stones, wood, metals, and other things. Which being melted and mixed together, a most curious table was framed out of this universal mass; and about it was this inscription: "We thy servants,¹⁸ Justinian and Theodora, offer unto thee, O Christ, thy own gifts out of thy own, which we beseech thee favourably to accept, O Son and Word of God, who wast made flesh and crucified for our sakes. Keep us in the true orthodox faith; and this empire which thou hast committed to our trust, augment and preserve it to thy own glory, προσεβείας τῆς ἁγίας θεοτόκου, by the intercessions of the holy mother of God and Virgin Mary." The reader will not wonder at this last part of this inscription in the sixth age, when the prayers of saints in heaven were thought available without directly praying to them.

Another considerable part of the ornament of churches was the beautifying of the roof, or camera, as they then called it. This was done two ways, either by Mosaic work, which they call musivum; or by lacunary work, dividing the roof into several panels, by architects termed laquearia, or lacunaria, from lacus, some of which were round, and some square, (as Valesius observes out of Isidore,¹⁹) and divided either with wood, or plaster, or colours, from each other, and then either gilded or painted, as men's fancies led them. Both these were used to adorn the ancient churches. The temple of Sancta Sophia was curiously wrought in Mosaic or chequer work, as Procopius²⁰ relates; and Constantine's church at Jerusalem was lacunary: for Eusebius²¹ says, the whole roof was divided into certain carved tables or panels, and all laid over with shining gold. And this he calls a little before καμάραν λακωνάριαν, a lacunary roof adorned with gold. Some churches, as that of Paulinus²² of Nola, were beautified both ways. For Paulinus says, the roof of his apsis, or altar part, was Mosaic work; but the body of the church, and the galleries on both sides the church, were lacunary, that is, divided into panels, as we see in many of our modern churches. The reader that pleases may see a great deal more of this matter in St. Jerom, who often speaks of their lacunary²³ golden roofs, and walls adorned with crust of mar-

¹³ Book VIII. chap. 5. sect. 9.

¹⁴ Ambros. ad Virgin. Lapsam.

¹⁵ Chap. 6. sect. 22.

¹⁶ Paulin. Ep. 12. ad Sever.

¹⁷ Sidon. lib. 4. Ep. 18.

¹⁸ Cedren. Hist. Compend. an. 32. Justin. p. 386. Τὰ σὰ ἐκ τῶν σῶν σοι προσφέρομεν οἱ δοῦλοι σου Χριστέ, &c.

¹⁹ Isidor. Origen. lib. 19. Laquearia sunt quæ cameram subtegunt et ornant: quæ et lacunaria dicuntur, quod lacus quosdam quadratos vel rotundos, ligno vel gypso vel coloribus habeant pictos, cum signis intermicantibus.

²⁰ Procop. de Ædificiis Justin. lib. I. cited by Valesius, Not. in Euseb. de Vit. Const. lib. 3. c. 36.

²¹ Euseb. lib. 3. de Vit. Const. c. 36 Τὰ δὲ τῆς εἰσω στῆγης γλυφαῖς φατωμάτων ἀπρητισμένα, &c. Vid. c. 32.

²² Paulin. Ep. 12. ad Sever. p. 150 et 151. Apsidem solo et parietibus marmoratam camera musivo illusa clarificat. — Totum vero extra concham basilicæ spatium alto et lacunato culmine geminis utrinque porticibus dilatatur.

²³ Hieron. lib. 2. in Zechar. viii. Non solum laquearia et tecta fulgentia auro, sed parietes diversi marmoris crustis vestiti. Id. Ep. 2. ad Nepotian. Marmora nitent auro, splendent laquearia, gemmis altare distinguitur, &c. It. Ep. 30. Epitaph. Fabiolæ, c. 4. Sonabant psalmi, et aurata templorum tecta reboans in sublime quatiebat Alleluja. It.

ble; and pillars with their chapters of shining gold; and gates inlaid with ivory and silver; and altars distinguished and beset with precious stones and gold. Though he was no great admirer of these things himself, but a greater friend to charity.

They of the Romish church, when they are describing the ancient churches, commonly add to these other ornaments that of pictures and images, according to the modern custom: and nothing will content them, but to have them as ancient as churches themselves, that is, to be derived from apostolical practice. To this purpose, they have invented an apostolical council at Antioch, wherein not only the use, but the worship of images is pretended to be authorized by the apostles. And the credit of this council is stiffly defended by Baronius,²⁴ and Turrian, and Binius, and many such over-zealous writers. But Petavius,²⁵ and Pagi,²⁶ and other writers of candour and judgment, give it up as a mere forgery, and freely confess it to be a fiction of the modern Greeks. Petavius also²⁷ owns, that for three or four of the first ages, there was little or no use of images in churches. And indeed the evidences are so plain, that none but they who resolve to wink hard can deny them. The silence of all ancient authors is good evidence in this case. The silence of the heathen is further confirmation. For they never recriminated, or charged the use of images upon them. Nay, in the last persecution, when they often plundered and pillaged their churches, we never read of any images seized in them, though we have several particular catalogues or inventories of what they found there, left upon record by the heathen. It is a very full one which Baronius²⁸ first published, and is since inserted among the Collections²⁹ at the end of Optatus. There is a particular breviat of all things found by the persecutors in the church of Paul, bishop of Cirta in Numidia, where we find mention made of cups, and flagons, and bowls, and water-pots, and lamps, and candlesticks, and torches, and coats, and other clothing for men and women, which in those days seem to be laid up in store, either for the poor or the ascetics of the church: but of images or pictures there is not a syllable, which is at least a good negative argument that there was no such thing then in their churches. Nay, there are positive proofs in the fourth age, that in some places they were not then allowed to be set up in churches. As in Spain, in the time of the council of Eliberis, anno 305, there was a positive decree against them. For one of the canons of that council runs in these words: We decree³⁰ that pictures ought not to be in churches, lest that which is worshipped and adored be painted upon the walls. And it was certainly so in Cyprus to the end of this century, as appears from that famous epistle of Epiphanius to John, bishop of Jerusalem, translated by St. Jerom, where, speaking of his passage through Anablatha, a village of Palestine, he says, he found there a veil hanging before the doors of the church, wherein was painted³¹ the image of Christ, or some saint; for he did not well remember whether it was: but seeing, however, the image of a man hanging in the church against the authority of Scripture, he tore it in pieces, and advised the guardians of the church rather to make a winding-sheet of it, to bury some poor man in. Some storm against this passage, as an interpolation of some modern Greek iconoclast; which is the common evasion of Bellarmine³² and Baronius,³³ and the rest that follow them. But Petavius³⁴ owns it to be genuine, and says, images were not allowed in the time of Epiphanius in the Cyprian churches: which is certainly the truth of the matter, when men have used all their arts and shifts to persuade the contrary. The common writers of the Romish church are as uneasy about the council of Eliberis.

Ep. 8. ad Demetriam, Virgin. Alii adificent ecclesias; vestiant parietes marmorum crustis; columnarum moles advehant, earumque deaudent capita, pretiosum ornatum non sentiant; ebore argenteoque valvas, et gemmis aurata distinguant altaria. Non reprehendo, non abnuo. Unusquisque in sensu suo abundet. Meliusque est hoc facere, quam repositis opibus incubare. Sed tibi aliud propositum est, Christum vestire in pauperibus, &c.

²⁴ Baron. an. 102. n. 19 et 20. Binius, Not. in Conc. Antioch. Conc. t. 1. p. 62.

²⁵ Petav. Dogmat. Theol. de Incarnat. lib. 15. c. 14. n. 5. Quod ad illum canonem apostolicum attinet, quem primus edidit in lucem Franciscus Turrianus, eum puto suppositum esse, &c.

²⁶ Pagi, Critic. in Baron. an. 56. n. 3.

²⁷ Petav. ibid. c. 13. n. 3. Pagi, ibid. Certum est, imagines Christi, et maxime statuas, primis ecclesiæ sæculis non fuisse substitutas loco idolorum, nec fidelium venerationi expositas.

²⁸ Baron. an. 303. n. 12.

²⁹ Gesta Purgation. Cæcilian. ad calcem Optati, p. 266.

In brevi, sic: calices duo aurei: item calices sex argentei: urceola sex argentea: cucumellum argenteum: lucernæ argenteæ septem: cereofala duo: candela breves æneæ cum lucernis suis septem: Item lucernæ æneæ undecim cum catenis suis. Tunica muliebres 82: mafortea 38: tunica viriles 16: caligæ viriles paria 13: caligæ muliebres paria 47: coplæ rusticanae 19.

³⁰ Conc. Eliber. c. 36. Placuit picturas in ecclesia esse non debere, ne quod colitur aut adoratur, in parietibus depingatur.

³¹ Epiphani. Ep. ad Johan. Hierosol. Inveni ibi velum pendens in foribus ejusdem ecclesiæ tinctum atque depictum, et habens imaginem quasi Christi vel sancti cujusdam. Non enim satis memini cujus imago fuerit. Cum ergo hoc viderem in ecclesia Christi contra auctoritatem Scripturarum hominis pendere imaginem, scidi illud, et magis dedi consilium custodiendi ejusdem loci, ut pauperem mortuum eo obvolvent et efferret.

³² Bellarmin. de Imagin. lib. 2. c. 9.

³³ Baron. an. 392. p. 668.

³⁴ Petav. de Incarnat. lib. 15. c. 14. n. 8.

Baronius flies to the old refuge of imposture in that single canon; others say, they are all of the same stamp. Others, who think this a little too crude and bold, soften the matter by saying, images were only prohibited for fear the Gentiles should think Christians worshipped stocks and stones; or it was only images painted upon the walls that were prohibited, because these were liable to be abused by the persecutors, which others, that might be removed, were not liable to. So Sylvius, in his notes upon this canon. Others fly to the new notion of disciplina arcani, and tell us it was only the images of God and the Trinity that are here prohibited, (not the images of saints and martyrs,) and that only for fear the catechumens and Gentiles should be let into the secrets of their religion, and understand the mystery of the Trinity before their time. Which pleasant notion was first invented by Mendoza,³⁵ approved by Cardinal Bona,³⁶ and highly magnified by Schelstrate,³⁷ and Pagi,³⁸ as a clear solution to the protestants' argument against the worship of images drawn from this canon. But yet this does not satisfy either Albaspinus or Petavius. For Albaspinus thinks the images³⁹ of God and the Trinity were prohibited for fear the catechumens and new converts should entertain wrong notions and dishonourable thoughts of the majesty of God, when they saw him, whom they were first taught to believe invisible, and immaterial, and incomprehensible, afterward circumscribed in visible lines and colours. Which is a reason that will always hold against making images of the Deity, though it does not give the full sense of this canon, which certainly prohibits the use of images in general, and not only those of the Trinity, in churches. And therefore Petavius⁴⁰ gives a more general reason for the prohibition of all images whatsoever at that time, because the remembrance of idolatry was yet fresh in men's minds, and therefore it was not expedient to set up images in the oratories and temples of Christians. So that, in fact, now the case is clear, that Christians for near four hundred years did not allow of images in churches. Tertullian⁴¹ indeed once mentions the picture of a shepherd bringing home his lost sheep, upon a communion cup in some of the catholic churches. But as this is a singular instance only of a symbolical representation, or emblem, so it is the only instance Petavius pretends to find in all the three first ages. In the middle of the fourth age, the Christians of Panceas, or Cæsarea-Philippi, showed a little respect to the statue of Christ, which the Syrophœnician woman, who had been cured of an issue of blood, was supposed to have erected in honour of our Saviour. For when Julian had removed it, to set his own in the room, and the heathen out of hatred to Christ had used it contumeliously, and broken it in pieces by dragging it about the streets; Sozomen⁴² tells us, the Christians gathered the fragments together, and laid them up in the church, where they were kept to his own time. Philostorgius,⁴³ in telling the same story, adds one circumstance, which well explains Sozomen's meaning: for he says, they were laid up in the diaconicum or vestry of the church, and there carefully kept indeed, but by no means worshipped or adored. So that it was not a statue set up in a church, but only the fragments of it laid up in the repository of the church; and there not to be worshipped, but only to be kept from violence, and that the heathen might offer no more such barbarous indignities to it. Which was so far a commendable act, but yet no proof of images being set up publicly in churches.

Yet it is not denied, but that in some places, about the latter end of the fourth century, pictures of saints and martyrs began to creep into churches. Paulinus, bishop of Nola, to keep the country people employed, and prevent their running into riot and excess, when they met together to celebrate the anniversary festival of the dedication of the church of St. Felix, ordered the church to be painted with the images of saints and Scripture histories, such as those of Esther, and Job, and Tobit, and Judith, as he himself⁴⁴ acquaints us in his writings. And some intimations are given of the beginnings of the same practice in other places by St. Austin, who often speaks of the pictures⁴⁵ of Abraham sacrificing his son, and of the pictures⁴⁶ of Peter and Paul, and of some worshippers of pictures⁴⁷ too, but they have not his approbation. Nor had they the approbation of the catholic church: for he says, the church condemned them, as ignorant, and superstitious, and

Sect. 7.
First brought in by Paulinus and his contemporaries, privately and by degrees, in the latter end of the fourth century.

³⁵ Mendoza, Not. in Conc. Eliber. c. 36. Conc. t. 1. p. 1240.

³⁶ Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. 1. c. 16. n. 2.

³⁷ Schelstrat. Disciplina Arcani. c. 6. art. 3.

³⁸ Pagi, Critic. in Baron. an. 55. n. 5.

³⁹ Albaspin. Not. in can. 36. Concil. Eliber.

⁴⁰ Petav. de Incarnat. lib. 15. c. 14. n. 8. Recentem adhuc idololatriæ memoriam fuisse: ob idque nondum expedissee Christianorum in oratoriis ac templis imagines statui.

⁴¹ Tertul. de Pudicit. c. 10. Si forte patrocinabitur pastor, quem in calice depingis—At ego ejus pastoris Scripturam haurio, qui non potest frangi.

⁴² Sozom. lib. 5. c. 21.

⁴³ Philostorg. lib. 7. c. 3. Τὸν ἀνδριάντα μετασησάμενοι ἐν τῷ τῆς ἐκκλησίας διακοικῶ, τὰ πρίποντα ἐθεράπευον, σίβητοντες μὲν ἢ προσκυνοῦντες οὐδαμῶς.

⁴⁴ Paulin. Natal. 9. Felicis, p. 615. Propterea visum nobis opus utile, totis Felicis domibus pictura illudere sancta. Id. Natal. 10. p. 617. Martyribus mediam pictis pia nomina signant, &c.

⁴⁵ Aug. cont. Faust. lib. 22. c. 73. t. 6.

⁴⁶ Id. de Consensu Evangel. lib. 1. c. 10.

⁴⁷ Id. de Morib. Eccl. Cathol. lib. 1. c. 34. Novi multos esse sepulchrorum et picturarum adoratores—quos et ipsa ecclesia condemnat, et tanquam malos filios corrigere studet.

self-willed persons, and daily endeavoured to correct them, as untoward children.

Sect. 8.
The pictures of kings and bishops brought into the church about the same time.

From which any rational and unprejudiced person will easily conclude, that the first design of bringing pictures into churches, was only for ornament or history, and not for worship and adoration, as St. Austin and Philostorgius have declared. And this may be further confirmed from what Paulinus himself and other writers assure us of, that at first the pictures of the living had their place in the church, as well as the dead, and bishops and kings were joined with the saints and martyrs. Paulinus his own picture was set with St. Martin's in the baptistery of the church built by Severus, and Paulinus himself⁴⁸ wrote two epigrams by way of inscription to be set by them, to teach men not to worship, but to imitate them, the one as a saint, the other as a penitent sinner. Baronius thinks⁴⁹ Acacius, bishop of Constantinople, was the first that had this honour done him, anno 488. But Valesius⁵⁰ judiciously corrects his error, and observes it to have been customary long before. And the instance I have given in Paulinus sufficiently confirms his observation. Theodorus Lector⁵¹ speaks of the same honour done to Macedonius, bishop of Constantinople, in the remark that he makes upon Timotheus his successor, that whatever church he went into, he would never begin Divine service, till the images of Macedonius were first pulled down. Suidas takes notice of the picture of Gennadius, patriarch of Constantinople, being joined with that of Christ,⁵² and Christ speaking to him in these words, "Destroy this temple, and in thy successor's days I will raise it up again." Damascen, a great advocate for images,⁵³ pretends to carry this practice as high as Constantine, telling us from Socrates, that Constantine ordered his own images to be set up in temples: but, as Mr. Spanheim⁵⁴ has observed, there is something of fraud in the relation: for Socrates speaks not of Christian churches, but of heathen⁵⁵ temples, in which having demolished their idols, he caused his own images to be placed in their room. But admitting it had been as Damascen pretends, it makes nothing to the purpose for which he alleges it, which was to prove the worship of images in churches.

For now, I presume, no one will suspect that the pictures of bishops and kings were set up in churches to be worshipped, while they were living among other men, but only designed to be an ornament to the church, or a civil honour to the persons. And the same must be concluded of the pictures of the dead, since the first introducers of them intermixed their own pictures with them. But it must be owned, that this superstition presently followed upon the setting up of pictures in churches: yet it was never approved, till the second council of Nice, anno 787, made a decree in favour of it. Serenus, bishop of Marseilles, ordered all images to be defaced, and cast out of all the churches of his diocese: and though Gregory the Great blamed him for this, and defended the use of pictures in churches as innocent, and useful for instruction of the vulgar,⁵⁶ yet he equally condemns the worship and adoration of them. And when the council of Nice had established it, in opposition to the council of Constantinople of three hundred and thirty-eight bishops, held anno 754, who had before condemned it, the decrees of Nice were rejected by all the Western world, the popes of Rome only excepted. The council of Frankfort in Germany, the council of Paris in France, and some other councils in Britain, agreed unanimously to condemn them, and for some hundred years after the worship of images was not received in any of the three foresaid nations. But it is as much beyond my design to pursue this history any further, as it is needless, there being so many excellent discourses on this particular subject, especially those of Mr. Daille,⁵⁷ Bishop Stillingfleet,⁵⁸ and Spanheim,⁵⁹ who have omitted nothing on this head that was necessary to answer the cavils of their Romish antagonists, or give satisfaction to a curious reader.

All I shall add further, therefore, upon this subject, is only two observations, which Petavius himself⁶⁰ has made for us. The first is, that the ancients never allowed any pictures of God the Father, or the Trinity, to be set up in their churches. For this he produces the testimonies of Origen,⁶¹ St. Ambrose,⁶² and St. Austin,⁶³ who particularly pronounce it to be an impious thing for any Christian

Sect. 9.
But neither pictures of the living or dead designed for worship.

Sect. 10.
No images of God or the Trinity allowed in churches till after the second Nice council.

⁴⁸ Paulin. Ep. 12. ad Sever. p. 142. Adstat perfectæ Martinus regula vitæ: Paulinus veniam quo mereare docet. Hunc peccatores, illum spectate beati: exemplar sanctis ille sit, iste reis.

⁴⁹ Baron. an. 488. p. 438. Ex Suida, voce Acacius.

⁵⁰ Vales. Not. in Theodor. Lector. lib. 2. p. 167.

⁵¹ Theodor. Lector. lib. 2. p. 563.

⁵² Suidas Lexicon. voce Acacius.

⁵³ Damascen. Orat. 3. de Imagin.

⁵⁴ Spanheim. Histor. Imagin. sect. 1. p. 14.

⁵⁵ Socrat. lib. 1. c. 19. Εἰκόνας δὲ τὰς ἰδίας ἐν τοῖς ναοῖς ἀπέθετο.

⁵⁶ Gregor. lib. 9. Ep. 9. Quia sanctorum imagines adorari vetuisses, omnino laudavimus: fregisse vero reprehendimus, &c. Vid. lib. 7. Ep. 110.

⁵⁷ Dallæus de Imaginibus.

⁵⁸ Stillingfl. Defence of the Discourse of Idolatry, &c.

⁵⁹ Spanheim. Historia Imaginum, Lugdun. Bat. 1686. 8vo.

⁶⁰ Petav. de Incarnat. lib. 15. c. 14. n. 1.

⁶¹ Origen. cont. Cels. lib. 6.

⁶² Ambros. in Psal. cxviii. Octonar. 12.

⁶³ Aug. de Fide et Symbolo, c. 7. Tale simulachrum nefas est Christiano in templo collocare, multo magis in corde nefarium est.

to set up any such image in the church, and much more to do it in his heart. Nay, Pope Gregory II., who was otherwise a great stickler for images, in that very epistle⁶⁴ which he wrote to the emperor Leo to defend the worship of them, denies it to be lawful to make any image of the Divine nature. And the second council of Nice itself was against it, as is evident from the epistles of Germanus, bishop of Constantinople,⁶⁵ and John, bishop of Thessalonica, which are recited with approbation in the Acts of that council. And Damascen, following the doctrine of the same council, says, It is as great impiety as it is folly,⁶⁶ to make any image of the Divine nature, which is invisible, incorporeal, incircumscribable, and not to be figured by the art of man. And therefore in all ancient history we never meet with any one instance of picturing God the Father, because it was supposed he never appeared in any visible shape, but only by a voice from heaven. Upon this account Paulinus, where he describes a symbolical representation of the three Divine Persons, made in the painting of a church, makes a lamb to be the symbol of Christ, and a dove the symbol of the Holy Ghost, but for God the Father⁶⁷ nothing but a voice from heaven. And this they did in compliance with that text in Deut. iv. 12. "The Lord spake unto you out of the midst of the fire: ye heard the voice of his words, but saw no similitude, only ye heard a voice." By which we see how much the present church of Rome has outgone the first patrons even of image worship itself, by allowing pictures of the Deity commonly in their temples, which the ancients reckoned to be impious and absurd, and is acknowledged to be an abuse fit to be corrected by Cassander,⁶⁸ though Petavius, after all his concessions and acknowledgments of the novelty of the thing, and its contrariety to ancient custom, endeavours to find out some colour for the present practice.

His other acknowledgment of a difference between the practice of the ancient church, and that of his own at this day, is, that the ancients did not approve of massy images, or statues of wood, or metal, or stone, but only pictures or paintings to be used in churches. This he proves from the testimonies of Germanus, bishop of Constantinople,⁶⁹ and Stephanus Bostrensis, both alleged in the Acts of the second Council of Nice: which shows, that massy images or statues were thought to look too much like idols even by that worst of councils. But some plead the authority of Gregory Nazianzen⁷⁰ for statues in churches, to whom Petavius answers, that he speaks not of statues in temples, but of profane statues in other places. Which is a very just and true observation. For it is most certain from the writings of St. Austin⁷¹ and Optatus,⁷² that there were no statues in that age in their churches, or upon their altars, because they reckon both those to be mere heathenish customs. And Cassander observes⁷³ the same out of the writings of Gregory the Great. He also notes, that till the time of the sixth general council, the images of Christ were not usually in the effigies or figure of a man, but only symbolically represented under the type of a lamb: and so the Holy Ghost was represented under the type or symbol of a dove: but that council forbade⁷⁴ the picturing of Christ any more in the symbol of a lamb, and ordered it only to be drawn in the effigies of a man. I presume, by this time the worship of images was begun, anno 692. And it was now thought indecent to pay their devotions to the picture of a lamb, and therefore they would no longer endure it to be seen in the church. I have been the more particular in recounting and explaining these things distinctly, that the reader might have in one short view the rise and progress of that grand superstition, which has so overspread the church and defaced its worship in the matter of images, which were introduced at first only for historical use, to be laymen's books, and a sort of ornaments for the church, though, as the event proved, the most dangerous of any other.

There was one way more of adorning churches, which I should not have thought worth mentioning, but for its innocency and natural simplicity; that is, the custom of garnishing and decking them with flowers and branches. Which was not done at any certain times for any pretended mystery, but only to make them more decent and fit for a body of men to meet in. St. Austin takes notice of the custom, speaking of one⁷⁵ who carried away with him some flowers from off the altar. And Paulinus, in his poetical way, refers to it likewise.⁷⁶ But St. Jerom does it the greatest honour, to give it a place

Sect. 12. Of adorning the church with flowers and branches.

Sect. 11. Not usually statues or massy images, but only paintings and pictures, and those symbolical rather than any other.

⁶⁴ Gregor. 2. Ep. 1. ad Leon. in Act. 4. Conc. Nicen. 2.

⁶⁵ German. Ep. ad Leon. Act. 4. Conc. Nic. 2.

⁶⁶ Damascen. de Fide Orthodox. lib. 4. c. 17. Παροφροσύνης ἄκρα καὶ ἀσεβείας τὸ σχηματίζειν τὸ θεῖον, &c. Id. Orat. 1 et 2. de Imagin. passim.

⁶⁷ Paulin. Ep. 12. ad Sever. p. 150. Pleno coruscet Trinitas mysterio; stat Christus agno; vox Patris celo tonat: et per columbam Spiritus Sanctus fluit.

⁶⁸ Cassand. Consultat. Sect. de Imagin. p. 179. Illud quoque inter abusus ponendum est, quod etiam Divinitati in Trinitatis deformatione simulachrum effingitur, quod veteres absurdum et nefarium judicassent.

⁶⁹ German. Ep. ad Thom. Claudiopol. in Act. 4. Conc. Nic. 2. Stephan. Bostren. ibid. Act. 2.

⁷⁰ Nazian. Ep. 49. ⁷¹ Aug. in Psal. cxiii. ⁷² Optat. lib. 2.

⁷³ Cassand. Consult. de Imagin. p. 165.

⁷⁴ Conc. Trull. c. 83.

⁷⁵ Aug. de Civ. Dei, lib. 22. c. 8. Abscedens aliquid de altari florum, quod occurrit, tulit, &c.

⁷⁶ Paulin. Natal. 3. Felicis, p. 541. Ferte Deo pueri laudem, pia solvite vota: spargite flore solum, prætexite limina sertis.

in his panegyric upon his friend Nepotian, making it a part⁷⁷ of his commendable character, that he took care to have every thing neat and clean about the church, the altar bright, the walls whited, the pavement swept, the gates veiled, the vestry clean, and the vessels shining; and so far did his pious solicitude about these matters extend, that he made flowers, and leaves, and branches of trees contribute to the beauty and ornament of the churches. These were but small things in themselves, St. Jerom says, but a pious mind devoted to Christ is intent upon things great and small, and neglects nothing that may deserve the name of the very meanest office in the church. And it is plain St. Jerom had a greater value for such sort of natural beauty and comeliness in churches, than for rich ornaments of costly pictures and paintings, and silver, and gold, and precious stones. And therefore, as I observed before,⁷⁸ he rather advised his rich friends to lay out their wealth upon the living temples of God, the backs and bellies of the poor, and commended the rich lady Paula for so doing,⁷⁹ rather than for hanging up needless and superfluous gifts, as others did, upon the pillars of the temple. And it is no wonder then he should commend Nepotian's frugal care, who had divested himself of all his estate to relieve the poor, and left himself no ability to adorn the church any other way, but that which was most to St. Jerom's liking and approbation.

CHAPTER IX.

OF THE CONSECRATION OF CHURCHES.

Sect. 1.
What the ancients
meant by the consecration of churches. ANCIENTLY, when churches were finished and adorned, it was then usual to proceed to a dedication or consecration of them; which was a thing that was sometimes performed with a great deal of pious solemnity, and therefore it will be proper in the next place to make a little inquiry into the nature and circumstances of it. Now, I must observe first of all, that by the consecration of the church, the ancients always mean the devoting or setting it apart peculiarly for Divine service: but the manner and ceremony of doing this was not always exactly one and the same; therefore we are chiefly to regard the substance of the thing, which was the separation of any building from common use to a religious service. Whatever ceremony this was performed with, the first act of initiating and appropriating it to a Divine use was its consecration. And therefore, in allusion to this, the first beginning of any thing is many times called its dedication. As when Cyprian, speaking of Aurelius the confessor, whom he had ordained a reader, says, he dedicated¹ his reading, he means no more but that he performed the first act of his office in the church, which, in his phrase, was its dedication. Whether churches had any other ceremony besides this in their dedication for the three first ages, is not certain; though it is highly probable they might have a solemn thanksgiving and prayer for a sanctified use of them also, over and besides the usual liturgy of the church, because this was in use among the Jews; who thus dedicated not only their temple, 1 Kings viii., but also their private houses and walls of their cities, when they were finished, as appears from the title of the 30th Psalm, which is inscribed, "A Psalm or Song at the dedication of the house of David;" and from the account which is given by Nehemiah, xii. 27, of the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem. It is further probable, from the constant practice of Christians in consecrating their ordinary meat by thanksgiving and prayer, before they begin to use it; and from the manner of consecrating churches in the following ages after the time of Constantine: all which make it highly probable, that the Christians of the three first ages used the same ceremony of particular prayers and thanksgiving to God in the dedication of their churches. But having no express testimonies for this, I will not pretend positively to assert it. Durantus² and Bona³ are indeed very confident it was always so from the time of the apostles: but they build upon no better foundation than the feigned epistles of Clemens Romanus, Evaristus, and Hyginus, and the Acts of St. Cæcilia in Simeon Metaphrastes, which are writings of no authority, when the question is about matters of fact in the first and apostolical ages.

Therefore leaving this matter, for want of better evidence, as a thing only probable, but not certain, I proceed to consider it as practised in the next age, when, in the peaceable reign of Constantine, churches were rebuilt over all the world, and dedicated with great solemnity. Then it was a desirable sight, as Eusebius⁴ words it, to behold how

Sect. 2.
The first authentic accounts of this to be fetched from the fourth century.

⁷⁷ Hieron. Ep. 3. Epitaph. Nepotian. Erat sollicitus si niteret altare, si parietes absque fuligine, si pavimenta tersa, si janitor creber in portis, vela semper in ostiis, si sacrarium mundum, si vasa luculenta, et in omnes ceremonias pia sollicitudo disposita.—Basilicas ecclesie et martyrum conciliabula diversis floribus et arborum comis, vitiumque pampinis adumbravit. ⁷⁸ See before, sect. 5.

⁷⁹ Hieron. Ep. 27. Epitaph. Paulæ. Nolebat in his lapidibus pecuniam effundere, qui cum terra et sæculo transituri sunt: sed in vivis lapidibus, qui voluntur super terram.—

¹ Cyprian. Ep. 37. al. 38. ad Cler. Carthag. Dominico legit interim nobis, id est, auspiciatus est pacem, dum dedicat lectionem.

² Durant. de Ritib. Eccles. lib. 1. c. 24. n. 1.

³ Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. 1. c. 20. n. 3.

⁴ Euseb. lib. 10. c. 3. Τὸ πᾶσιν ἐκταῖον θέαμα, ἐγκαί-μιον ἔορται κατὰ πόλεις καὶ τῶν ἁγίων νεοπαγίων προσευκ-τηρίων ἀφιερῶσεις. Vide Euseb. de Laud. Constant. c. 17.

the consecrations of the new-built churches and the feasts of the dedications were solemnized in every city. That which made these solemnities the more august and venerable, was, that commonly a whole synod of the neighbouring or provincial bishops met at the dedication. The church of Jerusalem which Constantine built over our Saviour's sepulchre, was consecrated in a full synod of all the bishops of the East, whom Constantine called first to Tyre, and then to Jerusalem, anno 335, for this very purpose, as Eusebius⁵ and all the other historians inform us. In like manner Socrates observes,⁶ that the council of Antioch, anno 341, was summoned on purpose to dedicate the famous church there, called Dominicum aureum, which was begun by Constantine and finished by Constantius. And there are many examples of the like nature to be met with in ancient history. Now, the solemnity was usually begun with a panegyric oration or sermon, consisting chiefly of praise and thanksgiving to God, and sometimes expatiating upon the commendation of the founder, or the glory of the new-built church. Such as that oration in Eusebius,⁷ made at the dedication of the church of Paulinus at Tyre, and others⁸ in Gaudentius and St. Ambrose upon the like occasion. Sometimes they had more than one discourse upon it: for Eusebius, speaking of the dedication of churches in the time of Constantine, says, Every bishop that was present⁹ made a speech in praise of the convention; so that the panegyric which he there records, was but one of many that were spoken. In another place, describing the dedication of the church of Jerusalem, he says, Some made speeches by way of panegyric¹⁰ upon the emperor and the magnificence of his building; others handled a common place in divinity adapted to the present occasion; and others discoursed upon the lessons of Scripture that were read, expounding the mystical sense of them: and he bore a part in each of these himself, being present at that solemnity. When this part of the ceremony was over, they then proceeded to the mystical service, or the offering of the unbloody sacrifice, as he there terms it, to God; praying for the peace of the world, the prosperity of the church, and a blessing upon the emperor and his children. Among these prayers they seem to have had a particular prayer for the church then dedicated, as some understand St. Ambrose, who is thought¹¹ to have a form upon such an occasion; which, because we have not many such in the writings of the ancients, I will here insert in his own words: "I beseech thee now, O Lord, let thine eye be continually upon this house, upon this altar, which is now dedicated unto thee, upon these spiritual stones, in every one of which a sensible temple is consecrated unto thee: let the prayers of thy servants, which are poured out in this place, be always accepted of thy Divine mercy. Let every sacrifice, that is offered in this temple with a pure faith and a pious zeal, be unto thee a sweet-smelling savour of sanctification. And when thou lookest upon that sacrifice of salvation, which taketh away the sins of the world, have respect to these oblations of chastity, and defend them by thy continual help, that they may be sweet and acceptable offerings unto thee, and pleasing unto Christ the Lord: vouchsafe to keep their whole spirit, soul, and body, without blame, unto the day of thy Son Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen." I do not deny, but that this prayer, in some parts of it, may seem to look more like a consecration of virgins than a consecration of churches: perhaps it might serve for both, the spiritual and the material temples of God together; but if any thinks it means only the former, I will not contend about it, seeing it is already proved out of Eusebius, that at least panegyric orations, and praises of God, and prayers for the church, were always part of the solemnity and ceremony of these dedications. And till a solemn day was appointed for the performance of these, it was not according to rule for any one to use a new-built church as a place of worship, unless a great necessity compelled him to it. Which is evident from the apology that Athanasius makes for himself to Constantius, for using the great church of Alexandria on the Easter festival, before it was finished and dedicated by the emperor its founder. He says,¹² the multitude was so great, that the lesser churches would not contain them without hazard of their lives, and therefore they importuned the bishop that they might assemble in the great church, otherwise threatening that they would meet in the open fields: upon which he consented to have prayers in this church; but this did not go for its dedication; for he tells the emperor, they still expected a day, when he

⁵ Euseb. lib. 4. de Vit. Const. c. 43. Socrat. lib. 1. c. 28. Sozomen. lib. 2. c. 26. Theodor. lib. 1. c. 31.

⁶ Socrat. lib. 2. c. 8.

⁷ Euseb. lib. 10. c. 4.

⁸ Gaudent. Serm. 17. in Dedicat. Basilicæ. Ambros. Serm. 89.

⁹ Euseb. lib. 10. c. 3.

¹⁰ Euseb. de. Vit. Constant. lib. 4. c. 45.

¹¹ Ambros. Exhort. ad Virgines, in fine. Te nunc, Domine, precor, ut supra hanc domum tuam, supra hæc altaria quæ hodie dedicantur, supra hos lapides spirituales, quibus sensibile tibi in singulis templum sacratum, quotidianus præsul intendas, orationesque servorum tuorum, quæ in hoc loco funduntur, Divina tua suscipias misericordia. Fiat tibi in odorem sanctificationis omne sacrificium, quod in hoc templo fide integra, pia sedulitate offertur. Et cum ad illam respicis hostiam salutarem, per quam peccatum mundi hujus aboletur, respicias etiam ad has piæ hostias castitatis, et diuturno eas tuearis auxilio, ut fiant tibi in odorem suavitatis hostiæ acceptabiles, Christo Domino placentes, et integro spiritum eorum, animam et corpus, sine querelæ loco usque in diem Domini Jesu Christi Filii tui servare digneris. Amen.

¹² Athan. Apol. 1. ad Constant. t. 1. p. 682 et 684.

himself should give the orders for its encenia, or feast of dedication, and then solemnly give his thanks to God for the finishing of it, as had been done in the time of his predecessor Alexander, when the church of Theonas was building, and as he had seen it done at Triers, and Aquileia, and other places, where churches were sometimes used for prayer upon such urgent and pressing necessities before they were finished; but the using them for Divine service upon such occasions was not their dedication; but that always came after, and was a proper and solemn eucharistical service, or thanksgiving to God for the accomplishment of the holy structure. So that this evidently makes out the observation that has been made out of Eusebius before, That the common prayers of the church were not looked upon as a formal dedication, without special panegyric orations, and forms of adoration and praise more peculiar to that occasion. And this also confutes the opinion of those, who think the setting up the sign of a cross, or placing a communion table in a church, was its dedication. For these things might be done without any dedication. Which appears not only from this discourse of Athanasius, but from a case related in Synesius, where some pretended that a certain place was consecrated into a church, because it had been used for prayer and administration of the sacrament in a time of hostile invasion; against which Synesius positively determines,¹³ that such a use in time of necessity was no consecration; for otherwise mountains, and valleys, and private houses would be churches.

It is evident from what has been already said, that these consecrations being generally performed in a synod of bishops, the bishops were the ministers always employed in this service. But it might happen that none but the bishop of the diocese could be there, and then it was his business peculiarly to perform the office of consecration, which, by some ancient canons, is so specially reserved to the office of bishops, that presbyters are not allowed to perform it. The first council of Bracara, anno 563, makes it deprivation¹⁴ for any presbyter to consecrate an altar or a church, and says the canons of old forbade it likewise. Among our British councils collected by Sir Henry Spelman, there is one under St. Patrick, anno 450, where we have a canon to this very purpose, That a presbyter,¹⁵ though he builds a church, shall not offer the oblation in it, before he brings his bishop to consecrate it, because this was regular and decent. And ancient history affords no approved examples to the contrary.

Sect. 3.
The bishop in every diocese the ordinary minister of these consecrations.

This will receive a little further confirmation from our observing two or three other things, which have a near relation to this matter. As, first, that no church regularly could be builded without the licence or consent of the bishop in whose diocese it was erected. This is expressly provided in one of the canons of the council of Chalcedon, which subjects both monasteries and churches so to the bishop's care, that neither of them might¹⁶ be founded without his consent and approbation.

Sect. 4.
No church to be built without the bishop's leave.

And by the laws of Justinian no church was to be begun, before the bishop had first made a solemn prayer, and fixed the sign of the cross in the place where a new church was to be erected. Which we have over and over again repeated in that emperor's Novels, both with relation to monasteries and churches.¹⁷ And Gothofred, not without reason, thinks the same custom was observed in expiating the temples of the heathen, when they were to be consecrated into Christian churches. For so he understands that law¹⁸ of Theodosius, which orders the temples to be expiated by placing in them the sign of the Christian religion, that is, the sign of the cross. And whereas some monks, and other orders of men, would sometimes presume to set up the sign of the cross in public buildings, and other places erected for the divertisement of the people; which was, in effect, a pretending to make them churches without the bishop's leave; therefore the emperor Leo made a decree,¹⁹ that nothing of this nature should be done by usurpation for the future, but whether it was to erect a cross, or bring the relics of a martyr into any place, both these should be done by the direction of the bishops, and not

Sect. 5.
Not till the bishop had first made a solemn prayer in the place where it was to be builded.

¹³ Synes. Ep. 67. p. 238. Εὔξασθαι ἀναγκαῖα, τούτο τον ὅπον οὐ καθιεροῖ, &c.

¹⁴ Conc. Bracar. 1. c. 37. Si quis presbyter post hoc interdictum ausus fuerit chrisma benedicere, aut ecclesiam aut altarium consecrare, a suo officio deponatur. Nam et antiqui canones hoc vetuerunt.

¹⁵ Conc. Hibernicum, Conc. t. 1. p. 1480. can. 23. Si quis presbyterorum ecclesiam ædificaverit, non offerat antequam adducat suum pontificem, ut eum consecret, quia sic decet.

¹⁶ Conc. Chalced. can. 4. Ἐδοξε μηδένα μὲν μηδαμοῦ οἰκοδομεῖν, μήδε συνιστᾶν μοναστήριον, ἢ ἐκκλησίαν οἶκον, παρὰ γνώμης τοῦ τῆς πόλεως ἐπισκόπου.

¹⁷ Justin. Novel. 131. c. 7. Si quis voluerit fabricare vene- rabile oratorium aut monasterium, præcipimus non aliter inchoandam fabricam, nisi locorum episcopus orationem ibi fecerit et venerabilem fixerit crucem. Vid. Novel. 67. c. 1. Novel. 5. c. 1.

¹⁸ Cod. Theod. lib. 1. Tit. de Paganis, Leg. 25. Conlocatione venerandæ Christianæ religionis signi expiari præcipimus.

¹⁹ Cod. Justin. lib. 1. Tit. 3. de Episc. Leg. 26. Decernimus, ut posthac neque monachi, neque quicumque alii in ædes publicas, vel in quæcumque loca populi voluptatibus fabricata, venerabilem crucem et sanctorum martyrum reliquias illicite inferre conentur, vel occupare audeant ea, quæ vel ad publicas causas, vel ad populi oblectamenta, constructa sunt, &c.

otherwise. And hence it is probably conjectured, both by Suicerus and Meursius, that a bishop's diocese is sometimes called παροπήγιον, that is, the district wherein he had power to fix the cross within his own bounds for the building of churches. So the word will signify both the act of making a cross, and the limits wherein he had power to make it.

For it is to be observed further, that though bishops had the power of consecrating churches, yet that was limited to their own diocese, and they might not exceed their own bounds, unless called to assist another, or to minister in the vacancy of another bishopric. Which is so strictly insisted on by the council of Orange, that it forbids a bishop, who builds a church himself at his own expence, in another man's diocese, to assume to himself the consecration²⁰ of it, but to leave that to the bishop in whose territory the church is erected. The third council²¹ of Orleans and others have decrees of the like nature. But in case a church was built in a vacant diocese, then any neighbouring bishop might be called to consecrate it, as Sidonius Apollinaris was called to consecrate the church of Ruteni, or Rhodéz, in France, though he was bishop of another diocese: but the reason²² was, as Savaro rightly observes, because Rhodéz at that time had no bishop of its own to officiate in the consecration. Now, all these things show, that the bishop in every diocese was the proper minister of this service; for he was to be consulted before the work was begun, he was to come also and pray at the place before the foundation was laid, and when the building was finished, he was to be called to consecrate it, or else some other bishop in his stead. But if presbyters could regularly have done it, there had been no need to have sent for a bishop out of another diocese to perform it. But perhaps it will be asked, What if a presbyter did take upon him to do the thing, did his act stand good, or did the bishop proceed to a new consecration? To which I answer, this being a thing reserved to bishops only by ecclesiastical law and custom, (for the Scripture has nothing about it,) we do not find any new consecrations practised in such cases; but because it was a schismatical act in a presbyter so to go against rule and canon in contempt of his bishop, therefore he was to be punished²³ with deposition or degradation, as appears from the forecited canon of the council of Bracara. And even a bishop that pretended to consecrate a church in another man's diocese, was for his offence to be suspended a year from his office²⁴ as a transgressor of the canons, in the French churches.

Some pretend, that a bishop in his own diocese could not, according to ancient canons, consecrate a church without the bishop of Rome's licence to authorize him to do it. This is one of Gratian's doctrines to magnify the pope's power²⁵ in the canon law. Which the new Roman correctors are so far from altering or censuring, that they bring Socrates in as a further evidence to vouch for it. Socrates indeed, speaking of the council of Antioch, which Constantius summoned under pretence of dedicating his new church there, (though the true design was to have Athanasius condemned in a general council,) excepts against it upon this ground, because the bishop of Rome was not there, whose consent was necessary, by the ecclesiastical canon, to make laws or rules for the church.²⁶ Which was a privilege equally belonging to all patriarchs, that no general council should be held, nor general rules made for the whole church, without their presence and advice first taken in such public deliberations. But this has nothing to do with the consecration of churches in every private bishop's diocese, of which there is no instance in all ancient history, of any bishop's being obliged to send to the bishop of Rome for his licence to consecrate a church within his own diocese. But that which seems to have imposed upon these censors, was their misunderstanding those Greek words, κανονίζειν τὰς ἐκκλησίας, which does not signify dedicating of churches, (though Musculus so translates it, and Hospinian follows him in the same error,) but the church's making laws or canons for her own government: in which the bishop of Rome was allowed to have a patriarchal privilege, but not in the consecration of churches, though that now be insisted on by some, who would have every thing flow from the immense plenitude of power in the bishops of Rome.

Next to the minister consecrating, it will be proper to say something of the object, to whom churches were dedicated; which anciently was solely to God and his service. Of which custom St. Austin is a most irrefragable witness, who, disputing with Maximinus, the Arian bishop, uses this argument to prove the Divinity of the Holy Ghost, That he must be God, because temples were builded and dedicated to him, which it would be sacrilege to do to any creature. If, says he, we ²⁰ Conc. Arausican. can. 10. Si quis episcoporum in alienæ civitatis territorio ecclesiam ædificare disponit—permissa licentia ædificandi, non præsumat dedicationem, quæ illi omnimodo reservatur, in cuius territorio ecclesia assurgit.

²¹ Conc. Aurelian. 3. c. 15.

²² Sidon. lib. 4. Ep. 15. et Savaro in locum.

²³ Conc. Bracar. 1. c. 37.

²⁴ Conc. Aurelian. 3. c. 15.
²⁵ Gratian. de Consecrat. Dist. 1. c. 6 et 27. Edit. Romæ Jussu Gregor. 13. 1582.

²⁶ Socrat. lib. 2. c. 8. Κανόνος ἐκκλησιαστικοῦ κελεύοντος, μὴ δεῖν παρὰ γνῶμην τοῦ ἐπισκόπου τῆς Ῥώμης κανονίζειν τὰς ἐκκλησίας.

Sect. 7.
No necessity of a licence from the bishop of Rome for a bishop to consecrate in former ages.

Sect. 8.
Churches always dedicated to God, and not to saints, though sometimes distinguished by their names for a memorial of them.

should make a temple of wood and stone to any holy angel, though never so excellent, should we not be anathematized by the truth of Christ and the church of God, for exhibiting to the creature that service which is only due to the Creator? Since, therefore, we should be sacrilegious in building a temple to any creature,²⁷ how can he be otherwise than the true God, to whom we not only build temples, but are ourselves his temples? In another place, he rejects with scorn the false imputation of Faustus the Manichee, who charged the catholics with erecting temples to their martyrs, and offering sacrifice and other acts of worship to them therein. To this he replies, That they never offered sacrifice to any martyr, but only to the God of the martyrs, though they erected altars in the memorials of the martyrs.²⁸ For what bishop, when he stands by the altar in any place where the holy bodies lie, ever says, We offer unto thee, Peter, or Paul, or Cyprian? But what is offered, is offered unto God, (who crowns the martyrs,) in the memorials of the martyrs who are crowned by him. He often repeats it in other places,²⁹ that they did not so honour their martyrs, by erecting temples or altars to them, but only unto God. The same place, indeed, was often a monument or memorial of a martyr, and a temple of God, because churches were commonly built over the sepulchres of the martyrs, or in the places where they suffered, or else the relics of the martyrs were translated into them: and hence they were called by the martyrs' name, because they were memorials of them. The church and the altar that was built at Carthage, in the place where St. Cyprian suffered martyrdom, was, upon that account, called Mensa Cypriani, Cyprian's Altar, not because it was built or dedicated to him or his worship, (for St. Austin says³⁰ it was erected only to God and his service,) but because it was a memorial of his martyrdom, being built in the place where Cyprian himself was offered a sacrifice unto God.

And from hence it is very plain, that the naming a church by the name of a saint or martyr was far from dedicating it to that saint or martyr, though it served for a memorial of him among the living, and so far was an honour to his memory, though dedicated only to God and his service. And this is further evident from this consideration, that churches were sometimes named from their founders, who certainly did not intend to dedicate churches to themselves. Thus Sirmond³¹ has observed three churches in Carthage to be so denominated from their founders, Basilica Fausti, Florentii, and Leontii. And Sozomen³² tells us, that the temple of Serapis, when it was turned into a church, was called by the name of Arcadius. As some in Rome and Antioch bare the name of Constantine and Justinian. Sometimes they had their name from a particular circumstance of time, or place, or other accident in the building of them. The church of Jerusalem was called Anastasis and Cruz, not because it was dedicated to any St. Anastasis or cross, but because it was by Constantine built in the place of our Saviour's crucifixion and resurrection, as Valesius³³ and others have rightly observed. So the church of Anastasia at Constantinople was so termed, not from any saint of the same name, but because it was the church where Gregory Nazianzen by his preaching gave a sort of new life or resurrection to the catholic doctrine of the Trinity, after it had been long oppressed by the Arian faction, as he himself³⁴ accounts for the reason of the name in several places of his writings. And upon the like ground one of the churches of Carthage was called Basilica Restituta, from its being rescued out of the hands of the Arians. One of the churches of Alexandria was commonly called Cæsareum,³⁵ which Valesius³⁶ thinks was for no other reason but because the place before had been called Cæsareum, or the temple of the Cæsars. As a

Sect. 9.
Churches sometimes named from their founders, or other circumstances in their building.

²⁷ Aug. cont. Maximin. lib. 1. t. 6. p. 288. Nonne si templum alicui sancto angelo excellentissimo de lignis et lapidibus faceremus, anathematizaremur a veritate Christi et ab ecclesia Dei, quoniam creaturæ exhiberemus eam servitute, quæ uni tantum deberetur Deo? Si ergo sacrilegi essemus faciendo templum cuiunque creaturæ, quomodo non est Deus verus, cui non templum facimus, sed nos ipsi templum sumus?

²⁸ Aug. cont. Faust. lib. 20. c. 21. Nulli martyrum, sed ipsi Deo martyrum sacrificamus, quamvis in memoriis martyrum constituamus altaria. Quis enim antistitum in locis sanctorum corporum assistens altari, aliquando dixit, Offerimus tibi Petre, aut Paule, aut Cypriane; sed quod offertur, offertur Deo, qui martyres coronavit, apud memorias eorum quos coronavit.

²⁹ Aug. de Vera Relig. c. 55. Honoramus eos charitate, non servitute. Nec eis templa construimus. Nolunt enim sic se honorari a nobis, &c. It. de Civit. Dei, lib. 22. c. 10. Illi (ethnici) talibus diis suis et templa ædificaverunt, et stauerunt aras, et sacerdotes instituerunt, et sacrificia fecerunt. Nos autem martyribus nostris non templa sicut diis, sed memorias sicut hominibus mortuis fabricamus: nec ibi erigimus altaria, in quibus sacrificemus martyribus, sed uni Deo et martyrum et nostro.

³⁰ Aug. Ser. 63. de Diversis, t. 10. p. 592. Ut mensa illa quæ Dei est, etiam Cypriani vocetur, hæc causa est: quia ut illa modo cingitur ab obsequentibus, ibi Cyprianus cingebatur a persecutibus, &c. Item. Mensa Deo constructa est, tamen mensa dicitur Cypriani—quia ibi est immolatus, et quia ipsa immolatione sua paravit hanc mensam, non in qua pascatur sive pascatur, sed in qua sacrificium Deo, cui et ipse oblatum est, offertur.

³¹ Sirmond. Not. in Aug. Serm. 37. a se Edit. t. 10. p. 753.

³² Sozom. lib. 7. c. 15.

³³ Vid. Vales. Epist. de Anastas. ad Calcem Eusebii.

³⁴ Naz. Orat. 32. ad 150 Episcopos, t. 1. p. 527. It. Carm. 9. de Somnio Anastasiæ, t. 2. p. 78.

³⁵ Socrat. lib. 7. c. 15. Liberat. Breviar. c. 18.

³⁶ Vales. Not. in Evagr. lib. 2. c. 8.

church of Antioch was called Palæa, because built in that part of the city which they termed παλαιάν, or the old city. So St. Peter's at Rome was anciently called Triumphalis, because it stood in Via Triumphali, or the triumphal way leading to the capitol. And we are assured from St. Jerom,³⁷ that the Lateran church had its name from Lateranus the heathen, who was slain by Nero, because it had formerly been that nobleman's palace in Rome. A thousand observations of the like nature might be made; but these few are sufficient to show, that there were different reasons for giving names to churches; and that it was no argument of churches being dedicated to saints, because they bare the names of saints; it being otherwise apparent, that they were consecrated only to God, and not to any creature.

What has been observed of churches is equally true of altars, that they were always dedicated to God alone, and not to any other being whatever, even after they began to have a particular consecration with some new ceremonies distinct from churches: which seems to have begun first of all in the sixth century. For the council of Agde, anno 506, is the first public record that we meet with, giving any account of a distinct consecration of altars: and there we find the new ceremony of chrism³⁸ added to the sacerdotal benediction. And not long after we find a like decree in the council of Epone, anno 517, That no altars but such as were made of stone, should be consecrated with³⁹ the infusion of chrism upon them. Which implies, that at least some altars, if not all, had then the ceremony of chrism in their consecration. But as this ceremony was new, so was the consecration of altars, as distinct from churches, a new thing also; and much more the consecration of communion cloths, and cups, and images, and crosses, and paschal tapers, and holy water, and beads, and bells, of which the reader may find a particular account in Hospinian,⁴⁰ with all the new rites of consecrating churches in the Romish rituals, which it is none of my business here further to pursue.

Concerning the ancient consecrations we have further to observe, that Sect. 11. No church to be built or consecrated by the laws of Justinian no man was to begin to build a church, before he had given security to the bishop of a maintenance for the ministry⁴¹ and the repairs of the church, and whatever was otherwise necessary to uphold Divine service in it. And by a rule of one of the Spanish councils,⁴² a bishop was not to consecrate a church, before the donation of its maintenance was delivered to him in writing confirmed by law. Which were necessary rules to preserve churches from falling to ruin, and their ministry and service from contempt and disgrace.

But beyond this suitable provision and settlement for the service of the church, the bishop was not to exact or demand any thing further of the founder; but it being part of his ordinary office to consecrate churches, he was obliged to do it without requiring any reward for his service; unless the founder thought fit to make him any voluntary oblation, in which case he was at liberty to receive it. So it is determined in the foresaid Spanish council of Bracara,⁴³ and for the French churches in the second council of Chalons,⁴⁴ and others in the time of Charles the Great.

As to the time of consecration, they did not anciently confine themselves to perform it only upon Sundays, but all days were at first indifferent both for this and the ordinations of the clergy likewise. Which is an observation frequently made by the learned Pagi⁴⁵ in his critical remarks on the chronology of the ancient church. Particularly he observes, that Constantine's famous dedication of the church of Jerusalem in a full synod of bishops, anno 335, must needs have been upon a Saturday: for all writers agree, that it was upon the ides of September, that is, upon the 13th day of September, which, according to the exact rules and method of the cycle, must fall upon a Saturday that year. Whence Pagi rightly concludes, that the custom had not yet prevailed, which confined consecration of churches to the Lord's day.

I have nothing further to remark upon this head, save only that the day of consecration was in many churches solemnly kept and observed among Sect. 12. Yet bishops not to demand any thing for consecration.

Sect. 13. Consecrations performed indifferently upon any day.

Sect. 14. The day of consecration usually celebrated among their anniversary festivals.

³⁷ Hieron. Ep. 30. Epitaph. Fabiolæ. Ut ante diem paschæ in basilica quondam Laterani, qui Cæsariano truncatus est gladio, staret in ordine penitentium. Speaking of Fabiola doing penance there.

³⁸ Conc. Agathen. can. 14. Altaria placuit non solum unctione chrismatiss, sed etiam sacerdotali benedictione sacrari.

³⁹ Conc. Epaunens. c. 26. Altaria nisi lapidea infusione chrismatiss non sacrentur.

⁴⁰ Hospin. de Templis, lib. 4. c. 2, &c.

⁴¹ Justin. Novel. 67. c. 2. Non aliter quempiam ecclesiam de novo exædificare, priusquam loquatur ad Deo amabilem episcopum, et definiat mensuram quam deputat ad luminaria, et ad sacrum ministerium, et ad domus custodiam, et ad alimenta ministrantium, &c.

⁴² Conc. Bracarens. 3. c. 5. Unusquisque episcoporum meminerit, ut non prius dedicit ecclesiam, nisi antea dotem basilicæ et obsequium ipsius per donationem chartulæ confirmatum accipiat. Vid. Conc. Tolet. 3. c. 15.

⁴³ Conc. Bracar. 3. c. 5. Quoties ab aliquo fidelium ad consecrandas ecclesias episcopi invitantur, non quasi ex debito munus aliquod a fundatore requirant; sed si ipse quidem aliquid ex suo voto obtulerit, non respiciatur.

⁴⁴ Conc. Cabillon. 2. c. 16.

⁴⁵ Pagi, Critic. in Baron. an. 335. n. 4.

their anniversary festivals. For Sozomen gives us this account of the dedication of the church of Jerusalem,⁴⁶ that in the memory of it they held a yearly festival, which lasted for eight days together, during which time both they of the church, and all strangers, which flocked thither in abundance, held ecclesiastical assemblies and met together for Divine service. To this Gregory the Great seems to have added a new custom here in England, which was, that on the annual feast of the dedication the people might build themselves booths round about the church, and there feast and entertain themselves with eating and drinking, in lieu of their ancient sacrifices while they were heathens: which is related by Bede,⁴⁷ out of Gregory's letters to Austin, and Mellitus, the first bishop of the Saxons. And from this custom, it is more than probable, came our wakes, which are still observed in some places, as the remains of those feasts of dedication of particular churches.

CHAPTER X.

OF THE RESPECT AND REVERENCE WHICH THE PRIMITIVE CHRISTIANS PAID TO THEIR CHURCHES.

Sect. I.
Churches never put to any profane use, but only sacred and religious service.

NEXT to their adorning and consecration of churches, it will be proper to examine what respect and reverence they paid to consecrated places, after they were once set apart for Divine service. They then used them only as the houses of God, for acts of devotion and religion, and did not allow of any thing to be done there, that had not some tendency towards piety, or immediate relation to it. They might be used for religious assemblies, for the elections of the bishops and clergy, for the sitting of councils, for catechetical schools, for conferences and collations about religion; but not be put to the use of common houses, to eat, or drink, or lodge in. And therefore, though the law allowed men to take sanctuary in the church, as we shall see in the next chapter, yet it did not allow them to have their meat and lodging there. When some abused the catechumenia, (which I have showed before to be places within the church for men and women to hear Divine service in,) and turned them into rooms to lodge in, the emperor Leo made a decree, that all such should be expelled from their habitations in the church. The case was different when men spent whole nights in the church in watching and prayer; as they did frequently both in their public and private vigils; such pernoctations in the church were allowed, because they were but necessary circumstances of Divine service: only women were forbidden by the council of Eliberis¹ to keep private vigils in the church, because many times, under pretence of prayer, secret wickedness was committed. And for the like reason their agapæ, or feasts of charity, which were originally an apostolical practice, and kept in the church, were afterwards prohibited, or at least discouraged, for the excess and consequent profaneness that attended them. The council of Laodicea² peremptorily forbids them under that name of charity feasts, and commands that no one should eat, or prepare beds or tables for that purpose, in the house of God. And the third council of Carthage forbids all feasting in the church³ in general to the clergy, except in case of necessity, when they were upon a journey, and could not otherwise be entertained; and orders, that the custom should be discountenanced as much as possible also in the laity: for though they were forced to tolerate it for some time, yet they did not approve of it, as St. Austin tells Faustus⁴ the Manichee, but endeavoured to correct both the excess that many ran into upon such occasions, and the very custom itself of feasting in the church, or at the graves of the martyrs, because two errors crept into the church by that means, intolerable excess, and a heathenish superstition therewith: for men began, as he⁵ complains, in these riots to worship pictures and tombstones, and reckoned their feasts a sort of sacrifice to the dead, placing even their voracities and drunkenness to the account of religion; so that it was high time to lay aside all manner of banquetings in the church, that the house of God might not be profaned with such excesses of riot as were not to be endured in private houses. And this was their general rule in all cases, to lay aside all customs that were not absolutely necessary, though innocent and useful in their original, rather than suffer the abuses and corruptions of them to end in the profanation of churches.

⁴⁶ Sozom. lib. 2. c. 26.

⁴⁷ Bede, Hist. lib. 1. c. 30.

¹ Conc. Eliber. c. 35. Placuit prohiberi, ne fœminæ in cœmeterio pervigilent, eo quod sæpe sub obtentu religionis scelera latenter committant.

² Conc. Laodic. c. 28. "Ὅτι οὐ δεῖ ἐν τοῖς κυριακοῖς ἢ ἐν ταῖς ἐκκλησίαις, τὰς λεγομένας ἀγάπας ποιεῖν, καὶ ἐν τῷ οἴκῳ τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐσθίειν καὶ ἀκοῦβιτα τραννύειν.

³ Conc. Carthag. 3. c. 30. Ut nulli episcopi vel clerici in ecclesia conviventur, nisi forte transeantem hospitiorum necessitate illic reficiantur. Populi etiam, quantum fieri potest, ab hujusmodi conviviis prohibeantur. Vid. Cod. Afric. can. 42.

⁴ Aug. cont. Faust. lib. 20. c. 21. Qui se in memoriis martyrum inebriant, quomodo a nobis approbari possunt, cum eos, etiam si in domibus suis id faciant, sana doctrina condemnet? Sed aliud est quod docemus, aliud quod sustinemus: aliud quod præcipere jubemur, aliud quod emendare præcipimur, et donec emendemus, tolerare compellimur.

⁵ Aug. de Morib. Eccles. lib. 1. c. 34. Novi multos esse sepulchrorum et picturarum adoratores: novi multos esse, qui luxuriosissime super mortuos bibant, et epulas cadaveribus exhibentes, super sepultos seipsos sepeliant, et voracitates ebrietatesque suas deputent religioni.

The like reverence and respect was also showed to every sacred vessel and utensil belonging to the administration of the sacraments and Divine service: they might not be employed to any other use, but only what was sacred, and answerable to the designation and appointment of them. Upon this account, they were kept in the seeophylacium of the church, and never removed thence, but when the service of the altar required them. This custom was so nicely observed, that when Athanasius was accused for breaking the mystical cup, he clears himself of the accusation by saying, That in the place where it was pretended that he had broken it, there was neither church nor minister,⁶ nor was it the time of celebrating the eucharist: therefore, since the cup was never in the custody of any but the ministers of the church, nor ever used but in the church in time of Divine service, he could not be guilty of the crime laid against him, seeing there were none but private men, in whose keeping the cup could not be in that place. The vessels were usually kept by the deacon; and the subdeacons and other inferior orders are by the councils of Laodicea⁷ and Agde⁸ forbidden to touch them. There was but one case in which it was lawful to put these things to common use, and that was the case of absolute necessity, when no other method could be found out to redeem captives, or relieve the poor in times of extreme exigence: then it was thought that mercy was to be preferred before sacrifice, and that the living and spiritual temples of God were to be preserved at the expense of the material ones; and they never made any scruple to melt down their communion plate or part with their ornaments upon such occasions, of which I have given full proof heretofore from the examples of St. Ambrose, St. Austin, Cyril of Jerusalem, Acacius bishop of Amida, Exuperius of Thoulouse, and the laws⁹ of Justinian, which need not be repeated in this place. But excepting this one extraordinary case, it was esteemed the highest profanation and sacrilege, to divert any thing to any other use which was given to God's service: and there are some instances of very remarkable judgments that befell such profaners, one or two of which it may not be amiss to mention. Theodoret¹⁰ tells us, Julian the apostate sent two of his officers, Felix and his uncle Julian, to plunder the church of Antioch, called the golden church, and bring the rich vessels, which Constantine and Constantius had dedicated, into his own coffers. But they were not content barely to commit sacrilege, unless they could vent their spite also in some unmannerly and profane abuses: therefore Julian pissed upon the holy table, and Felix, seeing the holy vessels, broke out into this rude expression, Behold what fine vessels Mary's Son is served in! But the impious wretches did not long go unpunished: for Julian was immediately seized with an ulcer, which turned all his bowels into putrefaction, and he died voiding his own excrements at his blasphemous mouth; and Felix, by the same Divine vengeance, voided blood at his mouth, without intermission, day and night until he died. Victor Uticensis¹¹ gives us a like account of one Proculus, an agent of one of the kings of the Vandals, who, having ravaged and plundered the catholic churches, made himself a shirt and breeches of the palls or coverings of the altar. But not long after he fell into a frenzy, which made him eat off his own tongue, piece by piece, and so he breathed out his last in a most ignominious death. It is no less remarkable, what Optatus reports of some Donatist bishops, who, in their mad zeal against the catholics, ordered the eucharist which the catholics had consecrated to be thrown to their dogs; but not without an immediate sign of Divine vengeance¹² upon them: for the dogs, instead of devouring the elements, fell upon their masters, as if they had never known them, and tore them to pieces, as robbers and profaners of the holy body of Christ. Which makes Optatus put them in mind of that admonition of our Saviour, Matt. vii. 6, "Give not that which is holy unto the dogs, neither cast ye your pearls before swine, lest they trample them under their feet, and turn again and rend you." Other instances might be added of the same nature, but I choose rather to go on with the account of their reverence, than to dwell any longer upon the punishments of the profaners.

Let us next, then, observe the difference that was made between churches and private houses. Some heretics made very light of this distinction, as the Eustathians, Massalians, and others. Against the Eustathians we have two canons made in the council of Gangra, from which we may learn their errors, and what were the catholic tenets in opposition to them. The first is, If any one¹³ teach, that the house of God, and the assemblies held therein, are to be despised, let him be anathema. And the other, If any one¹⁴ hold assemblies privately

⁶ Athan. Apol. 2. t. 1. p. 732.

⁷ Conc. Laodic. c. 21.

⁸ Conc. Agathen. c. 66.

⁹ Book V. chap. 6. sect. 6. ¹⁰ Theodor. lib. 3. c. 12.

¹¹ Victor de Persecut. Vandal. lib. 1. p. 593.

¹² Optat. lib. 2. p. 55. Ut omnia sacrosancta supra memorati vestri episcopi violarent, jusserunt eucharistiam canibus fundi: non sine signo Divini judicii. Nam iidem canes accensi rabie, ipsos dominos suos, quasi latrones, sancti corporis reos, dente vindice, tanquam ignotos et inimicos lanaverunt.

¹³ Conc. Gangren. c. 5. Εἴ τις διδάσκει τὸν οἶκον τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐγκαταφρόνητον εἶναι, καὶ τὰς ἐν αὐτῷ συναγείεις, ἀνάθεμα ἔστω.

¹⁴ Ibid. c. 6. Εἴ τις παρὰ τὴν ἐκκλησίαν ἰδίᾳ ἐκκλησιᾶ-

Sect. 3.
What difference made between churches and private houses.

out of the church, and, despising the church, chooses to perform ecclesiastical offices where there is no presbyter appointed by the bishop, let him be anathema. These heretics seem to have contemned both a regular ministry and the public churches, and to have made no difference between the house of God and other houses, but to have taught that ecclesiastical offices might as well be performed at home as in the church. Against which errors this council rising up so severely, gives us to understand, that according to the sentiments of the catholic church, the public offices of the church were to be performed in public, and not in private houses, and that it was a contempt of the house of God to perform them otherwise. At present I do not remember any one allowed instance of the contrary practice in all ancient history, except in cases of necessity, which are above all laws. And therefore I could not but reckon this difference, which was so universally put between the house of God and private houses, amongst the instances of respect and reverence, which the ancients paid to their churches.

It will deserve here also to be remembered, particularly to the praise of St. Ambrose, how he acted with the courage and resolution of a martyr in defence of the churches, that they might not be delivered up to the profanation of the Arians. For when the younger Valentinian had, by the instigation of his mother Justina, an Arian empress, first published a law, now extant in the Theodosian Code,¹⁵ allowing the Arians liberty to hold assemblies; and afterwards sent his commands to Ambrose to deliver up to them one of the churches of Milan; he returned him this brave and generous answer: "If the emperor asks of me any thing¹⁶ that is my own, my estates, my money, I shall freely recede from my right, though all that I have belongs to the poor. But those things which are God's, are not subject to the emperor's power. If my patrimony is demanded, you may invade it; if my body, I will offer it of my own accord. Will you carry me into prison, or unto death? I will voluntarily submit to it. I will not guard myself with an army of my people about me; I will not lay hold of the altar, and supplicate for life, but more joyfully be sacrificed myself for the altar." He thought it absolutely unlawful for the emperor to grant to the Arians, the enemies of Christ, those temples which had been dedicated to the service of Christ; and that it did much less become a bishop, the minister of Christ, to be accessory to so foul a dishonour to his Lord: and therefore he rather resolved to die at the altar, if it must be so, than give his consent to so great a profanation. By this one instance we may easily judge, what opinion the ancients had of the sacredness of churches, as God's propriety; and that they would as soon deliver up their Bibles to be burnt by the heathen, as their churches to be profaned by heretical assemblies, where impiety would be taught for true religion, and blasphemy offered to God instead of adoration.

As to the ceremonies of respect used by them when they entered into the church, we find one of pretty general observation, which was the custom of washing their hands and their face, in token of innocency and purity, when they went to worship God at the holy altar. Which seems to be taken from that of the psalmist, "I will wash my hands in innocency, and so will I compass thy altar." This custom is frequently mentioned by Chrysostom, Eusebius, Tertullian, Synesius, Paulinus, and others, whose testimonies have been already alleged in the former part¹⁷ of this book, where I had also occasion to show, that fountains and cisterns of water were commonly set in the atrium or court before the church for this very purpose.

Another ceremony used by some few, (for it was no general custom,) was putting off their shoes when they went into the house of God. Cassian observes of the Egyptian monks, that they always wore sandals instead of shoes, and those they also put off whenever they went¹⁸ to celebrate or receive the holy mysteries, thinking themselves obliged to do so, by interpreting literally that intimation of reverence which was given to Moses and Joshua, "Put off thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground." But others did not understand this as an absolute command, obliging all men precisely to use this ceremony of respect, but only where the custom of any nation had made it an indication of reverence, as it was among the Eastern nations in the time of Moses and Joshua. Whence we do not find it mentioned as any general custom prevailing among the primitive Christians; unless perhaps it may be thought

Sect. 4.
How some chose rather to die than deliver up churches to be profaned by heretics.

Sect. 5.
The ceremony of washing their hands when they went into the church.

Sect. 6.
The ceremony of putting off their shoes used by some, but this no general custom.

ζοι, καὶ καταφρονῶν τῆς ἐκκλησίας, τὰ τῆς ἐκκλησίας ἐξέλοι πράττειν, μὴ συνόντος τῷ πρεσβυτέρου κατὰ γνώμην τῷ ἐπισκόπου, ἀνάθεμα ἔστω.

¹⁵ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 1. de Fid. Cathol. Leg. 4.

¹⁶ Ambros. Ep. 33. ad Marcel. de Tradendis Basilicis. Si a me peteret quod meum esset, id est, fundum meum, argentum meum, jus hujusmodi meum me non refragaturum, quanquam omnia quæ mea sunt essent pauperum. Verum ea quæ Divina, imperatoris potestati non esse subjecta, &c.

¹⁷ Chap. 3. sect. 6.

¹⁸ Cassian. Institut. lib. 1. c. 10. Nequaquam tamen caligas pedibus inhærere permittunt, cum accedunt ad celebranda vel percipienda sacrosancta mysteria, illud æstimates etiam secundum literam custodiri debere, quod dicitur ad Moysen vel ad Jesum filium Nave: solve corrigiam calceamenti tui, locus enim in quo stas terra sancta est.

to have been so in the Ethiopian or Abyssin churches, because, as Mr. Mede has observed¹⁹ out of Zaga Zabo's account of them in Damianus a Goes, the same custom continues still among them at this day. Which, whether it be derived from ancient tradition of their churches, or be a practice lately taken up among them, is not now very easy to be determined.

And I think the same resolution must be given to the question about bowing toward the altar at their first entrance into churches. Mr. Mede thinks there is no plain demonstration of it in the ancient writers, but some probability of such a custom derived from the Jews. For he says, What reverential guise, ceremony, or worship,²⁰ they used at their ingress into God's house in the ages next to the apostles, (and some I believe they did,) is wholly buried in silence and oblivion. The Jews before them, from whom the Christian religion sprang, used to bow themselves down towards the mercy-seat. The Christians after them, in the Greek and Oriental churches, have, time out of mind, and without any known beginning thereof, used to bow in like manner, with their posture toward the altar, or holy table, saying that of the publican in the Gospel, "God be merciful to me a sinner;" as appears by the liturgies of St. Chrysostom and St. Basil, and as they are still known to do at this day. Which custom of theirs, not being found to have been ordained or established by any decree or canon of any council, and being so agreeable to the use of God's people of the Old Testament, may therefore seem to have been derived to them from very remote and ancient tradition. Nothing therefore can be known of the use of those first ages of the church, further than it shall seem probable they might imitate the Jews. This is spoken according to the wonted ingenuity of that learned person, who never advances a probability into a demonstration. I shall only add one thing out of Chrysostom, to make his opinion seem the more probable, which I note from the observation of Mr. Aubertin,²¹ who, among some other instances of reverence paid to God, at the reading of the Gospel and reception of baptism, takes notice of this, that when the candidates of baptism came near the baptistery, which, in Chrysostom's language,²² is the bride-chamber of the Spirit and the port of grace, they were then as captives to fall down before their King, and all to cast themselves together upon their knees. Now, if such an act of reverence was performed to God at their entrance into the baptistery, it is not improbable but that some such reverence might also be used at their entrance into the temple. But in matters which have not a clear light and proof, it is not prudent to be over-bold in our determinations.

It is more certain, that when kings and emperors went into the house of God, they paid this respect to the place, that they left not only their arms and their guards, but also their crowns behind them; as thinking it indecent to appear in their regalia in the presence of the King of kings, or to seem to want arms and guards when they were under the peaceable roof of the Prince of peace. St. Chrysostom often spends his eloquence²³ upon this custom, and uses it as an argument to persuade all inferiors to a profound reverence, humility, and peace, when they came into the courts of God, because they had such examples of their kings before them. The emperor Theodosius junior also makes use of the same topic in one of his laws,²⁴ which was made to regulate the abuses of some who fled for sanctuary in the church with their arms about them: which profanation was not to be endured in any, since he himself always left his arms without doors, and first laid aside his diadem, the badge of imperial majesty, before he went into the church. Nay, Julian himself had regard to this custom, as Sozomen truly observes²⁵ out of his epistle to Arsacius, high priest of Galatia, where one of the things he would have them imitate the Christians in, was this, that when they went into the temples of their gods, no man of arms should appear among them. And I have already²⁶ noted out of Leo Grammaticus, how Michael, the Greek emperor, in latter ages, was censured for presuming to pass the beautiful or royal gates crowned, at which gates it had ever been customary for his predecessors to lay aside their crowns, when they went into the church.

Another very usual piece of respect paid to the altar and the church, was men's embracing, saluting, and kissing them, or any part of them, the doors, threshold, pillars, in token of their great love and affection for them. St. Ambrose takes notice of this in the account he gives of the great consternation they were in at Milan, when the

Sect. 7.
Whether the ancients used the ceremony of bowing toward the altar at their entrance into the church.

Sect. 8.
Kings laid aside their crowns and guards, when they went into the house of the King of kings.

Sect. 9.
The doors and pillars of the church and altar often kissed and embraced in token of love and respect to them.

¹⁹ Mede, Disc. on Eccl. v. 1. p. 348.

²⁰ Id. on Psal. cxxxii. 7. p. 397.

²¹ Albertin. de Euchar. lib. 2. p. 432.

²² Chrysost. in illud, Simile est Regnum Cœlor. &c. Ἐπειδὴν εἰσδράμητε τὴν παστᾶδα τῆς χάριτος, ἐπειδὴν πλησίον γένησθε τῆς φοβερᾶς ὁμοῦ καὶ ποθεινῆς κολυμβήθρας, ὡς αἰχμάλωτοι προσπίσητε τῷ βασιλεῖ, ῥίψατε πάντες ὁμοίως ἐπὶ γόνατα.

²³ Chrysost. Orat. post Redit. ab Exilio, t. 4. p. 971. It. Hom. in Psal. xlvi. t. 3. p. 812.

²⁴ Edict. Theodos. ad calcem Conc. Ephes. et in Cod. Th. lib. 9. Tit. 45. Leg. 4. Nos qui legitimis imperii armis semper circumdamur—Dei templum ingressuri, foris arma relinquimus, et ipsum etiam diadema, regis majestatis insigne, deponimus.

²⁵ Sozom. lib. 5. c. 16.

²⁶ See chap. 5. sect. 1.

emperor's orders came for delivering up the churches to the Arians. The soldiers were the men who first brought the welcome news into the church, that the emperor had revoked his fatal sentence: and they strove who should first get to the altar and kiss it,²⁷ to signify, that all things now were in peace and safety. He alludes, no doubt, to the osculum pacis, the solemn kiss of peace, which the faithful anciently were used to give mutually to each other in the communion service, as a testimony of their cordial love and affection for one another. And therefore it cannot be supposed that such salutations of the church or altar were intended as acts of religious worship, but only as civil indications of their love and respect for them. And by this rule we are to interpret all other places of ancient authors, which frequently speak of this custom, as Sidonius Apollinaris,²⁸ Paulinus,²⁹ Prudentius,³⁰ Chrysostom,³¹ Athanasius,³² Cassiodore,³³ and the author of the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy,³⁴ under the name of Dionysius the Areopagite, and several others, who wrote before the superstitious adoration of images had gained any credit in the church: the like respect to this having been also showed to the book of the Gospels, without any suspicion of adoring the materials of it.

I think it not improper also to observe under this head, that churches were many times chosen as the properest places for private devotion and prayer upon extraordinary occasions. Theodoret³⁵ observes of Theodosius the emperor, that the night before he was to engage Eugenius the tyrant, was by him wholly spent in an oratory, which happened to be in the place where he had pitched his camp. And in like manner both Athanasius,³⁶ and Socrates,³⁷ and the other historians, tell us of Alexander, bishop of Constantinople, that when the faction of Eusebius had threatened to oblige him upon a certain day to receive Arius into communion, he betook himself the night before to the church, and there, prostrating himself before the altar, continued all night in prayer, begging of God, that if the faith which he held was truth, and the opinion of Arius false, he would punish Arius as his impiety justly deserved. Which was accordingly fulfilled: for the next day Arius, as he was going triumphantly to church, having occasion to turn aside to go to stool, voided his entrails with his excrements, and

Sect. 10.
Churches used for private meditation and prayer, as well as public.

²⁷ Ambros. Ep. 33. Certatim hoc nunciare milites, irruentes in altaria, oculis significare pacis insigne.

²⁸ Sidon. Lib. 1. Ep. 5. Triumphalibus apostolorum liminibus affusus, &c.

²⁹ Paulin. Natal. 6. Felicis, p. 569. Sternitur ante fores, et postibus oscula figit.

³⁰ Prudent. Hymn. 11. in S. Laurent. Apostolorum ac martyrum exosculantur limina.

³¹ Chrysost. Hom. 29. in 2 Cor. Προθύρα φιλέμεν τῆ νᾶϊ.

³² Athanas. Homil. adv. eos qui in homine spem figunt, t.

so perished by a most ignominious death. I mention these things only to show, that the ancients paid such a respect to their churches, that upon special occasions they thought them the properest places as well for private devotion as for public. And I have already noted³⁸ that many of their churches were so framed, as to have private cells or recesses for men to retire to, and exercise themselves at leisure times in private reading of the Scriptures, and meditation and prayer.

As to their public behaviour in the church, it was generally such as expressed great reverence for it, as the sanctuary of God, and the place of his immediate presence. They entered it as the palace of the Great King, where the angels attended, and heaven opened itself, and Christ sat upon his throne, and all was filled with incorporeal powers, as Chrysostom words it³⁹ in some of his elegant descriptions. It is particularly remarked by Gregory Nazianzen,⁴⁰ of his own mother Nonna, that the zeal of her devotion was always so flaming and fervent, that she never spake a word in the church, but what was necessary to be done in joining in the sacred service; she never turned her back upon the altar, nor ever allowed herself to spit upon the pavement of the church. But I cannot say these were necessary laws for all to observe; for Nazianzen intimates she did something above the common pitch, and consequently that it was choice and zeal, and not any binding rules of the church, that obliged her to it. We might here have considered further their reverent postures of devotion, standing, kneeling, and prostration; and have exposed the practice of sitting at prayers and at the communion service, which Perron and some others, for different reasons, contend for, as a posture of devotion used in the ancient church; but I shall have a more proper occasion to speak of these things hereafter, when we come to the particular offices and services of the church.

The last instance of their reverence for churches which I shall take notice of, is, that the sacredness of them made them commonly the safest repository for things of value, and the best security and retreat in times of common calamity and distress. The church had not only her own private archives, her treasury, and her cemeliarchium, for

Sect. 11.
Their public behaviour in the church expressive of great reverence.

Sect. 12.
Churches the safest repository for things of any value, and the best retreat in times of distress.

2. p. 304. Προσιόντες τῷ ἁγίῳ Ξυσιασηρίῳ, καὶ μετὰ φόβῳ καὶ χαρᾷ ἀσπαζόμενοι.

³³ Cassiodor. Hist. Tripart. lib. 9. c. 30.

³⁴ Dionys. Eccl. Hier. c. 2.

³⁵ Theodor. lib. 5. c. 24.

³⁶ Athanas. Epist. ad Serapion. p. 671.

³⁷ Socrat. lib. 1. c. 37. Ruffin. lib. 1. c. 12.

³⁸ See chap. 5. sect. 8.

³⁹ Chrysost. Hom. 3. in Ephes. et Hom. 15. in Hebr.

⁴⁰ Naz. Orat. 19. in Fun. Patris, t. 1. p. 292.

preserving her own writings, her utensils, and her treasures, but was a place of common tuition and defence, both for things and persons, in many other cases. Thus it is noted by Ruffin,⁴¹ and Socrates,⁴² and Sozomen, that the cubit wherewith they were used to measure the increase of the waters of Nile, when it overflowed, having been before usually kept in the temple of Serapis, was by the order of Constantine laid up in the Christian church, where it continued till Julian the apostate caused it to be removed to the temple of Serapis again. But persons, as well as things, found a safe retreat and security in the sacredness of churches, when many times in barbarous invasions no other places would protect them against the insolence and fury of a conquering enemy. Nay, the very heathens themselves often found their account in flying to the Christian churches, as St. Austin glories over them, beginning his famous book against the pagans, De Civitate Dei, with this observation. There he tells them what ungrateful wretches they were to the religion of Christ, to clamour and inveigh so bitterly against it, when yet, had it not been for the protection of their lives in places dedicated to Christ, whether they⁴³ fled from the swords of their enemies, they had never been able at that day to have moved their tongues against it. For when Alaric the Goth took and sacked Rome, he gave orders that all the churches should be inviolable, and whoever fled thither should be spared; the sanctity of the place should be their protection: by which means the heathens escaped as well as the Christians. For the soldiers inviolably observed their general's commands, and when they had barbarously plundered and murdered in all other places, they did not pretend to meddle with churches, or offer the least violence to any who betook themselves thither for safety and protection. Nay, they carried some into churches themselves, whom they intended to spare, and so secured them from the violence of others that might have assaulted them. So great a veneration had even the barbarous Arian Goths for churches, in the midst of all their anger and fury against the Romans, as not only St. Austin, but Orosius,⁴⁴ and St. Jerom,⁴⁵ and Cassiodore,⁴⁶ and Sozomen,⁴⁷ with other ancient writers, relate the story. And it can hardly be doubted, then, but that the catholics had the same veneration for churches; especially when it is considered also, how both by general custom and law under the Christian emperors, every church was invested with the privilege of an asylum, or place of sanctuary and refuge, in certain cases; of the original of which, and the ancient laws relating to it, (because some abuses have been added in after ages by the canon law,) I will give a particular account in the following chapter.

CHAPTER XI.

OF THE FIRST ORIGINAL OF ASYLUMS, OR PLACES OF SANCTUARY AND REFUGE, WITH THE LAWS RELATING TO THEM, IN CHRISTIAN CHURCHES.

ALL that is necessary to be known of this privilege, so far as concerns the use of it in the ancient church, either relates to the original of the custom, or the place itself where sanctuary might be had, or the persons who were entitled to the benefit, or, lastly, the conditions they were to observe in order to obtain and enjoy it. And therefore under these four heads we will briefly consider it. As to the original of it, there is no dispute made by any author, but that it began to be a privilege of churches from the time of Constantine, though there are no laws about it older than Theodosius, either in the Justinian or the Theodosian Code. But the law of Theodosius is sufficient evidence itself, that it was the custom or practice of the church before; for his law was not made to authorize the thing itself, but to regulate some points relating to it, which supposes the thing to be in use before. But whether Constantine made any law to establish it, is very much doubted by learned men. Baronius¹ affirms it upon the credit of the acts of Pope Sylvester: but those are known to be spurious and forged writings, no older than the ninth or tenth age, by the acknowledgment of Papebrochius and Pagi,² who have accurately examined and refuted Baronius's vindication of them. However, Gothofred allows what seems to be the truth of the case, that practice and custom established this privilege by degrees even from the time of Constantine; for before Theodosius made any law about it, the thing was certainly in use in the church, as appears from the account which Gregory Nazianzen gives of it in the Life of Basil,³ where he tells us how St. Basil protected a widow, who fled to the altar, against the violence that was offered to her by the governor of Pontus. The like is reported of St. Ambrose in his Life,⁴ written by Paulinus; and St. Ambrose himself speaks

Sect. I.
The original of this privilege to be deduced from the time of Constantine.

⁴¹ Ruffin. lib. 2. c. 30.

⁴² Socrat. lib. 1. c. 18. Sozom. lib. 1. c. 8.

⁴³ Aug. de Civ. Dei, lib. 1. c. 1. Hodie contra eam linguas non moverent, nisi ferrum hostile fugientes, in sacratis ejus locis vitam, de qua superbiunt, invenirent, &c.

⁴⁴ Oros. lib. 7. c. 39. ⁴⁵ Hieron. Epist. 16. ad Principiam.

⁴⁶ Cassiodor. Variar. lib. 12. c. 20.

⁴⁷ Sozom. lib. 9. cap. 10. ¹ Baron. an. 324. n. 61.

² Papebroch. Conatus Chronico-Histor. p. 49. Pagi, Critic. in Baron. an. 315. n. 4.

³ Naz. Orat. 20. de Laud. Basil. t. 1. p. 353.

⁴ Paulin. Vit. Ambros. p. 9.

of the custom in one of his epistles, where, in answer to the emperor Valentinian junior, who had commanded him to deliver up one of the churches of Milan to the Arians, he tells him, that was a thing he could never obey him in; but if he commanded him to be carried to prison or to death, that he would voluntarily submit to, and neither use force to defend himself, nor fly to the altar to supplicate for his life.⁵ These and some other such like instances show, that the churches enjoyed this privilege by ancient custom, before Theodosius made any law about it; which he did first, anno 392, not to authorize the thing, but to explain and regulate some things relating to it, of which more by and by in their proper place.

Here we are next to examine what part of the church was more peculiarly assigned to be the place of sanctuary and refuge. Gothofred thinks, that at first only the inner buildings and apartments of the church, and especially the altar, were the places of refuge: whence in Synesius⁶ and other ancient writers the altar is so frequently called ἄσυλος τράπεζα, the table from which no one could be ravished or taken away. But whether this was originally so or not, it is certain that in the time of Theodosius junior these limits for taking sanctuary were enlarged. For in one of his laws now extant in both the Codes,⁷ not only the altar and the body of the church, but all between the church and outward walls, that is, houses and lodgings of the bishop and clergy, gardens, baths, courts, cloisters, are appointed to enjoy the same privilege of being a sanctuary to such as fled for refuge, as well as the innermost part of the temple. Particularly the baptisteries, which, as I have showed before, were places without the church, were invested with this privilege equally with the altar: for Proterius, bishop of Alexandria, as Liberatus⁸ and Evagrius⁹ report, took sanctuary in the baptistery of the church, to avoid the fury of the Eutychiean faction headed by Timotheus Ælurus; and though that was a place which even the barbarians themselves had some reverence for, yet, as the Egyptian bishops¹⁰ complain in their letter to the emperor Leo, the malice of the Eutychieans pursued him thither, and there slew him, mangled his body, dragged it about the streets, and at last burnt it to ashes, and scattered his ashes in the wind; for which unparalleled barbarity committed against the laws of religion, the emperor Leo deposed Timotheus Ælurus, and sent him into banishment all his life. There were a great many other places, which had this privilege of sanctuary also beside churches, as the statues of the emperors, of which there is a particular title in the Theodosian Code;¹¹ also the emperor's standard in the camp, the bishop's house, the graves and sepulchres of the dead, together with the cross, schools, monasteries, and hospitals in after ages, of which, being all foreign to the business of churches, I say nothing further, but refer the curious reader to the elaborate treatise of Rittershusius¹² upon this subject among the London critics, where each of these and some other privileged places are particularly considered.

Next to the places of refuge, we are to consider the persons to whom this benefit extended, and in what cases they were allowed to take sanctuary in their churches. For this privilege anciently was not intended to patronize wickedness, or shelter men from the due execution of justice, or the force of the laws in ordinary cases; but chiefly to be a refuge for the innocent, the injured, and oppressed: or in doubtful causes, whether criminal or civil, only to give men protection so long, till they might have an equitable and fair hearing of the judges, and not be proceeded against barbarously and rigorously, under pretence and colour of justice; or at most, only to give bishops opportunity to intercede for criminals and delinquents in such cases, as it was both becoming and lawful for bishops to turn intercessors. These were the sanctuaries which Basil¹³ pleaded for against the governor of Pontus, and Synesius¹⁴ against Andronicus, governor of Ptolemais, and Chrysostom against Eutropius, who had prevailed with Arcadius to abrogate by law all privileges¹⁵ of this nature belonging to the church; but by God's providence, he was the first man that wanted this privilege, being fallen under the emperor's displeasure, and forced to fly to the altar for that refuge which he had denied to others. This gave Chrysostom occasion to make that eloquent and curious oration upon his case, whereby he artfully wrought the people into a tender compassion for their bitterest enemy, that they might go and supplicate the emperor for him, who now lay prostrate at the altar, and by their supplications they obtained his life, for the sentence of death was mi-

Sect. 2.
At first only the altar and inner fabric of the church the place of refuge: but afterwards any outer buildings or precincts of the church, invested with the same privilege.

Sect. 3.
What persons allowed to take sanctuary.

⁵ Ambros. Ep. 33. ad Marcellin. Nec altaria tenebo vitam obsecrans, &c.

⁶ Synes. Ep. 58. p. 193.

⁷ Cod. Th. lib. 9. Tit. 45. de his qui ad Ecclesias confugiunt. Leg. 4. Inter templum, quod parietum descripsimus cinctu, et post loca publica et januas primas ecclesie, quicquid fuerit interjacens, sive in cellulis, sive in domibus, hortulis, balneis, areis atque porticibus, confugas interioris templi vice tueatur, &c. Vid. Cod. Justin. lib. 1. Tit. 12. Leg. 3.

⁸ Liberat. Breviar. c. 15.

⁹ Evagr. lib. 2. c. 8.

¹⁰ Epist. Episcoporum Ægypt. ad calcem Concil. Chalced. n. 32. p. 894.

¹¹ Cod. Th. lib. 9. Tit. 44. de his qui ad statuas Imperatorum confugiunt.

¹² Rittershus. de Asylis, c. 3.

¹³ Naz. Orat. 20. de Laud. Basil.

¹⁴ Synes. Ep. 58.

¹⁵ Cod. Th. lib. 9. Tit. 45. de his qui ad Eccl. confug. Leg. 3.

tigated, and turned into confiscation and banishment only,¹⁶ though afterward by treachery he lost his life. These were chiefly the cases which the ancient privilege of sanctuary respected, and commonly thirty days' protection was granted to men in such pitiable circumstances, which term was thought sufficient¹⁷ by the law to end any controversies that such men might have before the civil judges. Though the Saxon law of King Alfred allowed but three days' time for this, as both Rittershusius and Gothofred have observed out of Lambard's account of our ancient¹⁸ English and Saxon laws. During this time they were maintained by the church, if they were poor, out of the revenues of the poor; but if they were able to subsist themselves, it was sufficient for the church to grant them her protection, and that only in the forementioned cases, and no other.

Therefore, that no one might presume upon indemnity by virtue of this privilege, who had not a just and legal title to it, several crimes and cases were specified by the law, as excepted, for which the church could grant no protection. As, first, Public debtors, who either embezzled or kept back by fraud the public revenues of the state. By a law of Theodosius the Great, now extant in both the Codes, such debtors, though they fled to the church for sanctuary, were to reap no benefit by it, but immediately to be taken thence by force:¹⁹ or if they were concealed by the clergy, the bishop and church in that case were liable to be called upon, and made to answer the debt to the public. And Baronius²⁰ is of opinion, that it was by virtue of this law that St. Austin was obliged to pay the debt of one Fastius, who fled to the church for refuge, not being able to answer the pressing demands of the public exactors; and therefore St. Austin made a public collection for him in his church, because he would not deliver him up to be tortured by his creditors, as he himself informs us in one of his epistles.²¹ This was the reason, as I have observed in another place,²² why St. Austin refused to accept the donation of a man's estate, which was originally tied to certain public service in the corporation of the navicularii, or those who were bound to transport the public corn from Africa to Rome. For it might happen, that the men whom the church was to employ in this service, might, by mischance of shipwreck, or other means, become obnoxious to the public: and then the church must either deliver up her servants to be tortured, or else pay the debt; for there was no refuge or sanctuary allowed in this case but upon that condition. And therefore St. Austin²³ himself tells us, he refused such an estate, because one way or other it might have involved the church in great trouble. In private cases, Gothofred seems to think that the benefit of sanctuary was allowed to poor debtors, that they might have a little respite from torture, and either compound with their creditors, or find some other method to discharge their debt, whilst they were under the shelter and protection of the church.

Sect. 4.
What sort of persons and crimes denied this privilege. First, Public debtors.

But then even this benefit was not universal; for the Jewish converts were particularly excepted from it. For by a law of Arcadius and Honorius, extant in both the Codes, it was provided, That all Jews, who, being either in debt, or under prosecution as criminals, pretended to unite themselves to the Christian religion, that thereby they might have the privilege of taking sanctuary in the church, and avoid the punishment of their crimes²⁴ or burden of their debts, should be rejected, and not received till they had discharged their debts, or proved themselves innocent of the crimes laid against them. Yet, in other cases, the Jews were not denied this benefit, but had the common privilege of sanctuary with other men, if Gothofred²⁵ judge right, who cites Julius Clarus and Petrus Sarpus²⁶ for the same opinion.

Rittershusius²⁷ thinks the case of heretics and apostates was something worse in this respect than that of Jews, because they who deserted the church were wholly excluded from having any benefit of sanctuary in it. Covarruvias, and Panormitan, and Sarpus collect the same before him, but not from any express law about this matter, but only from a general law of Theodosius and Valentinian, which excludes apostates and heretics from all society, and many other common privileges allowed to other men.²⁸ From whence they conclude, by parity of reason, that they could lay no claim to the benefit

Sect. 5.
Secondly, Jews that pretended to turn Christians only to avoid paying their debts, or suffering legal punishment for their crimes.

Sect. 6.
Thirdly, Heretics and apostates.

¹⁶ Vid. Cod. Th. lib. 9. Tit. 40. de Pœnis, Leg. 17.

¹⁷ Vid. Justin. Novel. 17. c. 6.

¹⁸ Lambard. de Legibus Angliæ, p. 28.

¹⁹ Cod. Th. lib. 9. Tit. 45. de his qui ad Eccles. confug. Leg. 1. Publicos debitores, si confugiendum ad ecclesias crediderint; aut illico extrahi de latebris oportebit, aut pro his ipsos, qui eos occultare probantur episcopos exigi, &c.

²⁰ Baron. an. 392, p. 661.

²¹ Aug. Ep. 215. Ne corporalem pateretur injuriam, ad auxilium sanctæ ecclesiæ convolvat, &c.

²² Book V. chap. 3. sect. 5.

²³ Aug. Hom. 49. de Diversis, t. 10. p. 520. Naviculariam nolui esse ecclesiam Christi, &c.

²⁴ Cod. Th. lib. 9. Tit. 45. Leg. 2. Cod. Justin. lib. 1. Tit. 12. Leg. 1. Judæi, qui reatu aliquo vel debitis fatigati, simulant se Christianæ legi velle conjungi, ut ad ecclesias confugientes evitare possint crimina, vel pondera debitorum, arceantur, nec ante suscipiantur, quam debita universa reddiderint.

²⁵ Gothofred. t. 3. p. 361.

²⁶ Sarpus de jure Asyli, c. 5. p. 58.

²⁷ Rittershusius de Asylis, cap. 6.

²⁸ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 7. de Apostat. Leg. 4. Hi qui sanctam fidem prodiderunt, et sanctum baptismum hæretica of sanctuary in any case, because deserters of religion, which they had once owned in baptism, were reckoned worse than Jews, who had never made profession of it. And therefore, by another law of Theodosius, their slaves were entitled to the favour which the masters themselves were denied: for if the slave of an apostate or a heretic²⁹ fled from his master, and took sanctuary in the church, he was not only to be protected, but to have his manumission, or freedom, granted him likewise. There being an equal design in the law to encourage orthodoxy, and discourage heresy and apostacy, by respective rewards and punishments allotted to them.

This was particularly determined Sect. 7. Fourthly, Slaves that fled from their masters. in the case of the Donatists for rebaptizing their slaves, to initiate them into their own religion. But in other cases the slaves of orthodox masters had not so large a privilege. For by a law of Arcadius and Honorius, anno 398, slaves are put in the same condition with public debtors, and the curiales, and other public officers, whom no privilege of sanctuary³⁰ was to excuse from the proper duties of their station. And therefore, though any such one fled to the church for refuge, or was ordained a clerk in the church, there was no legal protection allowed him, but he might be reclaimed and fetched thence immediately to his proper servitude or station again, by the authority of the civil judges. I know, indeed, Gothofred takes this to be that law of Arcadius, procured by the instigation of Eutropius against the immunities of the church, which is so much reflected on by St. Chrysostom,³¹ and Prosper,³² and Socrates,³³ and Sozomen,³⁴ and some other ancient writers of the church, and which Arcadius himself thought fit to revoke within a year after, when Eutropius was fallen under his displeasure: which, whether it be that very law or not, is a thing I shall not now nicely dispute; for, admitting it to be so, I observe, that it was never wholly revoked and disannulled, but only in some particular instances. For that part about the illegal ordination of the curiales was left in a great measure in its full force, as has been clearly demonstrated in another place:³⁵ and that part which concerns slaves taking sanctuary in the church, was with a very small variation renewed and reinforced by Theodosius junior, son of Arcadius, and compiler of the Theodosian Code. For by one of his laws,³⁶ which is the last upon this head in that Code, No slave is allowed to have sanctuary or entertainment in any church above one day, when notice was to be given to his master from whom he fled for fear of punishment, that he might reclaim him and carry him back to his own possession, only giving a promise of indemnity and pardon for his faults, if they were not very great and heinous. And Rittershusius³⁷ cites a law of Theodoric, king of the Goths, and some others, to the same purpose.

But in case men were guilty of crimes of a more heinous nature, such as theft and robbery, or treason and conspiracy against the government, or murder and bloodshed, or ravishing of virgins, or adultery, or any crimes of the like nature; then it mattered not whether the criminals were bond or free, there was not an hour's respite allowed to such men, but they were to be taken immediately by force of the civil magistrate, if need required, even from the very altar; or if they pretended to make any resistance with arms, they might with indemnity be slain there. This is undeniably evident from the laws of Justinian, which specify these and all such criminals as excepted universally from all benefit of sanctuary; it being³⁸ wholly against the intent and design of that privilege to give any protection to murderers, adulterers, ravishers of virgins, or any the like, but rather to the innocent and injured parties, who were exposed to their violence and abuses: temples were never designed by law to give sanctuary both to the passive and the aggressors: and therefore if any that were guilty of such crimes fled to the altar for refuge, they should be drawn thence, and punished according to law with superstitione profanarunt, a consortio omnium segregati sint, &c.

Sect. 8. Fifthly, Robbers, murderers, conspirators, ravishers of virgins, adulterers, and other criminals of the like nature.

²⁹ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 6. Ne sanctum baptismum iteretur. Leg. 4. His qui fortisan ad rebaptizandum cogentur, refugendi ad ecclesiam catholicam sit facultas, ut ejus presidio adversus hujus criminis auctores attributæ libertatis presidio defendantur.

³⁰ Cod. Th. lib. 9. Tit. 45. Leg. 3. Si quis in posterum servus, ancilla, curialis, debitor publicus, procurator, murilegulus, quilibet postremo publicis privatisve rationibus involutus, ad ecclesiam confugiens, vel clericus ordinatus, vel quocunque modo fuerit a clericis defensatus, nec statim conventionem præmissa pristinae conditioni reddatur, decuriones quidem, et omnes, quos solita ad debitum munus functio vocat, vigore et solertia judicantium ad pristinam sortem revertentur.

³¹ Chrysost. Hom. in Eutrop. t. 4.

³² Prosper de Prædict. lib. 3. c. 38.

³³ Socrat. lib. 6. c. 5.

³⁴ Sozom. lib. 8. c. 7.

³⁵ Book IV. chap. 4. sect. 4.

³⁶ Cod. Th. lib. 9. Tit. 45. de his qui ad Eccles. confug. Leg. 5. Si quidem servus cujusquam ecclesiam, altariae, loci tantum veneratione confusus, sine ullo telo petierit, is non plus uno die ibidem dimittatur, quin domino ejus, vel ejus metu pœnaa imminentem visus est declinasse, a clericis, quorum interest, nuntietur. Isque eum, impertita indulgentia peccatorum, abducat.

³⁷ Rittershus. de Asylis, c. 8. p. 284.

³⁸ Justin. Novel. 17. c. 7. Neque autem homicidis, neque adulteris, neque virginum raptoribus, vel talia delinquentibus, terminorum custodias cautelam: sed etiam inde extrahes, et supplicium eis inferes. Non enim talia delinquentibus parcere competit, sed hoc patientibus, ut non talia a præsumptoribus patientur. Deinde templorum cautela non nocentibus, sed læsis datur a lege, et non erit possibile utrumque tueri cautela sacrorum locorum, et lædentem et læsum.

punishments suitable to their offences. This one law of Justinian's shows us plainly the true intent and meaning of all other ancient laws relating to this privilege of sanctuary, that the design of them, as I observed before, was chiefly to protect the innocent, the injured, and oppressed from violence, and in some hard or dubious cases to grant a little respite, till a fair hearing might be procured, or some intercession made to the judges, by the bishop or clergy, for such persons as might seem to want it. And so Gothofred³⁹ upon the whole matter determines, that anciently legal refuge was no more but the clergy's deprecation or intercession for men in distress. And such as they might laudably and decently intercede for, they might for some time legally protect from violence and torture in the church; but not obstruct the due execution of justice upon other sort of criminals, for which it was scandalous to intercede.

In which respect most of the modern sanctuaries have been complained of by considering men, as guilty of great abuses, in giving protection almost to all sorts of criminals, and so encouraging the practice of villany, by exempting men from legal punishment, and enervating the force of civil laws. For the canon law of Gratian, and the pope's Decretals, grant protection to all criminals, except night robbers, and robbers on the highway, and such as commit enormous crimes in the church itself upon presumption of its protection. But all other criminals have liberty of taking sanctuary, and it is reckoned a violation of the immunities of the church to take them thence, unless a promise or an oath be first given, that neither death,⁴⁰ nor any other corporal punishment, but only a pecuniary mulct, shall be inflicted on them, as Pope Innocent III. determined in one of his letters to the king of Scots, which Gregory IX. inserted into the body of his Decretals. The council of Orleans⁴¹ has some canons to the same purpose, which, though contrary to all other ancient laws, Gratian⁴² thought fit to adopt into his own Collections. And so the modern canon law, under pretence of ecclesiastical immunities, opened a wide gap to licentiousness, by taking off those restraints which the ancient laws had justly set upon this matter, when they granted refuge to innocent and injured men, but not to notorious criminals. Which difference is not only noted and complained of by all protestant writers, but also by some of the Romish church. Polydore Virgil⁴³ makes no scruple to condemn them all over the Christian world, but more especially here in England, where protection was given, not to the innocent and oppressed, but to all sorts of criminals, such as were guilty of treason and rebellion not excepted. Whence he thinks it very apparent, that the thing, as then practised, was not to be derived from Moses, who allowed refuge to none but such as killed a man unawares and against their will, but from Romulus: which was the cause that so many villains took heart and encouragement to practise wickedness, there being churches every where ready to receive and protect them; though nothing was more directly contrary to the establishment of Moses, whose law was guarded with this sanction, Exod. xxi. 14, "If a man come presumptuously upon his neighbour, to slay him with guile, thou shalt take him from my altar, that he may die." This was the difference, in the opinion of that author, between the modern sanctuaries and those of Moses and the ancient church.

There is one thing more to be observed concerning the privilege of sanctuary in the laws of the ancient church, which is, that such persons as were allowed this benefit, were obliged to observe certain conditions in taking refuge, otherwise they forfeited all their right and title to it. As, first, They were not to fly with arms into the church, nor into any place or building adjoining to it, as the gardens, houses, courts, cloisters, to which the privilege of sanctuary was annexed. This is particularly specified and provided by a law⁴⁴ of Theodosius junior, which has this sanction added to it, That if any one pretended to act otherwise, and, being admonished by the church, refused to lay aside his arms, that then it should be lawful for the magistrate, by the consent of the bishop, to send his officers with arms into the church upon such an exigence, and take him thence by force; and if the

Sect. 9.
A just reflection upon the great abuse of modern sanctuaries, in exempting men from legal punishment, and enervating the force of civil laws.

Sect. 10.
Conditions anciently to be observed by such as fled for sanctuary. 1st, No one to fly with arms into the church.

³⁹ Gothofred. Com. in Cod. Th. lib. 9. Tit. 45. Leg. 5. p. 373. Nihil ad ecclesiam per fugium erat, quam clericorum deprecatio seu intercessio.

⁴⁰ Decretal. Gregor. lib. 3. Tit. 49. de Immunit. Eccles. c. 6. Quantumcunque gravia maleficia perpetraverit, non est violententer ab ecclesia extrahendus: nec inde damnari debet ad mortem vel ad penam, sed rectores ecclesiarum sibi obtinere debent membra et vitam. Super hoc tamen quod inique fecit, est alias legitime puniendus.

⁴¹ Conc. Aurelian. 1. can. 3 et 4.

⁴² Gratian. Caus. 17. qu. 4. c. 36. It. Caus. 36. qu. 1. c. 3.

⁴³ Polydor. Virgil. de Inventor. Rerum, lib. 3. c. 12. Sunt hodie in orbe nostro Christiano, præsertim apud Anglos, passim asyla, quæ non modo insidias timentibus, sed quibusvis sontibus, etiam majestatis reis patent: quod facit ut manifeste appareat, nos id institutum non a Mose, qui illis duntaxat qui nolentes hominem occidissent, asylum posuit, sed a Romulo esse mutuatos. Quæ nempe res haud dubie in causa est, cur bene multi a maleficiis minus abstineant manus, &c.

⁴⁴ Cod. Th. lib. 9. Tit. 45. de his qui ad Eccles. confug. Leg. 4. Si ecclesiæ voce moniti, noluerint arma relinquere — armatis, si ita res exegerit, infromissis, trahendos se abstrahendosque esse cognoscant, et omnibus casibus esse subdendos, &c.

refugee still persisted in his opposition, and chanced to be slain in the engagement, it was to be reckoned purely his own fault, and no violation of the church's privilege in that case, because he refused to observe this necessary condition of safety. The emperors themselves laid aside their arms and crowns when they entered into the church, and therefore Theodosius argues,⁴⁵ that it was but reasonable all refugees should do the same, and trust only to the laws and sacredness of the place for their protection.

A second condition to be observed in this case was, That men should betake themselves silently and modestly to the church, and not by any rude and indecent clamours endeavour to raise any popular tumult. Learned men collect this from a law in the Greek Constitutions, and the Justinian Code,⁴⁶ which forbids refugees to make any clamorous petitions to the emperor on such festivals as he came to the great church, but if they had any request to be preferred, they should do it privately by the archbishop or defenders of the church: otherwise they should forfeit their privilege, and be cast out of the church, and be delivered over to the city magistrate to be punished.

Thirdly, Though refugees might fly to the church, and even to the very altar; yet they were neither to eat nor lodge there; but the clergy were obliged to prohibit them from doing either of these by an express law of Theodosius junior,⁴⁷ who, to cut off all pretences for the contrary practices, as if men could not be safe but within the walls of the church, made not only the church and the altar places of refuge, but all other buildings and places belonging to the church; giving this reason for allowing such an ample space for the benefit of sanctuary, that men might not have the excuse of fear to make them eat or lodge in the church, which he thought to be things not so decent in their own nature, nor agreeable to the state of religion, and the respect and reverence that was due to churches, as places appropriated to God, and set apart for his service.

Sect. 11.
2ndly, No one to raise a seditious clamour or tumult, as he fled thither.

Sect. 12.
3rdly, No one to eat or lodge in the church but to be entertained in some outward building.

⁴⁵ Edict. Theodos. ad calcem Concil. Ephesin. cited before, chap. 10. n. 8.

⁴⁶ Cod. Justin. lib. 1. Tit. 12. de his qui ad Eccles. confug. Leg. 8. Qui imperatore ad magnam ecclesiam in festo procedente, exclamazione usus fuerit, excidet re sperata, et per præfectum ejectus castigabitur, &c.

⁴⁷ Cod. Th. lib. 9. Tit. 45. de his qui ad Eccles. confug. Leg. 4. Hanc autem spatii latitudinem ideo indulgemus, ne in ipso Dei templo et sacrosanctis altaribus confugientium quenquam mane vel vespere cubare vel pernoctare liceat; ipsis hoc clericis religionis causa vetantibus, &c.

BOOK IX.

A GEOGRAPHICAL DESCRIPTION OF THE ANCIENT CHURCH, OR AN ACCOUNT OF ITS DIVISION INTO PROVINCES, DIOCESES, AND PARISHES: AND OF THE FIRST ORIGINAL OF THESE.

CHAPTER I.

OF THE STATE AND DIVISION OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE, AND OF THE CHURCH'S CONFORMING TO THAT IN MODELLING HER OWN EXTERNAL POLITY AND GOVERNMENT.

Sect. 1.
The state of the Roman empire in the days of the apostles.
HAVING thus far spoken of churches, as they signify the material buildings, or places of convention set apart for Christian worship, I come now to consider them in another notion, as they are put to signify any number of Christian people within a certain district, as in a parish, diocese, province, patriarchate; which are names that we frequently meet with in ancient writers, though they are not all equally of the same antiquity: and therefore I shall here inquire both into the nature and original of them. Something has already been said upon this head, in speaking of the several officers of the church that were placed in those districts, as patriarchs, metropolitans, bishops, and presbyters, so far as was necessary to explain the powers and duties of those ministers in the church: yet there are many things to be noted further, which could not then come under consideration; for which reason I now make them the subject of a peculiar inquiry. And here, to understand the state and division of the church aright, it will be proper to take a short view of the state and division of the Roman empire: for it is generally thought by learned men, that the church held some conformity to that in her external policy and government, both at her first settlement, and in the changes and variations that were made in after ages. In the time of the apostles, every city among the Greeks and Romans was under the immediate government of certain magistrates within its own body, commonly known by the name of βουλή or senatus, its common council or senate, otherwise called ordo and curia, the states and court of the city: among which there was usually one chief or principal above the rest, whom some call the dictator, and others, the defensor civitatis: whose power extended not only over the city, but all the adjacent territory, commonly called the προάστεια, the suburbs, or lesser towns, belonging to its jurisdiction. This was a city in the civil account, a place where the civil magistrate and a sort of lesser senate was fixed, to order the affairs of that community, and govern within such a precinct.

Now, much after the same manner, the apostles in first planting and establishing the church, wherever they found a civil magistracy settled in any place, there they endeavoured to settle an ecclesiastical one, consisting of a senate or presbytery, a common council of presbyters, and one chief president above the rest, commonly called the προεστώς, or the apostle, or bishop, or angel of the church; whose jurisdiction was not confined to a single congregation, but extended to the whole region or district belonging to the city, which was the προάστεια, or παρουσία, or, as we now call it, the diocese of the church. According to this model, most probably, St. Paul directed Titus to ordain elders in Crete, κατὰ πόλιν, in every city, that is, to settle an ecclesiastical senate and government in every place where there was before a civil one: which, from the subsequent history of the church, we learn, was a bishop and his presbytery, who were conjunctly called the elders and senate of the church. The cities of the empire had also their magistrates in the territory or country round them; but these were subordinate to the magistrates of the city, and generally chosen by them, as learned men¹ have observed out of Frontinus de Limitibus Agrariis, and other Roman antiquaries. In like manner, every city church had spiritual officers in all towns and villages belonging to the city region; and these depending on the mother church both for the exercise of their power and their institution; they being both subordinate and accountable to the city church,

Sect. 2.
The state of the church conformable to it.

¹ See Dr. Maurice, Dioces. Episc. p. 390.

as the subordinate magistrates were in the civil disposition.

Another division of the Roman empire was into provinces and dioceses. A province was the cities of a whole region subjected to the authority of one chief magistrate, who resided in the metropolis, or chief city of the province. This was commonly a prætor, or a proconsul, or some magistrate of the like eminence and dignity. A diocese was still a larger district, containing several provinces within the compass of it: in the capital city of which district a more general magistrate had his residence, whose power extended over the whole diocese, to receive appeals, and determine all causes that were referred to him for a new hearing from any city within the district. And this magistrate was sometimes called an eparchus, or vicarius of the Roman empire, and particularly a præfectus Augustalis at Alexandria. When first this division was made, it is not so certainly agreed among learned men; but it is generally owned, that the division of provinces is more ancient than that of dioceses. For the division into dioceses began only about the time of Constantine. But the cantoning of the empire into provinces was long before; by some referred to Vespasian, by others reckoned still more ancient, and coeval to the first establishment of the Christian church.

However this was, it is very plain, that the church took her model, in setting up metropolitaneal and patriarchal power, from this plan of the state. For as in every metropolis, or chief city of each province, there was a superior magistrate above the magistrates of every single city; so likewise in the same metropolis there was a bishop, whose power extended over the whole province, whence he was called the metropolitan, or primate, as being the principal bishop of the province. And in all places therefore the see of the bishop was fixed to the civil metropolis, except in Africa, where the primate was commonly the senior bishop of the province, as has been showed in another place. In like manner as the state had a vicarius in every capital city of each civil diocese; so the church in process of time came to have her exarchs, or patriarchs, in many, if not in all the capital cities of the empire.

This will appear plainly from the civil notitia of the empire, when compared with the ecclesiastical; which, because it not only gives light in this matter, but is of singular use in many other respects to all that study ecclesiastical history, I will here insert it out of the book called Notitia Imperii, said to be written about the time of Arcadius and Honorius, where the whole empire is divided into thirteen dioceses, under four præfecti-prætorio; and about a hundred and twenty provinces contained in them, in the manner and form following.

The præfectus-prætorio Orientis, and under him five dioceses, viz. The Oriental, Egyptian, Asiatic, Pontic, and Thracian dioceses.

I. In the Oriental diocese are contained fifteen provinces. 1. Palæstina. 2. Phœnice. 3. Syria. 4. Cilicia. 5. Cyprus. 6. Arabia. 7. Isauria. 8. Palæstina Salutaris. 9. Palæstina Secunda. 10. Phœnice Libani. 11. Euphratensis. 12. Syria Salutaris. 13. Osrhoena. 14. Mesopotamia. 15. Cilicia Secunda.

II. In the diocese of Egypt six provinces. 1. Libya Superior. 2. Libya Inferior. 3. Thebais. 4. Ægyptus. 5. Arcadia. 6. Augustanica.

III. In the Asiatic diocese ten provinces. 1. Pamphylia. 2. Hellespontus. 3. Lydia. 4. Pisidia. 5. Lycaonia. 6. Phrygia Pacatiana. 7. Phrygia Salutaris. 8. Lycia. 9. Caria. 10. Insulæ Cyclades.

IV. In the Pontic diocese eleven provinces. 1. Galatia. 2. Bithynia. 3. Honorias. 4. Cappadocia Prima. 5. Paphlagonia. 6. Pontus Polemoniacus. 7. Hellenopontus. 8. Armenia Prima. 9. Armenia Secunda. 10. Galatia Salutaris. 11. Cappadocia Secunda.

V. In the diocese of Thrace six provinces. 1. Europa. 2. Thracia. 3. Hæmimontis. 4. Rhodope. 5. Mæsia Secunda. 6. Scythia.

The præfectus-prætorio of Illyricum, and under him two dioceses, Macedonia and Dacia.

VI. In the diocese of Macedonia six provinces. 1. Achaia. 2. Macedonia. 3. Creta. 4. Thessalia. 5. Epirus Vetus. 6. Epirus Nova, and pars Macedoniæ Salutaris.

VII. In the diocese of Dacia five provinces. 1. Dacia Mediterranea. 2. Dacia Ripensis. 3. Mæsia Prima. 4. Dardania. 5. Pars Macedoniæ Salutaris, and Prævalitana.

The præfectus-prætorio of Italy, and under him three dioceses, viz. Italy or the Italic diocese, Illyricum, and Africa.

VIII. In the Italic diocese are contained seventeen provinces. 1. Venetiæ. 2. Æmylia. 3. Liguria. 4. Flaminia and Picenum Annonarium. 5. Tuscia and Umbria. 6. Picenum Suburbicarium. 7. Campania. 8. Sicilia. 9. Apulia and Calabria. 10. Lucania and Brutii. 11. Alpes Cottivæ. 12. Rhætia Prima. 13. Rhætia Secunda. 14. Samnium. 15. Valeria. 16. Sardinia. 17. Corsica.

Sect. 4.
The same model followed by the church.

Sect. 5.
The evidences from the civil notitia of the empire.

IX. In the diocese of Illyricum six provinces. 1. Pannonia Secunda. 2. Savia. 3. Dalmatia. 4. Pannonia Prima. 5. Noricum Mediterraneum. 6. Noricum Ripense.

X. In the diocese of Africa six provinces. 1. Byzacium. 2. Numidia. 3. Mauritania Sitifensis. 4. Mauritania Cæsariensis. 5. Tripolis. 6. Africa Proconsularis.

The præfectus-prætorio Galliarum, and under him three dioceses, viz. Hispania, Gallia, Britannia.

XI. In the Spanish diocese seven provinces. 1. Bætica. 2. Lusitania. 3. Gallæcia. 4. Tarraconensis. 4. Carthaginensis. 6. Tingitania. 7. Baleares.

XII. In the Gallican diocese seventeen provinces. 1. Viennensis. 2. Lugdunensis Prima. 3. Germania Prima. 4. Germania Secunda. 5. Belgica Prima. 6. Belgica Secunda. 7. Alpes Maritimæ. 8. Alpes Penninæ et Graiæ. 9. Maxima Sequanorum. 10. Aquitania Prima. 11. Aquitania Secunda. 12. Novem Populi. 13. Narbonensis Prima. 14. Narbonensis Secunda. 15. Lugdunensis Secunda. 16. Lugdunensis Tertia. 17. Lugdunensis Senonia.

XIII. In the Britannic diocese five provinces. 1. Maxima Cæsariensis. 2. Valentia. 3. Britannia Prima. 4. Britannia Secunda. 5. Flavia Cæsariensis. Thus far the notitia of the empire.

Now, though we have no notitia of the church so ancient as this; (for that of Leo Sapiens, which is exhibited hereafter, is of later date;) yet by comparing the broken fragments that remain in the acts and subscriptions of the ancient councils, with this notitia of the empire, and conferring both with the later notitias of the church, it plainly appears that the church was divided into dioceses and provinces much after the same manner as the empire; having an exarch, or patriarch, in almost every diocese, and a metropolitan, or primate, in every province. The most probable account of which, conformed to the foresaid civil notitia, is presented in the following Table, according as the division of the church seems to have stood in the latter end of the fourth century.

I. In the Oriental diocese. Patriarch of Antioch.

PROVINCES.	METROPOLES.
1. Palæstina Prima.	1. Cæsarea.
2. Phœnice.	2. Tyrus.
3. Syria.	3. Antiochia.
4. Cilicia Prima.	4. Tarsus.
5. Cyprus.	5. Constantia.
6. Arabia.	6. Bostra.

PROVINCES. METROPOLES.

7. Isauria.	7. Seleucia.
8. Palæstina Salutaris.	8. Jerusalem, or Ælia.
9. Palæstina Secunda.	9. Scythopolis.
10. Phœnice Libani.	10. Emissa.
11. Euphratensis.	11. Hierapolis.
12. Syria Salutaris.	12. Apamea.
13. Osrhoene.	13. Edessa.
14. Mesopotamia.	14. Amida.
15. Cilicia Secunda.	15. Anazarbus.

II. In the diocese of Egypt. Patriarch of Alexandria.

PROVINCES. METROPOLES.

1. Libya Superior.	1. Ptolemais.
2. Libya Inferior.	2. Dranieon.
3. Thebais.	3. Antinoe, or Lycopolis.
4. Ægyptus.	4. Alexandria.
5. Arcadia.	5. Oxirinchus.
6. Augustanica.	6. Pelusium.

III. In the diocese of Asia. Exarch of Ephesus.

PROVINCES. METROPOLES.

1. Pamphylia.	1. Perga, or Sida.
2. Hellespont.	2. Cyzicus.
3. Lydia.	3. Sardes.
4. Pisidia.	4. Antiochia.
5. Lycaonia.	5. Iconium.
6. Phrygia Pacatiana.	6. Laodicea.
7. Phrygia Salutaris.	7. Synada.
8. Lycia.	8. Myra.
9. Caria.	9. Amphrodisias, or Stauropolis.
10. Insulæ Cyclades.	10. Rhodus.
11. Asia Proconsularis.	11. Ephesus.

IV. Diocese of Pontus. Exarch of Cæsarea.

PROVINCES. METROPOLES.

1. Galatia.	1. Ancyra.
2. Bithynia.	2. Nicomedia.
3. Cappadocia Prima.	3. Cæsarea.
4. Cappadocia Secunda.	4. Tyana.
5. Honorias.	5. Claudiopolis.
6. Paphlagonia.	6. Gangra.
7. Pontus Polemoniacus.	7. Neocæsarea.
8. Helenopontus.	8. Amasea.
9. Armenia Prima.	9. Sebastia.
10. Armenia Secunda.	10. Melitine.
11. Galatia Salutaris.	11. Pessinus al. Justinianopolis.

V. Diocese of Thrace. Exarch of Heraclea first, afterward Constantinople.

PROVINCES. METROPOLES.

1. Europa.	1. Heraclea.
2. Thracia.	2. Philippopolis.

Sect. 6.
Compared with the most ancient accounts of the division of provinces in the church.

PROVINCES.	METROPOLES.
3. Hæmi montis.	3. Adrianople.
4. Rhodope.	4. Trajanople.
5. Mæsia Secunda.	5. Marcianople.
6. Scythia.	6. Tomi. But the bishop of Tomi is rather to be reckoned an autocephalus than a metropolitan, because he had no suffragan bishops under him.

VI. In the diocese of Macedonia. The exarch of Thessalonica.

PROVINCES.	METROPOLES.
1. Achaia.	1. Corinthus.
2. Macedonia.	2. Thessalonica.
3. Creta.	3. Gortyna.
4. Thessalia.	4. Larissa.
5. Epirus Vetus.	5. Nicopolis.
6. Epirus Nova.	6. Dyrrachium.

VII. Diocese of Dacia. Exarch perhaps first at Sardica, afterwards at Acrida, or Justiniana Prima, erected by Justinian.

PROVINCES.	METROPOLES.
1. Dacia Mediterranea.	1. Sardica.
2. Dacia Ripensis.	2. The same.
3. Mæsia Prima.	3. The same.
4. Dardania.	4. Scupi.
5. Prævalitana.	5. Acrida.

VIII. The diocese of Italy is by some reckoned but one diocese, by others divided into two, the diocese of Italy, and prefecture of Rome.

In the Italic diocese. Exarch of Milan.

PROVINCES.	METROPOLES.
1. Flaminia and Picenum Annon.	1. Ravenna.
2. Venetia and Histria.	2. Aquileia.
3. Æmilia.	3. Ravenna.
4. Liguria.	4. Mediolanum, Milan.
5. Alpes Cotticæ.	5. Milan.
6. Rhætia Prima.	6. Milan.
7. Rhætia Secunda.	7. Milan, others Rhætropolis, called Augusta Tiberii, now Ratisbon.

In the Roman prefecture. Patriarch of Rome.

PROVINCES.	METROPOLES.
1. Picenum Suburbicarium.	1. Rome.
2. Campania.	2. Rome, others Capua.

PROVINCES.	METROPOLIS.
3. Tuscia and Umbria.	3. Rome.
4. Apulia and Calabria.	4. Rome.
5. Brutii and Lucania.	5. Rome.
6. Samnium.	6. Rome.
7. Valeria.	7. Rome.
8. Sicilia.	8. Syracuse.
9. Sardinia.	9. Calaris.
10. Corsica.	10. Uncertain. Others say Rome.

IX. Diocese of Illyricum Occidentale. Exarch of Sirmium.

PROVINCES.	METROPOLES.
1. Pannonia Prima, or Superior.	1. Laureacum.
2. Pannonia Secunda.	2. Sirmium.
3. Salvia.	3. Sirmium. Others Vindomana.
4. Dalmatia.	4. Salona.
5. Noricum Mediterraneum.	5. Some say, Saltzburg.
6. Noricum Ripense.	6. Some say, Laureacum. Others leave these two uncertain.

X. Diocese of Africa. Exarch of Carthage.

PROVINCES.	METROPOLES.
1. Africa Proconsularis.	1. Carthago.
2. Byzacium.	2. Civil metropolis, Adrumetum. But the ecclesiastical followed the see of the senior bishop. So in all the rest.
3. Numidia.	3. Cirta Julia, or Constantina.
4. Tripolis.	4. Tripolis.
5. Mauritania Sitifensis.	5. Sitifi.
6. Mauritania Cæsariensis.	6. Cæsarea.

XI. Diocese of Spain. Exarch uncertain.

PROVINCES.	METROPOLES.
1. Bætica.	1. Hispalis.
2. Lusitania.	2. Emerita Augusta.
3. Gallicia.	3. Bracara.
4. Tarraconensis.	4. Tarraco.
5. Carthaginensis.	5. Carthago Hispanica.
6. Tingitana.	6. See of the sen. bishop.
7. Insulæ Baleares.	7. Uncertain; some say Palma.

XII. Diocese of Gallia. Exarch uncertain.

PROVINCES.	METROPOLES.
1. Viennensis.	1. Arelate. Others say Vienna.
2. Lugdunensis Prima.	2. Lugdunum.

PROVINCES.	METROPOLES.
3. Germania Prima.	3. Trevisis. Since Mentz.
4. Germania Secunda.	4. Treveris. Since Colen.
5. Belgica Prima.	5. Treveris.
6. Belgica Secunda.	6. Rhemi.
7. Alpes Maritimæ.	7. Ebrodunum.
8. Alpes Penninæ and Graiæ.	8. Vienna.
9. Maxima Sequanorum.	9. Vesontio. Besançon.
10. Aquitania Prima.	10. Bituriges. Bourges.
11. Aquitania Secunda.	11. Burdigala.
12. Novem Populorum.	12. Elusa, or Augusta Ausci- sciorum.
13. Narbonensis Prima.	13. Narbo.
14. Narbonensis Secunda.	14. Aquæ Sextiæ. Aix.
15. Lugdunensis Secunda.	15. Rothomagus. Rouen.
16. Lugdunensis Tertia.	16. Turones. Tours.
16. Lugdunensis Senoniæ.	17. Senonæ. Sens.

XIII. Diocese of Britain. Exarch of York, if any.

PROVINCES.	METROPOLES.
1. Maxima Cæsariensis, which was at the first all from the Thames to the northern borders.	1. Eboracum. York.
2. Flavia Cæsariensis, taken out of the former, and containing all from the Thames to the Humber.	2. York.
3. Britannia Prima, all on the south of Thames.	3. London.
4. Britannia Secunda, all beyond Severn.	4. Caerleon.
5. Valentia, beyond the Picts' wall.	5. York.

This, in the main, was the state and division of the church into provinces, and exarchates, or metropolitan and patriarchal dioceses, in the latter end of the fourth century; from which it appears, that a very near correspondence was observed between the church and state in this matter both in the Western and Eastern empire.

And this may be evidenced further both from the rules and canons, and the known practice of the church in this case. For when any provinces were divided in the state, there commonly followed a division in the church also: and when any city was advanced to a greater dignity in the civil account, it usually obtained a like promotion in the ecclesiastical: so when controversies arose about primacy between two churches in the same province or district, the way to end the dispute was to inquire, which of them was the metropolis in the state, and order the same to be the metropolis in the church. Of all which there are manifest proofs in ancient history. It was by this rule that the bishop of Constantinople was advanced to patriarchal power in the church, who before was not so much as a metropolitan, but subject to the primate of Heraclea in Thrace. And this very reason is given by two general councils, which confirmed him in the possession of this new-acquired power. The first of Constantinople decreed,² That he should have the next place of honour after the bishop of Rome, because Constantinople was New Rome. Which was thus again confirmed and ratified in the council of Chalcedon, which says, Forasmuch as we think it proper to follow the decrees of the holy fathers, and allow the canon made by those hundred and fifty bishops assembled under the emperor Theodosius in the royal city Constantinople, we ourselves order³ and decree the same concerning the privileges of the most holy church of the said city, which is New Rome. For our forefathers gave Old Rome her privileges in regard that she was the royal city: and those hundred and fifty bishops were moved with the same consideration to grant equal privileges to the episcopal throne of New Rome; judging it but reasonable, that the city which was honoured with the royal seat of the empire and senate, and enjoyed the same privileges with Old Rome in all matters of a civil nature, should also be advanced to the same dignity in ecclesiastical affairs, and be accounted the second in order after her. Accordingly they determined now, that the three whole dioceses of Asia, Pontus, and Thrace, should be settled under the jurisdiction of this new patriarch of Constantinople. Which plainly shows, they had a particular regard to the model of the state in settling the bounds and limits of jurisdiction in the church. The council of Antioch assigns this for the reason of paying deference to metropolitan bishops in general, because they were placed in the metropolis of the province,⁴ whither all men that had business or controversies had recourse. And therefore if any dispute happened, as sometimes there did, between two bishops in the same province about metropolitan power, each laying a claim to it; the way to end this controversy was to inquire, which of their sees was the true metropolis in the state? and adjudge the same to have the true legal right and privilege in the church. By this rule the council of Turin⁵ deter-

Sect. 7.
This evidenced further from the rules and canons of the church.

² Concil. Constant. c. 3. Τὸν Κωνσταντινουπόλεως ἐπίσκοπον ἔχειν τὰ πρεσβεία τῆς τιμῆς μετὰ τὸν τῆς Ρώμης ἐπίσκοπον, διὰ τὸ εἶναι αὐτὴν νέαν Ρώμην.

³ Concil. Chalced. c. 28. ⁴ Concil. Antioch. c. 9.

⁵ Concil. Taurin. c. 2. Illud inter episcopos urbium

Arelatensis et Viennensis, qui de primatus apud nos honore certabant, a sancta synodo definitum est, ut qui ex eis comprobaverit suam civitatem esse metropolim, is totius provincie honorem primatus obtineat, et ipse juxta præceptum canonum, ordinationum habeat potestatem.

mined the controversy about presidency betwixt the two churches of Arles and Vienna, decreeing, That that bishop should be the primate, who could prove his city to be the metropolis of the province. It sometimes happened that an ambitious spirit would petition the emperor to grant him the honour and power of a metropolitan in the church, when yet the province to which he belonged had but one metropolis in the state; which was so contrary to the foresaid rule of the church, that the great council of Chalcedon⁶ made it deposition for any bishop to attempt it. But on the other hand, if the emperor thought fit to divide a province into two, and erect a new metropolis in the second part; then the church many times allowed the bishop of the new metropolis to become a metropolitan in the church also. By this means Tyana, in Cappadocia, came to be a metropolitical see, as well as Cæsarea, because the province was divided into two by imperial edict. And the like happened upon the division of many other provinces, Galatia, Pamphylia, &c. As may be seen in the notitia of the church, which follows in the end of this book. The canons of the church were made to favour this practice in the erection of new bishoprics also. For the council of Chalcedon⁷ has another canon, which says, That if the imperial power made any innovation in the precincts or parishes belonging to any city, then the state of the church-precincts might be altered in conformity to the alterations that were made in the political and civil state. Which canon is repeated and confirmed in the council⁸ of Trullo. So that if any place was advanced to the privilege of a city, and governed by a civil magistracy of its own, which was not so before, it might then also be freed from the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of its former bishop, and be governed by one of its own. Thus when Maiuma in Palestine, a dependant on Gaza, was advanced by Constantine to the privilege of a city, and governed by a magistracy of its own; that was presently followed with the erection of a new bishop's see, which continued ever after, notwithstanding that Julian, in spite to Christianity, disfranchised the city, and annexed it to Gaza again. Sozomen is our author for this, and he adds further,⁹ that in his time the bishop of Gaza, upon a vacancy of Maiuma, laying claim to it as only an appendage of his own city; and pleading, that one city ought not to have two bishops; the cause came to a hearing before a provincial synod, which determined in favour of the Maiumitans, and ordained them another bishop. For they thought it not proper, that they who for their piety had obtained the privilege of being made a city, and were only deprived of their right by the envy of a pagan prince, should lose their other rights, which concerned the priesthood and the church. So it always continued an episcopal see, and has its place among the rest in the notitia of the church. The like may be observed of Emmaus, which at first was but a village belonging to the diocese and city of Jerusalem. But being afterward rebuilt by the Romans, and called Nicopolis, from their great victories over the Jews, it became a city and a bishop's see, under which character the reader may also find it in the notitia of the church. These are evident proofs, that in settling the limits of dioceses and other districts, and modelling the external polity of the church, a great regard was had to the rules of the state, and many things ordered in conformity to the measure observed in the Roman empire.

Yet these being matters only of conveniency and outward order, the church did not tie herself absolutely to follow that model, but only so far as she judged it expedient and conducive to the ends of her own spiritual government and discipline. And therefore she did not imitate the state model in all things: she never had one universal bishop, in imitation of a universal emperor; nor an Eastern and a Western pontificate, in imitation of an Eastern and Western empire; nor four grand spiritual administrators, answering to the four great ministers of state, the præfecti-prætorio, in the civil government; not to mention any other forms or ministers of state affairs, multitudes of which may be seen in the notitia of the empire. Nay, in those things wherein she followed the civil form, her liberty seems to have been preserved both by the laws of church and state; and nothing of this nature was forced upon her, but as she thought fit to order it in her own wisdom and discretion. This may be collected from one of Justinian's Novels, where having divided the two Armenias into four provinces, he adds,¹⁰ That as to what concerned the state of the church, his intent was to leave every thing in its ancient form, and make no alterations in the rights of the old metropolitans, or their power of ordaining their suffragans, &c. And this appears further from the answer of Pope Innocent, bishop of Rome, or one under his name, given to Alexander of Antioch, who had put the question,¹¹ Whether

Sect. 8.
Yet the church not tied precisely to observe this model, but used her liberty in varying from it.

⁶ Concil. Chalced. c. 12.

⁷ Concil. Chalced. c. 17. Εἰ τις ἐκ βασιλικῆς ἐξουσίας ἐκαινίσθῃ πόλις, τοῖς πολιτικοῖς καὶ δημοσίοις τύποις καὶ τῶν ἐκκλησιαστικῶν παροικίων ἢ τάξις ἀκολουθεῖτω.

⁸ Concil. Trul. c. 38, which instead of παροικίων, reads, πραγμάτων.

⁹ Sozom. lib. 5. c. 3.

¹⁰ Justin. Novel. 31. Quæ vero ad sacerdotia spectant, ea volumus in pristina manere forma, ut neque circa jus metropoliticum, neque circa ordinationes quicquam innovetur. Vid. 28. c. 2.

¹¹ Innocent. Ep. 18. ad Alex. Antioch. Quod sciscitaris, utrum divisio imperialis iudicio provinciis, ut duæ metropoles fiant, sic duo metropolitani episcopi debeant nomi-

upon the division of a province, and the erection of two civil metropolises in it by a royal decree, there ought also to be two metropolitan bishops in the church? To this he answers, That there was no reason the church should undergo alterations upon every necessary change that was made in the civil state, or have her honours and dignities multiplied or divided according to what the emperor thought fit to do in his own affairs. This shows, that the church was at liberty in this matter, to follow the model and divisions of the civil state or not, as she judged most expedient for herself: and when any alterations of this nature were made, they were generally done by the direction or consent of a provincial or general council, or the tacit consent and approbation of the church.

Whilst we are upon this head relating to the ancient division of the church, it comes properly to be inquired, what the primitive writers mean by the term ecclesiæ suburbicariæ, suburbicary churches, in the district of the Roman church. Ruffinus, in his translation and abstract of the Nicene canons, gives us the sixth of them in these words,¹² "The ancient custom of Alexandria and Rome shall still be observed, that the one shall have the care or government of the Egyptian, and the other that of the suburbicary churches." A great many questions have been raised by learned men in the last age concerning this, which I shall not clog this discourse with, but only resolve two questions, which are most material for a reader to know. 1. What was the extent of this district? 2. Whether it was the limits of his metropolitan or patriarchal power? To know what was the extent of this district, we cannot take a surer way, than to consider what is meant by the suburbicary regions in other places. For this is a term that often occurs in the Theodosian Code,¹³ where Gothofred,¹⁴ and our learned Dr. Cave,¹⁵ and many others take it to signify the district of the præfectus urbis, or jurisdiction of the provost of Rome, which was a circuit of about a hundred miles next to Rome; as is evident from the ancient law, which says, his government extended not only to Rome, but to a hundred miles round it,¹⁶ where the limits of his jurisdiction ceased. Which is noted also by Cassiodore,¹⁷ and Dio,¹⁸ who instead of centesimus lapis, uses the phrase of seven hundred and fifty stadia, or furlongs, which is not much short of the legal computation. Others reckon the regiones suburbicariæ to be the same ten provinces of the Italic diocese which were under the vicarius urbiæ, who with the other vicarius of Italy divided the Italic diocese between them: so that the Roman vicarius had seven provinces in Italy, (mentioned before in the notitia;) and the three islands of Sicily, Sardinia, and Corsica, under his jurisdiction; which they reckon the suburbicary provinces of Rome. So our learned Mr. Breewood,¹⁹ and Sirmond,²⁰ and Du Pin, and some others, who extend the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the bishop of Rome to all those ten provinces under the inspection of the vicarius urbis. Either of these opinions may be admitted, as having at least their arguments of probability to defend them: whereas they who confine the suburbicary churches to a single diocese, or extend them so far as to include all the provinces of the Western empire, run into contrary extremes, for which there is no ground either in the Nicene canon itself, or any other part of the history of the church in that age. For it is evident the canon speaks of the power of the three great bishops, Rome, Alexandria, and Antioch, as extending further than a single diocese: but that the authority of the bishop of Rome in those days extended over the whole Western empire, is not once so much as hinted in the Nicene canon, but is contrary to all the common senses of suburbicary churches, and refuted by the known distinction between Italic and Roman churches or provinces, and the constant opposition that was made by the African churches, and those of Britain, Milan, and others, to the least pretences of patriarchal power over them. From which it is rational to conclude, that the notion of suburbicary churches ought not to be extended beyond the limits either of the præfectus urbis, which was a hundred miles about Rome; and, as Dr. Cave and some others think, was also the limits of the pope's metropolitan power; or at most not beyond the limits of those ten provinces, which were immediately subjected to the civil disposition and jurisdiction of the vicarius urbis: viz. 1. Campania. 2. Tuscia and Umbria. 3. Picenum Suburbicarium. 4. Valeria. 5. Samnium. 6. Apulia and Calabria. 7. Lucania and Brutii. 8. Sicilia. 9. Sardinia. 10. Corsica. Which Dr. Cave²¹ supposes to have been the exact and proper limits of the pope's patriarchal power, as he thinks the other were the bounds of his metropolitan jurisdiction.

nari: non visum est ad mobilitatem necessitatum mundanarum Dei ecclesiam commutari, honoresque aut divisiones perpeti, quas pro suis causis faciendas duxerit imperator.

¹² Ruffin. Hist. lib. 1. c. 6. Ut apud Alexandriam, et in urbe Roma, vetusta consuetudo servetur, ut vel ille Ægypti, vel hic suburbicariarum ecclesiarum sollicitudinem gerat.

¹³ Cod. Th. lib. 11. Tit. 1. de Annona. Leg. 9. Vid. plura apud Gothofred. in locum.

¹⁴ Gothofred. in loc.

¹⁵ Cave, Anc. Church Gov. c. 3. p. 115.

¹⁶ Digest. lib. 1. Tit. 12. Leg. 1. Si quid intra centesimum milliarium admissum sit, ad præfectum urbi pertinet, &c.

¹⁷ Cassiodor. Form. lib. 6. p. 207.

¹⁸ Dio, lib. 52. p. 548.

¹⁹ Breewood of Patriarch. Gov. qu. 1. p. 99.

²⁰ Sirmond. Censur. Conjectur. lib. 1. c. 4.

²¹ Cave, Anc. Church Gov. c. 5. p. 256.

But it matters not much, I think, whether we call this district of these ten provinces the bishop of Rome's metropolitan or patriarchal dioceses or provinces. For after all the disputes that have been raised about this matter, these seem to have been in a great measure the true ancient limits both of his metropolitan and patriarchal power. Many, I know, will take this for a paradox: but I have showed it to be true²² in the case of the bishop of Alexandria, the bounds of whose jurisdiction were the same, viz. the six provinces of the Egyptian diocese, both when he was a metropolitan and patriarch: and why then might not the case be the same with the bishop of Rome, whose privileges are prescribed as a model for the bishop of Alexandria by the council of Nice, whose words are these:²³ Let ancient customs prevail; in Egypt, Libya, and Pentapolis, let the bishop of Alexandria have authority over all, because the same is customary with the bishop of Rome: in like manner at Antioch, and in other provinces, let the privileges be secured to the churches. Some think the bishop of Rome was only a metropolitan when this canon was made, as Launoy, Bishop Beveridge, Bishop Stillingfleet, Dr. Cave; according to whose sentiments it must follow, that the suburbicary churches were the district or subject of his metropolitan power. Mr. Brerewood²⁴ and Spalatensis, after St. Jerom, think he was properly a patriarch; and I have showed elsewhere,²⁵ that there are some reasons to countenance their opinion: but then the limits of his patriarchal power were still the same, (according as it was at Alexandria,) and the ten provinces of the Roman diocese were the legal bounds of his jurisdiction. And so Du Pin²⁶ amongst the Romanists makes no scruple ingenuously to confess; exempting Germany, Spain, France, Britain, Africa, Illyricum, and seven of the Italic provinces, from any subjection to the jurisdiction of the Roman patriarch in those first and primitive ages.

This is contrary to the general stream and current of the Romish writers, one of which is so angry with Du Pin upon this account, that he treats him with all the scorn and bitterness imaginable for making such a bold concession, and endeavours to answer²⁷ both what he and Bishop Stillingfleet had advanced against the pope's pretence to patriarchal power over the whole Western empire: but with what success, the reader may easily judge from these few instances, which are evident proofs of the sense that has been given of the extent and limits of the pope's patriarchal jurisdiction. 1. Ruffinus, who was an Italian, and presbyter of Aquileia, and therefore could not be ignorant of the bounds of the pope's patriarchal power, in interpreting the sixth canon of the council of Nice, confines his jurisdiction to the suburbicary provinces:²⁸ and other ancient versions, published by Sirmondus and Justellus, agree with his interpretation. 2. The other seven provinces of Italy, which properly constituted the Italic diocese, as distinct from the Roman provinces, with Milan their metropolis at the head of them, were not anciently subject to the jurisdiction of the bishop of Rome. For Milan is frequently styled the metropolis of Italy by Athanasius²⁹ and Theodoret,³⁰ taking Italy in its strict and peculiar notion, as distinct from the provinces subject to Rome. The bishop of Milan was never ordained by the bishop of Rome, (which yet he must have been, had he been subject to his patriarchal power,) but by the bishop of Aquileia, as the bishop of Aquileia and other places were ordained by Milan, which is evident from the epistle of Pope Pelagius,³¹ and De Marca³² does not pretend to deny it. The like has been observed by learned men concerning Ravenna, and other places in Italy, which frequently contested the point of superiority and subjection with the bishops of Rome, of which Dr. Cave³³ gives the reader a particular historical account for many ages successively, too long to be here inserted. 3. For the African provinces (which are pretended to be part of the pope's patriarchal dominions) they had always an exarch or patriarch of their own, the primate of Carthage, who was absolute and independent³⁴ of any other, as Justinian declares in one of his Novels. And it is plain the African councils always thought so: for as they never sent to Rome for ordinations, so they prohibited all appeals thither upon any account whatsoever. Which is evident beyond all contradiction from the council of Milevis,³⁵ which orders every African clerk, that appeals from the sentence of his own bishop, or a synod of select judges, to appeal to none but African synods, or the primates of the provinces. And if any presumed to appeal beyond seas, meaning to Rome, he should be excluded from all communion in the African churches. This de-²² Book II. chap. 17. sect. 11. ²³ Conc. Nic. c. 6.

²⁴ Brerewood of Patriarchal Power, qu. 1.

²⁵ Book II. chap. 17. sect. 8.

²⁶ Du Pin de Disciplin. Eccles. Dissert. 1. n. 14. p. 92.

²⁷ Schelstrate's Dissertation of Metropolitan and Patriarchal Power against Stillingfleet, Lond. 1688.

²⁸ Ruffin. Hist. lib. 1. c. 6. See before, sect. 9.

²⁹ Athanas. Ep. ad Solitar. t. 1. p. 831.

³⁰ Theod. lib. 2. c. 15.

³¹ Pelag. Ep. 17. Conc. t. 5. p. 805.

³² Marca de Concord. Sacerdot. lib. 6. c. 4. n. 7, 8.

³³ Cave, Anc. Church Gov. c. 5.

³⁴ Justin. Novel. 131. c. 4.

³⁵ Conc. Milevit. c. 22. Quod si et ab eis appellandum putaverint, non provocent nisi ad Africana consilia, vel ad primates provinciarum suarum. Ad transmarina autem qui putaverit appellandum, a nullo intra Africanam in communionem suscipiatur.

cree was further confirmed by several acts of their general synods, made upon the famous case and appeal of Apiarius, an African presbyter, whom Zosimus, bishop of Rome, pretended to restore to communion, after he had been deposed by an African council. Zosimus alleged for himself a pretended decree of the council of Nice, giving him authority to receive appeals: but this the African fathers proved to be a forgery, by sending for authentic copies of the Nicene decrees from Constantinople, Antioch, and Alexandria, where no such thing appeared. Upon this the African fathers write a very sharp letter to Pope Celestine; (for Zosimus and Boniface his successor were both dead whilst this controversy was depending;) where among other things they desire him, that he would not for the future give ear to any that came from Africa, nor admit those to communion whom they had excommunicated, which he might easily perceive to be prohibited by the council of Nice, according to whose decrees both the inferior clergy and the bishops themselves were committed to the judgment of their own metropolitans: for the Nicene fathers very justly and wisely conceived, that all controversies ought to be ended in the places where they arose. And it was very unreasonable in itself to think, that God should enable a single person to examine the justice of a cause, and deny his grace to a vast number of persons assembled in council. Therefore, upon the whole matter, they desire him henceforth to forbear sending any of his clerks into Africa, to execute his sentence there, lest they should seem to introduce the smoky pride of the world into the church of Christ. With abundance more to the same purpose, which the reader may find at large inserted³⁶ among the canons of the African Code. From which it is as plain as the sun at noon-day, that in the time of St. Austin the pope could lay no just claim to patriarchal power over any of the African churches. 4. Baluzius has further demonstrated for the Gallican churches, (in his excellent preface to Antonius Augustinus's book De Emendatione Gratiani;) that for eight hundred years the French synods never allowed of any appeals from their own determinations to the pope. They always ordained their own metropolitans, as is evident from the second synod of Orleans,³⁷ anno 533. And many times stoutly resisted the encroachments of the popes, for which I refer the reader to the foresaid Baluzius and Dr. Cave,³⁸ the particulars being too long to be inserted here. 5. Lastly, For the Britannie churches, it is evident, that for six hundred years they never acknowledged any dependence upon Rome. When Austin the monk came into England, and pleaded with the British bishops (seven in number) for subjection to the bishop of Rome, and conformity to the Roman rites in the observation of Easter, and some other things; he was answered positively,³⁹ That they owed no obedience to the pope of Rome, but were under the government of the bishop of Caerleon upon Uske, who was their overseer under God. And for the business of the paschal controversy, they were so far from paying any deference to the Roman custom, that they continued their ancient practice of observing Easter on a different Sunday from Rome for some ages after, notwithstanding all the arguments that the pope or his party could urge against them. For which reasons they were treated as schismatics by the agents and emissaries of Rome; which is an evident demonstration, that they did not then acknowledge any thing of the pope's patriarchal power over them. All this is clear from Bede,⁴⁰ who repeats it in several places. And William of Malmsbury,⁴¹ and Stephen Heddius,⁴² and Eadmerus,⁴³ and other writers of the Life of Wilfrid, archbishop of York, (a great zealot for the Romish cause against the British customs,) tell us the very same story. For they say, Wilfrid refused to receive ordination from the Scottish or British bishops, or from any ordained by them, because the apostolical see had rejected their communion. So that, as Bishop Stillingfleet has observed⁴⁴ out of these authors, it is plain, the British and Scottish churches stood excommunicate at that time by the church of Rome, because they would not submit to her rites and customs about Easter, and her pretended power over them. A great deal more has been alleged by our learned antiquaries, Mr. Brerewood,⁴⁵ Mr. Watson,⁴⁶ Dr. Cave,⁴⁷ and Bishop Stillingfleet,⁴⁸ to show the ancient liberty and independency of the Britannie churches, which I shall not here repeat, but only consider an exception or two, which are made by Schelstrate in his Dissertation concerning the patriarchal power of the bishop of Rome, in answer to Bishop Stillingfleet's Antiquities of the British Church.

He says,⁴⁹ the manuscript set out by Sir H. Spelman, containing the answer of Dinotus to Austin, is spurious and forged; for the style

Sect. 12.
The contrary exceptions of Schelstrate, relating to the Britannie church, considered.

³⁶ Cod. Can. Afric. a cap. 135. ad cap. 138.

³⁷ Conc. Aurel. 2. c. 7.

³⁸ Cave, Anc. Church Gov. c. 5. p. 220.

³⁹ Spelman, Concil. Britan. an. 601. t. 1. p. 108.

⁴⁰ Bede, Hist. lib. 2. c. 2 et 19. lib. 3. c. 25. lib. 5. c. 16 et 22.

⁴¹ Malmsbur. de Gestis Pontific. Anglor. lib. 3.

⁴² Steph. Heddius, Vit. Wilfrid. c. 12.

⁴³ Eadmer. Vit. Wilfrid.

⁴⁴ Stillingfleet's Answer to Cressy, p. 300.

⁴⁵ Brerewood of Patriarch. Gov. qu. 3.

⁴⁶ Watson De Eccles. Britan. Antiqua Libertate, Thes. 2.

⁴⁷ Cave, Anc. Church Gov. c. 5. p. 244.

⁴⁸ Stilling. Origin. Britan. c. 5.

⁴⁹ Schelstrat. Dissert. c. 6. p. 130.

manifestly discovers it to be modern. Which is a weighty argument indeed from a person who was so competent a judge of the British style, in which that manuscript was written, that he professes he did not understand even the English tongue without the help of an interpreter. And how then should he be able to judge of a British writing by its style, without knowing a syllable of the language? But, he adds, the matter of it also discovers it to be a forgery: for it is manifest there was no archbishop of Caerleon upon Usk at that time, as the writing pretends; but that the metropolitan jurisdiction had for above a hundred years before been transferred to Menevia. As if it was not as manifest to all the world, that the archbishop of Menevia or St. David's might retain the title of Caerleon, though the see was removed, because Caerleon was the original seat; as well as the bishop of the Isle of Man now retains the title of episcopus Sodorensis, because Sodora and all the Hebrides, or islands on the west of Scotland, were once part of his diocese, though now for many ages they have been separated from it. Or to give an instance nearer Rome, we are told by geographers,⁵⁰ that Ostia and Porto still give title to two bishops, one whereof is always a senior cardinal, and the other dean of the college of cardinals, though both places are now in such ruins, that there is scarce an inhabitant in either. We shall see hereafter, in the fifth chapter of this book, that many times three or four ancient Italian bishoprics were united into one, as Holstenius⁵¹ has observed of Tarquina, Cornetum, and Gravisca; in which case no absurdity is committed, whichever of the titles the bishop of the united diocese was called by. Why then must it be an objection against the validity of this testimony, that it calls the bishop of Menevia by the title of Caerleon, when that was the original title? But, secondly, he says, It appears from Bede, that the question was not concerning the primacy of the Roman bishop, but about Austin's metropolitcal jurisdiction over them. But how then came the British bishops to be reckoned schismatics, if the pope's authority was no ways concerned in the dispute? Would they be schismatics for rejecting Austin's metropolitcal jurisdiction, had he unwarrantably usurped that power of his own head, and without a legal commission from some superior obtruded himself upon them? It is plain, therefore, the one was included in the other, and the rejecting Austin was rejecting the power that sent him. But they also contested the pope's supremacy in another respect, refusing to comply with the Romish rites and usages in the observation of Easter, the administration of baptism, St. Peter's tonsure, and some other customs; which was an argument, that as they had no dependence upon the church of Rome heretofore, nor much communication with her, but rather with the Eastern churches; so now they intended not to submit to her dictates, but to follow their own ancient customs as a free church, and independent of her. Can any one suppose, that had the British bishops looked upon the pope as invested with a legal supremacy over them, they would have scrupled complying with directions in such matters, as the observation of Easter and the like, when such things were but the smallest part of patriarchal jurisdiction? Even our author himself, when he comes to consider the matter a little further, is not so hardy as to stand by his own assertion, but comes to call them names at last, with Baronius and others of his own party, telling us,⁵² that after the Saxons had broken in upon them, they deserted the doctrines and rites of the catholic church, and receded as schismatics from the centre of ecclesiastical communion: and that it ought to be concluded, that God was willing to show the falsehood of the schismatical church of Britain, by the miracle which he wrought upon Austin's intercession. This is home to our point, and gives up the cause in question, which is, whether the British church owned the pope's supremacy at the coming of Austin hither? Which our author, after some small bickerings with his learned adversary, is forced to deny, and join issue with him, and then betakes himself to their last and common refuge, ill names and miracles; which being no arguments in this case, I shall not stand to give them any answer; but only inquire into one thing more, how it appears, that the Britons had deserted any ancient doctrine relating to the pope's patriarchal power, upon the coming of the Saxons? To evidence this, our author must give us very plain proofs, that before that time the British church always owned the bishop of Rome's patriarchal jurisdiction over them. And this, indeed, is the pretended design of his whole Dissertation: but his proofs amount to no more than a few slight conjectures, by which he would be thought to have demonstrated these four things: 1. That St. Peter was the founder of the British church,⁵³ which any one that reads Bishop Usher de Primordiis,⁵⁴ will as readily attribute to St. Paul, or twenty others: so little reason is there for grounding the pope's patriarchal power upon the first conversion of the British church. 2. He argues from ancient tradition, that patriarchal power is an apostolical institution, and that thereby⁵⁵ the British church was made subject to the Roman, whoever was the first converter of it. But this tradition is involved in greater obscurity, and proceeds upon more precarious ⁵⁰ Ferrar. Lexicon. Geogr. voce Ostia, et Portus Augusti.

⁵¹ Holsten. Annot. in Geograph. Carol. a S. Paulo, p. 8.

⁵² Schelstrat. Dissert. c. 6. p. 106. ⁵³ Ibid. c. 1 et 2.

⁵⁴ Usser. de Antiquit. Eccles. Brit. c. 1.

⁵⁵ Schelstrat. Dissert. c. 3.

proofs, than the former. 3. He says, The British bishops in the council of Arles owned the pope's⁵⁶ patriarchal power over them, and all the Western world. 4. And lastly, That this power, in this full extent and latitude, is both acknowledged and confirmed⁵⁷ by the sixth canon of the council of Nice. How far the council of Nice allowed, or confirmed, this power, has been already showed, in discoursing of the suburbicary churches. So that the only thing remaining, is to examine what weight there is in his argument from the council of Arles. This council was summoned by Constantine, and not by the pope, against the Donatists, anno 314. Here were present three British bishops, Eborius, from York, Restitutus, from London, and Adelphius, from Lincoln, (Colonia Lindi,) as I shall show hereafter it probably ought to be read. Now, in their synodical epistle to Pope Sylvester, there is a passage (but by all acknowledged to be a very corrupt one) which speaks something of his holding the greater dioceses.⁵⁸ Which our author interprets to mean his having a patriarchal power over all the great dioceses of the western empire, Macedonia, Dacia, Illyricum, Italy, Africa, Spain, France, and Britain. But one question may be here asked, which will spoil all this flourish of a comment. Did the African fathers, many of which were present at this council, so understand the words, greater dioceses? If they did, how came it to pass, that within an age after they so stiffly opposed three popes successively, and vindicated their own liberties in this very point, (as we have seen before⁵⁹ they did,) denying them absolutely all power of receiving appeals from any of the African churches? Had St. Austin, and all the rest of them, forgot what their forefathers had so lately subscribed at Arles, that Africa was one of the pope's larger dioceses? Or had they been harassed out of their senses, like the poor Britons, by some Saxon invasion, and were now run into schism, as the other are reproachfully and falsely said to have done? Nothing of all this can be pretended in the present case: and therefore that is demonstration to me, that neither the African fathers, nor the Britons, nor any others then present in council, took the words, greater dioceses, in the sense which this author puts upon them. So that whatever meaning they must have, it is plain this cannot be their meaning: and then all the argument, which our author has built upon this supposition, in order to subject the Britons to the pope, at once falls to the ground. I will not now stand disputing with him, whether the word diocese was never about this time taken in any author for one of the great dioceses of the Roman empire. He says Constantine⁶⁰ so uses it in one place, speaking of the Asiatic and Pontic dioceses: and if that will do him any service, I can help him to another; for Constantine also speaks of a civil officer, called, καθολικός διοικήσεως, or rationalis of the diocese,⁶¹ where I agree with Valesius, we are to understand one of the great dioceses of the Roman empire. Nay, I have said before, that I think there were patriarchs too in the church at that time, and that they had the great dioceses of the Roman empire divided among them. But does it hence follow, that because the word diocese is sometimes so used, that therefore it must needs signify so in this place, when there is plain demonstration to the contrary? All the world knows, that about the same time the name diocese was given to single episcopal churches also, and they too were called greater dioceses, in opposition to the tituli or parishes, which were quasi dioceses, the lesser dioceses under them, as the Pontifical words it⁶² in the Life of Pope Marcellus, who was one of Sylvester's predecessors. So that Sylvester's holding greater dioceses, may mean no more than his being a metropolitan, or having several episcopal dioceses under his jurisdiction, to whom he was to signify, according to custom, the time of keeping Easter, and other things decreed in the council. Or if we suppose him to have been a patriarch at that time, then his greater dioceses may signify those ten suburbicary provinces, which were the ancient bounds of his patriarchal jurisdiction. But whatever meaning they have, it is certain they cannot be understood in our author's sense, of the great dioceses of the Roman empire: because it were absurd to think, that Africa should acknowledge itself to be one of the pope's dioceses, which never was reckoned among the suburbicary provinces, and what is more, always resolutely opposed the pope's pretences to the least shadow of power over it, claiming an absolute and independent power within itself in all matters of ecclesiastical cognizance and jurisdiction. And the case of the Britanic church being the same with that of Africa, it follows, that it was as independent of Rome as the other was, notwithstanding any pretended confession of subjection made by its bishops in the council of Arles, upon which our author lays the main strength of his cause, though there is nothing in it when fairly canvassed and examined, as I doubt not I have made it appear to every unprejudiced reader. I was the more willing to consider here some of the ⁵⁶ Schelstrat. Dissert. c. 4.⁵⁷ Ibid. c. 5.⁵⁸ Conc. Arelat. l. Epist. Synod. Conc. t. l. p. 1426. Placuit etiam antequam a te, qui majores dioceses tenes, per te potissimum omnibus insinuari. Schelstrate and Pereron correct it thus: Placuit etiam hæc juxta antiquam consuetudinem a te, qui majores dioceses tenes, et per te potissimum omnibus insinuari.

⁵⁹ See sect. 11.⁶⁰ Constant. Ep. ad omnes Ecclesias, ap. Euseb. de Vit. Const. lib. 3. c. 19.⁶¹ Ibid. lib. 4. c. 36.⁶² Pontifical. Vit. Marcelli. Viginti quinque titulos in urbe Roma constituit, quasi dioceses, &c.

chief exceptions of this celebrated writer against the liberties of the Britannic church, because I know not whether any one else has made a reply to them; and these strictures will serve to suggest at once to the reader the true grounds upon which our ancient liberties were founded, and the contrary pretences, which would subject us to the power of the bishop of Rome, as patriarch of the Western empire, though the Britannic diocese had as just title to be independent at that time as Rome itself, or Africa, or any other diocese in the empire. I make no further inquiry here into the bounds of other patriarchs or metropolitans, or their dioceses, because no such momentous disputes have been raised about them, and they may be easily learned from the notitia of the church here subjoined in the latter part of this book. Therefore I proceed in the next place to examine the ordinary extent of the ancient episcopal dioceses, or, as we now call them, diocesan churches.

CHAPTER II.

A MORE PARTICULAR ACCOUNT OF THE NUMBER, NATURE, AND EXTENT OF DIOCESES, OR EPISCOPAL CHURCHES, IN AFRICA, EGYPT, AND OTHER EASTERN PROVINCES.

Sect. 1.
Dioceses anciently called παροικία, parochia. It is evident from what has been discoursed in the last chapter, that the most ancient and apostolical division of the church was into dioceses, or episcopal churches; that is, such precincts or districts, as single bishops governed with the assistance of their presbyters. But yet we are to make a little further inquiry into the nature and extent of these, because great errors have been committed by some late writers about them. There are who pretend, that a diocese for the three first ages was never more than such a number of people as could meet, and ordinarily did meet, in a single congregation. Others extend the limits of ancient dioceses further than this at first, to include a city and the whole region about it: but then they reckon, that upon the general conversion of heathens to Christianity, such dioceses ought to have been divided into single congregations, and a new bishop and clergy set over every one. There is no difference betwixt these two opinions save only this, that the one wholly mistakes the church's first and primitive model, and the other quarrels with her practice. But the truth of the matter was, that the church, in settling the bounds of dioceses, went by another rule, not that of single assemblies or congregations, but the rule of government in every city, including not only the city itself, but the suburbs, or region lying round about it, within the verge of its jurisdiction. Which seems to be the plain reason of that great and visible difference which we find in the extent of dioceses; some being very large, others very small, according as the civil government of each city happened to have a larger or lesser jurisdiction. There are two things, indeed, that commonly impose upon unwary readers in this matter. One is, that the ancient name of an episcopal diocese for three hundred years is commonly παροικία, which they mistake for a parish church, or single congregation: whereas, as learned men¹ have rightly observed, it signified then not the places or habitations near a church, but the towns or villages near a city, which, together with the city, was the bishop's παροικία, or, as we now call it, his diocese, the bounds of his ordinary care and jurisdiction. That thus it was appears evidently from this, that the largest dioceses, such as those of Rome, Antioch, and Alexandria, which had many particular churches in them, were called by the same name, as the reader may find a hundred passages in Eusebius,² where he uses the word παροικία, when he speaks of those large and populous cities, which had many particular churches in them. The city of Alexandria, in the time of Alexander and Athanasius, was divided into several districts, called laura, in every one of which there was a church, with a presbyter fixed upon it: and yet all these were but one παροικία, as Alexander calls it in his circular epistle³ against Arius. The reader may see the word so used by Epiphanius,⁴ St. Jerom,⁵ the councils of Antioch,⁶ Ancyra,⁷ and many others in after ages, when it is certain episcopal dioceses were something larger than parish churches, as those are taken to signify single congregations. So that nothing can be plainer than the use of the word παροικία for a diocese to the fourth century.

And now about this time the name diocese began to be used likewise. Sect. 2.
When the name diocese began first to be used. For the council of Arles, which was held in the beginning of the fourth century, writing to the bishop of Rome, says, that he did majores dioceses tenere,⁸ possess greater dioceses; which though Schelstrate and other Romish writers interpret patriarchal dioceses, to aggrandize the pope's jurisdiction; yet it is more probable, as Dr. Cave⁹ observes, that it means only single bishoprics;

¹ Brerewood of Patriarch. Gov. qu. 1. p. 102.

² Euseb. lib. 1. c. 1. lib. 2. c. 21.

³ Alex. Ep. Encycl. ap. Socrat. lib. 1. c. 6.

⁴ Epiph. Ep. ad Joh. Hierosol. Ad mœa parochiæ videbantur ecclesiam pertinere, &c.

⁵ Hieron. Ep. 53. ad Ripar. Miror sanctum episcopum, in cujus parochia esse presbyter dicitur Vigilantius, acquiescere furori ejus, &c.

⁶ Concil. Antioch. c. 9.

⁷ Concil. Ancy. c. 18. August. Epist. 241. Basil. Ep. 264.

⁸ Concil. t. 1. p. 1429. ⁹ Cave's Anc. Ch. Gov. c. 3. p. 130.

though I grant Constantine might have made the division of the empire into civil dioceses, from whence patriarchal dioceses took their name in the following ages. The word is used frequently for a single diocese in the African councils, as where it is said,¹⁰ A bishop shall not leave his principal seat, and betake himself to any other church in the diocese: so likewise often in the African Code, and the Collation of Carthage. From which it appears, that the words parochia and diæcesis were of the same import in those times, and the calling of a diocese by the name of parochia does not make it a single congregation.

Another thing that imposes upon men in this matter, is the ambiguity of the names, προάστια and suburbia, the suburbs of a city; which, in the modern acceptation, signifies no more than the houses or habitations next adjoining without the walls of a city; but anciently it denoted all the towns or villages which lay round the city in a certain district, which were therefore reckoned as belonging to that city, though many times at several miles' distance from it. Thus, Canopus was twelve miles distant from Alexandria, and yet, in the Acts of the Council of Chalcedon, we find it called by one Athanasius,¹¹ the προάστειον, or suburbs of that city. So Sozomen¹² calls Daphne the suburbs of Antioch, though it was forty furlongs' or five miles' distance from it. And Pancirol¹³ notes of the famous suburbs of Constantinople, called Ἑβδομον, or Septimum, that it was so denominated from its being seven miles off from the city at first, though afterward, by the strange growth and increase of that city, it came to be reckoned a more immediate part of it. So there was in the suburbs of Carthage a place called Decimum, because it was ten miles distant from the city, as Procopius informs us.¹⁴ And some think the Ager Sexti, in which Cyprian suffered martyrdom, was so named from its being six miles off from the city; for the Roman martyrology puts Sextum Milliare instead of Ager Sexti. Now, in all such suburbs as these there were particular assemblies, distinct from those of the city churches; as appears from what Eusebius¹⁵ observes out of the epistle of Dionysius of Alexandria, who says, when he was banished to Colluthion, a place in the region of Mareotes, that he should still hold particular assemblies, as they were used to do in those suburbs that were something more remote from the city. So that these ancient words, παροκία and προάστια, when taken in their true ancient and primitive sense, do not make a bishop's diocese to be only a single parish in the modern sense, but a city with all the towns or villages within the region or district to which the city magistrate extended his jurisdiction. For that Justellus¹⁶ has showed, out of good authors, is the difference between πόλις and κώμη, a city and a village: a city is a place that is governed by a magistracy and laws of its own, and exercises authority over the region or territory that lies about it; but a village is a dependant only on a city, and has no magistrates of its own, but such as belong to the city whereof it is a dependant. According to which notion, an episcopal church was generally a city and a whole region, of the very same extent with the power of the civil magistrate, whose bounds for the most part were the bounds of the bishop's diocese; though the rule was not so universal, but that it admitted of some particular exceptions. And from hence it will appear, that though there was great difference in the extent of dioceses, as there was in city regions and districts, and many of them were but small in comparison of others; yet they were generally so large as to admit both of a bishop and a presbytery in the city church, and presbyters and deacons in the country regions.

To clear this whole matter, (which is of great use upon several accounts towards understanding rightly the state of the ancient church,) I will here make a particular inquiry into the extent both of the largest and narrowest dioceses, and distinctly consider the state of each. For though they differed much in extent, yet they all agreed in the same species of government; the essence of which consisted not in being confined precisely to such or such limits; for that was but accidental to the constitution: the same species of government is still preserved in most parts of the church, and yet any one that will allow himself the liberty of making just observations, may easily discern a difference between some of the first conversions, and those that followed in the middle ages of the church: for in the former, it is evident, dioceses were generally more numerous, and not so large as in the latter. The whole extent of Asia Minor, from the Hellespont to the river Euphrates, is estimated by the best geographers at 630 miles; the breadth from Sinus Issicus in Cilicia to Trabezond at 210: yet there were almost four hundred dioceses in this tract of land, as the reader may satisfy himself from the notitia of the church in the end of this book.

Sect. 3.
What meant by the προάστια, or suburbs of a city.

Sect. 4.
Dioceses not generally so large in nations of the first conversion, as in those converted in the middle ages of the church.

¹⁰ Concil. Carthag. 5. c. 5. Nemini sit facultas, relicta principali cathedra, ad aliquam ecclesiam in diocesi constitutam se conferre. Vid. Con. Can. Afric. c. 117, 118, 119, 123.

¹¹ Concil. Chalced. Act. 3. t. 4. p. 408.

¹² Sozom. lib. 5. c. 19.

¹³ Pancirol. Com. in Notit. Imper. lib. 1. c. 72.

¹⁴ Procop. Vandalic. lib. 1. c. 17.

¹⁵ Euseb. lib. 7. c. 11. Ὅτι ἐν προαείσις πορωτέρω κειμένοις, κατὰ μέρος ἔσονται συναγωγαί.

¹⁶ Justel. Not. in Cod. Canon. &c. Concil. Antioch. c. 9.

But now, if we look into any middle age conversions, we shall find the number of dioceses very small in comparison of these, and their extent very great. For in Germany, which is computed above twice as large as Asia Minor, (being 840 miles in length, and 740 in breadth,) there are but forty bishoprics; in all Belgium but eighteen; in Denmark but fifteen; in Swedeland but ten; in Russia twenty-one; in Poland thirty; as Dr. Heylin and other geographers have computed them. And our number in England, being also a later conversion, bears no proportion to those of Asia Minor, though the isle of Great Britain is not much inferior to it in bigness. I leave the curious and the learned to inquire into the reasons of this difference, whilst I go on to show the different extent of dioceses in the primitive church, where we shall meet with some very large, others very narrow, but the same species of episcopacy preserved in all, and none confined absolutely to a single congregation.

I shall begin with the dioceses of Africa, which some by mistake have reckoned the least bishoprics in the world; whereas upon a just computation they will appear to be far larger than many others. The whole extent of Africa (comprehending the six Roman provinces, Tripolis, Byzaena, Africa Proconsularis, Numidia, and the two Mauritania) is computed by Procopius¹⁷ to be ninety days' journey in length: which, reckoning as he does, that a day's journey was 210 stadia, or twenty-six miles and a quarter, amounts to above 2360 miles: the breadth was in some places 200, and in others 500 miles: which makes it by computation twice as big as Germany or France. Now there were in this compass, in St. Austin's time, about four hundred and sixty-six bishoprics, as appears both from the Collation of Carthage,¹⁸ and the Abstract of St. Austin,¹⁹ and the notitia of the African church, made about fifty years after St. Austin's death, and published by Sirmondus.²⁰ The present dioceses in France, if compared with these, will appear to be as large again, and those of Germany much larger: yet the African bishoprics, as a learned man²¹ rightly calculates, might one with another, notwithstanding, be reckoned to contain each of them threescore or fourscore towns and villages. It is certain, at least, that many of them were of a very large extent. St. Austin's diocese of Hippo was above forty miles long: for he himself tells us,²² that Fussala, a place in his diocese, which he erected into a new bishopric, was forty miles distant from him. Some other churches in his diocese are also mentioned in his epistles,²³ and other writings, which Bishop Stillingfleet²⁴ has collected together: to which the reader may add other epistles,²⁵ where he mentions the churches of Subsana, Turres, Ciza, Verbalis, Fundus Strabonianensis, and Gippitanus, as parts of his episcopal care also. In Hippo itself there were several churches, three of which are occasionally mentioned by St. Austin, one called Ecclesia Pacis,²⁶ another, Basilica Leontii,²⁷ and a third, Ad viginti Martyres, The Church of the twenty Martyrs,²⁸ whose memory was famous at Hippo,²⁹ as being, in all probability, African martyrs, and of that particular church whereof St. Austin was bishop. In the other Hippo, called Hippo Diaretorum for distinction sake, the African canons³⁰ speak of several churches. And in the Collation of Carthage we often meet with complaints of the catholic bishops, that the Donatists had set up anti-bishops, not only in their cities, but in other places of their dioceses:³¹ and the Donatist bishops return the charge, telling the catholics particularly, that at Constantina³² they had not only set up a bishop in the city, but another in the middle of the diocese: and that at Milevis they had done the same, making one bishop in the place, another at Tunca, a city in the same diocese, and a third at Ceramussa. From which it is easy to conclude, that those dioceses were then so large, as not only to have a country region, but sometimes more cities than one within their district. The like may be inferred from that canon of the African councils, which says,³³ No bishop shall leave his principal cathedral, and reside in any other church of his diocese. That manifestly implies, that their dioceses had other churches in the country, beside the city cathedral in them. And, indeed, instances of this kind would arise without number, to any one that would make a curious search into the history and antiquities of the African church. I shall only add two things more relating to it. 1.

¹⁷ Procop. Vandalic. lib. 1. c. 2. p. 177.

¹⁸ Collat. Carthag. Die 1.

¹⁹ Aug. Brevic. Collat. Die 1. c. 14.

²⁰ Notit. Afric. ap. Sirmond. Miscellan.

²¹ Maurice's Defence of Dioces. Episc. p. 163.

²² Aug. Ep. 262. ad Celestin.

²³ Id. Ep. 74, 203, 212, 236. It. de Cura pro Mortuis, c. 12.

²⁴ Stillingfleet's Unreasonableness of Separat. part 3. n. 9. p. 251.

²⁵ Aug. Ep. 236, 210.

²⁶ Aug. Ep. 110.

²⁷ Ser. 11. de Divers.

²⁸ Ser. 10. de Divers.

²⁹ Id. de Civ. Dei, lib. 22. c. 8.

³⁰ Cod. Can. Afric. c. 78.

³¹ Collat. Carth. Die 1. c. 181. Alypius dixit, Scriptum sit istos omnes in villis vel in fundis esse episcopos ordinatos, non in aliquibus civitatibus.

³² Collat. Carth. ibid. c. 65. Petilianus dixit, In plebe mea, id est, civitate Constantinensi, adversarium habeo Fortunatum. In medio autem diocesis meae nunc institutum habeo, imo ipsi habent nomine Delphinum—etiam in plebe fratris mei Adeodati, id est in civitate Milevitana, ita commissa res est, ut unum ibidem habeat adversarium, alterum in Tuncensi civitate, qui ad hujus plebem antiquitus pertinere.—Tertius vero sit in loco qui dicitur Ceramussa.

³³ Concil. Carth. 5. c. 5. Nemini sit facultas, relicta principali cathedra, ad aliquam ecclesiam in diocesi constitutam se conferre.

That Carthage is well known to have had a great number of churches belonging to its diocese in the fourth century. Mr. Sirmond,³⁴ in his Notes upon St. Austin's Sermons, gives us the names of seven of them, which are mentioned in the titles of his sermons, viz. the cathedral church, called Basilica Major et Restituta, Basilica Fausti, Basilica Leonitiana, Basilica Celerinæ, Basilica Novarum, Basilica Petri, in the third region, and Basilica Pauli, in the sixth region. To which Bishop Stillingfleet³⁵ adds two churches without the city, one where St. Cyprian suffered martyrdom, and another where his body was buried, at a place called Mappalia, both which are mentioned by Victor Uticensis. Dr. Maurice,³⁶ who examined a little further, adds still to those within the city, the church called Florentia, and Basilica Gratiani, and Theodosiana, and Honoriana, and Tricillarum: and, doubtless, there were many others not mentioned, since Victor³⁷ reckons about five hundred clergy belonging to the church of Carthage. The other thing I would note concerning the African church is, that in Tripolis, one of the six provinces of the Roman Africa, there were but five bishops, which we learn both from the canons of the African councils,³⁸ and the ancient notitia of that church, which names their sees, Leptis Magna, Cæea, Tacapa, Sabrata, and Girberis; from three of which there were bishops in the council under Cyprian at Carthage: and the presence of no more was required, because of the paucity of them. But now this was a large tract of ground, as Blondel³⁹ himself proves out of Ptolemy, who names many other cities, Chuzis, Sumucis, Pisinda, Sydedenis, Azuis, Gerisa, Iscina, Amuncla, Butta, and others. So that whether we compare the whole extent and dimensions of Africa with the number of dioceses contained therein, or consider any particular province or diocese by itself, it plainly appears, that every bishop had a city, and a region or large territory for his diocese; some, two cities or more; and none so small a people, as to deserve the name that some have bestowed upon them, of country parishes or single congregations.

Out of the African provinces let us pass into those of the Egyptian diocese, as it is called in the civil account of the Roman empire, under which are comprehended all the regions of Libya, Pentapolis, and Egypt, from Tripolis to the Red Sea. These countries all together are justly computed by a learned man⁴⁰ to be three times as great as England; yet they never had above a hundred bishops in them all. For Alexander and Athanasius, who were very competent judges, reckon scarce so many. Athanasius⁴¹ says, there was ἑγγυς ἑκατὸν, near a hundred in Egypt, Libya, and Pentapolis; and Alexander⁴² uses the same expression in his circular epistle against Arius, saying, That he and the rest of the bishops of Egypt and Libya, being near a hundred met together in council, had condemned Arius and his followers. And after this the notitias of the church reckon no more. That which the reader will find at the end of this book, has but ninety-seven, excluding those of Tripoli, which have been spoken of before: and others in Carolus a Sancto Paulo never exceed a hundred and one. So that the number of dioceses seems to have continued near the same without alteration for several ages. Carolus a Sancto Paulo has collected their names out of the ancient writers, and subscriptions of councils, and other monuments of the church, which I shall here subjoin, as I shall for all other countries as we pass on, that such readers as please to compare the names with the maps of ecclesiastical geography, may the better understand the extent of dioceses, and the true ancient state and geography of the church. The Egyptian patriarchate was sometimes divided into three provinces, sometimes into six, sometimes into nine, but the limits of the whole were the same, including Egypt, Libya, and Pentapolis: Carolus a Sancto Paulo follows the largest division, and so makes seven provinces in Egypt, reckoning the dioceses in this order.

In Egyptus Prima.

1. Alexandria.
2. Hermopolis Parva.
3. Metelisis.
4. Coprithis.
5. Sais.
6. Letus, al. Latopolis.
7. Nauratia.
8. Andromena, or Andropolis.
9. Nicium.
10. Onuphis.
11. Tava.
12. Cleopatra.
13. Marcotis.
14. Schedia and Menelaïtis.
15. Phthenegus, al. Phthenoti Nomus.
16. Nitria.

In Augustamnica Prima.

1. Pelusium.
2. Heraclea in Sethræte Nomo.
3. Tanis.
4. Rhinocurura.
5. Thmuis.
6. Ostracina.
7. Phacusa.
8. Cassium.
9. Aphnæum, which he thinks Antonine's Itinerary calls Daphnis.
10. Hephæstus.
11. Panæphysus.
12. Gerus.
13. Thennesus.
14. Sela.

In Augustamnica Secunda.

1. Leontopolis.
2. Atribis.
3. Onium, al. Ilium.
4. Babylon.
5. Bubastus.
6. Pharbæthus.

copi sunt quinque tantummodo. Vid. Cod. Can. Afric. c. 49. al. 50.

Sect. 6.
Of the dioceses of Egypt, Libya, and Pentapolis.

³⁴ Sirmond. Not. in Ser. 14. a se edit. t. 10. p. 851.

³⁵ Stillingfleet's Unreasonableness of Separation, p. 249.

³⁶ Maurice's Defence of Dioces. Episc. p. 51.

³⁷ Victor. de Persec. Vandal. lib. 5. Bibl. Patr. t. 7. p. 613.

³⁸ Concil. Carth. 3. c. 39. In Tripoli, ut asseritur, epis-

³⁹ Blondel. Apol. p. 185. ex Ptolem. lib. 4. c. 3.

⁴⁰ Maurice's Defence of Dioces. Episc. p. 71.

⁴¹ Athan. Apol. 2. p. 778.

⁴² Alex. Ep. Encycl. ap. Socrat. lib. 1. c. 6.

7. Heliopolis. 8. Scenæ Mandrorum. 9. Thou.
10. Antithou.

In Egyptus Secunda.

1. Cabasa. 2. Phragonea. 3. Pachneumonis.
4. Elearchia. 5. Diospolis. 6. Sebennythus. 7.
Cynopolis Inferior. 8. Busiris. 9. Paralus. 10.
Xoes. 11. Butus.

In Arcadia.

1. Oxyrinchus. 2. Heraclea Superior. 3. Ar-sinoe, al. Civitas Crocodilorum. 4. Theodosiopolis.
5. Aphroditopolis. 6. Memphis. 7. Clysmā. 8.
Nilopolis. 9. Parallus. 10. Thamiate, now called Damiata. 11. Cynopolis Superior; which, as Holstenius observes, is in the notitia of Hierocles made the metropolis of this province.

In Thebais Prima.

1. Antinoe. 2. Hermopolis Magna. 3. Cusa.
4. Lycopolis. 5. Oasis Magna. 6. Hypsele. 7.
Apollinis Civitas Parva. 8. Antæum. 9. Pano-polis.

In Thebais Secunda.

1. Ptolemais. 2. Thinis. 3. Coptus. 4. Tentyra. Holstenius corrects it, Teuchira, from the Greek. 5. Maximianopolis. 6. Latopolis. 7.
Hermetes, al. Hermonthes. 8. Diospolis Magna, al. Thebais Magna. 9. Therenunthis. 10. Phylæ.
11. Thoi. 12. Ombi. 13. Tathyris. 14. Diospolis Parva.

In Libya Cyrenaica, otherwise called Pentapolis.

1. Ptolemais, where Synesius was bishop. 2.
Sozusa. 3. Lemandus. 4. Cyrene. 5. Teuchira.
6. Berenice. 7. Ticelia, al. Pisila. 8. Aptuchi
Fanum. 9. Erythra. 10. Barca. 11. Hydrax.
12. Disthis. 13. Palæbisca. 14. Olbia. To which Holstenius adds Boræum.

In Libya Marmarica, al. Libya Secunda.

1. Darnis. 2. Parætonium. 3. Antipyrgus. 4.
Antiphra. 5. Marmarica. 6. Zagula; which Holstenius observes to be sometimes corruptly read Gazula. 7. Zygris.

Beside these, Carolus a S. Paulo reckons seven others in Egypt of uncertain position. Vantena, Gauœa, Flagonita, Cotenopolis, Gazula, Elesma, and Psynchus: but Holstenius rightly observes, that five of these are but corruptions of others named before. Vantena is put for Antinoe; Flagonita for Fragonita; Elesma for Clysmā; Gazula for Zagula; and Psynchus for Oxyrinchus. And I observe, that Paralus, and perhaps one or two more, seem to be named twice. So that we cannot reckon the whole number of dioceses much above a hundred in these nine provinces. Now, to make a tolerable estimate of the largeness and extent of these dioceses, we must consider a little the state of these countries, together with the extent of them. And by this means we shall find this observation to be true, (which I am also to make upon Palestine, Asia Minor, and Italy,) that here were some of the largest and some of the smallest dioceses in the world under the same form of episcopal government. In Libya and Pentapolis, the dioceses seem to have been very large; for the whole number in both provinces was but twenty-two: and yet these provinces were of great extent, as appears from what Pliny⁴³ delivers out of Eratosthenes, that from Alexandria in Egypt to Cyrene in Pentapolis was five hundred and twenty-five miles, the greatest part of which must be divided among these bishoprics; which is some ground to conjecture that they were of the largest size. Beronice was the most western border of Pentapolis, from whence to Arsinoe or Teuchira, the next neighbouring seat, Pliny⁴⁴ reckons forty-three miles, and from Arsinoe to Ptolemais twenty-two. And it is certain several others lay at greater distances from each other. But some may fancy, perhaps, they were small, inconsiderable dioceses for all this, because Synesius,⁴⁵ speaking of his own city Ptolemais, the metropolis of Pentapolis, says it was but a small city. To obviate this, I will note a few things out of Synesius, concerning the cities and dioceses of this region. That Ptolemais, where Synesius was bishop, had a territory and country churches in its diocese, is evident from Synesius himself, who, writing to his presbyters upon his first consecration, desires them to pray for him, and enjoin the people, both in the city and country churches,⁴⁶ both publicly and privately, to pray for him likewise. This is evident proof, that though Ptolemais itself might not be a very large city, yet it had a diocese of some extent, and village churches in the circuit of it. In another place he complains, that all the churches⁴⁷ of Ampelitis that were under him, were burned down and destroyed. There were two regions of this name in Pentapolis, one belonging to Cyrene, the other to Ptolemais: and it is probable there were in both of them towns and villages depending respectively upon those mother churches. Indeed Carolus a Sancto Paulo, out of Synesius, speaks of one or two dioceses in this province, which seem to be less. For Hydrax and Palæbisca were but villages, once belonging to the diocese of Erythros, from which they were separated in the time of the emperor Valens, and had a dis-

⁴³ Plin. lib. 5. c. 6. ⁴⁴ Ibid. c. 5. ⁴⁵ Synes. Ep. 58.

⁴⁶ Synes. Ep. 11. Τῶ τε ἐν ἄστει δῆμιω, καὶ ὅσοι κατ' ἀγροῦς, ἢ κομητικὰς ἐκκλησίας αὐλίζονται, &c.

⁴⁷ Synes. Catastas. p. 301.

tinect bishop of their own. But there was none before him, nor any after; for it was united by Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria,⁴⁸ to Erythros again. So that it rather proves the largeness of the dioceses, that they were of such an extent as to admit of others being taken out of them. In another place, Synesius⁴⁹ speaks of the Olbiatæ, whom he styles δῆμος κομήτης, a country people, and says they had a bishop. But a learned man observes⁵⁰ rightly, that this may signify a people or nation living in many villages, of which sort there were several in the region of Pentapolis and other parts of Africa, where there were but few cities: for, as he shows out of Pomponius Mela and Pliny, these country people generally inhabited in great numbers together, and were under the denomination of little nations, though they dwelt in cottages, or mapalia, as they called them in the language of those countries. So that though a bishop's seat was in a village, he might have a large region for his diocese, as we shall find in pursuing the history of other nations. In the neighbouring province of Libya, Zygus was a village, and a bishop's seat: yet, as the same learned person⁵¹ observes out of Ptolemy,⁵² it was such a village as had a territory along the sea-side; and the whole sea-coast of Libya was divided between that and two or three other such villages or cities, call them which you please. For there were but seven dioceses in all this Libya, which extended three hundred miles along the sea-shore, so that the bishop's sees were at least fifty miles from each other. And yet perhaps, being a desert country, and inhabited by very barbarous people, the dioceses might be less than many others, if computed by the number of Christians, rather than the extent of ground; as if we compare them with some in Egypt, their next neighbours. In Egypt, the dioceses cannot be reckoned so large as those of Libya and Pentapolis, because here were eighty bishoprics; and yet the extent of Egypt was not more than the other two, but the country was infinitely more populous, and so capable of more bishoprics in a less compass. Dr. Heylin computes the length of it to be only five hundred and sixty-two miles, and the breadth one hundred and sixty: which comes pretty near the computation of Pliny,⁵³ who reckons it five hundred and eighty-six miles long, and one hundred and seventy broad from Pelusium to Canopus. This divided into eighty dioceses, will allow above thirty miles length and breadth to every diocese; which is a competent space for an episcopal diocese consisting of many towns or parishes, but too large for any single congregation. We may judge of the extent of some of these dioceses by that of Alexandria, which had first a great many churches with presbyters fixed upon them in the city itself, in the time of Alexander and Athanasius, as Epiphanius⁵⁴ more than once informs us, naming beside the great church, commonly called Cæsarea, those of Dionysius, Theonas, Pierius, Serapion, Dizyas, Mendidius, Annianus, Abias, and Baucalis, where Arius was presbyter. Then again it had the large region of Marcotes belonging to it. For Athanasius⁵⁵ says, there never had been either bishop or chorepiscopus in all that region, but only presbyters under the bishop of Alexandria; and that they were fourteen in number, (besides thirteen deacons,) some of which had two villages, and others more, within their respective parishes. Canopus also was once in this diocese, being reckoned one of the suburbs of Alexandria, (as has been noted before,) though a large place, and twelve miles distant from it. Nicopolis also was in this diocese, which Strabo equals⁵⁶ to a city. So that there must be particular assemblies in the remoter suburbs of this diocese, which could not possibly meet with the mother-church. We have not so particular an account of any other diocese in Egypt, but from this we may make some estimate of the rest, since it appears that a competent territory of twenty or thirty miles might be allowed to every diocese upon a rational computation. Nor is it any just exception to this, that here were sometimes bishops' seats in villages as well as cities. For many villages were equal to cities, and had also large territories belonging to them. As Strabo particularly notes of Schædia, which was but a village in his time,⁵⁷ yet such a one as might compare with a city; and in Athanasius's time it seems to have been advanced into a city, or was at least the head of a nomas, or region, called Menelaites: for Athanasius styles Agathodæmon,⁵⁸ bishop of Schædia and Menelaites together. So that though we find in the Greek notitia of this province several bishoprics denominated from villages, as Vicus Psaneos, and Cotrideos, Rhicomerium, Pariana, and Anassa; yet we are not to imagine the bishops of these places were pastors only of a private village, but that they had each a larger territory, after the example of Schædia, for their jurisdiction. In the diocese of Arsinoe, it is plain, there were country parishes in the middle of the third century: for Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, speaks of them in one of his epistles, where he discourses of Nepos the Millenary, who was bishop of the place. After his death, he says, he went into the region of Arsinoe, and having called together the presbyters and teachers of the country villages,⁵⁹ he held a conference with them for three days together about Nepos's opinions, which it seems had infected some of their churches, and drawn them into factions and schisms. The like observation is made by Cassian⁶⁰ upon Panæphysus, in the province of Augustamnica Prima, that it had many towns and villages under it, till they were swallowed up with the inundation of the sea and an earthquake. And Carolus a Sancto Paulo rightly observes out of Athanasius,⁶¹ that Phragonea in Ægyptus Secunda had the whole nomus of Elearchia for its diocese. And excepting Thennesus, in the province of Augustamnica, which Cassian⁶² seems to make an island, without any territory about it, it may be generally affirmed of all the Egyptian cities, that they had their πρόσεια, or country towns and villages about them, some more, some less, where, as Dionysius bishop of Alexandria words it,⁶³ they had their holy assemblies distinct from those of the mother-churches.

⁴⁸ Synes. Ep. 67.⁴⁹ Id. Ep. 76.⁵⁰ Maurice's Defence of Dioc. Episc. p. 60.⁵¹ Maurice, ibid. p. 61.⁵² Ptolem. lib. 4.⁵³ Plin. lib. 5. c. 9.⁵⁴ Epiph. Hær. 68. Melet. n. 4. Hæret. 69. Arian. n. 2.⁵⁵ Athan. Apol. 2. p. 802.⁵⁶ Strabo, lib. 17.⁵⁷ Strabo, lib. 17.⁵⁸ Athan. Ep. ad Antioch. p. 580.⁵⁹ Dionys. Ep. ap. Euseb. lib. 7. c. 24. Συγκαλέσας τοὺς πρεσβυτέρους καὶ διδασκάλους τῶν ἐν ταῖς κώμαις ἀδελφῶν.

Yet, not to put a fallacy upon my readers, I must observe one thing, which will much diminish the largeness of those dioceses in one part of Ægypt; that is, that as it was the most populous country in the world in some parts of it, so it was absolutely desert and uninhabited in others. The cities were generally placed pretty near the banks of the Nile, but on both sides, within ten or twenty miles from them, were vast mountains and deserts, where no mortal dwelt, till, as Orosius observes,⁶⁴ the monks first took up their abode there, leaving the cities, to inhabit those vast tracts of wildernesses and sands, which for their barrenness and want of water, and multitudes of serpents, had never before seen any thing of human conversation. This account of the Egyptian deserts is confirmed by Josephus,⁶⁵ where he speaks of Moses making an incredible expedition with an army through them, to surprise and come unexpectedly upon the Ethiopians. And the Christian writers, who treat of the monastic life, give a more particular description of them. Sulpicius Severus makes the entrance on these deserts in Thebais⁶⁶ to be only twelve miles from the river Nile. But the deserts themselves were vastly greater. For Cassian, speaking of the wilderness of Scethis, where Paphnutius was abbot, says, there was one of the monks who had his cell⁶⁷ eighteen miles from church. But the desert of Porphyryon, he says, was abundantly larger than this: for a man might travel seven or eight days' journey in it⁶⁸ without coming near any house, or town, before he came to the cells of the monks, which had their habitation therein. So that by this account, it is probable almost one half of Ægypt was cut off in sands and deserts, which could not be cultivated, and therefore were not inhabited, till the monks, who found out a new way of living, left the cities, to become here and there scattered inhabitants of the wilderness. And by this means the dioceses of Ægypt, if we speak properly of the habitable part of them, will be reduced to a much narrower compass, and fifteen miles may perhaps pass for a general measure of their extent in this sense one with another. But as Alexandria and others might be larger, so it is certain Thennesus, and Panæphysus, and others, were much less: which makes good the observation and reflection I at first passed upon them, that here were some of the largest and some of the smallest dioceses in the world, under the same species and form of episcopal government, for any thing that we find to the contrary.

Out of the patriarchate of Alexandria, we should next have gone into that of Jerusalem, but Arabia coming between, we will take a view of it here, though it belonged to the patriarch of Antioch. Carolus a Sancto Paulo calls it by mistake Arabia Petraea, which, as Holstenius observes, was a distinct province under the patriarch of Jerusalem, and commonly known in ancient church records by the name of Palæstina Tertia. But Arabia here is taken only for that part which was under the metropolis of Bostra, and sometimes called Philadelphia in ancient writers. In this province we have accounts of twenty-one ancient dioceses, whereof eighteen are recounted by Car. a S. Paulo. 1. Bostra. 2. Adra. 3. Medaba. 4. Gerasa. 5. Nibe or Nive. 6. Philadelphia, whence in Epiphanius and others the region is called Arabia Philadelphica. 7. Esbus. 8. Neapolis. 9. Philippopolis. 10. Constantine. 11. Dionysias. 12. Maximianopolis. 13. Avara. 14. Elana, al. Neela. 15. Zerabena. 16. Erra. 17. Anitha, or, as Holstenius reads it, Eutimia. 18. Parembola. To which Holstenius adds three more, Canotha, Phæno, and Bacatha, mentioned by Epiphanius

Sect. 7.
Of the dioceses of Arabia. And why these more frequently in villages than in other places.

⁶⁰ Cassian. Collat. 11. c. 3.

⁶¹ Athan. Ep. ad Antiochenos.

⁶² Cassian. Collat. 11. c. 1. Thennesi accolæ ita vel mari vel stagnis salsis undique circumluantur, ut solis, quia terra deest, negotiationibus dediti, &c.

⁶³ Dionys. ap. Euseb. lib. 7. c. 11.

⁶⁴ Oros. Hist. lib. 7. c. 33. Vastas illas tunc Ægypti solitudines, arenasque diffusas, quas propter sitim ac sterilitatem, periculosamque serpentum abundantiam conversatio humana non nosset; magna habitantium monachorum multitudo compleverat.

⁶⁵ Joseph. Antiquit. lib. 2. c. 5.

⁶⁶ Sulpic. Dial. 1. c. 7. Ubi prima eremi ingressus sum, duodecim fere a Nilo millibus, &c.

⁶⁷ Cassian. Institut. lib. 5. c. 40. Decem et octo millibus longe ab ecclesia commanebat.

⁶⁸ Id. Collat. 24. c. 4. Calami et Porphyricnis eremus longioris solitudinis intervallo ab universis urbibus et habitaculis hominum, quam eremus Scythii dividitur: septem siquidem vel octo mansionibus vastissimæ solitudinis deserta penetrantes, vix ad cellularum suarum secreta perveniunt, &c. Vid. Institut. lib. 10. c. 24.

and Eusebius. In after-ages, when the notitia was made which is published in the seventh chapter of this book, the number of dioceses was augmented to thirty-four, whereof twelve are called villages. And it appears from Sozomen⁶⁹ that this was no new thing in this country; for he takes notice that it was usual in some provinces to consecrate bishops in villages, and he particularly specifies Arabia and Cyprus for it. But then we are not to imagine that these dioceses were confined to a single village, as some have vainly concluded, to favour the hypothesis of congregational episcopacy. For these villages were what the ancients commonly called metrocomiæ, mother-villages, which had many other villages depending on them, so that they were the chief villages of a certain district. This is evident from Epiphanius,⁷⁰ who, speaking of Bacathus, one of the village bishoprics, styles it μητροκωμίαν Ἀραβίας, a mother-village in Arabia, which implies, that there were others depending on it. So that these dioceses might be as large as any other, having not only that village, but whole tracts and regions sometimes depending on them, as may be seen in the foresaid notitia, where some of them are called clima orientarium, and clima occidentarium, denoting not only a particular village, but a little people or nation of such a combination or district, under a mother-village, from which the whole diocese or circuit had its denomination. The Arabians were a people that chose rather to live in villages, and had but few cities in comparison of others; and that seems to be the reason why village bishops were allowed in this country, which otherwise were forbidden by the canons of the church, as has been showed in another place.⁷¹

Out of Arabia, our next step is into Palestine, or the patriarchate of Jerusalem, which, being taken out of the patriarchate of Antioch, had three provinces assigned for the limits of its jurisdiction, which, in the ancient monuments of the church, are commonly called Palæstina Prima, Secunda, and Tertia, following the civil account of the Roman empire. In these three provinces (comprised within the borders of the land of Canaan and Arabia Petræa) Carolus a Sancto Paulo reckons about forty-seven ancient dioceses.

In Palæstina Prima.

1. Hierusalem.
2. Cæsarea.
3. Dora.
4. Antipatris.
5. Diospolis, in Scripture called Lydda.
6. Jamnia.
7. Nicopolis, which is Emmaus.
8. Sozusa.
9. Maiuma.
10. Joppa.
11. Ascalon.
12. Gaza.
13. Raphia.
14. Anthedon.
15. Eleu-

- theropolis, anciently some place about Hebron.
16. Neapolis, or Sichem.
17. Elia.
18. Sebaste, or Samaria.
19. Petra.
20. Jericho.
21. Libias.
22. Azotus.
23. Zabulon.
24. Araclia, al. Hecralea.
25. Baschat.
26. Archelais.

In Palæstina Secunda.

1. Scythopolis.
2. Pella.
3. Caparcotia, or Capernaum.
4. Gadara.
5. Capitolis.
6. Maximianopolis.
7. Tiberias.
8. Mennith.
9. Hippus.
10. Amathus.

In Palæstina Tertia.

1. Petra.
 2. Augustopolis.
 3. Arindela.
 4. Arad.
 5. Areopolis.
 6. Elusa.
 7. Zoara.
 8. Sodoma.
 9. Phenon.
 10. Pharan.
 11. Aila.
- Holstenius, in his corrections upon this catalogue, strikes two out of the number, viz. Baschat, which he reckons to be the same with Bacatha in Arabia Philadelphicæ, and Phenon, which he assigns to the same province. But instead of these two, he has found out three more in Palæstina Prima, viz. Sycamazon, Gerara, and another Lydda, distinct from Diospolis aforementioned. So that the whole number of known dioceses was forty-eight.

Now, if we look upon all these together, and compare them with the forty dioceses in Germany at this day, they will appear very small indeed in comparison of them. For whereas Germany is computed eight hundred and forty miles in length, and seven hundred and forty in breadth; the whole extent of these three provinces will not amount to a square of one hundred and sixty miles. For the length of all Palestine, or the land of Canaan, taking in part of Phœnicia as far as Tyre and Sidon, which yet is excluded from these provinces, is computed by St. Jerom,⁷² Cotovicus,⁷³ Masius,⁷⁴ and others, to be but a hundred and sixty miles; and the breadth from Joppa to Jordan not above sixty: to which if we add about sixty more beyond Jordan, for the breadth of Palæstina Tertia, to the borders of Arabia Philadelphicæ and Bostra, we have then the complete dimensions of the three provinces together. By which it appears, that two German dioceses of one hundred miles length, are as large as all those forty-eight dioceses put together. Yet there were some dioceses among them of a competent bigness. Eleutheropolis, a city much spoken of by St. Jerom, not far from the place where Hebron stood, in the borders of Dan and Judah, seems to have had a pretty large territory. For St. Jerom speaks of villages belonging to it at seventeen miles⁷⁵ distance from it, and mentions a great many other villages in the same territory, though he does not so exactly

Sect. 8.
Of the dioceses of Palestine, or the patriarchate of Jerusalem.

⁶⁹ Sozom. lib. 7. c. 19. ⁷⁰ Epiphanius. Epitom. Panarii.

⁷¹ Book II. chap. 12. sect. 1.

⁷² Hieron. Ep. ad Dardan.

⁷³ Cotovic. Itinerar. Hierosol. lib. 1. c. 1. p. 327.

⁷⁴ Masius, Comment. in Joshuam xii. 24.

⁷⁵ Hieron. de Locis Hebra. voce Duma. Duma vicus grandis in finibus Eleutheropoleos, decem et septem ab ea milliariibus distans.

tell us their distance from the city. Sozomen names some others, as Besanduca,⁷⁶ where he says Epiphanius was born: and Ceila and Berathsatia,⁷⁷ where the bones of the prophets Micah and Habakkuk were found. Near Besanduca Epiphanius built his monastery, and the village had a church in it, where Epiphanius ordained a deacon, as he himself informs us.⁷⁸ From all which it is very evident this city had a large territory and considerable diocese, with many country towns and churches belonging to them. And there were several others, especially in Palæstina Secunda and Tertia, equal in extent to the diocese of Eletheropolis. But a judicious reader will easily conclude from the largeness of these, that some others must needs therefore be very small, since there were so great a number in so short a compass. If we cast our eye upon the sea-coast of Palestine, and reckon Tyre, and Sidon, and Ptolemais, and Sycaminum, and Porphyria into the account, (as being within the ancient bounds of the land of Canaan, though they now belong to the province of Phœnice and the patriarch of Antioch,) we shall find seventeen or eighteen cities in a line of one hundred and sixty miles, and some very near neighbours to one another. Cotovicus⁷⁹ reckons it but four miles from Ptolemais to Porphyria; and Sycaminum and Zabulon were not further removed from it. But Ferrarius reckons it twenty or twenty-four; so that the position of the two first is a little doubtful, but the other three may be reckoned within five or six miles of one another. Baudrand observes⁸⁰ the like of Dora and Cæsarea the metropolis, that they were but five miles distant from each other. So Ferrarius computes Antipatris ten miles from Cæsarea, and Diospolis ten more from Antipatris. Diospolis is in the Scripture called Lydda, and said to be nigh unto Joppa. Baudrand reckons it but six miles, correcting Ferrarius, who computes it ten. Jamnia was also about ten miles from Joppa, and but twelve from Lydda, as is collected out of Antonine's Itinerary. So that these three cities were not above twelve miles distant from each other. But Gaza, Maiuma, and Anthedon were still nearer neighbours, not above twenty furlongs or three miles from each other, as Sozomen particularly⁸¹ remarks their distance. Maiuma, he tells us, was once only a village belonging to Gaza, to which it was the seaport, seated nearer the sea upon the river Besor: but when Constantine, for its merit in readily embracing Christianity, had granted it the privilege of a city, it presently, according to the ancient rule, became a bishop's seat, and continued ever after so to be, notwithstanding some attempts made against it, of which I have given an account in the foregoing chapter. But though these cities lay so near together, we are not to think they were of the congregational way, or their bishops only parish pastors. While Maiuma was joined to Gaza, the church was doubtless more than a single congregation. For Eusebius, speaking of Silvanus, bishop of Gaza, who suffered martyrdom in the time of the Diocletian persecution, styles him⁸² bishop of the churches in and about Gaza. Which implies that his diocese was more than a single congregation. Nay, after Maiuma was taken from it, Gaza had still many other villages and a populous territory belonging to it. Sozomen⁸³ mentions three villages, one called Thabaca, where Hilarion was born; another Sopharconbra, where Ammonius was born; and a third named Bethelia, which he calls πολύανθρωπον κώμην Γαζαίαν, a most populous village under the jurisdiction of Gaza; which was also famous for the heathen pantheon, beside other temples that were in it; whence he conjectures it had the name of Bethelia, which in the Syrian tongue is the same as domicilium deorum, or the house of the gods. Now, a village that had several heathen temples in it, had no doubt upon its conversion some Christian churches also, where they had presbyters to celebrate holy offices, though in dependence on the church of Gaza. And for Maiuma, when it became a distinct diocese, its bishop was not a single parish pastor, but he had a clergy under him, and all other things that the episcopal church of Gaza had; as Sozomen⁸⁴ particularly notes in the case, saying, Each city had their own bishop and clergy, and their own proper festivals for their martyrs, and commemorations of the bishops and priests that had lived among them, and their proper bounds of the country lying round about them. And that we may not wonder that there should be such villages as these, it will not be amiss to observe what Josephus reports of two villages of Idumea not far from these, Begabri and Caphartophan, where he says⁸⁵ Vespasian slew above ten thousand people, took a thousand captives, and forced many others to fly away. He also says⁸⁶ in another place, there were many villages in Galilee so populous, that the least of them had above fifteen thousand inhabitants in them. Now, a few such villages as these, united under a metromia, or mother-village, might quickly arise into numbers enough to become a diocese, and have a bishop and clergy of their own, which it would be absurd to mistake for the pastor of a single congre-

⁷⁶ Sozom. lib. 6. c. 32.

⁷⁷ Ibid. lib. 7. c. 29.

⁷⁸ Epiphanius. Ep. ad Johan. Hierosol. Ecclesia villæ quæ est juxta monasterium nostrum, &c.

⁷⁹ Cotovic. Itiner. lib. 1. c. 20.

⁸⁰ Baudrand. Lexic. Geogr. voce Dora.

⁸¹ Sozom. lib. 5. c. 3 et 9.

⁸² Euseb. lib. 8. c. 13. Ἐπίσκοπος τῶν ἀμφὶ τὴν Γαζὰν ἐκκλησιῶν.

⁸³ Sozom. lib. 3. c. 14. lib. 5. c. 15. lib. 6. c. 32.

⁸⁴ Id. lib. 5. c. 3.

⁸⁵ Joseph. de Bello Jud. lib. 5. c. 4.

⁸⁶ Idem, de Bell. Jud. lib. 3. c. 2.

gation. And this was evidently the case of the smallest dioceses in this part of Palestine, where, notwithstanding the narrowness of their limits, they were under the same species of episcopal government with other churches.

The inland dioceses of Palestine were generally larger; yet some of them were small. For Emmaus was but sixty furlongs, or seven miles and a half, from Jerusalem, as both the Scripture and travellers inform us;⁸⁷ yet when of a village it became a city, being rebuilt by the Romans in the time of Adrian, and by them called Nicopolis, in memory of their victories over Jerusalem, as Sozomen,⁸⁸ and Eusebius,⁸⁹ and St. Jerom⁹⁰ inform us, it then also advanced itself to an episcopal see, and according to the rule of the church had the city territory for its diocese; under which denomination and quality we find it afterwards in the notitias of the church. This perhaps brings the diocese of Jerusalem into narrower bounds one way than is commonly imagined; but still it was of sufficient extent to have many particular churches in it. For the Jewish antiquaries commonly tell us, there were above four hundred synagogues in the city itself. Dr. Lightfoot⁹¹ reckons four hundred and fifty. Others,⁹² four hundred and sixty; and some say,⁹³ there were four hundred and eighty for Jews and strangers there. Optatus says, there were seven in a very small plain upon the top of Mount Sion, where the Jews⁹⁴ were used to meet and hear the law of Moses read. And Epiphanius⁹⁵ mentions the same, which he says were also left standing after the destruction of Jerusalem to the time of Adrian, and one of them to the time of Constantine. Now, it would be very strange, that a city which had so many synagogues, should not afford above one church, after it was made Christian, and so many thousand converts were in it even in the time of the apostles. But it had also a territory without the city, and churches at some distance from it. For Bethlehem was in the diocese of Jerusalem, six miles from the mother-church; upon which account it had a church and presbyters of its own, but those subject to the bishop of Jerusalem, as St. Jerom⁹⁶ informs us, who charges John, bishop of Jerusalem, for an extravagant abuse of his power, in laying his injunctions on his presbyters at Bethlehem, that they should not baptize the catechumens of the monastery, who stood candidates at Easter, upon which they were sent to Diospolis for baptism. St. Jerom mentions the church of Thiria⁹⁷ in the same place, where the bishop of Jerusalem ordained presbyters and deacons: and there is no doubt but there were many other such parishes within the precincts of his diocese, acknowledging his jurisdiction. We cannot give so particular an account of all the dioceses of Palestine; but those which some have thought the least, Lydda and Jamnia, appear to have been cities, and to have had their dependences in the neighbouring country round them. So that except Maiuma, which was disfranchised by Julian, there was no village in Palestine that had a bishop of its own; but the villages were all as so many parishes to the neighbouring city in whose territory they lay: which made these diocesan churches still of the same species with the rest, that had a larger extent of jurisdiction. Josephus indeed calls Lydda a village, but he says, it was a village not inferior to a city; and afterward it was made a city, and called Diospolis, when it was a bishop's see: and though its diocese could not extend very far one way, being it was but six miles from Joppa toward the sea; yet other ways it extended further, for St. Jerom⁹⁸ speaks of Bethsarissa, a village belonging to it, though it was near fifteen miles' distance from it, in the region called Regio Tamnitica, which seems to have been the territory belonging to this city.

I have been the more particular in describing the dioceses of Palestine, because here Christianity was first planted, and the true model of ancient episcopacy may best be collected from them. They who reckon these bishoprics no larger than country parishes, are strangely mistaken on the one hand; and they who extend their bounds as wide as German dioceses, are no less extravagant on the other. To make the right estimate, the reader must remember that there were never quite fifty bishops in all the three Palestines. In the middle of the sixth century there were but forty-five, who subscribed in the council of Jerusalem, anno 536. And we do not find, upon the nicest inquiry, they ever exceeded forty-eight. So that it were the absurdest thing in the world to suppose, as some have done, that these dioceses were but parish churches, or single congregations. On the other hand, when it is remembered, that the extent of the whole country was not above ⁸⁷ Cotovic. Itiner. lib. 2. c. 19. ⁸⁸ Sozom. lib. 5. c. 21.

⁸⁹ Euseb. Chron. an. 2237.

⁹⁰ Hieron. de Locis Hebr. voce Emmaus.

⁹¹ Lightfoot, Horæ Hebr. in Matth. Proœm.

⁹² Otho, Lexic. Rabbin. p. 627.

⁹³ Signon. de Republic. Hebr. lib. 2. c. 8. Goodwin, Mos. et Aaron. lib. 2. c. 2.

⁹⁴ Optat. lib. 3. p. 62. In cujus vertice est non magna planities, in qua fuerant septem synagogæ, ubi Judæorum populus conveniens, legem per Moysem datam discere potuisset.

⁹⁵ Epiph. de Mensur. et Ponder.

⁹⁶ Hieron. Ep. 61. ad Pammach. c. 16. Tu potius scindis ecclesiam qui præcepisti Bethleem presbyteris tuis, ne competentibus nostris in pascha baptismum traderent. Vid. Sulpic. Sever. Dial. 1. c. 4. Parochia est episcopi qui Hierosolymam tenet.

⁹⁷ Ibid. Theosobium Thiriæ ecclesiæ diaconum facis presbyterum, et contra nos armas.

⁹⁸ Hieron. Loc. Hebr. voce Bethsarissa. Est in finibus Diospoleos villa, quindecim ferme ab ea millibus distans contra septentrionem in regione Tamnitica.

a hundred and sixty miles, it is as evident these dioceses could not be of the largest size, and, if compared with some others, scarce be found to have the proportion of one to twenty, which needs no further demonstration.

The next patriarchate is that of Antioch, to which Carolus a Sancto Paulo assigns these thirteen provinces: Syria Prima. Syria Secunda. Theodorias. Cilicia Prima. Cilicia Secunda. Isauria. Euphratensis. Osrhoena. Mesopotamia. Phœnicia Prima. Phœnicia Secunda. Arabia, and the isle of Cyprus. One of these, Arabia Philadelphicæ, has been already spoken of; and three others, Isauria and Cilicia Prima and Secunda, lying in Asia Minor, shall be considered in the next chapter, among the provinces of that country. For the rest, I will here give first a particular catalogue of the dioceses in each province, and then make a few remarks upon them and some other Eastern provinces not mentioned by that writer.

In Syria Prima.

1. Antiochia. 2. Seleucia Pieria. 3. Berræa, by some called Aleppo. 4. Chalcis. 5. Onosarta, or rather Anasarta. 6. Gabbus. To which Holstenius adds another, called Paltus, which he thinks wrong placed in Theodorias.

In Syria Secunda.

1. Apamea, upon the river Orontes. 2. Arethusa. 3. Epiphania. 4. Larissa. 5. Mariama, or Mariamne. 6. Raphanea. 7. Seleucia juxta Belum, al. Seleucobelus. To these also Holstenius transfers another, named Balanea, out of the province of Theodorias, where he thinks it was wrong placed; but he is mistaken.

In Theodorias.

1. Laodicea. 2. Gabala. 3. Paltos. 4. Balanæa.

In Euphratesia, or Comagene.

1. Hieropolis. 2. Cyrus. 3. Samosata. 4. Doliche. 5. Germanicia. 6. Zeugma. 7. Perre, by some corruptly read Perga, and Pella, and Peria, as Holstenius observes. 8. Europus, al. Amphipolis and Thapsacum. 9. Urima. 10. Cæsarea, otherwise called Neocæsarea Euphratensis. 11. Sergiopolis. 12. Sura. 13. Marianopolis, which some place in Syria Secunda.

In Osrhoena, or Mesopotamia Inferior.

1. Edessa. 2. Carræ. 3. Circesium. 4. Nicephorium. 5. Batnæ. 6. Callinicus, al. Leontopolis. 7. Marcopolis. 8. Himeria. 9. Dausara.

In Mesopotamia Superior.

1. Amida, now called Caramit. 2. Nisibis. 3. Rhesina. 4. Martyropolis. 5. Caschara. To these Holstenius adds two more, Cepha, and Mnisis or Miniza.

In Phœnicia Prima.

1. Tyrus. 2. Sidon. 3. Ptolemais, or Acon. 4. Berytus. 5. Byblus. 6. Tripolis. 7. Arca. 8. Orthosias. 9. Botrus. 10. Aradus. 11. Antaradus. 12. Porphyrium. 13. Paneas, or Cæsarea Philippi. 14. Sycaminum, now called Capo Carmelo.

In Phœnicia Libani.

1. Damascus. 2. Laodicea Scabiosa. 3. Abyla. 4. Heliopolis. 5. Jabruda. 6. Palmyra. 7. Emesa. 8. Danaba. 9. Evaria, al. Euroia, al. Justinianopolis. 10. Comoara. 11. Corada. 12. Saracenoram Civitas, which rather belongs to Arabia. Holstenius adds one more, called Arlana.

In Cyprus.

1. Constantia. 2. Citium. 3. Amathus. 4. Curium. 5. Paphos. 6. Arsinoe. 7. Lapithus. 8. Thamassus. 9. Chytrus. 10. Tremithus. 11. Soli. 12. Ledra. 13. Tiberiopolis. Holstenius adds Carteriopolis and Carpasia, where Philo was bishop, who commonly, by a vulgar error, is called Carpathius, as if he had been bishop of Carpathus, an island in the Mediterranean Sea, whereas he was bishop of this Carpasia, in the isle of Cyprus, as Holstenius and Dr. Cave have both observed.

Now, to make some few remarks upon these dioceses distinctly, I observe, that by the same reason that Sect. 10. Observations on the dioceses of Cyprus. Carolus a Sancto Paulo places Cyprus under the patriarch of Antioch, he might have brought Assyria, Persia, Babylonia, Adiabene, India, and the nation of the Homerites in Arabia Felix, under Antioch also. For there were bishops in all these places, as I shall show, but independent of any patriarch except their own metropolitans. And so Cyprus was declared to be by the council of Ephesus; whence it was always reckoned an autocephalus, or independent province, as has been more fully proved in another place.⁹⁹ All I have further to observe of it here, is in reference to those fifteen dioceses that we have found there, that they were large ones, if compared with those of Palestine: for Cyprus is computed by Ferrarius 170 miles long, and by others 200; which is more than Palestine. Baudrand reckons it 500 miles in compass; which, without inquiring any further into the particular distance of places, or largeness of the cities or villages, is sufficient to show, that those dioceses were none of the least size, though short of some that we shall meet with in the continent, as we take a view of the other provinces.

⁹⁹ Book II. chap. 18. sect. 2.

That which lay next to Cyprus was Syria, which anciently comprehended all the country betwixt the Mediterranean and Euphrates; but the Romans divided it into six provinces, Syria Prima and Secunda, Phœnicia Prima and Secunda, Theodorias, and Euphratensis, otherwise called Hagiopolis and Comagene. The six provinces together are computed by geographers to be between three and four hundred miles in length, and two hundred broad from the Mediterranean to the Euphrates. And the whole number of dioceses in all the provinces was about fifty-six, that is, but eight more than we found in Palestine. By which the reader may easily make a general estimate of the largeness of these in comparison of the other in Palestine, by considering the dimensions of each country, and comparing them together. But I will speak a little more particularly of a few dioceses in these provinces. Syria Prima had anciently but six dioceses, and in the later notitias we find only five. The metropolis was Antioch, one of the largest cities in the world. Chrysostom, who may be supposed to be a competent judge of its greatness, speaks sometimes of ten or twenty myriads,¹⁰⁰ that is, a hundred or two hundred thousand people in it. And he makes this a part of his panegyric upon Ignatius, that whereas it is a difficult matter sometimes to govern a hundred or fifty men; yet such was his wisdom and virtue, that St. Peter doubted not to commit to his care a city, which had two hundred thousand people in it. The territory without the city was answerable to its greatness within: for one way it reached two days' journey, or fifty miles, to the territory of Cyrus, where Theodoret was bishop: for Strabo says,¹⁰¹ these two territories joined one to another. There were many great villages like cities in this compass; as Daphne, in the suburbs of Antioch; Gindarus, in the borders of the diocese toward Cyrus: in Strabo's time it was a city¹⁰² belonging to Cyrus, or Cyrrestica. But I must note, that there seem to have been two places of that name, the one a city, the other a village. For Strabo speaks of a Gindarus in the Regio Cyrrestica, which he calls a city: and we find one Petrus Gindarensis subscribing among the bishops of Syria in the council of Nice; who was also among the bishops of the council of Antioch which condemned Athanasius, as Holstenius¹⁰³ and Schelstrate have observed out of the subscriptions of these councils. Whence we may conclude, that Gindarus mentioned by Strabo, was probably the same city whereof this Peter was bishop, and that there was another Gindarus, a village, in the time of Theodoret, belonging to Antioch, where Asterius the monk lived, of whom Theodoret¹⁰⁴ speaks in his Religious History; where he also mentions other villages¹⁰⁵ near mount Amanus in the territory of Antioch; which must be at a great distance from Antioch; for Mount Amanus was the northern limit of Syria. Berræa and Chalcis were large cities, twenty miles from one another. In the same province lay Seleucia Pieria, sixteen miles from Antioch down the river Orontes, and five miles from sea; which was compass enough to make a large diocese, though much inferior to the former.

In Syria Secunda there were anciently seven bishoprics, and we find the same number in the later notitias of the church. Of these Apamea was the metropolis, a city which Theodoret¹⁰⁶ makes to be seventy-five miles from Antioch: and that it had a large territory and many villages, we learn from Strabo¹⁰⁷ and other ancient writers. Larissa in this province is computed by Ferrarius to be fourteen miles from Apamea; Arethusa, sixteen from Epiphania; Epiphania, eighteen from Larissa. So that at least twenty miles will be allotted to every diocese in the province.

In Phœnicia Prima some few cities, as I have observed before in speaking of Palestine, lay very near together, as Sycaminum and Porphyrium, whose dioceses could not be very large upon that account. But Tyre and Sidon and Berytus were both large cities and at a greater distance. For Tyre was twenty-five miles distant from Sidon on the one side, and as much or more from Ptolemais on the other side. Cotovicus¹⁰⁸ reckons it but twenty, but Ferrarius says it was two and thirty. And the city itself was very large, if we take Strabo's account, for he says,¹⁰⁹ it filled an island that was nineteen miles in compass. Pliny¹¹⁰ agrees as to the bigness of the island, but makes the city only two and twenty furlongs. Sidon was also a large city, and not within twenty-five miles of any other. Baudrand makes it twenty-five from Tyre, and thirty-five from Berytus. Berytus was famous for the study of the civil law, and reckoned among the great and flourishing cities of the East, and it had no nearer neighbours than Sidon on the south, and Byblus on the north, which Ferrarius sets at thirty-four miles' distance from it. The dioceses in the other Phœnicia, toward Mount Libanus, were greater than the former.

¹⁰⁰ Chrys. Hom. 86. in Matth. It. Hom. 42. in Ignat. t. 1. p. 567.

¹⁰¹ Strabo, lib. 16. p. 751. ¹⁰² Id. ibid.

¹⁰³ Holsten. Annotat. Geograph. p. 206. Schelstrat. de Concil. Antioch. p. 93.

¹⁰⁴ Theod. Hist. Relig. Vit. Julian. p. 777.

¹⁰⁵ Ibid. Vit. Simeon. c. 6. p. 808.

¹⁰⁶ Theod. Ep. 113.

¹⁰⁷ Strabo, lib. 16.

¹⁰⁸ Cotovic. Itinerar. lib. 1. c. 20.

¹⁰⁹ Strabo, lib. 16.

¹¹⁰ Plin. lib. 5. c. 19.

For here were some larger cities and at a greater distance from one another. Among these was the great city Damascus, once the metropolis of the province, the largeness of which may be collected from what Josephus relates,¹¹¹ how that the Damascenes slew there ten thousand Jews in one day. Emissa, the new metropolis, is accounted also a large city by Ammianus Marcellinus,¹¹² who equals it to Tyre and Sidon and Berytus. And for their territories, we must judge of them by their distance from other places. Laodicea and Arethusa were the nearest neighbours to Emissa, and Ferrarius makes them sixteen miles distant from it. And we do not find Damascus pent up in narrower bounds: for it was surrounded with Abyla, and Jabruda, and Cæsarea Philippi, the last of which Ferrarius reckons twenty-six miles from it. Abyla was the head of a region, thence called Abylene, which gave the denomination of a tetrarch to Lysanias, as St. Luke informs us: whence we may collect there was a considerable territory belonging to it. Here was also the great city Palmyra, the head of another region, thence called Palmyrene, of which it is reasonable to make the same conclusion; though I have nothing more particular to remark of the extent of these regions, save that Abyla is reckoned thirty-two miles from Heliopolis, another noted city in this province, and one of its nearest neighbours, as Ferrarius out of Antonine's Itinerary computes their distance. Vid. Ferrar. voce Heliopolis.

Sect. 13.
Of Theodorias. In the province of Theodorias, between Syria Prima and Phœnicia on the sea-coast, there were but three dioceses, Laodicea the metropolis, Balanea, and Gabala; and the same are mentioned in Goar's notitia and others. Now, the distance of these places may be seen in Antonine's Itinerary. Balanea was twenty-four miles from Antaradus in Phœnicia; Gabala, twenty-seven miles from Balanea, which Ferrarius calls twenty-four, according to modern accounts; and Laodicea the metropolis was eighteen from Balanea. And their territories extended further other ways.

Sect. 14.
Of Euphratesia, or Comagene. In the province of Euphratesia, or Comagene, there were anciently thirteen dioceses, and but one more in later notitias. Here were several large cities, as Hierapolis the metropolis of the province, and Samosata on the Euphrates, which both Josephus¹¹³ and Ammianus Marcellinus¹¹⁴ describe as a great and magnificent city. But the largest diocese for extent of territory in these parts was that of Cyrus, where Theodoret was bishop, who gives a most particular account of it. He says in one place,¹¹⁵ it was forty miles in length and forty in breadth; and that there were above six myriads, or threescore thousand ζύγα or juga of land in it. Now a jugum of land was not a single acre, as some learned men mistake; but as much land as a yoke of oxen could plough in a year; and the Roman taxes were raised by such proportions of land, whence the ordinary tax upon land was styled jugatio in the civil law, as I have had occasion to note¹¹⁶ in another place. So that threescore thousand juga, according to this account, will make a far greater diocese, than if we should understand it of single acres only. And that we may not think this was barren and unoccupied land, Theodoret in another place specifies what number of churches and parishes he had in his diocese, which he says¹¹⁷ were eight hundred: some of which were overrun with the heresies of Marcion, Arius, and Eunomius, when he came to the diocese; but he converted above ten thousand of one sect only, viz. Marcionites,¹¹⁸ to the catholic faith, and of others some thousands more. All which arguments agree to make it one of the largest dioceses of the East, as Blondel¹¹⁹ ingenuously confesses it to be, though some others would fain insinuate the whole story to be a fiction, when yet all circumstances concur to give it the clearest evidences of truth. They who would see objections answered, may consult Bishop Stillingfleet¹²⁰ or Dr. Maurice,¹²¹ who have particularly considered the exceptions that have been raised against it. As to the other cities of this province, Doliche, Germanicia, Nicopolis, Zeugma, Cæsarea, &c., some of them were but small cities, as Doliche, which Theodoret speaks of¹²² with the diminutive title of πολιχνη μικρά, a very small city: but they might have large dioceses, as Cyrus had, which itself was neither a great city nor very well inhabited, but had a diocese larger than many other cities which were ten times the bigness of it.

In the Roman provinces beyond the Euphrates (which some call by Sect. 15.
Of Osrhoena, and Mesopotamia. the general name of Mesopotamia, because it lay between the two rivers Tigris and Euphrates; but the Romans divided it into two provinces, Osrhoena on the banks of Euphrates, and Mesopotamia toward the Tigris) there are so few dioceses to be found in ancient records, that to me it seems probable that our accounts are very imperfect: for the whole number in both provinces is but sixteen; whereas in the later notitias there are sixteen in Osrhoena alone, and in the other province thirty-five more; which makes it probable that ancient accounts are here defective. Other-¹¹¹ Joseph. de Bell. lib. 2. c. 25. ¹¹² Ammian. lib. 14. c. 8.

¹¹³ Joseph. de Bell. lib. 7. c. 27. ¹¹⁴ Ammian. lib. 14. c. 8.

¹¹⁵ Theodor. Ep. 42 et 47. ¹¹⁶ See Book V. c. 3. sect. 3.

¹¹⁷ Theod. Ep. 113. ad Leon. 'Εν ὀκτακοσίοις ἐκκλησίαις ἔλαχον ποιμαίνειν. τσαύτας γὰρ ὁ Κύρρος παροικίας ἔχει.

¹¹⁸ Id. Ep. 145. p. 1026. Πλείους ἢ μυρίους, &c.

¹¹⁹ Blondel. Apol. p. 185.

¹²⁰ Stillingfl. of Separat. p. 258.

¹²¹ Maurice's Defence of Dioc. Episc. p. 396.

¹²² Theod. lib. 5. c. 4.

wise we must say, that these dioceses were extremely large. For Baudrand makes the country four hundred and twenty miles long, and two hundred and seventy broad. Which divided into sixteen dioceses would make them all of great extent. But the country seems not to have been all converted, for the Roman cities were only such as lay by the banks of the rivers, and chiefly upon the Euphrates. I shall therefore make no other estimate of them, than by the certain light we have of them in ancient history. From which it is clear, that some of them were at least such episcopal dioceses as were in all other parts of the world, that is, cities with country regions and village churches. This is evident from what Epiphanius observes of Chascara, one of the cities of Mesopotamia, that beside the bishop's see it had village churches, and presbyters incumbent on them, in the third century. For speaking¹²³ of Manes the heretic, the first founder of the Manichees, he says, When he had been baffled at a public disputation by Archelaus, bishop of Chascara, and had like to have been stoned by the people, he fled to Diodoris, a village belonging to Chascara, where one Tryphon was presbyter, whom he challenged to a new disputation. And if the lesser cities had such kind of dioceses, we may readily conclude the same of Nisibis the metropolis, which was so large a city as to be able to defend itself sometimes against all the power of the Persian empire; being, as Sozomen observes of it,¹²⁴ in a manner all Christian in the time of the emperor Julian. Edessa, the metropolis of the other province of Osrhoena, was also a very large city, and the royal seat of Agbarus, who lived in our Saviour's time, and by whose means it is generally thought to be converted very early to Christianity; and so it might perhaps from the very first have several churches in it. However, in after ages we are sure it had: for Sozomen, speaking of the persecution under Valens the Arian emperor, says, He took away all the churches within the city, among which¹²⁵ that of St. Thomas was one, so that the people were forced to assemble in gardens without the city for Divine service.

Beside these provinces mentioned by Carolus a Sancto Paulo, there were some other countries out of the bounds of the Roman empire, which had the same form of episcopal government; upon which therefore it will not be amiss to make a few strictures, whilst we are speaking of the Eastern provinces. That which we now call Armenia Magna, was anciently called Armenia Persica, because it belonged not to the Roman, but to the Persian empire. Here were also bishops in the time of Theodoret, as appears from some of his epistles. For writing to one Eulalius a bishop, he styles him,¹²⁶ for distinction sake, τῆς Περσικῆς Ἀρμενίας, bishop of the Persian Armenia. And another epistle¹²⁷ is directed to one Eusebius, a bishop of the same region. By which it is plain there were bishops in that country in Theodoret's time; but how many we cannot learn from him or any other ancient writer. Otho Frisingensis,¹²⁸ and Baronius,¹²⁹ and some other modern writers, talk much of the catholic of Armenia that sent to submit himself to the pope in the twelfth century, having a thousand bishops under him. But, as Mr. Breewood¹³⁰ rightly observes, if the whole story be not a fiction, Otho must needs mistake obedience for communion: for the catholic of Armenia might have a great number of the Jacobite bishops in his communion, but there could not be so many in Armenia under his jurisdiction. For the modern notitia mentions but nineteen bishops in this Armenia, as the reader will find in the seventh chapter of this book. And it is not probable they should multiply from twenty to a thousand in an age or two. However, this story has no relation to the state of the church in the primitive ages, about which the present inquiry is only concerned.

We have some further account of the churches in other parts also of the Persian dominions, beyond the river Tigris, in Adiabene, which is a region of Assyria, and in Babylonia or Chaldea, in which we find two large cities, Seleucia and Ctesiphon, under one bishop. These were the royal seats of the Persian kings, and but three miles from each other, as Pliny¹³¹ and Ferrarius after him compute, though others place them at a greater distance. Seleucia is by some said to be the same as Mosul, the present seat of the patriarch of the Nestorians. But anciently they were both but one diocese, as we learn from Sozomen,¹³² who styles Simeon archbishop of Ctesiphon and Seleucia, under Saporet king of Persia, who lived in the time of Constantine. There were other bishops also in these parts at the same time, some of which suffered martyrdom together with Simeon, as the same author informs us.¹³³ He also mentions one Aceptsimas, a bishop in the region of Adiabene, and twenty-three more, whose names are there recorded, as suffering martyrdom about the same time¹³⁴ in several parts of the Persian empire. And what sort of dioceses they had, we may conjecture from what Sozomen¹³⁵ says

Sect. 16.
Of Armenia Persica.

Sect. 17.
Of Assyria, or Adiabene, and Chaldea.

¹²³ Epiph. Hær. 66. Manichæ. n. 11.

¹²⁴ Sozom. lib. 5. c. 3.

¹²⁵ Sozom. lib. 6. c. 18.

¹²⁶ Theodor. Ep. 77. ad Eulal.

¹²⁷ Theod. Ep 78.

¹²⁸ Otto Frising. lib. 7. c. 32.

¹²⁹ Baron. an. 1195.

¹³⁰ Breewood, Inquir. c. 24.

¹³¹ Plin. lib. 6. c. 26.

¹³² Sozom. lib. 2. c. 9.

¹³³ Ibid. c. 10.

¹³⁴ Ibid. c. 13.

¹³⁵ Ibid. c. 13.

of one of them, named Bichor, that he suffered martyrdom together with Maureandus his chorepiscopus, and two hundred and fifty more of the clergy that were under him. Such a number of clergy, and a chorepiscopus among them, seem to bespeak a pretty large diocese; and if the rest were answerable to this, we may conclude the bishops were all of the same species as we have seen in all the Eastern nations.

Theodorus Lector¹³⁶ speaks of another nation converted to Christianity in the time of Anastasius the emperor, whom he names Immireni, and says, they were subjects of the Persian empire, and dwelt in the most southern parts of their dominions. Whether they had above one bishop is not certain; for only one is mentioned as set over them upon their conversion. And it might be with them, as it was with some other barbarous people, Goths, Saracens, &c., that one bishop served the whole nation. Valesius confounds this people with the Homeritæ, whom Bochart and others more truly place in Arabia Felix toward the South Sea. Baronius¹³⁷ supposes the Homerites first converted to the Christian faith about the year 354, at the same time that the Indians or Ethiopians were converted in the reign of Constantius. But we have no account then of what bishops were settled among them: but in the beginning of the sixth age, we find the Christian religion in a flourishing condition there, till one Dunaan, an apostate Jew, having gotten the kingdom, raised a great persecution against the church, especially at Nargan, where one Arethas was a petty king, subject, as many other small reguli were, to the kingdom of the Homerites, whom he barbarously destroyed with all his people. But this cloud quickly blowing over by the assistance of Justin the Roman emperor, and Elesban king of Ethiopia, who conquered Dunaan,¹³⁸ the government fell again into the hands of a Christian king, in whose time Gregentius, archbishop of Tephra, the royal city, is said to have had that famous disputation with Herbanus the Jew, the result of which was the conversion of an incredible number of Jews in that region. Here I chiefly observe, that Gregentius is styled archbishop of Tephra, which implies, that he had suffragan bishops under him: and in the relation of his death at the end¹³⁹ of the dispute, it is added, that both bishops, priests, and deacons were gathered together to attend his funeral. By which it appears, that the state of that church, so far as we have any account of it, was conformable to other churches.

We have some few intimations also given us of churches planted anciently among the Saracens in Arabia, which were never under the Roman empire. Hilarion is said by some¹⁴⁰ to have begun the conversion of this nation, but it was not completed till Mauvia, queen of the Saracens, made it a condition of her making peace with the Romans in the time of Valentinian, that they should send her one Moses, a famous monk, to be the bishop of her nation; which was accordingly done, and so he became the first bishop of that region of the Saracens, as Ruffin,¹⁴¹ and Socrates,¹⁴² and the other historians inform us. Sozomen also adds, that one Zocomos, another regulus or petty prince of another region of the Saracens, being converted by a monk, brought over all his subjects to the Christian faith. Theodorus Lector¹⁴³ likewise mentions another of these Saracen princes, named Alamundarus, who embraced the faith in the reign of the emperor Anastasius, anno 513. And Cyril of Scythopolis, who wrote the Lives of Euthymius and Sabas, takes notice also of a plantation of Saracens under the Roman government in Palestine,¹⁴⁴ over whom one Peter, a converted Saracen, who had before been their captain, was made the first bishop by Juvenal, bishop of Jerusalem, about the middle of the fifth century. Now, we are to observe, that as these Saracens were thus divided into little nations, (after the manner of the Arabians,) and had each their regulus, or petty prince; so they seem each to have had their proper bishop, one to a nation, and no more. And therefore in councils we find them usually subscribing themselves rather by the title of their nation, Episcopus Gentis Saracenorum, than any other way. Which I take to be an indication, not that all the Saracens in the world had but one bishop, but that every petty nation had a bishop of its own, though it is hard to distinguish sometimes which family or tribe of them is meant by that general title. In the second council of Ephesus,¹⁴⁵ one Auxilaus is styled Episcopus Saracenorum Federatorum, among the bishops of Palestine, whence it is easy to conclude, there is meant the same Saracens that Cyril speaks of, who were confederate with the Romans, or under the Roman government. But in other places we are left to guess what Saracens may be meant, since they were divided into several petty nations, and more than one nation of them, as we have seen, were converted to the Christian faith.

There is one Eastern country more, famous for its conversion by Ædesius and Frumentius, in the time of Atha-

Sect. 19.
Of bishops among the Saracens in Arabia.

Sect. 18.
Of the Immireni
in Persia, and Homeritæ in Arabia
Felix.

Sect. 20.
Bishops of the Axumites, or Indians beyond Egypt.

¹³⁶ Theodor. Lect. lib. 2. p. 567.

¹³⁷ Baron. an. 354. n. 14.

¹³⁸ Acta Martyr. Homeritar. ap. Baron. an. 522 et 523.

¹³⁹ Gregent. Disput. cum Herban. Bibl. Patr. Gr. Lat. t. 1. p. 272.

¹⁴⁰ Baron. an. 372. p. 344.

¹⁴¹ Ruffin. lib. 2. c. 6.

¹⁴² Socrat. lib. 4. c. 36. Theodor. lib. 4. c. 23. Sozom. lib. 6. c. 38.

¹⁴³ Theodor. Lector. lib. 2.

¹⁴⁴ Cyril. Vit. Euthym. ap. Baron. an. 420. p. 481.

¹⁴⁵ Conc. Ephes. 2. in Act. 1. Conc. Chalcedon. t. 4. p. 118.

nasius, but yet learned men are not agreed where to place it. The ancient historians, Ruffin,¹⁴⁶ Socrates,¹⁴⁷ and the rest that relate the story, commonly call it India Ulterior, the Inner India: whence Carolus a Sancto Paulo,¹⁴⁸ and Baronius,¹⁴⁹ and many others take it for granted, that they mean India within Ganges, the other part without Ganges having been converted before (as they think) by the apostle St. Bartholomew. But Holstenius¹⁵⁰ and Valesius¹⁵¹ correct this mistake, and Bishop Pearson¹⁵² has more fully proved that the India they speak of was no part of the East Indies, but India beyond Egypt, which was part of Ethiopia, whereof Axumis was the metropolis. This lay not far from the mouth of the Red Sea, over against the country of the Homerites in Arabia, whence Constantius, in one of his laws,¹⁵³ joins these two nations together. From which, and many other authorities, Bishop Pearson unanswerably proves, that this India can be understood of no other but the Ethiopic India, whereof Axumis was the metropolis. This the ancients called India as well as the other: for Virgil says, the Nile flowed from the Blackamore Indians;¹⁵⁴ and Procopius Gazensis styles the Red Sea, the Indian Sea, because it bordered upon this India beyond Egypt. Now, in this country Frumentius was the first bishop that we read of, being ordained bishop of Axumis by Athanasius and a synod of Egyptian bishops, and sent thither to convert the country and settle churches among them: which therefore, we need not doubt, were of the same species with those in Egypt and the rest of the world. For Axumis was not the only place that had a bishop. For Palladius mentions one Moses,¹⁵⁵ bishop of Adulis, which was another city of Ethiopia. And in his Life of St. Chrysostom,¹⁵⁶ he also speaks of one of his own name, Palladius, bishop of the Blemyes, which were a people of Ethiopia, adjoining to Egypt, as Strabo, and Pliny, and other geographers inform us. Bishop Pearson gives some other proofs, out of Cedrenus and the Arabic canons of the Nicene council, and their ancient liturgies, that they had bishops in that country ever since this their first conversion. But nothing more particular occurring concerning their dioceses, for want of better light we can give no further account of them. And for the same reason I must omit several other Eastern nations, as the Parthians, and Indians about Ganges, which were converted by St. Thomas the apostle; and the Iberians and other nations lying upon the Caspian Sea, which Ruffin¹⁵⁷ says were converted first by a captive woman in the time of Constantine. Ancient history affords us but slender accounts of the original of these churches, and less of the constitution and settlement of them. So that, taking our leave of these far-distant regions, we will come next to a part of the world which is better known, which is the patriarchate of Constantinople, under which were anciently comprehended all the provinces of Thrace and Asia Minor, except Isauria and Cilicia, which always belonged to the patriarch of Antioch. I shall first speak of Asia Minor, and then proceed to the European provinces, taking each country as they lie in their natural order.

CHAPTER III.

A CONTINUATION OF THIS ACCOUNT IN THE PROVINCES OF ASIA MINOR.

To understand the state of diocesan churches in Asia Minor, it will be proper, before we descend to particulars, to examine the extent of the country in gross, and see how many dioceses are to be found in the whole: for by this we may make an estimate of them in general, allowing each diocese its proportion upon an equal distribution of the country into so many parts as there were dioceses in it. Not that they were really so equally divided; (for in summing up the particulars we shall find here were some of the largest and some of the smallest dioceses in the world;) but we may conceive them as equal, in order to make a division of the whole country at once among them. Now, Dr. Heylin in his Geography¹ reckons the length of Asia Minor from the Hellespont to the river Euphrates to be 630 miles; and the breadth from Sinus Issicus in Cilicia to Trabezond in Pontus to be 210 miles. The ancient geographers, Strabo² and Pliny,³ make it almost 200 miles more in length. But then their accounts are taken from some ancient periplus or sea voyage, which never proceeds in a direct line, but takes in the bendings and windings of the sea, which may easily stretch 600 to 800 miles: so that the accounts may be the same, when allowance is

Sect. 1.
Of the extent of Asia Minor and the number of dioceses contained therein.

¹⁴⁶ Ruffin. lib. 1. c. 9.

¹⁴⁷ Socrat. lib. 1. c. 19.

¹⁴⁸ Carol. a S. Paulo. Geogr. Sacr. p. 268.

¹⁴⁹ Baron. Not. in Martyrol. Die 27. Octob.

¹⁵⁰ Holsten. Not. in Carol. a S. Paulo. Geogr. p. 171.

¹⁵¹ Vales. Not. in Socrat. lib. 1. c. 19.

¹⁵² Pearson, Vind. Ignat. par. 2. c. 11. p. 332.

¹⁵³ Nullus ad gentem Auxumitarum et Homeritas ire præ-ceptus, ultra annui temporis spatia debet Alexandriae de cætero commorari.

¹⁵⁴ Virgil. Georg. 4. ver. 291. Usque coloratis amnis devexus ab Indis.

¹⁵⁵ Pallad. de Gentibus Indiæ.

¹⁵⁶ Pallad. Vit. Chrysost. c. 20.

¹⁵⁷ Ruffin. lib. 1. c. 10.

¹ Heylin, Cosmogr. lib. 3. p. 3.

² Strabo, lib. 12. p. 547 et 548. ³ Plin. lib. 6. c. 2

made for the excesses of one way of measuring above the other. As to the breadth, Pliny's account is rather less: for he makes it but bare 200 miles⁴ from Sinus Issicus to the Euxine Sea. But then he says, this was the narrowest part of it, where the two seas almost made it a peninsula. And it is certain in other parts it was much broader. For Strabo⁵ reckons the breadth of Cappadocia only from Pontus to Mount Taurus 1800 stadia, which is above 200 miles: and yet Casaubon⁶ supposes, that by Pontus he does not mean the Pontus Euxinus, but the province of Pontus, which was to be added to the breadth of Asia on one side of Cappadocia, as Cilicia was on the other. So that we can hardly suppose the breadth of Asia, taking one part with another, to be less than 300 miles. Now, this was divided by the Romans into two large civil dioceses, the Asiatic and Pontic, each of which had ten or eleven provinces in them, and every province several cities and episcopal dioceses, beside those of Isauria and Cilicia, which are reckoned to the Oriental diocese, and were under the patriarch of Antioch. Christopherson, in his translation of Theodoret, makes a strange mistake concerning these bishoprics. For whereas Theodoret says, that Asia, or the Asiatic diocese, was ὑπὸ ἑνδεκά ἀρχόντων, under eleven civil prefects,⁷ he translates it, undecim antistites, as if there had been but eleven bishops in all the Asiatic diocese; and only as many in the Pontic diocese, because Theodoret says, it had ἰσαριθμὸς ἡγουμένων, the same number of governors: whereas Theodoret is not speaking of ecclesiastical governors, but civil governors of provinces; whereof there was the number Theodoret speaks of in each of those dioceses: but bishoprics were abundantly more numerous; for some single provinces had above forty, and in the whole number they were, according to Carolus a Sancto Paulo's reckoning, three hundred and eighty-eight, viz. in Asia forty-two, Hellespont nineteen, Phrygia Pacatiana Prima twenty-nine, Pacatiana Altera five, Phrygia Salutaris twenty, Lydia twenty-four, Caria twenty-five, Lycia twenty-eight, Pamphylia Prima twelve, Pamphylia Secunda twenty-four, Pisidia nineteen, Lycaonia nineteen, Cappadocia Prima six, Cappadocia Secunda six, Cappadocia Tertia five, Armenia Prima five, Armenia Secunda ten, Galatia Prima seven, Galatia Secunda four, Pontus Polemoniacus six, Elenopontus six, Paphlagonia five, Honorias five, Bithynia Prima fourteen, Bithynia Secunda four, Cilicia Prima seven, Cilicia Secunda nine, Isauria twenty-three. In the latter notitia, which the reader will find at the end of this book, the number is a little increased to four hundred and three. For though some provinces decreased, yet others increased in their numbers, so that in the eighth century we find fifteen dioceses more than were in former ages, which is no great alteration in such a multitude, considering what great additions have been made in some other countries in comparison of this. Now then, supposing 400 dioceses to have been in a country 600 miles in length and 300 in breadth, let us examine how much upon an equal distribution will fall to every diocese. And it appears upon an exact computation, that supposing there had been 450 dioceses, there would have been 20 miles to each diocese; and consequently, there being not so many by 50, every diocese must have so much the more upon an equal distribution. But then it must be owned, that the distribution was generally unequal in this country; for the bishoprics of the Pontic provinces were for the most part very large, and those of the Asiatic provinces consequently the smaller upon that account, and abundantly more numerous: so that here the reader may view the largest and smallest dioceses in the world together, and yet the same species of episcopacy maintained in all without distinction.

To begin with the Pontic provinces: Cappadocia was a very large country, and had but few bishoprics.⁸ Strabo⁹ reckons it 3000 stadia in length, that is, 375 miles: but then he takes it in a larger sense than we do now, as including all from the provinces of Lycaonia and Phrygia to the Euphrates; which takes in Armenia Minor as well as Cappadocia: for anciently they were all one kingdom, though afterwards divided into five provinces, three Cappadocias, and Armenia Prima and Secunda. But now in all these five provinces there were not thirty dioceses at first, and some of those were new erected in the fourth century, as Sasima, where Gregory Nazianzen was made bishop, which before belonged either to Cæsarea, the metropolis of Cappadocia Prima, from which it was 100 miles distant; or to Tyana, the metropolis of Cappadocia Secunda, from which it lay 32 miles,⁹ as Ferrarius computes. This shows that these dioceses were of great extent: but we have still more certain evidence of the thing; for Gregory Nazianzen¹⁰ says, that St. Basil, who was bishop of Cæsarea, had fifty chorepiscopi under him; and Basil himself often speaks of his chorepiscopi,¹¹ and country presbyters and deacons under them:¹² which argues his diocese to be of great extent, though we cannot precisely fix the limits of it. And the paucity of dioceses in this province argues the same. For by Carolus a Sancto Paulo's account, beside Cæsarea, the metropolis of the first Cappa-

Sect. 2.
Of Cappadocia
and Armenia Minor.

⁴ Plin. lib. 6. c. 2. ⁵ Strabo, lib. 12. p. 539.

⁶ Casaub. in loc. ⁷ Theod. lib. 5. c. 28.

⁸ Strabo, lib. 12. p. 539.

⁹ Ferrar. Lexic. Geograph. voce Sasima.

¹⁰ Naz. Carm. de Vita Sua.

¹¹ Basil, Ep. 181.

¹² Ibid. Ep. 412.

docia, there were but five bishoprics more in that province, Nyssa, where Gregory Nyssen was bishop, Thermæ Regiæ, Camuliana or Justinianopolis Nova, Ciscissa, and Theodosiopolis, at the time of the sixth general council; which are the same that are mentioned in the later notitias, only Methodiopolis is put for Theodosiopolis Armenia, to which province the council of Chalcedon ascribes it. So that there were really never above five dioceses in this province, and two of those, Camuliana and Ciscissa, erected after the council of Chalcedon. For in the synodical epistle of this province to the emperor Leo at the end of that council, there are but two bishops subscribe beside the metropolitan of Cæsarea, viz. the bishops of Nyssa and Thermæ. Sozomen¹³ speaks of one Prapadius, governor of St. Basil's hospital, (called Basilius from its founder,) who was likewise a bishop that had several villages under his jurisdiction. But whether his diocese was in this Cappadocia is uncertain.

The second Cappadocia, which was made by a division of the province in the time of St. Basil, had, according to Carolus a Sancto Paulo's account, six dioceses, Tyana the metropolis, Sasima, Justinianopolis, Asuna, Faustiniopolis, and Cybistra. But as Holstenius¹⁴ has observed, two of these are mistaken. For there never was any such city as Asuna, which is only a corruption in the Latin editions of the councils for Sasima; it being in the Greek, ἐπίσκοπος Σασίμων, bishop of Sasima. And Justinianopolis was only another name for Mocissus, which Justinian having advanced to be a metropolis in the third Cappadocia, styled it by his own name, Justinianople. So that there were really no more than four dioceses in this province, and one of them, Sasima, but of late erection. This was also but an obscure village, στένον κωμόδιον, Nazianzen¹⁵ himself calls it. So that the three ancient dioceses must be of very large extent, though we have no further account of them, save that Pasa, a village twelve miles distant from Tyana, is said to be in that diocese¹⁶ by one Euphrantas in the fifth general council, and Sasima was originally part of the same diocese, though thirty-two miles distant from the cathedral. Which sufficiently demonstrates the largeness of dioceses in this province.

The third Cappadocia had never above five bishoprics, Mocissus, Nazianzum, Colonia, Parnassus, and Doara. Of these Mocissus was the metropolis, which owed its honour to Justinian, who dignified it with the title of a metropolis, and, as Procopius¹⁷ informs us, gave it his own name, Justinianople; by which title Peter, bishop of the place, subscribes himself¹⁸ in the council under Mennas. Doara was but a village, as Holstenius¹⁹ observes out of St. Basil, who styles it²⁰ κώμην Δώρα. And Nazianzus was but a small city, as Gregory Nazianzen himself²¹ styles it: but they must have large dioceses, else the other three must be so much the larger for it. For geographers place them at a considerable distance from one another. Nazianzus had its chorepiscopi, sometimes mentioned in Gregory Nazianzen's epistles,²² which is an argument that it had a large country region.

In Armenia Prima, Carolus a Sancto Paulo could find but five bishoprics, Sebastea the metropolis, Sebastopolis, Nicopolis, Satala, and Berisse. And the later notitias add but one more, Colonia, which is also reckoned to Cappadocia Tertia, unless there were two of the same name in those provinces. In the Second Armenia he augments the number to ten, Melitene the metropolis, Arca, Comana, Arabissus, Cucusus, Ariarathia, Amasa, Zelona, Sophene, Diospontum. But Holstenius, in his animadversions upon the place,²³ observes, that four of these are to be struck out of the account: for Amasa, or Amasia, belonged to Hellenopontus; and Zelona was no other than Zela in the same province; Sophene belonged to Armenia Major; and Diospontum was not the name of a bishopric, but only an old name for the province of Hellenopontus. And his conjecture is confirmed by the later notitias, which name the six first of these dioceses, but none of those four, under the title of Armenia Minor. So that in all these five provinces, upon an exact computation, there were not above twenty-four dioceses in the whole: some of them, therefore, must be very large in a country of three hundred miles extent.

The next province to these upon the Euxine Sea, was Pontus Polemoniacus, so called from Polemonium, a chief city in the province; beside which and Neocæsarea the metropolis, there were but three other bishoprics, Trapezus, Cerasus, and Comana: all which lay at a great distance from one another. Polemonium, Cerasus, and Trapezus, lay in a line on the sea-coast: and by Pliny's reckoning,²⁴ Polemonium and Trapezus were one hundred and fifty-five miles distant from each other, and Cerasus lay in the middle between them. Neocæsarea was a hundred miles within land, and Comana sixty from

Sect. 3.
Of Pontus Polemoniacus.

¹³ Sozom. lib. 6. c. 34.

¹⁴ Holsten. Annot. Geograph. p. 157.

¹⁵ Naz. Carn. de Vita Sua.

¹⁶ Conc. Gener. 5. Collat. 5. Conc. t. 5. p. 478.

¹⁷ Procop. de Ædific. Justin. lib. 5. p. 48.

¹⁸ Concil. sub Menna. Act. 2.

¹⁹ Holsten. Annot. Geograph. p. 159. ²⁰ Basil. Ep. 10.

²¹ Naz. Orat. 19. de Laud. Patris, t. 1. p. 310.

²² Naz. Ep. 88.

²³ Holsten. Annot. Geograph. p. 161. Id. Annot. in Ortelium, p. 172, observes out of Antonine's Itinerary, that Sebastea and Sebastopolis were thirty-six miles distant from each other.

²⁴ Plin. lib. 6. c. 4.

it. Justinian²⁵ mentions these five cities in one of his Novels, and says, there were no more in the province. For Pitius and Sebastopolis were not cities, he says, but only castles: and, as Holstenius²⁶ observes, they were not properly of this province, but lay in Solo Barbarico, and were only appendages to this province, because they could not constitute a province of themselves. So that though Carolus a Sancto Paulo make Pitius a sixth bishopric of this province, yet the later notitias leave it out of the number, and only retain the five first mentioned. Which shows, that for eight hundred years there never was any alteration made in this province, nor more episcopal dioceses erected than there were imperial cities, though they lay at so great a distance from one another.

Sect. 4.
Of Helenopontus. The next province to this on the sea-coast, was Helenopontus, which had only six bishoprics at the time of the council of Chalcedon, Amasea the metropolis, Amisus, Sinope, Iborea, Zela, and Andrapa, as appears from the synodical epistle of the bishops of this province²⁷ to the emperor Leo; and there was but one more added in after ages. Of these Amisus and Sinope lay upon the sea-coast, at a great distance from one another. For Pliny says, Amisus lay in the way between Polemonium and Sinope, one hundred and twenty miles from Polemonium,²⁸ and one hundred and thirty from Sinope.²⁹ Which comes pretty near the account of Strabo, who reckons it nine hundred stadia, or one hundred and twelve miles, from Amisus³⁰ to Sinope. He also speaks of Armena, a village of Sinope,³¹ fifty stadia from it. And of Amasea, the place of his nativity, he gives a more particular account, telling us, that it had a very large territory one way, which for the number of villages in it was called χιλιόκωμον πεδίον,³² the country of a thousand villages. This was an inland city, reckoned by some a hundred miles from the sea. Zela was as far from Amasea. So that without all doubt these were dioceses of the largest size, since the cities lay so remote from one another.

Sect. 5.
Of Paphlagonia and Galatia. Next to Helenopontus on the sea-coast lay the province of Paphlagonia in which Carolus a Sancto Paulo reckons five bishoprics, Gangra the metropolis, Sora, Junopolis, Pompeiopolis, and Amastris. To which Holstenius has added Dadibra, whose bishop Polychronius subscribed in the council of Chalcedon,³³ by Peter the metropolitan of Gangra. In the following ages the number decreased; for there is no mention of Pompeiopolis or Amastris in the later notitias of the church. Among these Gangra is noted by St. Basil³⁴ as a place that had several churches and altars in it. Amastris was a large city, which grew out of four others adjoining to it, Sesamus, Cytorus, Cromna, and Teius, as Ferrarius observes, who³⁵ makes it to be sixty-eight miles from Heraclea in the next province of Honorias. And all the rest seem to have been at as great distances from each other.

On the south of Paphlagonia lay Galatia, an inland country, having Cappadocia on the east, and Phrygia on the west. This by the Romans was divided into two provinces, Galatia Prima, and Secunda, or Salutaris. In the first there were seven bishoprics, Ancyra the metropolis, Tabia, Heliopolis, or Juliopolis, Aspona, Cinna, Berinopolis, and Anastasiopolis. The last of which seems to be erected in the latter end of the seventh century only: for there is no mention of it till the sixth general council of Constantinople, anno 681. The Greek notitias add but one more, Mizzi, retaining all the other old names; which shows, that little alteration was made in this province for the space of eight ages in the church. The other Galatia had originally but four dioceses, Pissinus, Orcistus, Petenessus, and Trochmada, or Trochmi: but the number was doubled in after ages, as appears from the notitia at the end of this book, which adds, Eudoxias, Mericium, and Therma, or Germocolonia, and Justinianopolis, otherwise called Spalea. Now, Galatia was a large country, and the dioceses (even when these four last mentioned were added) were still of great extent. For Baudrand³⁶ observes that Pessinus was fifty miles from Ancyra, and thirty from Therma, by which we may guess at the distance of other places. Carolus a Sancto Paulo places Cinna pretty near Ancyra; but Baudrand removes it to the southern borders of Galatia, nearer Synada in Phrygia.³⁷ And Ferrarius computes Aspona to be sixty-four miles from Ancyra eastward. Berinopolis and Juliopolis seem to have been almost as much to the west. Which leaves room for the territory of Ancyra to be sufficiently large, though I find no particular account given of it, nor of some other places in these two provinces of Galatia.

Sect. 6.
Of Honorias. Next to Paphlagonia, on the sea-coast, lay the province of Honorias, or Pontus Honorii, so called by Theodosius the emperor in honour of his son Honorius. This was divided from Bithynia by the river Sangarius, and from Paphlagonia by the river Parthenius. Here were anciently five bishoprics, and the later notitias have but six, Claudiopolis, Heraclea, Prusias, Tium, Cratea, Adrianopolis, which last is not to be ²⁵ Justin. Novel. 28. in Præfat.

²⁶ Holsten. Annot. Geograph. p. 164.

²⁷ Append. Concil. Chalced. cap. 53. Conc. t. 4. p. 963.

²⁸ Plin. lib. 6. c. 4.

²⁹ Ibid. c. 2.

³⁰ Strabo, lib. 12. p. 517.

³¹ Ibid. p. 515.

³² Ibid. p. 561.

³³ Concil. Chalced. Act. 6.

³⁴ Basil. Ep. 73.

³⁵ Ferrar. voce Amastris.

³⁶ Baudrand. Lexic. voce Pessinus.

³⁷ Baudrand. voce Cinna.

met with in the subscriptions of any ancient council. Of these, Tium and Heraclea lay upon the Euxine Sea, thirty-eight miles distant from each other, as Pliny³⁸ informs us. Claudiopolis was at as great distance from them in the middle of the province; Baudrand³⁹ says it was above thirty miles from Heraclea. So that we may judge of Cratia, otherwise called Flaviopolis, and of Prusias, by what we have discovered of the former. All these cities are sometimes reckoned to Bithynia, because Honorias was anciently part of Bithynia, till Theodosius made a distinct province of it.

But after the separation was made, Sect. 7. Of Bithynia Prima and Secunda. Bithynia was again divided into two provinces. In the first of which Carolus a Sancto Paulo reckons fourteen dioceses. 1. Nicomedia, the metropolis. 2. Chalcedon. 3. Prusa ad Olympum. 4. Prænenum. 5. Helenopolis. 6. Basilinopolis. 7. Apollonias. 8. Hadriana. 9. Cæsarea, al. Smyrdiana. 10. Arista. 11. Patavium. 12. Dablis. 13. Neocæsarea. 14. Cius. In the other Bithynia only four. 1. Nicæa, where the famous council of Nice was held, the metropolis of this province. 2. Apamea. 3. Linoe. 4. Gordus. And the later notitia of Leo Sapiens makes but one more in both provinces, though some new names of places are inserted. Among these I observe the city of Nice had a large diocese: for several regions belonging to it are mentioned in the council of Chalcedon, in a famous dispute between the two metropolitans of Nicodemia and Nice, both laying claim to the diocese of Basilinopolis, as one of their suffragans. Anastasius, bishop of Nice, pleaded, that Basilinopolis⁴⁰ was once but a region belonging to Nice, as Tacteus and Doris then were, till Julian, or some other emperor, made it a city, setting up a curia or civil magistracy therein, upon which it became also a bishop's see, according to the known rule and practice of the church. So that the diocese of Nice was once so large, as to have another diocese taken out of it, and yet there remained several regions belonging to it. The like may be collected from its distance from other places. Pliny⁴¹ says, it was twenty-five miles from Prusa, and Ferrarius reckons forty-four miles from Nicodemia, but sets Helenopolis, or Drepanum, in the middle way between them.⁴² Basilinopolis, by mistake, is set by Carolus a Sancto Paulo at a greater distance from it, between Nicodemia and Chalcedon; but it must be nearer, having been once a part of its diocese, as was observed before. For other places, I find little account of them in particular, save only that Strabo makes it three hundred furlongs, or thirty-seven miles, from Nicodemia to the mouth of the river Sangarius, whereabout Cius stood; and Ferrarius computes sixty from Nicodemia to Chalcedon, in all which tract there were but these three dioceses, and one more, called Prænenum; so that if we had a particular account of Nicodemia and Chalcedon, we might perhaps find them to have had dioceses of as great extent as any other. But Apamea and Prusias, Baudrand⁴³ says, were but nine miles distant from one another. For these lay in the southern parts of Bithynia, and were some of the last in the Pontic civil diocese toward the Asiatic diocese, where, as I observed before, the cities were more numerous and thicker set together, and, consequently, the episcopal dioceses were generally less than in the other provinces, as will appear by taking a distinct view of them in order as they lay.

In the Asiatic diocese, the first province next adjoining to Bithynia was Sect. 8. Provinces in the Asiatic diocese. Hellespontus. Hellespontus, so called from the straits of the sea named Hellespont, which was its western border. It was anciently part of Mysia and Phrygia Minor, bordering on Phrygia Major eastward, and Asia to the south. In this province Carolus a Sancto Paulo has observed nineteen dioceses in the ancient councils. 1. Cyzicus, the metropolis. 2. Germa. 3. Pœmanium. 4. Occa. 5. Bares. 6. Adrianotheræ. 7. Lampsacus. 8. Abydus. 9. Dardanum. 10. Ilium. 11. Troas. 12. Melitopolis. 13. Adriana. 14. Scepsis. 15. Pionia. 16. Præconesus. 17. Ceramus. 18. Parium. 19. Thermæ Regiæ. But the last of them Holstenius thinks is mistaken for Germa, by a corrupt reading of the ancient subscriptions. The notitia of Leo Sapiens has but thirteen of these, so that five of them were sunk and united to others in the eighth century. The greatest distance, that I can find, of any of these cities, was not above twenty miles from one another. Which was the distance between Cyzicus and Parium, and Lampsacus and Abydus. But then, Dardanum was but seventy furlongs, or eight miles, from Abydus; Ilium but thirteen miles from Dardanum; Troas but twenty-seven miles from Abydus, though Pionia, Ilium, Bares, and Dardanum lay between them. So Præconesus was but a very small island, and Pœmanium a castle once belonging to the territory of Cyzicus, as Ferrarius has noted out of Strabo, Stephanus, and other ancient writers.

The two next provinces I join together, because we sometimes find Sect. 9. Asia Lydiana, or Proconsularis. them under the common name of Asia Lydiana, or Proconsularis, under which title Bishop Usher has a most accurate dissertation⁴⁴

³⁸ Plin. lib. 6. c. 1.

³⁹ Baudrand. voce Claudiopolis.

⁴⁰ Conc. Chalced. Act. 13. ap. Crab. p. 918. Sicut Tacteus et Doris regiones sunt sub Nicæa, sic fuit ante hoc Basilinopolis sub Nicæa, &c.

⁴¹ Plin. lib. 5. c. 32.

⁴² Ferrar. Lexic. voce Nicæa, et Drepanum.

⁴³ Baudrand. Lexic. voce Apamea.

⁴⁴ Usser. Disquisitio Geographica de Asia Lydiana sive Proconsulari.

upon them, where he distinguishes the several acceptations of the name Asia, either for the greater Asia, or Asia Minor, or Asia proprie dicta; which was the Romans' first conquests in Asia, containing the provinces of Phrygia, Mysia, Caria, and Lydia; or lastly, for Asia Lydiana or Proconsularis, which was those two provinces which in Constantine's division are called distinctly Asia and Lydia, as we here now take them. In this sense we may call the former, Asia maxime proprie dicta, which is bounded on the north by the province of Hellespontus, on the east by Phrygia and Lydia, on the south by the river Mæander, which separates it from Caria, and on the west by the Ægean Sea. In it Carolus a Sancto Paulo has found forty-two ancient dioceses. 1. Ephesus, the metropolis. 2. Hypæpa. 3. Trallis. 4. Magnesia ad Mæandrum. 5. Elæa. 6. Adramyttium. 7. Assus. 8. Gargara. 9. Mastaura. 10. Brullena, al. Priulla. 11. Pitane. 12. Myrina. 13. Aureliopolis. 14. Nyssa. 15. Metropolis. 16. Valentinianopolis. 17. Aninetum. 18. Pergamus. 19. Anæa. 20. Priene. 21. Arcadiopolis. 22. Nova Aula. 23. Ægea. 24. Andera. 25. Sion. 26. Fanum Jovis. 27. Colophon. 28. Lebedus. 29. Teos. 30. Erytræ. 31. Antandrus. 32. Peperè or Perpere. 33. Cuma or Cyme. 34. Aulium, al. Aulii Come vel Vicus. 35. Naulochus. 36. Palæopolis. 37. Phocæa. 38. Bargaza, al. Baretta. 39. Thymbria. 40. Clazomenæ. 41. Magnesia. 42. Smyrna. To these Holstenius adds four more, Evaza, Areopolis, Temnus, and Argiza. And thirty-eight of these are the same that are mentioned in the notitia of Leo Sapiens, in the seventh chapter of this book. Now, this was but a very small province for so many dioceses, if we examine either the whole extent of it, or some particular dioceses therein. The extent of it in length was from Assus near Troas, to the river Mæander, or the cities Bargasa and Sion. Which was anciently the country of Ionia, Æolis, and part of Mysia, about two hundred miles in length upon the Ægean Sea. But the breadth was nothing answerable to its length, being not above fifty miles, taking one part with another. As to particular distances of places, I find some of them thus noted by Ferrarius and Baudrand. Assus in the most northern border was fifteen miles from Gargara, and thirty from Antandrus; but Anæa and Andera lay between, or near unto them. From Antandrus to Adramyttium is also reckoned thirty miles, but then Tremenothyra in Phrygia, and Nova Aula in this province, come between them. On the same shore we find Naulochus and Pitane, and then Elea, Myrina, and Cyme, whereof Myrina was but seven or eight miles from Elea, and Cyme the same distance, sixty furlongs, from Myrina. Between Pergamus and Cyme is reckoned twenty-six miles, but the fore-mentioned cities Myrina and Elea, with Aminetum and Hierocæsarea, lay between them. On the south of Cyme lay Phocæa, ten miles from the mouth of the river Hermus, and about the same distance from Cyme. From Phocæa to Smyrna is computed twenty-five miles, and from Smyrna to Colophon, twenty miles, but Lebedus lay in the middle way between them. Colophon and Metropolis upon the Caystrus were each of them twenty miles from Ephesus, and Ephesus seems not to have had any nearer neighbour, unless it was Priene, towards the river Mæander, from whence we may conclude, that Ephesus was the largest diocese in all this province. And by these few hints we may judge of the general extent of them.

In the other province of Lydia, Carolus a Sancto Paulo reckons twenty-six dioceses. 1. Sardis, the metropolis. 2. Philadelphia. 3. Tripolis. 4. Thyatira. 5. Septe. 6. Gordus. 7. Trallis. 8. Silandus. 9. Mæonia. 10. Fanum Apollinis. 11. Mostena. 12. Apollonia. 13. Attalia. 14. Bana. 15. Balandus. 16. Hierocæsarea. 17. Acrassus. 18. Daldus. 19. Stratonicia. 20. Satala. 21. Gabala. 22. Heraclea. 23. Areopolis. 24. Helene. 25. Sena, al. Setta. 26. Civitas Standitana. To which Holstenius adds three more, Mastaura, Cerasa, and Orcanis, or Hircani, which Tristan and Carolus a Sancto Paulo both mistake for a city some where among the Hircanians, but Holstenius shows it belonged to Asia Minor and this province of Lydia. I will not stand to examine the particular bounds and extent of dioceses throughout this province; it being sufficient to observe in general, that both it and Asia put together were not larger than the provinces of Pontus Polemoniacus and Helenopontus; and yet there were not above ten or eleven dioceses in those two provinces, whereas we have discovered in these above seventy-five, which is almost the disproportion of eight to one, and fully makes out the observation I at first made of Asia Minor, that it had some of the greatest and some of the smallest dioceses, quietly enjoying the same form of government together.

The next province on the south of Asia and Lydia, is Caria, bounded on the east with Lycia, and on the south and west with the Ægean Sea, having the rivers Mæander and Calbis for its inland bounds. Here Carolus a Sancto Paulo has found twenty-five dioceses. 1. Aphrodisias, the metropolis. 2. Stauropolis. 3. Cybira. 4. Heraclea Salbaci. 5. Apollonias. 6. Heraclea Latmi. 7. Tabæ. 8. Antiochia ad Mæandrum. 9. Neapolis. 10. Orthosias. 11. Harpasa. 12. Alabanda. 13. Stratonice. 14. Alinda. 15. Amyzon. 16. Jassus. 17. Bargyla. 18. Halicarnassus. 19. Larima, al. Halarima. 20. Cnidus. 21. Myndus. 22. Ceramus. 23. Anastasiopolis. 24. Erisa. 25. Miletus. The notitia of Leo Sapiens increases the number to thirty-one.

Sect. 10.
Of Caria.

Miletus was the place whither St. Paul called the elders of Ephesus, which was about forty miles distant from it. But several dioceses lay between them, as Heraclea, near Mount Lathmus, which Ferrarius computes but twelve miles from Miletus; so also Briullium, Sion, and Arpasa in the same coast toward Ephesus. On the south of Miletus the other way, we have Jassus, fifteen miles from it, and Tabæ, placed between them. From Jassus to Halicarnassus is computed fifty-five miles, but Bargillia and Myndus stand between them. From Halicarnassus to Gnidus is thirty miles, but Ceramus is an intervening diocese. And so the reader may find all the dioceses of this province scarce exceeding the compass of ten or fifteen miles throughout. But this was territory sufficient to make them exceed single congregations, and we need not question but it was true of them all, what Sozomen (lib. 5. c. 20.) particularly observes of Miletus, that in the time of Julian it had several Christian oratories in its neighbourhood. For he says, Julian sent orders to the governor of Caria, That whereas there were several oratories or churches built in honour of the martyrs near the temple of Didymæum, (so the temple of Apollo was called, that stood before Miletus,) he should, if they were covered and had communion tables in them, burn them with fire; or, if they were half decayed of themselves, he should take care utterly to demolish and destroy them. There were, it seems, churches then in the suburbs or country region of Miletus, which Julian, remembering what had lately happened to the temple of Apollo at Daphne in the suburbs of Antioch, was so careful to have destroyed, because they were an annoyance to his god.

The next province to Caria on the sea-coast is Lycia, where Carolus a Sancto Paulo reckons twenty-eight dioceses. 1. Myra, the metropolis. 2. Mastaura. 3. Telmessus. 4. Limyra. 5. Araxa. 6. Podalæa. 7. Sidyra, al. Diduma. 8. Olympus. 9. Zenopolis. 10. Tlos. 11. Corydalla. 12. Caunus, al. Acaleia. 13. Acarassus. 14. Xanthus. 15. Marciana. 16. Choma. 17. Phellus. 18. Antiphellus. 19. Phaselis. 20. Aucanda. 21. Eudoxias. 22. Patara. 23. Nysa, vel Nesus. 24. Balbura. 25. Ceneanda. 26. Bubon, al. Bunum. 27. Calinda. 28. Rhodia. The notitia of Leo Sapiens has most of the same names, and eight more, for it makes the whole number of dioceses thirty-six. But the lesser number in so small a province is sufficient to show the narrow extent of its dioceses in comparison of those of the Pontic provinces. For this province was not above eighty or a hundred miles square, and the cities therefore, one may easily conclude, lay pretty close together. Phellus is reckoned but six miles from Antiphellus one way, and ten from Myra, the metropolis, another way. Antiphellus was nine from Patara, and Telmessus and Patara scarce so much from Xanthus; for Baudrand reckons but seventy furlongs. By which it is easy to make an estimate of the remaining cities of this province, which lay about equal distances from one another.

The next province on the same shore is Pamphylia, divided by the Romans into two, called Pamphylia Prima and Secunda. In the second of them, which bordered upon Lycia, Carolus a Sancto Paulo reckons twenty-six dioceses. 1. Perga, the metropolis. 2. Termessus. 3. Eudoxias. 4. Maximianopolis. 5. Palæopolis. 6. Pentenessus. 7. Diciozanabrus, al. Zenopolis. 8. Ariassus. 9. Pugla. 10. Adriana. 11. Attalia. 12. Magidis. 13. Olbia. 14. Corbasa. 15. Lysinia. 16. Cordylus. 17. Lagania. 18. Panemoticus. 19. Geone. 20. Commachum. 21. Silvium. 22. Pisinda, al. Sinda vel Isinda. 23. Talbonda. 24. Unzela. 25. Gilsata. 26. Pella. To which Holstenius adds five more, Colobrassus, Coracesium, Senna, Primopolis, and Seleucia. But three of these are by Carolus a Sancto Paulo set in the other Pamphylia, with nine more, in this order: 1. Sida, the metropolis. 2. Aspendus. 3. Etene. 4. Erymne. 5. Cassus. 6. Semneam, which is the same with Senna before mentioned. 7. Carallus. 8. Coracesium, mentioned before. 9. Sysdra. 10. Lyrbæ. 11. Colibrassus. 12. Selga. To which Holstenius adds Cotana, which makes the whole number in these two provinces forty-one. And the number is some evidence that they were comparatively but small. Sometimes, as Holstenius has observed, two of them were united together. For in the council of Constantinople, under Flavian, one Sabinianus subscribes himself bishop of Eudocias, Termessus, and Jobia.⁴⁵ Which we find in the first session of the council of Chalcedon. And in the time of Leo Sapiens some more of them were united together; for his notitia has but thirty-six dioceses in both the provinces. Yet any of them single were of a competent extent to confute the notion of those who make episcopal dioceses only parish churches.

On the north of Pamphylia, more within land, lay the province of Lycaonia, where we find nineteen dioceses. 1. Iconium, the metropolis. 2. Lystra. 3. Derbe: all mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles. 4. Onosada, al. Usada. 5. Amblada. 6. Honomada. 7. Laramanda. 8. Baratta. 9. Hyda. 10. Sabatra. 11. Canna. 12. Berinopolis. 13. Ilistra. 14. Perte. 15. Arana, al. Baratta. 16. Isaura. 17. Mithium. 18. Corna. 19. Pappa. To which Holste-

Sect. 11.
Of Lycia.

Sect. 12.
Of Pamphylia Prima and Secunda.

Sect. 13.
Of Lycaonia.

⁴⁵ Conc. Chalced. Act. I. t. 4. p. 230.

nius adds another, called Hydmautus, or Gadamautus, in the Acts of the Council of Chalcedon. But the notitia of Leo Sapiens has but fifteen.

Sect. 14.
Of Pisidia.

In the next province of Pisidia, Carolus a Sancto Paulo finds twenty dioceses. 1. Antiochia, the metropolis. 2. Sagalassus. 3. Sozopolis. 4. Apamea. 5. Tityassus. 6. Baris. 7. Adrianopolis. 8. Limenopolis. 9. Laodicea Combusta. 10. Seleucia. 11. Adada. 12. Mallus. 13. Siniandus. 14. Metropolis. 15. Paralauus. 16. Bindeum. 17. Philomelium, which some place in Phrygia. 18. Prostama. 19. Gortena. 20. Theodosiopolis. The notitia of Leo Sapiens augments the number to twenty-three. I stand not to make any particular remarks upon these dioceses, because any reader that knows these two provinces, will easily imagine they are not to be compared with the other dioceses in the northern parts of Pontus.

The last provinces in the Asiatic diocese, are those which the old Greeks and Romans called by one common name, Phrygia Major, but the Roman emperors divided it at first into two, and then into three provinces, one called Phrygia Salutaris, from the medicinal waters found there, another Phrygia Pacatiana, or, as some books read it corruptly, Capatiana, and a third, Pacatiana Secunda. In Phrygia Salutaris, Carolus a Sancto Paulo reckons up twenty dioceses. 1. Synnada, the metropolis. 2. Dorylæum. 3. Polybotus. 4. Nacolia. 5. Midaium. 6. Hipsus. 7. Prymnestia. 8. Myrum, or rather Merum. 9. Eucarpia. 10. Lysias. 11. Augustopolis. 12. Brysum. 13. Otrum. 14. Spectorium. 15. Cinnaborium. 16. Amadassa. 17. Cotyaium. 18. Præpenissus. 19. Docimæum. 20. Amorium.

In Phrygia Pacatiana Prima he recounts twenty-nine. 1. Laodicea, the metropolis. 2. Tiberiopolis. 3. Azana. 4. Itoana, or Bitoana. 5. Ancyra Ferrea, which Holstenius observes to be sometimes attributed to the province of Lydia adjoining. 6. Cidissus. 7. Egara, which Holstenius corrects into Aliana. 8. Pelte. 9. Apira. 10. Cadi. 11. Tra-nopolis vel Trajanopolis. 12. Sebasta. 13. Eumenia. 14. Temenothyrae. 15. Aliona. 16. Trapezopolis. 17. Silbium. 18. Ilusa. 19. Nea. 20. Chæretapa. 21. Colossa, now called Chone. 22. Sinaus. 23. Philippopolis. 24. Themisionium. 25. Sanis. 26. Aemonia. 27. Theodosiopolis. 28. Bleandrus. 29. Atanassus. Holstenius strikes out one of the number, for Nea is but a corruption of the Greek for Sanæa or Sanans, as he shows, but he finds out another, called Dioclia, to supply its room.

In Pacatiana Secunda there were but five dioceses, being by much the least of all the provinces. 1. Hierapolis, the metropolis. 2. Dionysiopolis. 3. Anastasiopolis. 4. Mosynus. 5. Attudi. But this province being of later erection, these dioceses are more commonly attributed to Phrygia Pacatiana without any distinction. Now, I observe of Phrygia in general, that some of its dioceses bordering upon Galatia were, like those of Galatia and the other Pontic provinces, of a larger extent than the rest about Hierapolis and Laodicea, which two metropolitan sees were not at a very great distance from one another. Ferrarius in one place says, but six miles; but it seems to be a typographical error, for in another place he makes Colossæ⁴⁶ to be between Hierapolis and Laodicea, upon the confluence of the rivers Lycus and Mæander, at twenty miles' distance from them both. So that there must be a mistake one way or other. Pliny is very exact in describing the situation of Laodicea,⁴⁷ for he says, it stood upon the Lycus, and had its walls washed also with the Asopus and the Caprus: but yet he does not tell us how far the confluence of these rivers was from the confluence of the Lycus with the Mæander, where Colossæ stood. But it may be concluded, it was at no great distance from it, since all authors agree, that Laodicea stood near the Mæander; and these three cities, Colossæ, Hierapolis, and Laodicea, which St. Paul joins together, are said by Chrysostom, Theodoret, and others, to be very near each other. They who have opportunity to consult Antonine's Itinerary, which at present I have not, may perhaps find them more exactly described, and limited with more certain bounds than I can pretend to assign them. If the first opinion of Ferrarius be true, and agreeable to Antonine, that they lay but six miles asunder; then it will readily be concluded, that the dioceses in this part of Phrygia were comparatively very small, since by Carolus a Sancto Paulo's description, Itoana, Trapezopolis, Attudi, Mosynus, and Antioch upon the Mæander in Caria, seem not to have been at much greater distances from one another.

Beside these several provinces of the Asiatic and Pontic dioceses in Asia Minor, there were also three provinces in it which were reckoned to the eastern diocese and the patriarchate of Antioch, viz. Isauria, Cilicia Prima, and Cilicia Secunda, which must be spoken of in this place. Isauria was anciently reckoned only a part of Cilicia, but from the time of Constantine, both in the civil and ecclesiastical account, it was esteemed a distinct province. Carolus a Sancto Paulo mentions twenty-two dioceses. 1. Seleucia, the metropolis. 2. Celenderis. 3. Anemurium. 4. Lamus. 5. Antiochia ad Tragum.

Sect. 16.
Of Isauria and Cilicia.

⁴⁶ Ferrar. Lexic. voce Colossæ.

⁴⁷ Plin. lib. 5. c. 29. Celeberrima urbs Laodicea im-posita est Lyco flumini, latera alluentibus Asopo et Capro.

6. Selinus, al. Trajanopolis. 7. Jotape. 8. Diocæsarea. 9. Philadelphia. 10. Domitiopolis. 11. Titopolis. 12. Hierapolis. 13. Nephelis. 14. Dalisandus. 15. Claudiopolis, al. Isaura. 16. Germanicopolis. 17. Sbide, al. Isis. 18. Cestrus. 19. Olbus. 20. Lybias. 21. Hermopolis. 22. Irenopolis. To which Holstenius adds two more, Charadra and Lauzada, which is sometimes written corruptly, Vasada and Nauzada.

In Cilicia Prima there were eight dioceses. 1. Tarsus, the metropolis. 2. Pompeiopolis. 3. Sebaste. 4. Coricus. 5. Adana. 6. Mallus. 7. Zephyrium. And, 8. Augusta, added by Holstenius, who shows it to be a distinct place from Sebaste.

In the other Cilicia there are reckoned nine. 1. Anazarbus, the metropolis. 2. Mopsuestia. 3. Ægæ. 4. Epiphania. 5. Irenopolis. 6. Flaviopolis. 7. Castabala. 8. Alexandria, now called Scanderon. 9. Rossus, in the confines of Syria. The greatest part of these were large dioceses, like those of Syria, as any one that computes the distance between Epiphania, Alexandria, Rossus, &c. will easily imagine.

Some reckon Lazica, which was Sect. 17. Of Lazica, or Colchis. anciently called Colchis, an appendix to Asia Minor, and therefore I mention it in this place. It is all the country on the Euxine Sea from Trabezond in Pontus to Phasis, which Strabo reckons near 200 miles. The modern notitias speak but of five dioceses, but that of Leo Sapiens in Leunclavius has fifteen. It was first made a Roman province in the time of Justinian, who mentions the cities⁴⁸ that were in it, Petra and Justiniana; with four castles, Pitius, Sebastopolis, Archæopolis and Rhodopolis, which had anciently been in the hands of the Romans; and four other castles, Scandias, Sarapenes, Murisios, and Lusieros, which he had lately taken out of the hands of the Persians. Of these one is as ancient as the council of Nice: for Stratophilus, bishop of Ptyusium, or Pitius, subscribes there among the bishops of Pontus Polemoniacus, to which province it was then annexed, as lying in Solo Barbarico, and not constituting any other province. In the sixth general council there is mention of Petra and Phasis, the metropolis. And that is all the account we have of them in the ancient councils.

Another appendix to Asia Minor Sect. 18. Of the isle of Lesbos and the Cyclades. are the lesser islands of the Ægean Sea, which constituted a province by themselves. Carolus a Sancto Paulo reckons four dioceses in Lesbos itself, Mytelene, Methymna, Tenedos, and Poroselene. But Poroselene and Tenedos were distinct islands by themselves, which sometimes had bishops of their own, and sometimes were united to Lesbos. In the council of Sardica, Dioscorus subscribes himself bishop of the isle of Tenedos alone: but in the second council of Ephesus, and in the council of Chalcedon, Florentius subscribes himself bishop of Lesbos and Tenedos together. Now as we must say, that Tenedos was but a small diocese by itself; for it was but 10 miles in compass, as Ferrarius computes; so when Lesbos was joined with it, it was a large one. For Pliny says, Lesbos alone had nine famous towns, and Strabo makes it 1100 stadia, or 140 miles in compass.

The other islands, called Cyclades, were divided into eleven distinct dioceses. 1. Rhodus, the metropolis. 2. Samos. 3. Chios. 4. Coos. 5. Naxus. 6. Paros. 7. Thera. 8. Delos. 9. Tenus. 10. Melos. 11. Carpathus. Now the largest of these, Rhodes, Samos, and Chios, were about 100 or 120 miles in compass, as Pliny informs us.⁴⁹ But the lesser sort of them, Tenos and Thera, were not above 14 or 15 miles long, or 40 in compass. So that among these we find dioceses of different extent, as in the rest of Asia, but all agreeing in the same species of episcopal government; and some of them, as Lesbos, having their chorepiscopi, but none so small as to be confined to a single congregation.

And so we have gone over all the provinces of the East under the civil government of the prefectus-pretorio Orientis, except the six provinces of the Thracian diocese, which because they are European provinces, we will consider them as such among the provinces of Europe, and give them the first place in the following chapter.

CHAPTER IV.

A CONTINUATION OF THE FORMER ACCOUNT IN THE EUROPEAN PROVINCES.

IN pursuance of the former inquiry, we are led out of Asia Minor into the Sect. 1. Of the six provinces of Thrace, And first of Scythia. provinces of Europe, where the six provinces of the Thracian diocese, Europa, Thracia, Hæmimontis, Rhodope, Mæsia Secunda, and Scythia, first offer themselves to consideration. This was all the country from Macedonia and the river Strymon to the Danube, which is now Romania and Bulgaria. A country extending from Constanti-nople to Sardica above 300 miles one way, and from the Ægean Sea to the Danube almost as much the other. In all these provinces the dioceses were very large. For in Scythia, the most northern province, there was but one bishopric, though there were many cities. For the bishop of Tomi was the sole bishop of this whole region, as is noted by Sozomen,¹ and Theodoret,² and other ancient writers, by whom he is sometimes called the bishop of Tomi, and sometimes the bishop of Scythia, as being the only superintendent of all the churches in that Scythia, which was made a province of the Roman empire.

⁴⁸ Justin. Novel. 28.

⁴⁹ Plin. lib. 5. c. 31.

The province of Europa had also large dioceses. For several cities were under one bishop. We find in the Acts of the Council of Ephesus³ a petition offered to that council by the bishops of this province, wherein they pray, That an immemorial custom of their country might be continued, whereby the bishop of Heraclea had also Panium in his diocese, the bishop of Bizya had Arcadiopolis, the bishop of Cœle had Callipolis, the bishop of Subsadia had Aphrodisias: to which petition the council agreed, and ordered, that no innovation should be made in the matter. Nor was there any alteration in the time of the council of Chalcedon: for there we find one Lucian⁴ styled bishop of Bizya and Arcadiopolis still. But in the council of Constantinople under Mennas⁵ we meet with some alterations; for there Panium had a distinct bishop from Heraclea, and Callipolis from Cœle. And in the notitia of Leo Sapiens in Leuclavius, Bizya and Arcadiopolis are not only distinct bishoprics, but both of them advanced to the honour of autocephali, or titular metropolitans in the church. In this province stood also Byzantium, once subject to Heraclea, the metropolis, till it was rebuilt, and advanced to be the royal city by Constantine, after which it grew so great and populous, as to equal old Rome. Sozomen says,⁶ Constantine adorned it with many noble oratories; and it appears from one of Justinian's Novels,⁷ that in his time four of these churches had no less than five hundred clergy of all sorts belonging to them. The Novatians themselves, as Socrates observes,⁸ had three churches within the city: and in the suburbs, or region belonging to the city, the catholics had many parishes and churches at a considerable distance, as Hebdomum, Sycæ, Marianæ, Hieron, Elæa, Therapea, and Hestîæ, otherwise called Michaelium, which Sozomen says⁹ was thirty-five furlongs from the city by water, and seventy by land. I think it needless to be more particular in the description of this diocese, since these are sufficient indications of the largeness of it. I shall only add concerning this province of Europa, that though Carolus a Sancto Paulo reckons thirteen dioceses in it, Heraclea, Panium, Cælos, Callipolis, Cyla, Aphrodisias, Theodosiopolis, Chersonesus, Drusipara, Lysimachia, Bizya, Selymbria, and Arcadiopolis; yet really there were but nine: for Cælos and Cyla, as Holstenius has observed,¹⁰ were two names for the same city, and Callipolis was joined in the same diocese with it; in like manner as Panium was annexed to Heraclea, and Arcadiopolis to Bizya. So that these were anciently dioceses of great extent.

In the province of Thracia properly so called there were but four dioceses, Philippopolis, Diocletianopolis, Nicopolis, and Diopolis. And the modern notitias, that of Leuclavius only excepted, have but three: for Nicopolis is not mentioned in them.

In the province of Hæmimontis there were anciently six dioceses, Adrianopolis, Mesembria, Sozopolis, Plutinopolis, Develtus, and Anchialus. The latter notitias reckon but the four first, and Zoida instead of the two last, which are omitted, as being sunk or united into one.

In the province of Rhodope Carolus a Sancto Paulo finds six dioceses, Trajanopolis, Maximianopolis, Abdera, Maronia, Ænus, and Cypsela. To which Holstenius adds, Topirus, which the other by mistake places in Macedonia. But these were so far from increasing in later ages, that they sunk into three, Trajanopole, Anastasiopole, and Perus, which are all that the modern notitias mention.

In Mœsia Inferior, or Secunda, the last of the six Thracian provinces, which is now much the same with Bulgaria, Carolus a Sancto Paulo reckons nine dioceses, Marcianopolis, Nicopolis, Novæ, Abritum, Durostorum, Dionysiopolis, Odessus, Apiaria, Comæa; to which Holstenius adds another, called Trista, or Prista, by Socrates, and Nicephorus Calistus σεξαντάπριστα. But whether increased or diminished, we know not, for there is no account of them in the notitias of later ages. I make no further remark upon these dioceses, save that they were generally large ones, as any one that will cast his eye upon a map, or examine particular distances of cities, will easily be convinced. And we may make the same general observation upon most of the dioceses of the European provinces in Macedonia, Dacia, and Illyricum; till we come as far as Italy. For which reason, it will be sufficient to give the reader only a catalogue of the names of dioceses in every province of those regions, according to the order and distribution of them in the church, following the model of the civil government, which divided these countries into three great dioceses, and seventeen or eighteen provinces, under ¹ Sozom. lib. 6. c. 21. lib. 7. c. 19.

² Theodor. lib. 4. c. 35. ³ Concil. Ephes. par. 2. Act. 7.

⁴ Concil. Chalced. Act. 16. t. 4. p. 800.

⁵ Concil. sub Men. Act. 3 et 4.

⁶ Sozom. lib. 2. c. 3.

⁷ Justin. Novel. 3.

⁸ Socrat. lib. 2. c. 38.

⁹ Sozom. lib. 2. c. 3.

¹⁰ Holsten. Annot. Geograph. p. 131.

the general name of Illyricum Orientale and Occidentale.

The first of these are the provinces of Greece, which by the Romans are all comprehended under one common name, of the civil dioceses of Macedonia, which with the diocese of Dacia was anciently the district of the præfectus-prætorio Illirici Orientalis. In the diocese of Macedonia were anciently six provinces, or according to Hierocles's account, seven: Macedonia Prima and Secunda, Epirus Vetus and Epirus Nova, Thessalia, Achaia, and the isle of Crete. Carolus a Sancto Paulo confounds the two Macedonias together, and reckons seventeen dioceses in both. 1. Thessalonica, the metropolis of the first Macedonia. 2. Philippi, the metropolis of the second. 3. Stobi, the old metropolis of the second province. 4. Berrhœa. 5. Dium. 6. Particopolis. 7. Doberus. 8. Cassandria. 9. Neapolis. 10. Heraclea Pelagoniæ. 11. Torone. 12. Lete. 13. Topiris. 14. Serre. 15. Heraclea Strymonis. 16. Isle of Thassus. 17. Hephæstia in the isle of Lemnos. To which Holstenius¹¹ adds Primula and Zapara, but rejects Topiris, as belonging to Rhodope, a province in the Thracian diocese, and observes of Serre, that it was but another name for Philippi.

The next province upon the Ægean Sea is Thessalia, where Carolus a Sancto Paulo finds but eight dioceses: Larissa the metropolis, Demetrias, Echinus, Cypera, Metropolis, Lamia, Tricœa, and Thebæ Pthioticæ. But Holstenius¹² adds three more, Dicæærea, Gomphi, and Scarphia, the last of which Carolus a Sancto Paulo confounds with Echinus. The notitia in Leunclavius calls this province Hellas Secunda, and names eleven dioceses in it, four of which retain their old names, by which it is reasonable to conjecture, that Hellas Secunda and Thessalia were but two names for the same province; and the number of dioceses agreeing exactly in both accounts, we may conclude there never were above eleven dioceses in all this province.

The next province to Thessaly is Achaia, which was a very large province, including not only what the ancients called Attica and Achaia, but also all Peloponnesus, and the isle of Eubœa. Here Carolus a Sancto Paulo finds twenty-six dioceses, four of which were in the isle of Eubœa. 1. Chaleis, now called Negroponte. 2. Oreum. 3. Porthmus. 4. Caristus. Nine in Peloponnesus. 1. Corinthus, the metropolis of the whole province. 2. Argos. 3. Tegea. 4. Megalopolis. 5. Lacedæmon. 6. Messena. 7. Corone. 8. Petræ. 9. Helice. Thirteen in the other part of Achaia. 1. Athenæ. 2.

Megara. 3. Thespiæ. 4. Naupactus. 5. Securus. 6. Elatea. 7. Opus. 8. Strategis. 9. Thebæ. 10. Platea. 11. Tanagra. 12. Marathon. 13. Carsia, al. Corissia. Holstenius adds another Corone, or Coronis, in Bœotia, beside the Corone that was in Peloponnesus. The notitia of Leo Sapiens, in Leunclavius and the seventh chapter of this Book, makes three provinces of this, calling them Hellas Prima, and Peloponnesus Prima and Secunda, and the number of dioceses is pretty near the same, by which we may guess no great alteration was made in them for several ages. The largeness of these dioceses may easily be concluded from the greatness of many of the cities and their large territories, which the reader may find already demonstrated by Dr. Maurice, in his discourse of Diocesan Episcopacy, p. 380, concerning Thebes, Athens, Lacedæmon, Megalopolis, and other cities of this province in particular.

The next region is Epirus, separated from Achaia by the river Achelous. This was anciently one kingdom, but the Romans divided it into two provinces, Epirus Vetus and Epirus Nova. In the former Carolus a Sancto Paulo reckons ten dioceses. 1. Nicopolis, the metropolis. 2. Anchiasmus. 3. Phœnicia. 4. Dodone. 5. Adrianopolis. 6. Buthrotum. 7. Euria. 8. Photica. 9. Isle of Cephalenia. 10. Isle of Corcyra. In the new Epirus, only eight. 1. Dyrrachium, or Doracium, the metropolis. 2. Scampes. 3. Apollonia. 4. Aulon. 5. Amantia. 6. Lychnidus. 7. Bullidum, or Bulis. 8. Prina, or Prisna. To which Holstenius adds Listra, or Helistra, but with some doubting, whether it do not rather belong to Lycaonia. These were very large dioceses, above forty or fifty miles long; notwithstanding which, two of them were sometimes united together: for in the Acts of the Council of Ephesus, as Holstenius has observed, one Felix is called¹³ bishop of Bulis and Apollonia together. In the Greek notitia of Leo Sapiens, old Epirus goes by the name of Ætolia, and has the same number of ten dioceses only, though not the same names. The other Epirus has sixteen, but then the province of Prævalitana is joined to it, and most of its dioceses taken in to make up the number. Whence I conclude, that the dioceses in these provinces have been of great extent in all ages; the isle of Corcyra itself being reckoned by some geographers forty-five miles long, and by Pliny¹⁴ no less than ninety-seven.

In the isle of Crete, which was the last of the Macedonian provinces, Carolus a Sancto Paulo names eleven dioceses. 1. Gortyna, the metropolis. 2. Gnossus. 3. Hierapetra. 4. Lappa. 5. Subrita. 6. Eleuthera. 7. Cherronesus. 8. Cydonia. 9. Cysamus. 10. Ci-

Sect. 7.
Provinces in the civil diocese of Macedonia. Episcopal dioceses in Macedonia Prima and Secunda.

Sect. 8.
Of Thessalia.

Sect. 9.
Of Achaia, Peloponnesus, and Eubœa.

Sect. 11
Of the isle of Crete.

¹¹ Holsten. Annot. Geograph. p. 114. ¹² Ibid. p. 115.

¹³ Conc. Ephes. Act. 1. ¹⁴ Plin. lib. 4. c. 12.

tium. 11. Cantanum. The notitia of Leo Sapiens in Leunclavius makes them twelve, but Hierapetra is there by mistake of some transcriber divided into two, which being corrected reduces them to the same number. Whence I conclude, this was pretty near the standing number for several ages. Now, Crete is reckoned by Ferrarius and others out of Pliny and Strabo, two hundred and seventy or three hundred miles long, and fifty broad. Which makes these twelve dioceses equal to the rest of the Macedonian provinces, all which appear visibly to be dioceses of great extent, without descending any further to give a more particular account of them.

The other civil diocese of Illyricum Orientale went by the common name of Dacia, consisting of five provinces, Prævalitana, Mæsia Superior, Dacia Mediterranea, Dacia Ripensis, and Dardania. Prævalitana lies on the north of Epirus to the Adriatic Sea, being part of that country which is now called Albania. Carolus a Sancto Paulo names but two dioceses in it, Scodra, the old metropolis of the province, and Achrida, which was anciently called Prævalis, but afterwards Justinian honoured it with his own name, Justiniana Prima, and advanced it to patriarchal dignity, assigning it all the five provinces¹⁵ of the Dacian diocese, and the two Pannonias in the diocese of Illyricum Occidentale, for the limits of its jurisdiction. Besides these two bishoprics, Holstenius has found out two more in this province, Rhizinium and Lissus, now called Alessio, on the Adriatic Sea; Carolus a Sancto Paulo also by mistake places Scodra in the province of Dalmatia, making Justiniana Prima a metropolitan see, without any suffragans under it.

On the north of Prævalitana to the Danube lay Mæsia Superior, between Pannonia on the west and Dacia on the east. Carolus a Sancto Paulo confounds the episcopal dioceses of this province and the Dacias together, making Sardica the metropolis of them all, and calling them from that by the common name of Provincia Sardicensis; and, beside Sardica, he finds but three more dioceses in the three provinces, Remessiana, Aquæ, and Castrum Martis. But Holstenius is a little more accurate, and treats distinctly of them. He assigns to Mæsia Superior, Castrum Martis, and another called Margus, seated on the confluence of the river Margus and the Danube.

To Dacia Mediterranea he assigns Sardica, the metropolis, and Romantiana and Naissus, which he and Pagi make to be the birth-place of Constantine the Great. In the other Dacia, called Ripensis, from its running along the banks of the Danube between Mæsia Prima and Secunda, he places Aquæ, which is mentioned in the council of Sardica, in St. Hilary's Fragments, and Iscus, or Iscopolis, another city, whose bishop subscribed out of the same province in the foresaid council. In his Annotations also upon Ortelius,¹⁶ he observes two other episcopal cities in this province, one called Martis by Hierocles, or Stramartis by Procopius, and another called Budine, now Bodine, in Bulgaria, upon the Danube: but perhaps these are both modern sees, for he cites no other authority but that of the notitias for them, and Stramartis seems to be a corruption of Castra Martis.

On the south of Dacia, between it and Macedonia, was the province of Sect. 15. Of Dardania and Gothia. Dardania, divided from Macedonia by Mount Scardus, and from Thracia by part of Mount Hæmus. It is now part of Servia, and was anciently a part of Mæsia, as Dacia also was, till the Daci, passing over the Danube, got themselves planted in the middle of Mæsia, which, from that time, was called Dacia Nova, as the other beyond the Danube was called Dacia Antiqua, and Gothia. In this province of Dardania, Carolus a Sancto Paulo finds four dioceses. 1. Scupi, the metropolis. 2. Ulpianum, otherwise called Justiniana Secunda. 3. Diocletiana, which, at the time of the council of Sardica, was reckoned a city of Macedonia. 4. Nesyssa, or Nessus. Holstenius adds another, called Pautalia, which Hierocles, in his notitia, reckons among the cities of Dacia Mediterranea, and Stephanus and Ptolemy among the cities of Thracia, as lying in the confines of those provinces. Besides these five provinces of the Dacian diocese, on the south side of the Danube, there was another on the north side out of the bounds of the Roman empire, called Dacia Antiqua, and Gothia, from the time that the Goths seated themselves in it. Epiphanius speaks of one Silvanus, bishop of Gothia beyond Scythia, taking Scythia for the Roman Scythia on this side the Danube, whereof Tomi was the metropolis. Whence Holstenius rightly concludes, that Gothia was that region which is now called Transylvania, or Wallachia. But what episcopal sees they had, or whether they had in all this region any more than one bishop, as the Scythians, and Saracens, and some other such barbarous nations, is uncertain. Carolus a Sancto Paulo thinks Zarmizegethusa was the seat of their bishop, because Ptolemy makes it the royal seat and metropolis of the kingdom. And this he supposes to be the same with Gothia, mentioned in the notitia of Leo Sapiens, among the autocephali, or such bishops as had no suffragans under them. But these being matters involved in obscurity, I leave them to further inquiry.

¹⁵ Justin. Novel. 131. c. 3.

¹⁶ Holsten. Annot. in Ortel. p. 116.

Sect. 16.
Of the six provinces in the diocese of Illyricum Occidentale. Of Dalmatia.

Out of Illyricum Orientale we pass next into the civil diocese of Illyricum Occidentale, which was under the government of the praefectus-praetorio of Italy. In this diocese were six provinces, Dalmatia, Savia, Pannonia Superior, Pannonia Inferior, Noricum Mediterraneum, and Noricum Ripense. In Dalmatia Carolus a Sancto Paulo reckons four episcopal dioceses. 1. Salona, the metropolis. 2. Jadera, now called Zara. 3. Epidaurus, now Ragusa. 4. Scodra, or Scutari. But Scodra is wrong placed in Dalmatia, for, as has been noted before, it was rather the metropolis of Prævalitana. But Holstenius adds two more in the room of it, Doclea and Senia, now called Segna, a city upon the Liburnian shore.

Sect. 17.
Of Savia.

The next province to this was Savia, which seems to be so named from the river Savus running through the middle of it. It is sometimes called Pannonia Sava, being part of Pannonia on the Savia, and sometimes Pannonia Sirmiensis and Cibaliensis, from the cities Sirmium and Cibalis, which lay in this part of it. But here we consider it as a distinct province from Pannonia, from which it was separated by the river Dravus, and is what we now call Slavonia, and part of Bosnia and Servia. In this province were six episcopal dioceses. 1. Sirmium, the metropolis, near the confluence of the Savus and the Danube. 2. Singidunum. 3. Mursa, now called Essek. 4. Cibalis. 5. Noviodunum. 6. Siscia.

Sect. 18.
Of Pannonia Superior and Inferior.

Between the river Dravus and the Danube lay the two Pannonias, Superior and Inferior, which are now the southern part of Hungary. In the former of these Carolus a Sancto Paulo out of Lazius speaks of four dioceses: Vindobona or Vienna, Sabaria, Scarabantia, and Celia. To which Holstenius adds Petavia, now called Petow, which the other confounds with Patavia, or Batavia Castra, in Noricum, now called Passaw in Bavaria. Victorinus Martyr was bishop of this city, though Baronius and many others commonly style him Pictaviensem, as if he had been bishop of Poitiers in France; whereas he was bishop of this city in Pannonia Prima, called Petavia, or Petow, as is observed by Spondanus, and Pagi, and Du Pin, in their critical remarks upon the Life of that ancient writer. In the lower Pannonia there were but three dioceses, Curta, Carpis, and Stridonium, the birth-place of St. Jerom.

Sect. 19.
Of Noricum Mediterraneum and Ripense.

More westward from Pannonia was the province of Noricum, confined on the north with the Danube, and on the south and west with Venetia and Rhætia, two Italic provinces. This the Romans divided into two, Noricum Mediterraneum and Ripense, in both which Lazius mentions but four dioceses, Laureacum, now called Lork, Juvavia or Saltsburg, Ovilibis, and Solva. Carolus a Sancto Paulo by mistake adds a fifth, Petavio, Petow; but that, as was said before, belongs to another province. And the rest were not erected till the sixth century, when that part of Germany was first converted, which is now Carniola and Carinthia, with part of Bavaria, Stiria, Tirol, and Austria. By which it is easy to judge of what vast extent those dioceses anciently were, as they are now at this day; two of them, as I observed, being as large as ten or twenty in some other parts of the world, particularly in Palestine and Asia Minor, which have been already considered; and the observation will be more fully verified by taking a particular view of Italy, whose episcopal dioceses come now in order in the next place to be considered.

CHAPTER V.

A PARTICULAR ACCOUNT OF THE DIOCESES OF ITALY.

ITALY, in the sense we are now to speak of it, as it was taken for the whole jurisdiction of the praefectus urbis et vicarius Italiae under the Roman emperors, was of somewhat larger extent than now it is: for not only the islands of Sicily, Sardinia, and Corsica were taken into the account, but also Rhætia Secunda, which is that part of Germany that lies from the Alps to the Danube. In this extent it was divided into two large civil dioceses, containing seventeen provinces of the Roman empire, as has been showed before;¹ and in these provinces there were about three hundred episcopal dioceses, the names of which are still remaining, but the places themselves many of them demolished or sunk into villages, and other new bishoprics set up in their room. I shall not concern myself with the number or extent of the modern dioceses, but only those that were ancient, and erected within the first six hundred years; of which I am to make the same observation in general, as I have done upon those of Palestine and Asia Minor, that here were some of the largest and some of the smallest dioceses, for extent of ground, of any in the world, and yet the same species of episcopacy retained in all without any variety or distinction. The dioceses of the suburbicary provinces that lay next to Rome were generally small, in comparison of those that lay further to the north and west in the Italic provinces. For about Rome the country was extremely populous, and cities much thicker spread, which occasioned so many more episcopal sees to be erected in those provinces above the other. This will plainly appear by taking a view of each particular province, and comparing the dioceses one with another: of which we shall be able to give a more exact account, because so much pains has been taken by learned men in all ages, especially Cluver and Holstenius, Ferrarius and Baudrand, in the last age, to describe minutely and exactly the several places of this country, and their distance from Rome and one another. To begin with Rome itself: this was a very large diocese in one respect, and very small in another. In respect of the city itself, and the number of people that were therein, it might be called one of the greatest dioceses in the world. For Pliny² speaks of it as the most populous city in the universe, in the time of Vespasian, when it was but thirteen miles about. But Lipsius,³ in his book de Magnitudine Romana, and Mr. Mede,⁴ and some others think, that is meant only of the city within the walls; for otherwise it was but forty-two miles in compass when St. John wrote his Revelation, in the time of Domitian. And afterward it received considerable additions; for in the days of Aurelian, the historian⁵ speaks of it as no less than fifty miles in circumference. And before this time the Christians made a considerable figure in it: for Cornelius, who lived in the middle of the third century, speaks of forty-six presbyters,⁶ beside deacons, sub-deacons, and other inferior clergy, belonging to the church in his time. And within half an age more we find an account of above forty churches in it. For so many Optatus⁷ says there were, when Victor Garbiensis, the Donatist bishop, was sent from Africa to be the anti-bishop there: though there were forty churches and more in the city, yet he could not obtain one of them, to make his handful of sectaries look like a Christian congregation. This, as Baronius and Valesius have rightly observed, was spoken by Optatus not of his own times, but of the time when Victor Garbiensis came to Rome, which was in the beginning of the Diocletian persecution. Whence it may be rationally inferred, that if there were above forty churches in Rome before the last persecution, there would be abundance more in the following ages, when the whole city was become Christian. But as by the vast increase of this city the diocese was very large within, so for the same reason it became very small without. For that which was at first the territory of Rome, seems afterward to have been swallowed up in the city itself by the prodigious increase of it. Inasmuch that some have thought, that in the time of Innocent I. the diocese of Rome had no country parishes belonging to it, but that they were all within the city; because in his epistle to Decentius, bishop of Eugubium,⁸ he seems to make this difference between other dioceses and that of Rome, that in the Roman diocese the custom was to send the sacrament from the mother-church to the presbyters officiating in other churches, because all their churches lay within the city; but this was not proper to be done in other places, which had country parishes,⁹ because the sacraments were not to be carried to places at too great a distance. But however this was, (for learned men are not exactly agreed upon it, and I conceive it to be a mistake,) this is certain, that the diocese of Rome could not extend very far any way into the country region; because it was bounded on all sides with neighbouring cities, which lay close round it. On the north it had Fidenæ, a bishop's see in those times, though, as Cluver¹⁰ and Ferrarius¹¹ show out of Dionysius Halicarnassensis, it lay but forty stadia, or five miles, distant from it. On the east it was bounded with the diocese of Gabii, which some by mistake place seventy miles from Rome, but Holstenius¹² and Cluver, who are more accurate, tell us, it lay in the middle way between Rome and Præneste, about twelve or thirteen miles from each. In the same coast lay Tusculum, but twelve miles from Rome. A little inclining to the south lay the diocese of Subaugusta, close by Rome. Here Helena, the mother of Constantine, was buried, whence it was called Subaugusta Helena. Holstenius¹³ says, the remains of it are still visible at the place called Turris Pignataræ. It was so near Rome, that the writers which speak of Helena's interment, commonly say she was buried at Rome in the church of St. Marcelline in Via Lavicana; which is to be understood of St. Marcelline's church in Subaugusta, which lay in the way betwixt Rome and Lavici, whence the way was called Via Lavicana. If we look to the south of Rome down the river Tiber toward the sea, there we find three dioceses in three cities, none of them above three miles from each other, nor above sixteen miles from Rome. These were Ostia, Portus Augusti, and Sylva Candida. The first and second of which lay within two miles of each other, Ostia on the east side, and Portus on

Sect. 1.
Of the extent of the diocese of the bishop of Rome.

¹ See chap. 1. sect. 5. of this Book.

² Plin. l. 3. c. 5.

³ Lipsius de Magnitud. Roman. l. 3. c. 2. p. 111.

⁴ Mede, Commentat. Apocalyp. p. 488.

⁵ Vopisc. Vit. Aurel. p. 645.

⁶ Cornel. Ep. ad Fab. Euseb. lib. 6. c. 43.

⁷ Optat. lib. 2. p. 49. Non enim grex aut populus appellandi fuerant pauci, qui inter quadraginta et quod excurrit basilicas, locum ubi colligerent non habebant.

⁸ Innocent. Ep. l. ad Decent. c. 5. De fermento autem quod die Dominico per titulos mittimus superflue nos consulere voluisti, cum omnes ecclesiæ nostræ intra civitatem sunt constitutæ, &c.

⁹ Ibid. Quod per parochias fieri debere non puto, quia non longe portanda sunt sacramenta.

¹⁰ Cluver. Ital. lib. 2. p. 654.

¹¹ Ferrar. Lexic. Geogr. voce Fidenæ.

¹² Holsten. Annot. in Ortel. p. 85. Cluver. Ital. p. 955.

¹³ Holsten. Annot. Geogr. in Car. a Sancto Paulo, p. 11.

the west side of the river Tiber; and Sylva Candida a little more west from Portus. The site and distance of Ostia and Portus from Rome we have exactly delivered both from ancient and modern geographers. In Antonine's Itinerary it is called eighteen; but Holstenius¹⁴ observes that the ancient miles were shorter than the modern, and therefore both he, and Ferrarius, and others, reckon these places precisely but sixteen miles from Rome. Now these being sea-ports, had probably the chief extent of their dioceses toward Rome, which takes off from the largeness of the former. On the west it was bounded with the diocese of Lorium, which lay in Tuscia in the Via Aurelia betwixt Rome and Turres, which Holstenius says,¹⁵ was but twelve miles from Rome, and ten from Turres. And many other dioceses lay in the same circle about Rome, not at much further distance. For Nepe in Tuscia was but twenty miles from Rome, and Sutrium but four from Nepe. Nomentum, among the Sabines in Valeria, was but twelve miles from Rome, and Tibur in the same tract about sixteen. Lavici in Campania, or Latium, was but fifteen, and Tres Tabernæ, according to some accounts, but twenty-one, and Velitræ so near that, that Gregory the Great united them together. But we shall see more of this in specifying the dioceses of each particular province, and assigning the bounds of such as were most remarkable for their nearness one to another.

I shall begin with those provinces which are properly called Roman, in contradistinction to the rest of the Italic dioceses; and in each of these assign both the names and number of the ancient episcopal dioceses, that the reader who is curious in this matter, may exercise his geographical knowledge in a more particular search into the state of them. The first of these in order is Tuscia and Umbria, which the civil and ecclesiastical account always joins together as one province, though they had distinct bounds upon other occasions. Tuscia was the same that was anciently called Etruria, bounded with the Tiber on the east, and the river Macra on the west, the Apennine hills on the north, and the Tuscan Sea on the south; and includes now St. Peter's patrimony in the eastern part, and the dukedom of Florence, or Tuscany, in the west. In this province Carolus a Sancto Paulo finds thirty-five ancient dioceses. 1. Portus Augusti, now called Porto. 2. Sylva Candida, now Sancta Ruffina. 3. Nepe, vulgo Nepi. 4. Aqua Viva, al. Carpenatum Urbs. 5. Phalaris, now Citta Castellana. 6.

Ferentium, Ferento. 7. Polymartium, Bomarso. 8. Hortanum, Horti. 9. Blera, now Bieda. 10. Sutrium. 11. Tarquina. 12. Salpis. But Holstenius thinks this is mistaken for Sæpinum, in the province of Samnium. 13. Tuscania, Tuscanello. 14. Balneum Regis, Bagnarea. 15. Perugia, now Perugia. 16. Urbs Vetus, Orvieto. 17. Clusium, Chiusa. 18. Cortona. 19. Aretium, Arezzo. 20. Volsinium, Bolsena. 21. Centumcellæ, now Civita Vecchia. 22. Gravisca, now Montalto. 23. Cornetum. 24. Forum Claudii, now Oriolo. 25. Pisa. 26. Lucca. 27. Luna. 28. Sena. 29. Florentia. 30. Fesulæ, now Fiezoli. 31. Suana. 32. Manturanum. 33. Rusella, Rosella. 34. Populonia, Porto Baratto. 35. Volaterræ. To which Holstenius adds Volsæ, or Civitas Bulcentina, Castrum Valentini, and Lorium. Now some of these, as has been already observed, were very near neighbours to Rome, and they were yet nearer to one another. Nepi was but four miles from Sutrium, as Ferrarius computes,¹⁶ and so they were afterward united together, as the same author informs us. Portus Augusti was bounded on one side with Ostia, which was but two miles from it, as Ferrarius¹⁷ and Cluver inform us; and on the other side with Sylva Candida, which Carolus a Sancto Paulo places about the same distance from it. Faleria, or Phalaris, is reckoned by Cluver¹⁸ about five or six miles from Nepe, and four miles from Hortanum by Ferrarius,¹⁹ who says, Hortanum lay upon the Tiber, opposite to the Oericuli in Umbria, and not above four miles to the west of it. Holstenius²⁰ shows out of the Jerusalem Itinerary, that Aqua Viva was but twelve miles from Oericuli, and Phaleria lay between them. Polymartium was but five miles west from Hortanum, as Ferrarius computes,²¹ and Ferentium about the same distance from Polymartium; which two last were united into one, before the council of Rome under Martin, anno 649, as Carolus a Sancto Paulo collects from the subscriptions of that council. Blera was but nine miles from Forum Claudii, as Holstenius²² shows from the old Itineraries; and Forum Claudii not above five from Sutrium, according to Cluver's reckoning. Lorium was but twelve miles from Rome in the way to Civita Vecchia, as has been showed before. Tarquina is reckoned by Ferrarius²³ about five miles from Cornetum, and about the same distance from Gravisca, by Cluver's Tables. Which is the more probable, because Holstenius observes,²⁴ that these three dioceses were at last united into one. Centumcellæ, or Civita Vecchia, ¹⁴ Holsten. Annot. in Cluver. Ital. p. 79. Others reckon but twelve modern miles. So Lipsius out of Apian.

¹⁵ Holsten. in Cluver. Ital. p. 43.

¹⁶ Ferrar. Lexic. Geogr. voce Nepe et Sutrium.

¹⁷ Ibid. voce Ostia et Portus.

¹⁸ Cluver. Ital. lib. 2. p. 537.

¹⁹ Ferrar. Lexic. voce Hortanum.

²⁰ Holsten. Annot. in Cluver. p. 80.

²¹ Ferrar, voce Polymartium.

²² Holsten. in Cluver. p. 47.

²³ Ferrar. Lexic. voce Tarquinia.

²⁴ Holsten. Annot. in Carol. a Sancto Paulo, p. 8.

lay upon the sea, twelve miles from Gravisca, as appears from the Jerusalem Itinerary in Holstenius.²⁵ Tuscania and Volsinium, and Urbs Vetus, now called Orvieto, and Balneum Regis, had much about the same distances from one another. And all these lay within that little compass of land, which is now called St. Peter's patrimony, hemmed in on the east and north with the river Tiber, on the west with the river Marta, and on the south with the Tuscan Sea. A country that is not much above fifty miles square, as Cluver rightly describes it. For from Rome to Centumcellæ, or Civita Vecchia, which lies but ten miles from the river Marta, which now divides St. Peter's patrimony from Castro Ducato, Cluver and Holstenius,²⁶ out of Antonine's Itinerary, in the direct course of the Via Aurelia, reckon but forty-seven miles, which do not exceed forty miles according to the present estimation. So that there being in this compass twenty bishoprics, including Rome in the number, if we will suppose all the dioceses to be equal, each diocese will be about ten or twelve miles square, which confirms the account that has been given of the distance of the several cities from each other. And hence it appears, that as in some parts of the kingdom of Naples, dioceses have been multiplied above what they were in former ages, so in this and other parts of the pope's dominions, they have as strangely decreased. For now there are not near half the number, there being sometimes two, or three, or four united into one. For Ferrarius informs us, that Viterbo was raised, anno 1074, out of the ruins of three old ones, Ferentum, Tuscania, and Polymartium. So Citta Castellana arose from the decay of Faleria and Hortanum. Sutrium was united to Nepe; Tarquina and Gravisca to Cornetum; not to mention any more of this kind, which concern not the present inquiry. As to those dioceses which lay in the western part of Tuscia, now called the dukedom of Tuscany, they were much larger in proportion than the former, for excepting Fesulæ, which lay but three miles²⁷ from Florence, all the other dioceses were of greater extent. Of which I need only give this evidence, that this part of Tuscia is reckoned²⁸ above two hundred miles in length, and near a hundred in breadth, excluding the pope's dominions. Which being divided among fifteen or sixteen dioceses, will afford a large territory to every one: so that it is needless to look further for a particular account of them.

But if we return back again into Umbria, nearer

Rome, there we shall find dioceses of the same size, and as thick as in the patrimony of St. Peter. For it was but a little tract of ground, bounded with the rivers Nar and Tiber, and the Apennine hills, and only a part of the old Umbria, which reached beyond the Apennine to the Adriatic sea. In the present Umbria, Carolus a Sancto Paulo reckons eighteen bishoprics. 1. Oriculum. 2. Narnia. 3. Tuder, now Todi. 4. Mevania, now Bevagna. 5. Tifernum Tiberinum, now Citta di Castello. 6. Interamnia, now Terni. 7. Ameria, Amelia. 8. Trebia, Trebi. 9. Spoletum, Spoleto. 10. Fulginum, Fulgino. 11. Camerinum. 12. Hispellum. 13. Assisium. 14. Forum Novum, now Vescovio. 15. Forum Flaminii, now For-flammo. 16. Vettonium, Bittona. 17. Nuceria, Nocera. 18. Eugubium, Gubbio. To which Holstenius adds Tadinum²⁹ and Martula. Now five of these, Fulginum, Hispellum, Assisium, Forum Flaminii, and Mevania, lay so close together, that none of them was above ten miles' distance from any of the other. Fulginum had on the north towards Nuceria, Forum Flaminii to bound it, which Ferrarius³⁰ says, was but three miles removed from it. Hispellum was but the same distance in the way to Assisium. Trebia on the east was but six miles from Fulginum, and nine from Spoletum, as Ferrarius also informs us,³¹ who says also it was but fifteen miles from Fulginum to Spoletum; so that Trebia must lie exactly in the way betwixt them. On the south, Fulginum was bounded again with Mevania, which was but six miles from it.³² On the west lay Assisium, famous in modern stories for the birth of St. Francis, the father of the Franciscans; and this, Ferrarius says, was but ten miles³³ from Fulginum, and about twelve from Perugia in Tuscia. If we look a little more northward, from Forum Flaminii to Nuceria is computed nine miles³⁴ by Ferrarius. From Nuceria to Tadinum (the remains of which, Holstenius³⁵ says, are yet to be seen in the Via Flaminia, near Gualdo, on the top of the Apennine) is computed no more than eight miles by Holstenius³⁶ and Baudrand. And from Tadinum to Eugubium must be about thirteen. But here the dioceses began to enlarge toward the western parts of this province, as was observed before of Tuscia. For westward of Eugubium, there was no city betwixt it and Tifernum Tiberinum, which was twenty miles from it. Nor had Tifernum Tiberinum any nearer neighbours than Aretium, which is reckoned eighteen, and Callium twenty-two, and Perugia twenty-four ²⁵ Holsten. in Cluver. p. 80.

²⁶ Ibid. p. 78. Procop. de Bell. Goth. lib. 2. p. 405, reckons it 280 stadia, or 35 miles.

²⁷ Cluver. Ital. lib. 2. p. 452.

²⁸ Ferrar. Lexic. Geogr. voce Tuscia.

²⁹ Holsten. Annot. in Carol. a S. Paulo, p. 9, et in Cluver. p. 98.

³⁰ Ferrar. Lexic. voce Forum Flaminii.

³¹ Ibid. voce Trebia, et Fulginum, et Hispellum

³² Ibid. voce Mevania.

³³ Baudrand. voce Fulginum et Perugia.

³⁴ Ferrar. voce Nuceria.

³⁵ Holsten. Annot. in Carol. a S. Paulo, p. 9.

³⁶ Holsten. Annot. in Ital. Cluver. p. 86.

miles from it, as Baudrand and Ferrarius³⁷ have computed. But then if we look towards Rome again, and descend from the Apennine to the southern parts of this province toward the rivers Nar and Tiber, we there first meet with Martula on the river Nar, which Holstenius³⁸ assures us was but six miles to the east of Spoleto. Down the same river lay Interamnia, about the same distance from Martula. And below that was Narnia, which Cluver,³⁹ from the Jerusalem Itinerary, reckons to be nine miles from Interamnia; but Holstenius, who was at the pains to measure it, says⁴⁰ it was but five miles and two-thirds from the gate of the one city to the gate of the other. A little to the west of Narnia lay Ameria, which Ferrarius⁴¹ says was not quite six miles from it. And to the south of Narnia, more down the river Nar toward Rome, there was Oriculum, which the Jerusalem Itinerary in Cluver⁴² makes to be twelve miles from Narnia; but Ferrarius, by the modern account, reckons but eight, and four from Hortanum in Umbria, as has been noted before in speaking of Hortanum. In the middle of this province, upon the confluence of the rivers Tinia and Asius, between Mevania and Perusia, lay Vettonium, which Ferrarius⁴³ accounts six miles from Mevania, and eight from Perusia in Tuscia. So that all the dioceses of this province, except two or three, were very small, and one with another not to be reckoned above eight or ten miles in length, since there was scarce so much distance from one city to another. And upon this account, as the cities decayed, several of these dioceses were united together in after ages. For Tadinum is joined to Nuceria, as Holstenius⁴⁴ informs us. Hispellum and Forum Flamini are swallowed up in Fulgino. So Mevania, and Trebia, and Martula are sunk and united to other dioceses, and in all this province, that I can learn, there is not one new see erected.

Out of Umbria our next step toward the east is into the province of Valeria, so called, Holstenius thinks, from the Via Valeria, which ran directly through it. It was bounded on the north with the Apennine, on the west with the river Nar, which divided it from Umbria, on the south with the Tiber and the Anio, which divided it from Latium, or that which is now called Campagna di Roma. On the east it bordered upon Samnium, from which it was divided by a line drawn from the river Aternus to the head of Anio. It was anciently the country of the Sabines and Marsi, and part of Old Latium, and is now called Sabina in that part which runs toward Rome, the rest being now part of the dukedom of Spoleto and Abrusso. In this province Carolus a Sancto Paulo reckons eleven dioceses. 1. Fidenæ, now called Castel Jubileo. 2. Nomentum, now Lametana. 3. Tibur, Tivoli. 4. Nursia, Norza. 5. Marsi, al. Marruvium, and Valeria. 6. Præneste, now Palestrina. 7. Furconium, Forconio. 8. Amiternum, now S. Vittorino. 9. Reate, Rieti. 10. Cures, Curese. 11. Lista. But Holstenius⁴⁵ observes, that the last of these is mistaken for Lissum, or Alessio, as it is now called, in Prævalitana on the other side of the Adriatic Sea; and Præneste belongs to Latium: instead of which he substitutes two others, Pitinum and Forum Novum, or Sabinum, now Vescovio, once a chief city among the Sabines. Now, of these, Fidenæ was but five miles from the gates of Rome, as has been noted before. Nomentum was about eight from Fidenæ, and twelve from Rome, as Baudrand⁴⁶ shows out of Sanson and Brietius; though others place it beyond Tibur ten miles, and twenty-six from Rome. Tibur itself was but sixteen miles⁴⁷ from Rome, and twelve from Præneste. But it was a pretty large diocese for all that. For Holstenius⁴⁸ observes, that Sublaqueum was a dependant on it, till it became a monastery exempt from all episcopal jurisdiction; and Ferrarius⁴⁹ says, that abbey had fourteen villages belonging to it. Præneste was thirteen miles from Gabii, and fourteen from Anagnia, and not so much from Nomentum. Cures, now called St. Anthimo, was only ten miles from Reate, according to Ferrarius,⁵⁰ and probably something nearer to Nomentum, because Carolus a Sancto Paulo⁵¹ observes out of an epistle of Gregory⁵² the Great, that it was united in his time to Nomentum. Some confound Cures with Sabinum, or Forum Novum; but Holstenius⁵³ shows, that Sabinum was a distinct city, and stood in the place which is now called Vescovio, where the ruins of the cathedral church are still remaining: which Baudrand says⁵⁴ was but three miles from Reate, and eleven from Interamnia; but the site of this place may be passed over as a little uncertain. The ruins of Amiternum are still to be seen, Cluver says,⁵⁵ near where Aquila now stands. Ferrarius⁵⁶ thinks it was only five miles from it. Pitinum was but two miles from ³⁷ Ferrar. Lexic. voce Tifernum.

³⁸ Holsten. Annot. in Ital. Cluver. p. 98.

³⁹ Cluver. Ital. p. 526.

⁴⁰ Holsten. Annot. in Cluver. p. 95. Sunt a Narniensi porta ad portam Interamnii cannæ Romanæ 3760, quæ sunt 5 mil. pass. $\frac{2}{3}$.

⁴¹ Ferrar. Lexic. voce Ameria.

⁴² Cluver. Ital. p. 526.

⁴³ Ferrar. Lexic. voce Vettonium.

⁴⁴ Holsten. in Ital. Cluver. p. 86.

⁴⁵ Holsten. Annot. in Carol. a S. Paulo, p. 16.

⁴⁶ Baudr. voce Nomentum.

⁴⁷ Ferrar. voce Tibur.

⁴⁸ Holsten. in Ital. Cluver. p. 147.

⁴⁹ Ferrar. voce Sublaqueum.

⁵⁰ Ibid. voce Cures.

⁵¹ Carol. a S. Paulo, Geogr. Sacra. p. 58.

⁵² Greg. lib. 2. Ep. 20.

⁵³ Holsten. Annot. in Carol. a S. Paulo, p. 9.

⁵⁴ Baudr. voce Cures.

⁵⁵ Cluver. Ital. lib. 2. p. 686.

⁵⁶ Ferrar. voce Amiternum.

Aquila, and consequently, as Holstenius observes,⁵⁷ must be near Amiternum. Furconium was another see in that neighbourhood, but eight miles from Aquila, as Ferrarius⁵⁸ acquaints us. So that these three dioceses lay in a small compass, and are now swallowed up in the new diocese of Aquila, which arose out of the ruins of them all united together. The largest of these dioceses in this tract, were Reate, Nursia, and Marruvium or Marsi. For from Reate to Nursia, Baudrand⁵⁹ calls it thirteen miles, Ferrarius, twenty: to Aquila twenty-five miles, and as much to Narnia. But Interamnia and Furconium were something nearer to Reate. Marruvium or Marsi, on the lake Fucinus, was at a considerable distance from Furconium and Sulmo, which cities lay the nearest to it. But the exact distance is not so certain, because it is not agreed on which side the lake Fucinus Marruvium was.

Out of Valeria and Umbria cross the Apennine we come into the province of Picenum Suburbicarium, so called to distinguish it from Picenum Annonarium, which belonged to the Italic diocese. This lay betwixt the Apennine on the south and the Adriatic Sea on the north, and was divided from Picenum Annonarium by the river Æsis on the west, and from Samnium by the river Aternus, now called Pescara, on the east; and it is now the provinces of Marca di Ancona and Abrusso Ultra. In this province Carolus a Sancto Paulo reckons fourteen dioceses. 1. Pinna, now Penna. 2. Interamnia, now Teramo. 3. Asculum, Ascoli. 4. Firmum, Fermo. 5. Tolentinum, Tolentino. 6. Septempeda, now S. Severino. 7. Matelica. 8. Cingulum, Cingulo. 9. Auximum, Osmo. 10. Potentia. 11. Numana, now Humana. 12. Ancona. 13. Hadria, Adri. 14. Aternum, now Pescara. To which Holstenius⁶⁰ adds five more; Truentum, Aufinia, Faleronia, Urbs Salvia, now called Urbisaglia, and Pausola, or Pausulæ, as Ferrarius calls it, which now goes by the name of Monte del Olmo. The most eastern city of this province was Aternum, on the mouth of the river Aternus or Pescara, which (as Ferrarius⁶¹ and Baudrand compute) was but eight miles from Teate, and eleven from Ortona, two cities in the province of Samnium, and not above eleven from Adria, and twelve from Pinna. Pinna was the same distance from Teate and Adria. Interamnia is reckoned by Ferrarius twenty miles from Asculum; but Baudrand says only thirteen. In the western parts of the province, Matelica is computed but nine miles from Septempeda; and Septempeda six from Tolentinum, and ten from Camerinum, and twelve from Cingulum; Cingulum is reckoned but eight from Æsium in Picenum Annonarium, and twelve from Auximum; Auximum twelve from Æsium, and the same from Ancona: Ancona twelve from Numana; Numana twelve from Potentia; the remains of which last, Holstenius says,⁶² are still to be seen, not far from Portus Ricanaticus and Laureto. Urbs Salvia, according to Ferrarius's account, was but ten miles from Tolentinum, and by Baudrand's but six. Firmum, Truentum, and Asculum lay at a greater distance; for Ferrarius reckons them near twenty miles from each other: but then he says, that Pausulæ was in Comitatu Firmano, and therefore not far from Firmum; and if Faleronia and Aufinia (whose situation is uncertain) lay in those parts also, they might bring the dioceses of Asculum and Truentum to the same pitch with the rest of the province. So that few dioceses in this province could be much above ten miles in extent, and the largest not above twenty, as appears from Ferrarius and other geographers' computation.

From the Adriatic Sea we must again cross the Apennine to take a view of Latium and Campania, the ancient glory of Italy, along the Tuscan Sea eastward to the river Silarus from the Tiber and the gates of Rome. This in the civil and ecclesiastical account is reckoned but one province; but since Latium is commonly distinguished from Campania, I will speak first of the dioceses that were in that, as being the nearest neighbours to Rome. This country was anciently bounded with the rivers Tiber, Anio, and Liris, which last divided it from Campania properly so called. It now contains Campagna di Roma, and part of Lavoro in the realm of Naples. It had anciently twenty-three dioceses, as Carolus a Sancto Paulo and Holstenius have computed. 1. Subaugusta. 2. Ostia. 3. Gabii. 4. Albanum. 5. Alba. 6. Antium. 7. Tres Tabernæ. 8. Velitræ. 9. Tusculum. 10. Lavici. 11. Præneste. 12. Signia. 13. Anagnia. 14. Ferentinum. 15. Aletrium. 16. Verulæ. 17. Terracina. 18. Fundi. 19. Formiæ. 20. Aquinum. 21. Cassinum. 22. Atina. 23. Sora. Of these, as has been observed before, Subaugusta lay close by Rome; Ostia sixteen miles from Rome and two from Porto; Gabii thirteen from Rome and as many from Præneste. Tusculum, which some mistake for Tusculanum, where Cicero wrote his Tusculan Questions, was a city now called Frescati, and Ferrarius says but twelve miles from Rome. Signia, now called Segni, lay between Tusculum and Anagnia, six miles from each, nine from Præneste, and thirty from Rome, as Baudrand informs⁶³ us from Holstenius. The same author says,⁶⁴ Ferentinum ⁵⁷ Holsten. Annot. in Carol. a S. Paulo, p. 16. Pitinum non longe fuit ab Amiterno, duobus mil. pass. ab Aquila.

⁵⁸ Ferrar. voce Furconium.

⁵⁹ Ferrar. et Baudrand, voce Nursia, et Reate.

⁶⁰ Holsten. Annot. Geogr. in Carol. a S. Paulo, p. 14.

⁶¹ Ferrar. Lexic. Geogr. voce Aternum.

⁶² Holsten. Ibid.

⁶³ Lexic. Geogr. voce Signia.

⁶⁴ Ibid. voce Ferentinum.

was but five miles from Anagnia and four from Alatrium; and Ferrarius⁶⁵ places Verulæ between Anagnia and Sora, nine or ten miles from each. Lavici is reckoned by Holstenius⁶⁶ but fifteen miles from Rome, and yet the diocese of Subaugusta came between them: for it was in the Via Lavicana, the direct way that leads from Rome to Lavici. Albanum and Alba are by some authors confounded together, but Holstenius⁶⁷ reckons them distinct cities, and Ferrarius says⁶⁸ the one was fourteen, and the other sixteen miles from Rome. But perhaps the one might only arise out of the ruins of the other, for they were not above two miles from each other. Velitræ was but four miles from Alba, and twenty from Rome; Antium on the Tuscan shore fourteen from Velitræ and twenty from Ostia, as the same Ferrarius⁶⁹ informs us. Between Antium and Velitræ lay Tres Tabernæ, the place whither the Christians came to meet St. Paul from Rome. Carolus a Sancto Paulo thinks it is the same which is now called Cisterna, but Holstenius says⁷⁰ it was at some distance from it in the Via Appia, so near Velitræ that Gregory the Great united these two dioceses together. Ferrarius says⁷¹ it was but five miles from Velitræ, and twenty-six (or, as Baudrand computes, twenty-one) from Rome, five from Aricia, and twenty-two from Appii Forum, the other place whither the brethren came to meet St. Paul. Indeed neither Aricia nor Appii Forum are mentioned as episcopal sees by any ancient writer: but Ferrarius⁷² seems to make them both so; for he says Aricia was a famous city and a Roman colony, which, by the common rule of the church, had thereby a title to an episcopal see: nor is it any objection against it that it was but sixteen miles from Rome, and four or five from Alba, Tres Tabernæ, and Velitræ; for we have seen already that many cities in this tract were at no greater distance from one another. Of Appii Forum he speaks more positively, and says it was anciently an episcopal see,⁷³ though from what authority he tells us not: but there is some reason to believe it, because it was a city at a good distance from any other. For Tarracina on the east was near twelve miles from it, and Tres Tabernæ westward above twenty; so that either Tres Tabernæ and Tarracina must have dioceses of more than ordinary extent in these parts, or else Appii Forum must come between them. But I let this pass, because in matters of doubtful nature, where we are destitute of ancient authorities, nothing can certainly be determined. I go on therefore with those that are more certain. From Tarracina to Fundi the modern accounts⁷⁴ reckon but ten miles, though the Jerusalem Itinerary⁷⁵ calls it thirteen, and Antonine's Itinerary sixteen. From Fundi to Formiæ the same Itineraries reckon twelve and thirteen, which Ferrarius, from the modern geographers, esteems but ten; cautioning his reader here⁷⁶ against a great error in Strabo, who makes it four hundred stadia, that is, fifty miles, from Tarracina to Formiæ, when indeed it was not half the distance. If we look a little upward from the sea to the north-eastern part of Latium, there we find Aquinum and Cassinum but five miles from one another, and Atina the same distance from Cassinum, and Sora twelve miles from Atina, twelve from Ferentinum, sixteen from Cassinum, and sixty from Rome. So that in the compass of seventy old Italian miles, which are not quite sixty of the modern, there were betwixt twenty and thirty bishoprics, answerable to the number of cities in Latium, in the most flourishing times of the Roman empire.

From Latium we must pass into Campania, where we first meet with Minturnæ, now called Scaffa del Garigliano, not far from the mouth of the river Liris, which Ferrarius⁷⁷ computes nine miles from Formiæ, and as many from Sinuessa. A little above these lay Teanum, now called Tiano, eight miles from Suessa, twelve from Capua; and Calenum was the same distance from Capua, and but six from Suessa, and six from Sinuessa, as Ferrarius⁷⁸ reckons. Carolus a Sancto Paulo takes Calenum for Cagli, and others for Cales; but Holstenius⁷⁹ shows it to be the same with Carinola, which is now a bishop's seat, and, as Baudrand computes, but four miles from Suessa, and as many from the Tuscan shore. Next beyond these lay Vulturum, now called Castel di Bitorno, at the mouth of the river Vulturum, eight miles from Sinuessa, and nine from Linternum, and ten from Capua. Five miles beyond Linternum, on the same shore, was Cumæ, and three miles below that Misenum, from whence to Puteoli was but three miles likewise, and from Puteoli to Naples six, according to Ferrarius's computation. About eighteen miles beyond Naples was Stabiæ, and six from that Surrentum, on the same shore, beyond which was Amalphia and Salernum, the last of which is reckoned by Ferrarius but twenty-four miles from Naples. On the north and east of Naples lay Nola, which could not be above twelve miles from it: for Holstenius observes,⁸⁰ that Octavianum, the village where Octavius Augustus died, under Mount Vesuvius, was in the way between them, five miles from Naples, and seven from Nola. Between Nola and Capua lay Acerræ, six miles from Nola, and eight ⁶⁵ Lexic. Geogr. voce Verulæ.

⁶⁶ Holsten. Annot. in Ital. Cluver. p. 194.

⁶⁷ Holsten. ibid. p. 183.

⁶⁸ Ferrar. voce Alba longa.

⁶⁹ Ferrar. voce Velitræ, et Antium.

⁷⁰ Holsten. Annot. in Carol. a S. Paulo, p. 9.

⁷¹ Ferrar. voce Tres Tabernæ.

⁷² Ibid. voce Aricia.

⁷³ Ferrar. voce Forum Appii.

⁷⁴ Ibid. voce Fundi.

⁷⁵ Ap. Holsten. Annot. in Ital. Cluver. p. 218.

⁷⁶ Ferrar. voce Formiæ.

⁷⁷ Ibid. voce Minturnæ.

⁷⁸ Ibid. voce Teanum, et Calenum.

⁷⁹ Holsten. Annot. in Cluver. Ital. p. 258.

⁸⁰ Holsten. Annot. in Ortel. p. 133.

from Naples, and ten from Capua: for from Nola to Capua was but twenty old Italian miles, as we learn from Paulinus, bishop of Nola,⁸¹ who could not be mistaken. Naples and Capua were but sixteen miles asunder, and yet Atella, now called S. Arpino, or S. Elpidio, lay between them, which, Ferrarius⁸² says, was eight miles from each. Calatia was but the same distance to the north of Capua; Venafrum but ten miles from Cassinum; Abellinum was the largest diocese in all Campania, sixteen miles from Beneventum, and as much from Nola, Salernum, and Frequentum, in the province of Samnium, to which, Baudrand⁸³ says, it was afterward united. If now we put all these Italian dioceses hitherto enumerated together, they amount to above one hundred and ten, whereof twenty were in that little part of Tuscia, which is now called St. Peter's patrimony, twenty in Umbria, eleven in Valeria, nineteen in Picenum Suburbicarium, and forty-three in Latium and Campania. And yet all this country put together was not, in the longest part of it, above two hundred miles on the Tuscan shore: for from the river Marta, on which lay Tarquina and Gravisca, to Rome is reckoned fifty modern miles; from Rome to Naples one hundred and twenty-five; and from Naples to Salernum, the utmost diocese in Campania, but twenty-four, according to the computations of Ferrarius. On the Adriatic shore it was only the length of Picenum Suburbicarium between the rivers Æsis and Aternus, which was not above one hundred and twenty miles. The breadth of it in the widest part of it, from Ancona on the Adriatic Sea to Ostia on the Tuscan Sea, was but one hundred and sixty-four miles, and in the narrower parts, from the mouth of the river Aternus to the mouth of the Liris, not above one hundred and twenty miles. Which the curious may divide among one hundred and ten dioceses, and then examine whether they exceed the proportions which I have before assigned them.

Sect. 6.
Of Samnium.

I will not stand so nicely to examine the rest of the Italian dioceses, but only recount the number in each province, and make a few remarks upon the largest, as I have hitherto done upon the smallest; that the reader may pursue this inquiry further at his own pleasure, and see that the greatness or smallness of a diocese anciently bred no division or disturbance in the catholic church. The next province then in order to be spoken of is Samnium, which lay on the coast of the Adriatic Sea, between Picenum Suburbicarium on the west, from which it was divided by the river Aternus, or Pescara, and Apulia on the east, from which it was separated by the river Frenta. In this province Carolus a Sancto Paulo reckons but ten dioceses. 1. Beneventum. 2. Sæpinum. 3. Sulmo. 4. Bovianum, now called Boiano. 5. Theatea, now Chieti. 6. Ortona. 7. Frequentum, Fricenti. 8. Alipha. 9. Samnium. 10. Corfinium, or Valva. To which Holstenius adds Istonium and Æclanum, but Baudrand thinks Æclanum was the same with Frequentum. However it was, Holstenius observes,⁸⁴ that it had the name of Decimum Quintum, because it was fifteen miles from Beneventum. Corfinium and Sulmo were nearer to one another, and were afterward united together. Ortona, Theatea, Sæpinum, Bovianum, and Istonium, were some ten, some twelve miles from one another. So that these dioceses were neither so little as those about Rome, nor so large as those of the western provinces in the Italic diocese.

Next to Samnium lay Apulia, and beyond that Calabria, in the utmost corner of Italy to the Adriatic Sea.

Sect. 7.
Of Apulia and Calabria.

These two regions made but one province in the civil and ecclesiastical account, and therefore I join them together. In Apulia Carolus a Sancto Paulo reckons twelve dioceses. 1. Ignatia, now called Ignazzo. 2. Barium, Barri. 3. Tranum, Trani. 4. Cupersanum, Conversano. 5. Canusium, Canosa. 6. Sipontum, Siponto. 7. Arpi, now Sarpi. 8. Melpia, Melfi. 9. Venusia, Venosa. 10. Acherontia, Acerenza. 11. Vigilia, Biseglæ. 12. Cannæ. To which the diligence of Holstenius has added five more. 13. Bivinum, Bovino. 14. Herdona, Ardonia. 15. Rubisium, Ruvo. 16. Salapia, Salpe. 17. Æcæ, or Æquana, since called Troja. In Calabria Carolus a Sancto Paulo found but seven dioceses, but Holstenius makes them ten. 1. Brundisium, Brindisi. 2. Aletium, Lecci. 3. Hydruntum, Otranto. 4. Callipolis, Gallipoli. 5. Tarentum, Taranto. 6. Uria, Oira. 7. Lypia, or Luspiæ. 8. Neritum, Nardo. 9. Uxentum, Ugento. 10. Alexanum, before called Leuce, now Alessano.

Next to these, toward the lower sea, lay the regions of Lucania and Brutia, which are reckoned together likewise

Sect. 8.
Of Lucania and Brutia.

as one province. In Lucania Carolus a Sancto Paulo could find but five bishoprics, but Holstenius augments them to eight. 1. Potentia, Potenza. 2. Buxentum, which Carolus a Sancto Paulo takes to be Piscioti, but Holstenius and others Polycastro. 3. Pæstum, Pesto. 4. Acropolis, Agropoli. 5. Blanda, which some take for Belvedere, but Holstenius calls it Porto di Sapri. 6. Grumentum, Agrimonte. 7. Velia. 8. Cocilianum, the bishop of which is sometimes styled also Marcillianensis, as Holstenius⁸⁵ observes, from Marcillianum, a seat or suburbs belonging to the diocese of Cocilianum. In Brutia Carolus a Sancto Paulo reckons up sixteen dioceses. 1. Rhe-⁸¹ Paulin. ad Cyther. Carm. 13. p. 492.

⁸² Ferrar. voce Atella. ⁸³ Baudrand. voce Abellinum.

⁸⁴ Holsten. Annot. in Carol. a S. Paulo, p. 18.

⁸⁵ Ibid. Not. in Ital. Cluver. p. 299.

gium, now Rezo. 2. Taurianum, Seminara. 3. Vibo Valentia, now called Bivona. Out of these two dioceses, Holstenius⁸⁵ observes, that Roger earl of Calabria raised the new diocese of Mileto, anno 1037. 4. Tropæa. 5. Nicotera, Nicodro. 6. Temesa, now S. Marco. 7. Thurium, Terra Nova, al. Buffalora. 8. Cerillus, Cerilla. 9. Consentia, Cosenza. 10. Crotona. 11. Scyllatium, Squillaci. 12. Locri, Gieraci. 13. Muranum, Morano. 14. Portus Orestis, Porto Ravaglioso. 15. Carina, united to Rhegium by Gregory the Great. 16. Bova. To these Holstenius adds two more, Paternum and Turres; the first of which sees, he says,⁸⁷ was translated to Umbriatico, and the other united to Taurianum. So that the new diocese of Mileto, which was made out of Taurianum and Vibo, must be at least three old dioceses united into one. Whence we may conclude, that though some of the dioceses in this part of Italy are less than they were anciently, yet others are larger by being united: and the same observation may be made upon Campania, where the dioceses are now more numerous than in any other part of Italy; though some of them are now so small, as not to extend beyond the walls of their cities, yet others are larger than formerly for the reason mentioned, because they were made up of two or three old dioceses put together, as has been noted in its proper place.

To these seven provinces which lay in Italy, we must add the islands of Sicily, Sardinia, and Corsica, with the lesser islands that lay about them, which make up the ten provinces of the Roman diocese, or city prefecture. In Sicily Carolus a Sancto Paulo counts thirteen dioceses. 1. Syracusæ. 2. Tindarium, Tindaro. 3. Leontini, Lentini. 4. Lilybæum, now called Marsala. 5. Tauromenium, Taormina. 6. Messana. 7. Thermæ. 8. Catana. 9. Trocala. 10. Agrigentum, Grigenti. 11. Panormus, Palermo. 12. Alæsa, now Caronia. 13. Camarina, Camarana. To which are added the two islands of Lipara, and Melita or Malta, which had each their bishop in the time of Gregory the Great. The later notitias speak of seven more in Sicily, and Baudrand takes notice of others, which he says were old episcopal sees, as Charinum, Drepanum, Gela Nova, Myle, now called Melazzo, and Trojanopolis, or Troyna; but where he found those names he does not inform us. However, these must be large dioceses; for this was the greatest island in all the Mediterranean Sea: Baudrand says, Cluver was at the pains to measure it, and his account is,⁸⁸ that it is six hundred miles in compass. Which being divided between thirteen or eighteen bishoprics, will easily prove them to be large dioceses, without standing to examine the distances of particular places. The isle of Malta, Ferrarius⁸⁹ says, was twenty miles long, and eleven broad; but Baudrand makes it twenty-five one way, and fifteen another: by either of which accounts, it was larger than some four or five Italian dioceses. Lipara, the chief of the seven Vulcanian or Æolian islands, was not so large; for it was but eighteen miles in compass: but here was a city, and several appendant villages, which, with the lesser islands, were enough to make a considerable diocese, larger than many of those about Rome.

Sardinia is sometimes reckoned to the African diocese, and sometimes to the Roman. In the notitia of the African church published by Sirmondus, there are said to be five dioceses, and Carolus a Sancto Paulo speaks but of six. 1. Caralis. 2. Sulchi. 3. Tegula. 4. Turris Libisonis, now called Porto di Torre. 5. Forum Trajani. 6. Phausania, now Terra Nova. For Sanafer he makes to be a little uncertain. Baudrand⁹⁰ says they were once augmented to eighteen, but now they are again reduced to seven. However, the country appears to be large enough for eighteen: for Ferrarius⁹¹ reckons it two hundred miles long, and one hundred and seventy broad: Baudrand brings it into a little narrower bounds, making it only one hundred and seventy miles in length, and eighty in breadth, and four hundred and fifty in circumference: which will make five or six large dioceses, and eighteen much greater than those which lay in the neighbourhood of Rome.

In Corsica Carolus a Sancto Paulo finds four ancient dioceses; Holstenius, five. 1. Aleria. 2. Urcinium, al. Adiacium. 3. Nebium. 4. Tamita. 5. Mariana. Now this island, by the lowest computation of Baudrand, was one hundred and six miles in length, and fifty in breadth, which will allow forty miles to every diocese. So that these may be reckoned the largest dioceses of all the ten provinces which belonged to the prefecture of Rome.

We are now to return into Italy again, and to take a short view of the seven provinces, which made up that which is properly called the Italic diocese in contradistinction to that of Rome. The first of these which lay nearest to Rome, was Picenum Annonarium, divided from Picenum Suburbicarium by the river Æsis. Carolus a Sancto Paulo by mistake makes it a province of the Roman diocese, but in the old notitia of the empire, it is joined with Flaminia, and both together make but one province of the Italic diocese. In this Picenum there were anciently but nine dioceses. 1. Æsis, now called

Sect. 10.
Of Sardinia and Corsica.

Sect. 9.
Of the isles of Sicily, Melita, and Lipara.

Sect. 11.
Of Picenum Annonarium, and Flaminia.

⁸⁵ Holsten. Annot. in Ital. Cluver. p. 300.

⁸⁷ Id. ibid. p. 294 et 306. ⁸⁸ Baud. Lex. Geog. voce Sicilia.

⁸⁹ Ferrar. voce Melita. ⁹⁰ Baudrand. voce Sardinia.

⁹¹ Ferrar. voce Sardinia.

Giesi. 2. Senogallia, Sinigaglia. 3. Fanum Fortunæ, now Fano. 4. Pisaurum, Pesaro. 5. Ariminum, Rimini. 6. Urbinum. 7. Tifernum Metaurense, so called to distinguish it from the other Tifernum upon the Tiber, from which it was sixteen miles' distance. It is now called St. Angelo in Vado, and is only a part of another diocese called Urbanea, from its founder Pope Urban VIII. 8. Forum Sempronii, Fossembruno. 9. Callium, Cagli. In Flaminia, which lay westward of Picenum, between the Rubicon and the Padus, or Po, Carolus a Sancto Paulo names eleven dioceses. 1. Ravenna. 2. Sarsina. 3. Cæsena. 4. Forum Popillii. 5. Ficoclae, now called Cervia. 6. Forum Livii, Forli. 7. Faventia, Faenza. 8. Forum Cornelii, now Imola. 9. Vicohabentia, Vicovenza. 10. Hadria, Adri. 11. Comacula, Comacchio. Of all which dioceses I shall stand to make no other observation but this, that they were larger than those about Rome, and less than many others in the western provinces, which lay at a greater distance from it. Ferraria was as yet no diocese of itself, but first made one by Pope Vitalian in the latter end of the seventh century, as Ferrarius⁹² informs us.

Sect. 12.
Of Æmylia. The second of these seven provinces was Æmylia, divided on the east from Liguria by the river Idex, on the north from Liguria by the Po, on the west from Alpes Cottiae by the river Trebia, and on the south from Tuscia by the Apennine. Carolus a Sancto Paulo reckons here but six dioceses. 1. Bononia, Bologna. 2. Mutina, Modena. 3. Brixellum, Bressello. 4. Regium Lepidi, Reggio. 5. Parma. 6. Placentia, Piacenza. These were all very large dioceses. For Bononia, the most eastern in situation, is reckoned twenty miles from Mutina, and as much from Forum Cornelii in Flaminia, twenty-eight from Ferraria, which was in the next diocese northward, and on the south it had no nearer neighbour than Fesulæ beyond the Apennine, within three miles of Florence. Mutina was fifteen miles from Regium Lepidi, and Regium as much from Parma, and Parma thirty-five from Placentia, according to Ferrarius's computation. Brixellum on the Po was but eight miles from Parma, but on other sides it might have a larger diocese. For Ferrarius says, it was twenty-four miles from Regium Lepidi, and thirty from Cremona. So that these six dioceses were larger than twenty of those about Rome.

Sect. 13.
Of Alpes Cottiae. Out of Æmylia we pass over the river Trebia into one of the Alpine provinces, called Alpes Cottiae, which was divided also from Liguria by the Po, from which it extended to the Tuscan Sea, including part of Piedmont and Montferat, and the whole republic of Genua, and part of the duchy of Milan on this side the Po. In this province Carolus a Sancto Paulo finds ten dioceses. 1. Augusta Taurinorum, Turin. 2. Asta, Asti. 3. Dertona, Tortona. 4. Alba Pompeia, Alba. 5. Aquæ Statiellæ, Acqui. 6. Albingaunum, Albenga. 7. Vigintimilium, Vintimiglia. 8. Bobium, Bobio. 9. Genua. 10. Savona. To which Holstenius⁹³ adds Nicæa, Nizza. These were large dioceses, for Bobium had no nearer neighbour than Placentia, which Ferrarius reckons twenty-five miles from it,⁹⁴ and Genua and Dertona thirty-five. Savona was twenty-six miles from Genua, according to the most accurate computation of Holstenius.⁹⁵ Ferrarius⁹⁶ says, it lay in the middle way between Genua and Albingaunum, at thirty miles' distance. Aquæ Statiellæ was also twenty-two miles from Savona, as Baudrand computes; but not so far from Asta and Alba Pompeia; for Alba was but eight miles to the north of Aquæ, and Asta twelve more beyond that: but east and west these dioceses might extend very wide; for Turin, the nearest neighbour westward, was twenty miles from Asta and twenty-eight from Alba, and Dertona as much to the east, according to Ferrarius's computation. Vigintimilium was twenty miles from Nicæa, and Albingaunum forty from Vigintimilium, and Savona between twenty and thirty from Albingaunum. The whole province was one hundred and fifty miles in length, and half as much in breadth, which made those eleven dioceses equal to fifty of those about Rome and Naples.

Out of this province, passing over Sect. 14.
Of Liguria. the Po, we come into Liguria, the province whereof Milan was the metropolis; though the reader must note, that the last-mentioned province in the Roman historians is more commonly called Liguria, and this Insubria; but we now speak of them as they stood divided under the Christian emperors. This was a large province, including all that lay between the fountain of the Addua and the Po, and the Alps and the Athesis, which divided it from Venetia. Yet here were but ten dioceses to be discovered by Carolus a Sancto Paulo, and the inquisitive diligence of Holstenius after him. 1. Mediolanum, Milan. 2. Eporedia, Jurea. 3. Vercellæ, Vercelli. 4. Novaria. 5. Ticinum, Pavia. 6. Laus Pompeia, Lodi. 7. Cremona. 8. Brixia, Brescia. 9. Bergomum, Bergamo. 10. Comum, Como. Of these Milan was reckoned the largest city in Italy next after Rome. Ferrarius says, it is now computed to have three hundred thousand people in it; but that is much short of its ancient greatness: for Procopius says,⁹⁷ In Justinian's time, when it was taken by the Goths, ⁹² Ferrar. voce Ferraria.

⁹³ Holsten. Annot. in Cluver. Ital. p. 4.

⁹⁴ Ferrar. voce Bobium.

⁹⁵ Holsten. Annot. in Cluver. Ital. p. 9.

⁹⁶ Ferrar. voce Savona.

⁹⁷ Procop. de Bell. Gothic. lib. 2. c. 21. p. 439.

there were three hundred thousand men put to the sword. When St. Ambrose was bishop there, it had several Christian churches, some of which are named by him in his epistles, as the Basilica Portiana⁹⁸ without the walls, and the Basilica Major or Nova within the city, the Basilica Faustæ,⁹⁹ and Basilica Ambrosiana: and when it was all become Christian, we must suppose a great many churches more under one bishop; for it never had two except in the times of the Arian persecution. Without the walls it might also have a large diocese: for no other city among those forementioned was within less than twenty miles of it; and there were some thirty, and some forty miles removed from one another, only Novaria and Vercellæ were but ten miles asunder, being nearer neighbours than any other in this province. Cremona was eighteen miles from Placentia, thirty from Brixia, forty from Ticinum, and, if Ferrarius compute right, no less from Mantua; and yet the territories of Cremona and Mantua joined together, as we may guess from that complaint of Virgil, Mantua vœ miseræ niniùm vicina Cremonæ, that Mantua was a little too near to Cremona, because when Augustus sent his colony of veterans to settle at Cremona, and the territory of Cremona proved too little for them, he ordered fifteen miles to be taken from the territory of Mantua, to make up the deficiency of the former. Whence it is easy to infer, that the dioceses of this province were exceeding large, since the cities were so far removed from one another.

Sect. 15.
Of Rhætia Prima
and Secunda.

In the two next provinces, Rhætia Prima and Secunda, the dioceses were yet larger: for in the former, which lay next to Liguria in the middle of the Alps, and is now the country of the Grisons, Carolus a Sancto Paulo could find but one diocese, which was Curia, now called Coire; and in the other, but three. 1. Augusta Vindelicorum, Ausburg. 2. Quintanæ, or Colonia Augusta Quintanorum, now Kyntzen, in Bâvaria on the Danube. 3. Ratispona, or Regium, and Castra Regina, now Regensburg, or Ratisbone: to which Holstenius adds, Augusta Prætoria, now called Aosta, which is reckoned to Piedmont; and Brixino, now Brixen, in the county of Tirol: for, as I observed before, all that part of Germany which reaches from the Alps to the Danube, was anciently called Rhætia, and reckoned among the provinces of Italy, and the dioceses therein were so large, that these five or six were equal for extent of ground, though not for number of people, to thirty or forty of those near Rome.

Sect. 16.
Of Venetia and Histria.

The last of these seven Italic provinces, was Venetia and Histria, which were always joined together as one province. Venetia was divided from Rhætia and Liguria by the river Athesis, from Æmylia and Flaminia by the Po, and from Noricum Mediterraneum by a line drawn from the fountain of the river Athesis to the rise of the Savus, where Istria was joined to it, lying between the Sinus Tergestinus on the west, and Sinus Flanaticus on the east, which is the utmost bounds of the north-east part of Italy. In Histria Carolus a Sancto Paulo reckons but five dioceses. 1. Forum Julii, now Friuli. 2. Tergestum, Trieste. 3. Parennum, Parenzo. 4. Pola. 5. Æmonia, which he takes to be the same that is now called Citta Nova, but Holstenius says it is Lubiana, or Labach, on the Save. In Venetia he recounts eighteen dioceses. 1. Aquileia. 2. Patavium, Padua. 3. Torcellum. 4. Altinum, Altino. 5. Acelum, Asolo. 6. Tarvisium, Treviso. 7. Marianum. 8. Verona. 9. Gradus, Grado. 10. Nova. 11. Caprulla, Cahorla. 12. Ceneta, Ceneda. 13. Tridentum, Trent. 14. Feltria, Feltri. 15. Bellunum, Belluno. 16. Sabiona, Siben. 17. Opitergium, Oderzo. 18. Celina, Celine. Some of these were very large dioceses: Trent was above thirty miles from Verona; and Sabiona, and Forum Julii, and Æmonia, and Tergestum Parentium, and Pola were no less from one another. The rest were ten or twenty miles removed from any other neighbouring city; only Altinum and Torcellum, Ferrarius¹⁰⁰ says, were but five miles apart, but he questions whether they were both bishops' sees at the same time, and thinks rather that Torcellum came only in the room of Altinum, when that was destroyed by Attila toward the middle of the fifth century. However, the greatest part of these dioceses were, one way or other, of large extent, as most of the northern dioceses in Italy were in comparison of those which lay round about Rome. And now, I think, the observation made in the beginning of this chapter has been fully verified, that in Italy there were anciently some of the smallest and some of the largest dioceses in the world; and yet the same species of episcopacy preserved in them all: the bishop of Eugubium, as St. Jerom words it, being ejusdem meriti, and ejusdem sacerdotii, of the same merit, and equal as to his priesthood with the bishop of Rome. A larger or smaller diocese made no division in the unity of the catholic church.

CHAPTER VI.

OF THE DIOCESES IN FRANCE, SPAIN, AND THE BRITISH ISLES.

I HAVE now gone through all parts of the Christian world, except France, Sect. 1.
Of the ancient boundsand divisions

⁹⁸ Ambros. Ep. 33. ad Marcel. Sororem.

⁹⁹ Id. Ep. 85. ad Soror.

¹⁰⁰ Ferrar. voce Altinum.

of Gallia into seventeen provinces.

Spain, and Britain, which made up three civil dioceses, and twenty-nine or thirty provinces of the Roman empire: but I shall not need to be so nice and particular in inquiring into the bounds and extent of episcopal dioceses in these countries, because their number being but small in proportion to the largeness of the countries, it will easily appear to any man, that the dioceses were large, as they continue to be at this day, though some alterations have been made in their bounds since the original settlement of them. France, as it now stands, is but a part of old Gallia, which included also some of the Belgic, Helvetic, and German provinces. It was at first divided by Augustus into four parts, Narbonensis, Aquitania, Lugdunensis, and Belgica. Afterwards, about the time of Adrian, or Antoninus, as De Marca thinks, these four were made fourteen: Narbonensis was divided into four, Narbonensis, Viennensis, Alpes Maritimæ, and Alpes Graiæ, or Penninæ; Aquitania was made three, two Aquitains and Novempopulania; Lugdunensis likewise three, Lugdunensis Prima and Secunda, and Maxima Sequanorum; and Belgica was turned into four, Belgica Prima and Secunda, and Germania Prima and Secunda. Last of all, about the time of the emperor Gratian, three more provinces were made out of these. For Lugdunensis Tertia, otherwise called Turonia, was taken out of Lugdunensis Secunda, and Lugdunensis Quarta, or Senonia, out of Lugdunensis Prima, and the new province of Narbonensis Secunda out of the province of Vienna. And about this time, or a little after, Viennensis Secunda, otherwise called Arelatensis, was made a province also. Some think also that Gallia had once the name of Septem Provinciæ, The Seven Provinces, because it was divided into so many: but De Marca¹ proves this to be a vulgar error; for it never was divided into seven provinces, but sometimes we meet with the distinction of Gallia and the five provinces, and Gallia and the seven provinces; and in the notitia of the empire, the word seven provinces is once put for seventeen, which occasioned the mistake. Now the five provinces were either nothing but so many parts of the old Gallia Narbonensis, viz. Narbonensis Prima and Secunda, Viennensis, Alpes Maritimæ, and Alpes Graiæ, as Berterius, and De Marca, and Quesnellus account them; or else the four first of those mentioned with the province of Novempopulania or Aquitania Prima, instead of Alpes Graiæ, which Mr. Pagi² shows to be the more probable opinion. So that when the council of Valence, anno 374, inscribe their synodical epistle, Episcopis per Gallias et quinque provincias, these five provinces are to be understood. As also in Philastrius,³ where he speaks of the Priscilianists, the remains of the Manichees, sculking in Spain and the five provinces. The like distinction occurs in the letter of the emperor Maximus to Pope Siricius, and some of Symmachus's epistles, which De Marca mentions. Afterward we meet with the distinction of Gallia and the seven provinces, which occurs in the letters of Pope Zosimus and Boniface, and is thought to owe its name to the emperor Honorius, who ordered seven provinces to meet in the convention of Arles, viz. Narbonensis Prima and Secunda, Viennensis, Alpes Maritimæ, Aquitania Prima and Secunda, and Novempopulania. These are sometimes distinguished from Gallia by the name of Septem Provinciæ, which occasioned the mistake of those who take Gallia in the largest extent and the seven provinces to be the same; whereas it appears, that there were not only seven, but seventeen or eighteen provinces in it. The names of the bishoprics in each province, because they occur not in any modern notitia, I will here subjoin out of Carolus a Sancto Paulo, who has collected them out of the Acts of the ancient councils.

The first of these provinces was that of the Maritime Alps, next to Italy, which had seven dioceses. Sect. 2. Of the dioceses in the province of Alpes Maritimæ. 1. Ebrodunum, Ambrun, made the metropolis of this province in the fifth century, for before it was not so, when it was laid to the charge of Armentarius, bishop of this see, that he was ordained without the consent of the metropolitan,⁴ which had been a frivolous accusation, had he himself then been metropolitan of the province. 2. Dinia, Digne. 3. Nicæa, Nice. 4. Cemelene, Cimies, which was afterwards united to Nice; for in the fifth council of Orleans, Magnus subscribes himself bishop of both churches. Some say it was only six, others thirty miles from Nice. 5. Sanicium, Senez. 6. Glandata, Glandeve, which Baudrand says is now translated to Intervallium, Entrevaux. 7. Ventio, Vence.

In the second province, called Alpes Graiæ, or Penninæ, were but three bishoprics. Sect. 3. Alpes Graiæ, or Penninæ. 1. Tarantasia, the metropolis, which see is now translated to Monasterium, or Moutiers en Tarantaise. 2. Octodurum, Martenach. 3. Sedunum, Syon en Valez, the bishop of which place is now prince of the city, as Baudrand informs us.

The next province westward was Viennensis, divided into Prima and Secunda. Sect. 4. Viennensis Prima and Secunda. In the first were six dioceses. 1. Vienna, the metropolis. 2. Geneva. 3. Gratianopolis, Grenoble. 4. Civitas Albensium, al.

¹ Marca de Primatu Lugdun. n. 66, &c.

² Pagi, Critic. in Baron. an. 374. n. 18.

³ Philastr. Hær. 62. Manichæ. Qui et in Hispania et quinque provinciis latere dicuntur. ⁴ Conc. Reiens. c. 2.

Vivaria and Alba Augusta, Viviers. 5. Mauriana, St. Jean de Maurienne. 6. Valentia, Valence. In the second, called also Provincia Arelatensis, were ten dioceses. 1. Arelate, Arles, the metropolis. 2. Massilia, Marseilles. 3. Avenio, Avignon. 4. Cabellio, Cavaillon. 5. Carpenteracte, Carpentras. 6. Tolonium, al. Telonium, Toulon. 7. Arausio, Orange. 8. Vasio, Vaison. 9. Dia, or Dea Vocontiorum, Die. 10. Tricastini, or Augusta Tricastinorum, now called St. Paul de Trois Chasteaux, which Baudrand reckons three leagues from Avignon, and four from Vaison.

Sect. 5.
Narbonensis Prima
and Secunda.

Out of the province of Vienna eastward was also taken another province, called Narbonensis Secunda, or Aquensis, from the metropolis of it, Aquæ Sextiæ, Aix; beside which there were six other dioceses in the province. 2. Apta Julia, Apt. 3. Reii, Riez. 4. Forum Julii, Frejuz. 5. Vapincum, Gap. 6. Segestero, Cisteron. 7. Antipolis, Antibes, since translated to Grassa in Provence. On the west of Viennensis Secunda, lay the province of Narbonensis Prima, which had ten dioceses. 1. Narbo. 2. Tolosa. 3. Bætiræ, Beziers. 4. Nemausum, Nismes. 5. Luteva, Lodeue. 6. Uctia, Uzes. 7. Carcaso, Carcassone. 8. Agatha, Agde. 9. Helena, Elna. 10. Magalona, an island of the Mediterranean, which see is since translated to Mons Pessulanus, or Montpellier.

Sect. 6.
Of Novempopu-lania.

Westward of Narbonensis Prima lay the province of Novempopulania, along the Pyrenæan mountains to the Aquitanic ocean, wherein were eleven dioceses. 1. Elusa, Eause, the metropolis, whence the province was styled Elusana. The see is since translated and joined to Augusta Ausciorum, which was a second see, now called Aux. 3. Lactoratium, Lectoure. 4. Convenæ, Cominges. 5. Consoranni, Conserans. 6. Vasatæ, Basas. 7. Tarba, Tarbes. 8. Aturum, al. Vico-Julia, Aire. 9. Lascara, Lescar. 10. Olero, Oleron. 11. Aquæ, Acs.

Sect. 7.
Of Aquitania Prima
and Secunda.

Northward of these provinces, from the Garumna to the Ligeris, lay the two provinces of Aquitania Prima and Secunda, the latter of which, bordering upon the ocean, had six very large dioceses. 1. Burdigala, Bourdeaux, the metropolis. 2. Aginnum, Agen. 3. Engolisma, Angoulesme. 4. Santones, al. Mediolanum Santonum, Saintes. 5. Pictavi, Poitiers, where St. Hilary was bishop. 6. Petrocorium, Perigueux. In the other province, which lay eastward from this, were nine as large dioceses. 1. Biturigæ, the metropolis, now called Bourges. 2. Arverni, Clermont. 3. Rutena, Rhodes. 4. Arisita. 5. Cadurcum, Cahors. 6. Lemovica, Limoges. 7. Gabalum, al. Mimate, now Mande. 8. Vellava, al.

Anicium, now le Puy en Velay. 9. Albiga, or Alba Helviorum, Alby, whence the Albigenes, who flourished in these parts, had their denomination.

North and east of Aquitain, lay Gallia Lugdunensis, divided into five provinces, whereof the first had five dioceses. 1. Lugdunum, Lyon, the metropolis. 2. Matisco, Mascon. 3. Cabillonum, Chalons on the Saone. 4. Lingones, Langres. 5. Augustodunum, Autun. The second, called Lugdunensis Secunda, had eight dioceses. 1. Rothomagum, Rouen in Normandy. 2. Ebroica, Eureux. 3. Lexovium, Lisieux. 4. Baioca, Baieux. 5. Constantia, Coutance. 6. Abrinea, Auranches. 7. Sagiugum, Siez. 8. Oximum, Hiesmes, since united to Sagiugum, from whence it is four leagues' distance. Lugdunensis Tertia, otherwise called Turonensis, had seven dioceses. 1. Turones, Tours. 2. Andegavum, Angiers. 3. Cenomanum, Le Mans. 4. Redones, Renes. 5. Namnetes, Nantes. 6. Venetia, Vennes. 7. Aletium, Alet, since translated to Maclovium, anno 1140. Five others are added by some French writers, viz. Briocum, Dola, Trecora, Ossisma, Corisopitum: but Carolus a Sancto Paulo makes some question about their antiquity, because in the time of Carolus Calvus Brittany had but four bishoprics in the whole. Lugdunensis Quarta was that part of France where Paris stands, the metropolis whereof was Senones, Sens. Next to that, 2. Carnutum, Chartres. 3. Antissiodorum, Auxerre. 4. Trecæ, Troyes in Champagne. 5. Aurelia, Orleans. 6. Parisii, Paris. 7. Melda, Meaux. 8. Nivernum, Nevers. Lugdunensis Quinta was otherwise called Maxima Sequanorum; not from Maximus the tyrant, as Carolus a Sancto Paulo and many others think; for it was called so long before, in the time of Diocletian, as De Marca^s shows from an ancient inscription in Gruter. The ancient metropolis of it was Vesontio, or Bisuntio, Besançon. 2. Aventicum, Avenche, which see was since translated to Lausanna. 3. Augusta Rauracorum, Augst, translated to Basil. 4. Vindonissa, Winich, since translated to Constance. 5. Bollica, Belley, which, De Marca says, arose out of the ruins of a more ancient one, which was Noiodunum, Nion, formerly called Colonia Equestris.

The most northern provinces of Gallia were Belgica Prima and Secunda, and Germania Prima and Secunda, which was all the country lying north of the river Matrona from near Paris and Meaux to the Rhine. Belgica Prima had but four dioceses. 1. Augusta Trevirorum, Treves, or Triers, the metropolis. 2. Mediomatricum, Metz. 3. Tullum, Toul. 4. Verodunum, Verdun in Lorraine. In the other Belgica there were ten dioceses. 1. Remi, Rheims. 2. Au-

Sect. 9.
Of Belgica Prima
and Secunda.

^s Marca de Primat. Lugdun. n. 64.

gusta Suessionum, Soissons. 3. Catalaunum, Chalons in Champagne. 4. Laudunum, Leon. 5. Augusta Veromanduorum, Vermand; which being destroyed by the Huns, the see was translated to Neomagus, or Noviodunum, now called Noyon. 6. Cameracum, Cambrai. 7. Tornacum, Tournay. 8. Sylvanectum, Senlis. 9. Bellovacum, Beauvais. 10. Ambianum, Amiens. Some add two more, Teruana, Therouenne, and Bononia, Boulogne. But Carolus a Sancto Paulo thinks these were not very ancient; for he finds no mention of the former before the time of Pope Zachary, anno 750. And the latter was made out of the former a great many centuries after, in the time of Charles V., anno 1350, when the see of Taruanna was divided into three, and translated to Bononia for that part of the diocese which is in France, and to Audomaropolis, or St. Omers, for that part which is in Artois, and to Ipres for the third part in Flanders.

Germanica Prima had but four dioceses. 1. Moguntiacum, Mayence, or Mentis. 2. Argentoratum, Strasburgh. 3. Spira Nemetum, Spire. 4. Wormacia Vangionum, Worms. And Germanica Secunda had but two. 1. Colonia Agrippina, Colen. 2. Tungri, or Aduatuca Tungrorum, Tongres in Brabant: which see was first translated to Trajectum ad Mosam, Maastricht, and from thence to Leodium, or Liege, where it now continues, having the temporal jurisdiction joined to the spiritual, and twenty-four towns or cities subject to its command. Now, I suppose any one that knows any thing of the state of these countries, will easily conclude, that the greatest part of these dioceses were large, as they are at this day: the whole number being but one hundred and twenty-two, when the bounds of France extended much further than they do at present, including some parts of Helvetia, Germany, and Belgium, which are now reckoned distinct countries of themselves.

Out of France, passing over the Pyrenæan mountains, we come into Spain, which with the province of Tingitana in Africa, and the islands called Balears, made up another great civil diocese of the Roman empire, under the prefectus-prætorio Galliarum. The whole country of Spain then was divided only into five provinces, Tarraconensis, Carthaginensis, Bætica, Lusitania, and Gallæcia, and in these provinces there were never above seventy-four or seventy-six episcopal dioceses, when they were most numerous, and they are almost as many at this day.

In the large province of Tarraconensis, which lay next to France, there were only sixteen dioceses. 1. Tarracona, now Tarragona, the metropolis. 2. Dertosa, Tortosa. 3. Cæsaraugusta, Saragossa. 4. Tyrassona, al. Turiasso, now Tarazona. 5. Calagurris, Calahorra. 6. Auca, Oca. 7. Osca, Huesca. 8. Pampelona. 9. Ilerda, Lerida. 10. Barcino, Barcelona. 11. Egara, Tarrassa, a place near Barcelona, about four or six leagues from it, and now united to it. 12. Ausona, al. Ausa, Vich de Ausona. 13. Gerunda, Girone. 14. Emporiæ, Empurias. 15. Orgellum, Urgel. 16. Velia, now Veleia.

Next to this, on the coast of the Mediterranean, lay the province call-^{Sect. 13.} Of Carthaginensis. ed Carthaginensis, from the chief city, Carthago, Carthage, which was the ancient metropolis of the province, though Toledo afterward gained the privilege of being a new metropolis, and at last succeeded to the dignity of the whole province. Beside these two, Carolus a Sancto Paulo reckons twenty-two more dioceses in this province. 1. Complutum, now Alcalá de Henares. 2. Oxoma, Osma. 3. Pallentia. 4. Voleria, now Valera la Vieja. 5. Saguntum, al. Segontia, Sigüenza. 6. Secobia, Segovia. 7. Arcabrica, Arcas. 8. Oretum, Oretó. 9. Valentia, Valencia. 10. Dianium, Denia. 11. Setabis, Xativa. 12. Basti, Baza. 13. Mentesa, Mentexa. 14. Salaria. 15. Acci, now Guadix. 16. Segobriga, Segorbe. 17. Castulo, Gazlona. 18. Bigastrum. 19. Illicias, which some make the same as Alicante, others Origuela, or Elche. 20. Ergavica, a place of more doubtful situation, some taking it for Alcaniz near Toledo, others for Penna Escrita, or Santaver. 21. Eliocrota, now Lorca. 22. Urci, al. Virgi, now Orce.

The next province of Bætica had^{Sect. 14.} Of Bætica. but eleven dioceses. 1. Hispalis, Seville. 2. Italica, now Sevilla la Vieja. 3. Iliapa, Niebla. 4. Astygis, now Ecija. 5. Corduba, Cordova. 6. Egabrum, Caba. 7. Eliberis, Elvira. 8. Malaca, Malaga. 9. Asinda, al. Assidonia, now Medina Sidonia. 10. Tucci, now Martos. 11. Abdara, Adra.

In the province of Lusitania there were but nine dioceses. 1. Emerita,^{Sect. 15.} Of Lusitania. Merida, the metropolis. 2. Abula, Avila. 3. Salamantica, Salamanca. 4. Eborac, Evora. 5. Cauria. Coria. 6. Pax Julia, now Beja, which some by mistake confound with Pax Augusta, now called Badajoz, which is but a modern bishopric. 7. Ossonaba, Estoy. 8. Olyssippo, Lisbon. 9. Egita, Eidania.

Gallæcia was a large province, and yet never had above thirteen or fourteen dioceses. In the council of Lucus Augusti, or Lugo, under King Theodimir, anno 569, a complaint was made that the dioceses here were so large, that the bishops could scarce visit them in a year. Upon which an order was made, that several new bishoprics, and one new metropolis, should be erected: which was accordingly done by the bishops then in council, who made Lugo to be the new metropolis, and raised several other episcopal sees out of the old ones, as is declared⁶ in the Acts of that council. Bracara, now called Braga, was the old metropolis, which after the division had no more than seven dioceses subject to it. 1. Dumium. 2. Portus Calensis, now called El Puerto. 3. Conimbrica, Coymbra. 4. Viseum, Viseo. 5. Lamecum, Lamego. 6. Valentia ad Minium, Valenzia, al. Menno. 7. Legio, Leon. The other metropolis, Lucus Augusti, had but five suffragans. 1. Iria Flavia, El Padron. 2. Auria, Orense. 3. Tude, Tuy. 4. Asturica, Astorga. 5. Brittonia, Bretagna. Of these, Legio and Asturica are thought by many learned men to have been but one diocese in the time of Cyprian, because he joins them together in the same epistle,⁷ writing to the church in both places: but I think the argument is hardly cogent, because he joins Emerita with them in the same inscription. There is another place, which some say had no diocese but a monastery, that is, Dumium near Braga. But this is a great mistake. For though there be an instance or two in ancient history⁸ of bishops being ordained in monasteries without any diocese at all, yet we no where read that their monastery was their diocese; and in the present case it was far otherwise. For, as a learned man has showed,⁹ Dumium had another diocese beside the monastery: in the Acts of the Council of Lugo it is said to have familia regia, the king's court, belonging to it. For Martin Braccarenensis, commonly called the apostle of Gallecia, having converted Theodimir, king of the Suevi, from the Arian heresy, was created bishop in the monastery of Dumium, (which he had built,) not for the service of the monastery, but the king's court, till he was translated to Braccara, or Braga, the metropolis of the province. And further, in the distribution of dioceses made by King Wamba, the bounds of this diocese are marked, from Duma to Albia, and from Rianteca to Adasa: which though they be such obscure places, as geographers take no notice of, yet they argue the diocese to be larger than the monastery; or at least this monastery, like that of Sublaqueum in the diocese of Tibur in Italy, had several villages under its jurisdiction. And so it might have a sufficient diocese, though not so large as the rest of the province of Gallecia, which were so vastly great as to need the wisdom and consideration of a council to contract them.

^{Sect. 12.} Of Tarraconensis.

^{Sect. 11.} The ancient division of the Spanish provinces.

^{Sect. 10.} Of Germanica Prima and Secunda.

Sect. 17.
Of the islands
Majorica, Minorica,
&c.

To these Spanish provinces we must join the Spanish islands, Majorica, Minorica, and Ebusus, which Carolus a Sancto Paulo by mistake places with Sardinia, as appendants of the Roman diocese. Majorica, the largest of the Baleares, was one hundred and ten miles in circuit, yet it never had above one episcopal diocese, whose chief seat was Palma, now called Mallorca, which is the name that the inhabitants at present give to the whole island, by others called Majorca. Minorica, Minorque, is sixty miles in compass, and anciently enjoyed a bishop of its own, whose see was Jamna, now called Citadella, the capital city of the island. Ebusus, now called Yvica, was less than these, yet large enough to make a distinct diocese, being forty-two miles in compass, having a city of the same name, with several villages under its jurisdiction. So that in all the Spanish provinces the dioceses were generally very large, and not one among them whose bounds did not far exceed the limits of a single congregation.

And that this was the true state of the Spanish church in ancient times, appears from some of her most early councils. The council of Eliberis, which was held anno 305, in the beginning of the Diocletian persecution, has a canon, which plainly supposes the dioceses to have country parishes, when it says,¹⁰ If any deacon who has the care of a people, shall baptize any one without a bishop or presbyter, the bishop shall consummate him by his benediction. The same is more plainly intimated by a canon of the first council of Toledo, anno 400, which directs the presbyters of every church¹¹ throughout each diocese to send to the bishop before Easter for chrism, to be used in baptism at Easter, and other solemn times when baptism was to be administered. This supposes the Spanish dioceses to have country parishes, where presbyters and deacons resided without the bishop, and it serves to confirm the account that has been given of the original state and division of those churches.

Out of Spain, we come at last to the British Isles, part of which only was under the Roman government, and called the Britannic diocese; for Ireland and the greatest part of Scotland never came under that denomination: yet in our passage it will not be amiss to say something of them, as well as England, if it were for no other reason but to set aside and censure some fabulous reports that are made of them. When Ireland was first converted, or by whom, is not very material here to be inquired, since before

Sect. 18.
The state of the Spanish church evidenced from some of her most ancient councils.

Sect. 19.
Of Ireland and Scotland.

⁶ Concil. Lucens. Conc. t. 5. p. 874.

⁷ Cypr. Ep. 68. al. 67. Plebibus consistentibus ad Legionem et Asturica.

⁸ See Book IV. chap. 6. sect. 3.

⁹ Maurice, Defenc. of Dioc. Episc. p. 149.

¹⁰ Concil. Eliber. c. 77. Si quis diaconus regens plebem, sine episcopo vel presbytero aliquos baptisaverit, episcopus eos per benedictionem perficere debebit.

¹¹ Concil. Tolet. l. c. 20. Placuit, ex hac die nullum alium nisi episcopum chrisma conficere, et per diocesim destinare, ita ut de singulis ecclesiis ad episcopum ante diem Paschæ diaconi destinentur, qui confectum chrisma ab episcopo destinatum, ad diem Paschæ possint ad tempus deferre.

the time of St. Patrick, anno 433, there is little mention of bishops or dioceses in this kingdom, and after him the accounts of them are so uncertain and dark, that Carolus a S. Paulo does not pretend to give any other catalogue of them, but what he has from Camden and the Provinciale Romanum, both of which are modern accounts: for they make mention of the diocese of Waterford, which, as Dr. Cave and other learned men have observed out of Eadmerus,¹² was not erected till the year 1097, when King Murchertacus and the clergy of his kingdom petitioned Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury, who was then primate of that part of Ireland, to let Waterford be made a bishop's see; to which petition he consented, and ordained one Malchus, whom they had elected, first bishop of the place. Nay, both these catalogues also take notice of four archbishoprics in Ireland, which number of metropolitans was first introduced by Pope Eugenius, anno 1151, as Baronius has observed out of Roger Hoveden; and the same thing is noted by Matthew Paris, Simeon Dunelmensis, Gervasius Chronicon, and others of our English writers. Yet because we have no catalogues of Irish dioceses older or more authentic than these, it will not be amiss to insert them in this place. That in Camden has the four archbishoprics and their suffragans in this order.

Archiepiscopo Armachano subsunt

1. Midensis, vel Elnamirand. 2. Dunensis, al. Dundaletghlas. 3. Colchorensis, al. Lugundunensis. 4. Connerensis. 5. Ardachadensis. 6. Rathbotensis. 7. Rathlucensis. 8. Daln-ligüirensis. 9. Dearrihensis.

Sub archiepiscopo Dublinensi.

1. Glendelacensis. 2. Fernensis. 3. Osseriensis, al. De Canic. 4. Lechlinensis. 5. Kildarensis.

Sub archiepiscopo Cassiliensi.

1. Laoniensis de Kendalnam. 2. Limricensis. 3. De Insula Gathay. 4. De Cellumabrath. 5. Melicensis, al. de Emeleth. 6. Rossiensis, al. Roscreensis. 7. Waterfordiensis, al. de Batilfordian. 8. Lismorensis. 9. Clonensis, al. de Cluanania. 10. Coreagiensis. 11. De Rosalither. 12. Ardefertensis.

Sub archiepiscopo Tuamensi.

1. Duatensis, al. Killmacduoc. 2. De Mageo. 3. Enachdunensis. 4. De Cellaiaro. 5. De Roscomon. 6. Clonfertensis. 7. Achadensis. 8. Ladensis, al. Killalet. 9. De Conany. 10. De Killmunduach. 11. Elphinensis.

The other catalogue in the Provinciale Romanum, published by Carolus a S. Paulo in the Appendix to his Geography, advances the number of suffragans to fifty-three, in the following order.

Sub archiepiscopo Armachano.

1. Connerinensis. 2. Deconnannas. 3. Dedamialiagg. 4. Dedundaleglas. 5. Deardarchad. 6. Dedarrich. 7. Ingundunum. 8. Deralhboth. 9. Dunensis, al. Drumorensis. 10. Elualnirand, al. Midensis. 11. Derathlurig. 12. Renensis, al. Reulensis, al. Crocorensis. 13. Cluanensis, al. Cluanerdensis. 14. Rochinosensis, al. Rathbotensis. 15. Artagadonensis, al. Ardacadensis. 16. Conerensis. 17. Heugamensis.

Sub archiepiscopo Dublinensi.

1. Glendelacensis. 2. Caldetensis, al. Kiscarensis. 3. Glensis, al. Gluisonensis. 4. Ossinensis. 5. Darensis. 6. Gaininch. 7. Licelinensis.

Sub archiepiscopo Cassellensi.

1. Decendaluensis, al. Laonensis. 2. Derostreenensis, al. Wldifordianus. 3. Deartefertensis. 4. Lunech. 5. Lismorensis. 6. Firmaberensis, al. Fymbarrensis. 7. De Insula. 8. Deduanamensis, al. Cluanensis. 9. Laudensis. 10. Carthax. 11. Tubricensis. 12. Decellinabrach. 13. Deconeagia, vel Coreagiensis. 14. Artfertelensis. 15. Denulech, al. Umblicensis. 16. Derosailitchir. 17. Waterfordensis.

Sub archiepiscopo Tuamensi.

1. Demageonensis. 2. Achadensis. 3. Nelfinensis. 4. Decellaid. 5. Deconairi. 6. Eacdunensis. 7. Roscomon. 8. Decelmundaich. 9. Cluarterfentensis. 10. Deculuanferd. 11. Duacensis. 12. Bladensis.

This seems to have been the greatest number of bishops that ever Ireland had since it was a Christian nation. For as to the pretence of some modern writers, that there were at one time no less than three hundred and sixty-five bishops, ordained by St. Patrick, it is solidly refuted by Dr. Maurice, who shows plainly,¹³ that the story is not to be understood of so many bishops at once, but of that number in the reign of four kings successively, and in the compass of a hundred years: which any one that carefully reads Bishop Usher's Antiquities,¹⁴ whence the ground of the story is fetched, will easily discern. And it is no hard matter to conceive then, how there might be three hundred and fifty, or, as Nennius tells the story, three hundred and sixty-five bishops in the compass of a whole century, though there were not above fifty or threescore at any one time living together. Another error committed by Carolus a Sancto Paulo in reference to the bishops of this nation, which makes the whole number of them subject to a single abbot, has been already rectified in speaking of the ascetics, where I have showed,¹⁵ he mistakes Hibernia for the little isle of Huy in the north of Scotland, where a monastery was founded by Columbanus, the abbots of which by an unusual custom, as Bede calls it, had some sort of superiority over the province of the northern Picts, and the provincial bishops too; but this has no relation to Ireland, nor any other part of Scotland than what has been now mentioned.

¹² Eadmer. Hist. lib. 2. p. 36. Vid. Cave, Hist. Literar. vol. 2. p. 373.

¹³ Maurice, Defence of Dioces. Episcop. p. 155.

¹⁴ Usher, Antiquit. Eccl. Brit. p. 490.

As to the original state of dioceses in Scotland, Carolus a Sancto Paulo, for want of light from ancient history, could give no account of them, and therefore he only sets down the modern names. Under the archbishop of St. Andrews eight dioceses: 1. Dunkeld. 2. Brechin. 3. Aberdeen. 4. Rosse. 5. Moravia, or Muray. 6. Caithness. 7. Dumblain. 8. The islands called Orchades. Under the archbishop of Glasgow three: Candida Casa, or Whitern, Lismore, and the Islands, that is, the Hebrides, or Western Islands, whereof Iona was one of the chief. The principal town of this island, called Sodora, was made a bishop's see by Gregory IV., anno 840, whence the bishop of all those forty-four islands, together with the Isle of Man, which then was but a part of that diocese, had the name of Episcopus Sodorensis. But when the Isle of Man fell into the hands of the English, the Western Islands withdrew their obedience from their ancient bishop, who commonly lived in this island, and set up another bishop of their own, who for a long time retained the title of Sodorensis, but at last he relinquished that title to the bishop of the Isle of Man, and took the name of Insulanus, bishop of the Isles, which he still retains. The Provinciale Romanum makes no mention either of this diocese of these islands, or that other of the Orchades; but speaks of one called Dearegarchel, belonging to the pope, and makes Glasgow only a suffragan to St. Andrews. By which it appears that it is not many ages since Glasgow was made an archbishopric, the bishop of St. Andrews being then the only metropolitan among them. But about ancient dioceses we must not be very solicitous: for whatever fabulous writers affirm, it is certain from Bede, that no part of this nation possessed by the Picts, was converted till the fifth century, when first, in the time of Arcadius and Honorius, the southern Picts were converted by Ninias, a Briton, who built a church at Candida Casa, which was the first cathedral in that part of Scotland, and which gave denomination of Whitern to the place, as Bede observes,¹⁶ because the church was built of stone, which was not a very usual thing among the Britons in those days. The northern Picts were not converted till above a hundred and fifty years after this. For their apostle was Columbanus, the famous monk, who came out of Ireland in the time of Justin junior, anno 565, to preach the gospel to them, as Bede informs us in the same place. So that it would be in vain to search after episcopal dioceses before we have any certainty that Christianity was planted among them. In the following ages we have no particular account of any other diocese, save this of Candida Casa, in Bede, or any other authentic writer. For though they speak of bishops both among the southern and the northern Picts, yet they take no notice of the names of their sees. Whence some have concluded, that the Scottish bishops had no proper sees, but were ordained at large for the whole country; and others, that there was but one bishop for all the region. The first of which opinions is incredible, because it is against the known rule of the catholic church, which forbade any bishop to be ordained at large: and the other is expressly refuted by Bede,¹⁷ who speaks of several bishops in the province of the northern Picts; and by the writer of the Life of Ninias, in Bishop Usher's Antiquities, who says,¹⁸ that Ninias, having converted the southern Picts, ordained them presbyters, and consecrated them bishops, and divided the whole region into certain parochie, or dioceses, and so returned to his own church again, meaning Candida Casa, before mentioned. Whence it is evident, there were bishops both among the northern and southern Picts, though the names of their dioceses be not mentioned." As for the diocese of Candida Casa, Bishop Usher truly observes, that it was not properly in any part of the Picts' dominions, but in that part or province of the Romish Britain, which was called Valentia, and afterwards Bernicia, by Bede, when it was under the dominion of the Saxons. Bishop Usher¹⁹ thinks it was also sometimes called the kingdom of Cumbria or Cumberland; and that the diocese of Candida Casa was sometimes of equal extent with that kingdom, reaching from Glasgow on the river Clota or Cluyd to Stanemore-cross in the borders of Westmoreland; and that in the time of Kentigern the see was removed to Glasgow. But when the Irish Scots had seized this country, and given it the name of Galloway, this and the neighbouring regions were all subjected to the bishop of Sodora, whose residence was in the Isle of Man, till Malcolm III., king of Scots, made Candida Casa a bishop's see again, and assigned it the country of Galloway for its diocese, which continues to be so to this day. I

¹⁵ See Book VII. chap. 3. sect. 14.

¹⁶ Bede, lib. 3. c. 4.

¹⁷ Ibid.

¹⁸ Vit. Ninie, ap. Usser. Antiq. p. 350. Ordinavit pres- byteros, episcopus consecravit, et totam terram per certas parochias divisit: confirmatisque in fide omnibus, ad ecclesiam suam est regressus.

¹⁹ Usser. Antiq. p. 319.

cannot give any such particular account of any other diocese in the kingdom of Scotland for want of certain records; but this is certain, that from the first conversion of it, first by Ninias, and then by Columbanus, they had several bishops among the Picts; part of whose country being made tributary, as well as Valentia, to the Saxon kings of Northumberland, their bishops consequently became subject to the metropolitan of York, from whose hands they sometimes had their ordination.

There remains only one country more to be examined, which is our own part of the British nation; a country that embraced the Christian faith as early as any of the western parts of the world, and therefore may be presumed to have received the same form of government that we have found in all other churches. It has been noted before, that the Britannic diocese was divided by the Romans at first into three provinces, and then into five; but by the injury of time, we have no complete account of what bishoprics were erected in every province. They who speak of a precise number of flamens and archflamens turned into so many archbishops and bishops, seem rather to deliver their own fancies than relate true history. That which is certain in the case, is this: there were here in the beginning of the fourth century such episcopal churches as were in all other nations; for the bishops of these churches were summoned to councils as others were. There were British bishops in the council of Arles, Eborius²⁰ de civitate Eboracensi, Restitutus de civitate Londinensi, Adelphus de civitate Colonia Londinensium. The last of which Holstenius,²¹ following Camden, and Selden in his Notes upon Eutychius, thinks ought rather to be read Colonia Camalodunensium; which some take to be Colchester, others Maldon, others Walden, in Essex. But a late learned antiquary,²² in his posthumous observations upon Antonine's Itinerary of Britain, has happily discovered that the true reading should in all probability be Colonia Lindi, which is the old Roman name for Lincoln, as he shows not only out of Antonine and Ptolemy, who call it Lindum, but out of the anonymous geographer of Ravenna, who more expressly styles it Lindum Colonia; which with a little variation is the name that is given it also by Bede,²³ who calls it Lindocolina, and the region thereabout Provincia Lindisi, whence, I presume, comes the name of Lindsey Coast, which is the name of one part of that province to this day. But to return to the ancient bishops of this nation.

Some authors say there were British bishops in the council of Nice; but that does not so evidently appear from ancient history. It is more certain there were three bishops from Britain in the council of Ariminum, as Sulpicius Severus²⁴ informs us. And Athanasius also²⁵ takes notice of British bishops in the council of Sardica, anno 347. And Hilary inscribes his book, de Synodis, to the bishops²⁶ of the British provinces, among many others. Yet none of these authors tell us precisely the number of the whole college, and therefore we can only conjecture from the remains of those British bishops which continued in Wales after the Saxon conquests, and were there at the coming of Austin into England. Bede takes notice of seven of those,²⁷ which came to the synod of Worcester, or Austin's oak, to confer with Austin about the settlement of the church. And over these there was also a metropolitan, to whom they professed subjection in the council which was the archbishop of Menevia, or St. David's, or, as they term him, the archbishop of Caerleon upon Uske, because that was the ancient metropolitan see, before it was translated to St. David's. The names of the other suffragans, as some of the British historians²⁸ record them in Latin, were then Herefordensis, Tavensis, Pater-nensis, Banchorensis, Elviensis, Viciensis, Morganensis; that is, Hereford, Landaff, Lan-Patern, Bangor, St. Asaph, Worcester, and Morgan. Now, if the number of bishops in other provinces was answerable to this, we may conclude, there were more bishops before the invasion of the Saxons than there are at this day. But when Austin came into England, he found none except the forementioned. However, Gregory the Great gave him orders to settle twenty-six bishops, twelve bishops suffragans to the bishop of London, and as many subject to the metropolitan of York, and reserve to himself the primacy over the whole nation.²⁹ Yet this was rather a scheme laid for future ages, when the whole nation should be converted, than any present settlement or constitution of the church. For above fifty years after this, there were not above seven bishops in all the heptarchy, or seven Saxon kingdoms, as appears from the account which Bede gives of the council of Herudford, anno 673, where were present Theodore, archbishop of Dorovernia or Canterbury,³⁰ Bisi, bishop of the East Angles, Wilfrid, bishop of the Northumbrians, Putta, bishop of Rochester, Leutherius, bishop of the West Saxons, and Winfrid, bishop of the whole province of the Mercians. In which council³¹ a canon was made, ²⁰ Concil. Arelat. l. an. 314.

²¹ Holsten. Annot. in Carol. a S. Paulo, p. 108.

²² Dr. Gale, Not. in Antonin. Iter. Britan. p. 96.

²³ Bede, lib. 2. c. 16.

²⁴ Sulpic. lib. 2. p. 109. ²⁵ Athan. Apol. 2. p. 720.

²⁶ Hilar. de Synod. Provinciarum Britanniarum Episcopis.

²⁷ Bed. Hist. Gent. Anglor. lib. 2. c. 2.

²⁸ Galfrid. Monumeth. Hist. lib. 8. c. 4. Vid. Powel. Not. in Girald. Cambrens. Itinerar. Cambriae, lib. 2. p. 170.

²⁹ Bed. Hist. Gent. Anglor. lib. 1. c. 29.

³⁰ Bed. lib. 4. c. 5.

³¹ Concil. Herudford. c. 9. ap. Bed. ibid. In commune

That the number of bishops should be augmented, as the number of converts should increase. But nothing was done for the present, save that Bisi or Bifus, bishop of the East-Angles, being grown old, two others, Æcca and Badwin, were consecrated in his room: and from that time to the age in which Bede lived, that province had two bishops, as our author notes in the same place. These were the bishops of Elmham and Dunwich, which were afterward united, and the see removed to Thetford, and from thence to Norwich, whose bishops succeed to the whole kingdom of the East-Angles. So that in that age a kingdom and a diocese were almost commensurate. In the kingdom of Northumberland there were at first but two bishops, whose sees were York and Lindisfarne. But not long after, anno 678, Ecgfrid, king of Northumberland, having expelled Wilfrid, bishop of York, from his see, four or five bishops were ordained in his room; one in the province of Deira; another in the province of Bernicia; a third at Hagulstade, or Hexam, in Northumberland; a fourth in the province of the Piets, which was then subject to the English; and a fifth in the province of Lindissi, as Bede³² calls it, which was lately taken out of the diocese and kingdom of Mercia, and not long after laid to it again. The great kingdom of Mercia, (comprehending the counties of Gloucester, Hereford, Worcester, Warwick, Leicester, Cambridge, Rutland, Northampton, Lincoln, Nottingham, Bedford, Buckingham, Oxford, Derby, Stafford, Shropshire, Cheshire, and part of Hertfordshire,) was at first but the diocese of one bishop, whom Bede commonly calls the bishop of the Angli-Mediterranei, or Mercians, whose see was Lichfield, the royal seat and metropolis of the kingdom of Mercia; till about the year 678, a new see was erected at Sidnacester in Lincolnshire, and some time after another at Dorchester in Oxfordshire, which were afterward united and removed to Lincoln. Out of this large diocese also the sees of Worcester and Hereford were taken, as Ely was out of that part which fell to Lincoln: not to mention the dioceses of Chester, Peterborough, Oxford, and Gloucester, which had their rise out of the same at the Reformation. The diocese of Winchester was also very large at first, containing all the kingdoms of the West Saxons, till it was divided by King Ina between Winchester and Sherborn, anno 705. The latter of which was afterward subdivided into the dioceses of Cornwall, Devonshire, Somersetshire, Wiltshire, and Dorsetshire, some of which being united again, made up the dioceses of Exeter, Wells, Salisbury, and Bristol, as they now stand in the present frame and constitution of the church. I think it needless to carry this inquiry any further, since what has been already suggested sufficiently shows, that the dioceses in England were anciently much larger than they are now, and that it has ever been the wisdom of the church to multiply and contract them. Though many of them still remain so large, that if they be compared with some of the ancient Italian dioceses, one of them will be found to be equal to ten or twenty of those which lay round about Rome.

I shall conclude this chapter with a few ancient canons, which confirm the account that has been given of episcopal dioceses throughout the world, as supposing them generally to have country regions and country parishes belonging to them. The council of Neocæsarea, which was held some years before the council of Nice, makes express mention³³ of προεσβύτεροι ἐπιχώριοι, country presbyters, who are forbidden to officiate in the city church, save only in the absence of the bishop or city presbyters. The council of Antioch has two canons of the same import. The one describes a bishop's diocese³⁴ to be a city and all the region that was subject to it, wherein he might ordain presbyters and deacons, and order all things according to his own judgment, without consulting his metropolitan. The other is a provision concerning the chorepiscopi,³⁵ who were seated in the villages and regions about the city, that they should govern the churches committed to them, and content themselves with that care, ordaining readers, subdeacons, and exorcists; but not presbyters or deacons, unless commissioned to it by the city bishop, to whom both they and their region were subject. A like provision is made by the council of Nice,³⁶ in case a Novatian bishop should return to the unity of the catholic church, that then the catholic bishop might provide him the place of a chorepiscopus in some part of his diocese, that there might not be two bishops in one city. And indeed all the canons that mention the chorepiscopi, are full proof that a diocese was not only a city, but a country region, over which those chorepiscopi presided, under the inspection of the city bishop, to whom they were accountable. The canons of Sardica³⁷ and Laodicea,³⁸ do plainly suppose the same thing, when they prohibit bishops to be ordained in small cities or villages, because a presbyter or itinerant visitor might be sufficient to take care of them. So in the African canons, one orders the same as the council of Toledo, That every presbyter³⁹ throughout the diocese, who has the care of a church, shall have recourse to his own bishop for chrism to be used at Easter. And another⁴⁰ says, No bishop shall leave his principal church, to go to reside upon any other church in the diocese. Which

Sect. 21.
The whole account confirmed from some ancient canons of the church.

tractatum est, ut plures episcopi crescente numero fidelium arguerent, sed de hac re ad præsens silemus.

³² Bed. lib. 4. c. 12.

³³ Concil. Neocæsar. c. 13.

³⁴ Conc. Antioch. c. 9. ³⁵ Ibid. c. 10. ³⁶ Conc. Nic. c. 8.

³⁷ Concil. Sardic. c. 6. ³⁸ Concil. Laodic. c. 57.

³⁹ Concil. Carthag. 4. c. 36. ⁴⁰ Ibid. 5. c. 5.

canons speak plain nonsense, unless it be supposed that there were then other churches in the diocese beside the mother-church.

The bishop's obligation to visit his diocese, is a further proof of the same thing. For this was a necessary consequent of having several churches at a distance under his jurisdiction: such as he could not personally attend himself, he was obliged to visit, and see that they were provided of a proper incumbent, and that every thing was performed in due order. St. Austin and St. Basil,⁴¹ who had pretty large dioceses, speak often upon this account of their being employed in their visitations. And the rule in some places was to visit ordinarily once a year, as appears from the council of Tarraco in Spain, which lays this injunction on bishops,⁴² Because it was found by experience, that many churches in their dioceses were left destitute and neglected, therefore they were obliged to visit them once a year. And if a diocese was so large, that a bishop could not perform this duty annually, that was thought a reasonable cause to divide the diocese, and lay some part of the burden upon a new bishop; which was the reason assigned in the council of Lugo for dividing the large diocese of Gallecia, as has been observed before⁴³ in speaking of the Spanish churches. St. Jerom has a remark upon the exercise of confirmation, which also mightily confirms this notion of ancient episcopal dioceses. He says,⁴⁴ it was the custom of the churches, when any persons were baptized by presbyters or deacons in villages, castles, or other remote places, for the bishop to go to them and give them imposition of hands, in order to receive the Holy Ghost; and that many places lay at so great a distance, that the parties baptized died before the bishop could come to visit them. Which is a plain description of such dioceses as we have generally found in every part of the catholic church, some few provinces excepted, where the number of cities and populousness of the country made dioceses more numerous and of less extent than in other places.

CHAPTER VII.

THE NOTITIA, OR GEOGRAPHICAL DESCRIPTION OF THE BISHOPRICS OF THE ANCIENT CHURCH, AS FIRST MADE BY THE ORDER OF LEO SAPIENS, COMPARED WITH SOME OTHERS.

FOR the fuller proof of what has been asserted in the last chapters, and to give the reader a clear view of the state of the ancient church, I shall here subjoin one of the notitias, or catalogues of bishoprics contained in the five greater patriarchates, Constantinople, Rome, Antioch, Jerusalem, and Alexandria, according to the account that was taken first by the order of the emperor Leo Sapiens about the year 891. For though this does not come up to the antiquity of those other records, which I have generally made use of in this work; yet, being the most ancient and perfect account we have in the kind, and agreeing with the scattered remains of antiquity of this nature, it will be useful as a collateral evidence, to corroborate the account that has been given of the division and extent of dioceses in the primitive church. And I the rather choose to insert it here, to satisfy the curiosity of many of my readers, to whose view perhaps this notitia may not otherwise come, being scarce to be met with but in books of great rarity or great price, which fall not into the hands of every ordinary reader. The first of this kind was published by Leunclavius, in his Jus Græco-Romanum,¹ anno 1596, in Greek and Latin, under the name of Leo Sapiens, the reputed author of it. After which some others, but imperfect, were set forth by Carolus a Sancto Paulo,² in his Geography of the Ancient Church. The defects of which were supplied by Jacobus Goar, from a MS. in the French king's library, which he published at the end of Codinus,³ among the Byzantine historians, anno 1648; and by Bishop Beverege, from a MS. in the Bodleian library, published in his *Notes*⁴ upon the Pandects, anno 1672. The last of which being acknowledged to be the most perfect in the kind, has been since reprinted by the learned Schelstrate,⁵ with some notes and observations upon the defects and variations of all the former; which, having revised and compared them together, I shall here present to the curious reader, that he may have them all together in one view.

⁴¹ Basil. Ep. 264.

⁴² Concil. Tarraco. c. 8. Reperimus nonnullas diœsanas ecclesias esse destitutas. Ob quam rem hac constitutione decrevimus, ut annuis vicibus episcopo diœceses visitentur, &c.

⁴³ See sect. 14. of this chapter.

⁴⁴ Hieron. Dial. cont. Lucifer. c. 4. Non abnuo hanc esse ecclesiarum consuetudinem, ut ad eos qui longe in minoribus urbibus per presbyteros et diaconos baptizati sunt, episcopus ad invocationem Sancti Spiritus manum impositu-rus excurrat. And a little after, Alioquin si episcopi tantum imprecatione Spiritus Sanctus defuit, lugendi sunt qui in villulis, aut in castellis, aut in remotioribus locis per presbyteros aut diaconos baptizati, ante dormierunt, quam ab episcopis inviserentur.

¹ Leunclav. Jus. Gr. Rom. t. 2. p. 88.

² Carol. a S. Paulo, Append. ad Geograph. Sacr.

³ Codin. de Offic. Constant. in Append. p. 337.

⁴ Bevereg. Not. in Can. 36. Concil. Trull.

⁵ Schelstrat. de Concil. Antioch. Dissert. 4. cap. 13. p. 425.

The order of presidency of the most holy patriarchs. 1. Of Rome. 2. Constantinople. 3. Alexandria. 4. Antioch. 5. Ælia, or Jerusalem.

The order of presidency of the metropolitans, and autocephali, and bishops, subject to the apostolical throne of this divinely preserved and imperial city, viz. Constantinople.

PROVINCES.	METROPOLITANS.
1. Cappadocia.	1. Cæsarea.
2. Asia.	2. Ephesus.
3. Europa.	3. Heraclea in Thrace.
4. Galatia.	4. Ancyra.
5. Hellespontus.	5. Cyzicum.
6. Lydia.	6. Sardes.
7. Bithynia.	7. Nicomedia.
8. The same.	8. Nice.
9. The same.	9. Chalcedon.
10. Pamphylia.	10. Sida.
11. Armenia.	11. Sebastea.
12. Elenopontus.	12. Amasea.
13. Armenia.	13. Melitine.
14. Cappadocia.	14. Tyana.
15. Paphlagonia.	15. Gangra.
16. Honorias.	16. Claudiopolis.
17. Pontus Polemoniacus.	17. Neocæsarea.
18. Galatia.	18. Pissinus, or Justinianople.
19. Lycia.	19. Myra.
20. Caria.	20. Stauropolis.
21. Phrygia Cappatiana.	21. Laodicea.
22. Phrygia Salutaris.	22. Synada.
23. Lycaonia.	23. Iconium.
24. Pisidia.	24. Antioch.
25. Pamphylia.	25. Perga, or Sileum.
26. Cappadocia.	26. Moccusus.
27. Lazica.	27. Phasis.
28. Thracia.	28. Philippopolis.
29. Rhodope.	29. Trajanople.
30. Insulæ Cyclades.	30. Rhodes.
31. Æmimontus.	31. Adrianople.
32. Æmimontus.	32. Martianople.
33. Phrygia Pacatiana.	33. Hierapolis.

Here ends the account of provinces and metropolitans in the notitia of Bishop Beverege and Goar, but in Leunclavius these other metropolitans are added without any mention of provinces at all. 34. Thessalonica. 35. Corinth. 36. Crete. 37. Athens. 38. Seleucia. 39. Patræ. 40. Trapezus. 41. Calabria. 42. Larissa. 43. Naupactus. 44. Philippi. 45. Dyrachium. 46. Smyrna. 47. Catana. 48. Ammorium. 49. Camachus. 50. Cotyaium. 51. Severiana. 52. Mitylene. 53. Novæ Patræ. 54. Euchaita. 55. Amastris. 56. Chonæ. 57. Hydrus. 58. Kelzene. 59. Colonia. 60. Thebæ. 61. Serræ. 62. Pompeiopolis. 63. Rossia. 64. Alania. 65. Ænus. 66. Tiberiopolis. 67. Achaia. 68. Cerasus.

69. Nacolia. 70. Germania. 71. Madyta. 72. Apa-mea. 73. Basileum. 74. Drystra. 75. Nazianzus. 76. Coreyra. 77. Abydus. 78. Methymna. 79. Christianopolis. 80. Rusium. 81. Lacedæmonia. 82. Naxia. 83. Attalia. To which the scholiast adds three more, Sebastopolis, Euripus, and Cybistis Herculis.

After the metropolitans, follow the autocephali, or independent bishops, which the notitia in Leunclavius calls archbishops: they were such as had neither metropolitans above them, nor suffragans under them, being immediately subject to the patriarch only, as Goar's notitia informs us. In Bishop Beverege's notitia they are as follows.

PROVINCES.	AUTOCEPHALI.
1. Mysia.	1. Odyssus.
2. Scythia.	2. Tomi.
3. Europa.	3. Bizya.
4. Paphlagonia.	4. Pompeiopolis.
5. Asia.	5. Smyrna.
6. Isauria.	6. Leontopolis.
7. Rhodope.	7. Maronæa.
8. Bithynia.	8. Apamea.
9. Rhodope.	9. Maximinianopolis.
10. Galatia.	10. Germia.
11. Europa.	11. Arcadiopolis.
12. Thracia.	12. Beræa.
13. Lesbus.	13. Mitylene.
14. Hellespont.	14. Parium.
15. Caria.	15. Melitus, al. Miletus.
16. Thracia.	16. Nicopolis.
17. Insulæ.	17. Proconesus.
18. Rhodope.	18. Anchialus.
19. Europa.	19. Selymbria.
20. Lesbus.	20. Methymne.
21. Bithynia.	21. Cius.
22. Europa.	22. Aprus.
23. Rhodope.	23. Cypsala.
24. Zicchia.	24. Cherson.
25. Zicchia.	25. Bosphori.
26. Zicchia.	26. Nicopsis.
27. Isauria.	27. Cotrada.
28. Elenopontus, al. Helenopontus.	28. Euchetæ.
29. Cyclades Insulæ.	29. Carpathus.
30. Rhodope.	30. Ænus.
31. Europa.	31. Drizapara, al. Mesena.
32. Hemimontus.	32. Mesembria.
33. Armenia.	33. Heracliopolis, al. Phylactoe.
34. Abasgia.	34. Sebastopolis.
35. Pontus Polemoniacus.	35. Trapezus.
36. Paphlagonia.	36. Amastris.
37. Lycaonia.	37. Misthia.
38. Pisidia.	38. Neapolis.

PROVINCES.	AUTOCEPHALI.
39. Mare Ægeum.	39. Ægene.
40. Phrygia Salutaris.	40. Cotyaium.
41. Pamphylia.	41. Selga.

To these, in Goar's notitia, are added two more, Delca, or Derce, and Reni in Armenia. But that in Leunclavius has but thirty-nine, whereof sixteen are different names, viz. Nice, Messana, Garella, Brisis, Carabyzia, Lemnus, Leucas, Cudræ, Soteropolis, Pedachthoa, Eroina, Gotthia, Sugdaia, Phullæ, Pharsala, and Matracha. And several of those which in the Bodleian notitia are called autocephali, are in Leunclavius reckoned among the metropolitans, as Trapezus, Smyrna, Cotyaium, Mitylene, Amastris, Pompeiopolis, Ænus, and Apamea. Whence it is easy to conclude, that archbishops and autocephali were then a sort of titular metropolitans, who had the privilege of being independent, though they had no suffragan bishops under them.

NOW FOLLOW THE PARTICULAR PROVINCES, WITH THE NUMBER OF BISHOPRICS CONTAINED IN EACH OF THEM.

Province of Cappadocia.

1. Cæsarea, the metropolis. 2. Thermæ Regiæ. 3. Nyssa. 4. Methodiopolis Armeniæ. 5. Camuliana. 6. Ciscissus, or Cissus: to which are added in Leunclavius. 7. Euaisa. 8. Serias. 9. Arathia. 10. Æpolia.

Province of Asia.

1. Ephesus, the metropolis. 2. Hypepæ. 3. Tralles. 4. Magnesia ad Mæandrum. 5. Elea. 6. Adramyttium. 7. Assus. 8. Gargara. 9. Mastaura. 10. Caloe. 11. Bryulla. 12. Pittamne. 13. Myrine. 14. Phocia. 15. Aurilopolis, al. Aureliopolis. 16. Nisa, al. Nyssa. 17. Maschacomæ. 18. Metropolis. 19. Baretti. 20. Magnesia. 21. Aninates. 22. Pergamus. 23. Anca. 24. Priene. 25. Arcadiopolis. 26. Novæ Aulæ. 27. Templum Jovis. 28. Augaza. 29. Sion. 30. Colophon. 31. Levedus, al. Lebedus. 32. Teus. 33. Erythræ. 34. Clazomenæ. 35. Attadri, al. Antandri. 36. Theodosiopolis, al. Peperine. 37. Cymæ. 38. Palæopolis: to which are added in Leunclavius, Thyrcæ in Chliara; but Phocia, Magnesia, and Clazomenæ are wanting.

Here the province of Thracia and Macedonia is interposed in Leunclavius.

1. Heraclea, the metropolis. 2. Theodoropolis. 3. Rhædestus. 4. Panium. 5. Hexamilium. 6. Calliopolis. 7. Peristasis. 8. Chariopolis. 9. Chalceis. 10. Daoneum. 11. Madyta. 12. Pamphilus. 13. Medea. 14. Lizicus. 15. Sergentza. 16. Metra. 17. Tzurulloec. 18. Athyra.

In the other notitias the last province is called the province of Europa; but it has but six bishoprics assigned to it, viz.

1. Heraclea. 2. Panium. 3. Callipolis. 4. Cherronesus. 5. Cylæ. 6. Redestus.

Province of Galatia.

1. Ancyra, the metropolis. 2. Tabia, al. Attabia. 3. Heliopolis. 4. Aspona. 5. Berinopolis. 6. Mizzus. 7. Cina. 8. Anastasiopolis.

Province of Hellespont.

1. Cyzicum, the metropolis. 2. Germe. 3. Pœmanium. 4. Oce. 5. Baris. 6. Adrianotheræ. 7. Lampsacus. 8. Abydus. 9. Dardanus. 10. Ilium. 11. Troas. 12. Pæonia. 13. Melitopolis.

Province of Lydia.

1. Sardes, the metropolis. 2. Philadelphia. 3. Tripolis. 4. Thyatira. 5. Seta. 6. Arilliapolis, al. Aureliopolis. 7. Gordi. 8. Troalli. 9. Sala. 10. Silandus. 11. Mæonia. 12. Fanum Apollinis. 13. Hyrcanis. 14. Mustina. 15. Arcastus, al. Acarusus. 16. Apollonias. 17. Attalia. 18. Baga. 19. Balandus. 20. Mesotymolus. 21. Hierocæsarea. 22. Dale. 23. Stratoneca. 24. Cerasia. 25. Sattala. 26. Gabbala. 27. Hermocapelia.

Province of Bithynia.

1. Nicomedia. 2. Prusa, or Theopolis. 3. Prænetus. 4. Helenopolis. 5. Basilinopolis. 6. Daschylum. 7. Apollonias. 8. Adriana. 9. Cæsarea. 10. Gallus, or Lophi. 11. Daphnusia. 12. Eriste.

The same Province.

1. Nice. 2. Modrina, al. Mela, or Melina. 3. Linoe. 4. Taius. 5. Gerduservæ. 6. Numericæ. 7. Maximianæ. It is added in Leunclavius, that Chalcedon in the same province had no sees under it, as being only an autocephalus, or honorary metropolis.

Province of Pamphylia.

1. Sida. 2. Aspendus. 3. Etna. 4. Orymna. 5. Cassa. 6. Semnea. 7. Corallia. 8. Coracissius. 9. Syethra, al. Synedra. 10. Mylone, or Justinianople. 11. Anamanda. 12. Dalisandus, al. Duldusus. 13. Isbi. 14. Lybra. 15. Colybrassus. 16. Manæa.

Province of Armenia.

1. Sebastea. 2. Sebastopolis. 3. Nicopolis. 4. Satala. 5. Colonia. 6. Berissa.

Province of Helenopontus.

1. Amasea. 2. Amissus. 3. Sinope. 4. Ibora, al. Pimolissa. 5. Andropa. 6. Zalichus, al. Leonopolis. 7. Zela.

Province of Armenia Secunda.

1. Melitene. 2. Arca. 3. Cucusus. 4. Arabisus. 5. Ariaratha. 6. Ceomanæ, al. Comana.

Province of Cappadocia Secunda.

1. Tyana, or Christopolis. 2. Cybistra. 3. Faus-tinopolis. 4. Sasima.

Province of Paphlagonia.

1. Gangra. 2. Junopolis, al. Innopolis. 3. Da-dybra. 4. Soræ.

Here follows next the province of Thessalia in Leunclavius, which is omitted in others.

1. Thessalonica. 2. Citria. 3. Berrhœa. 4. Dru-gubitia. 5. Servia. 6. Casandria. 7. Campania, al. Castrium. 8. Petra. 9. Herculia, al. Arda-meria. 10. Hierissus. 11. Litæ ac Rentenæ. 12. Bardariotæ.

Province of Honorias.

1. Claudiopolis. 2. Heraclea Ponti. 3. Prusias. 4. Tius. 5. Cratea. 6. Hadrianopolis.

Province of Pontus Polemoniæcus.

1. Neocæsarea. 2. Trapezus. 3. Cerosantes. 4. Polemoneum. 5. Comana. To these are added in Leunclavius, 6. Halyæum. 7. Rhizæum. 8. Coccus. 9. Eunicus. And the scholiast adds three more, Aradase, Myrtyropolis, and Hypsela.

Province of Galatia Secunda.

1. Pisinus. 2. Mericium. 3. Eudoxias. 4. Pi-tanissus. 5. Trochnada. 6. Germocolonia. 7. Spa-lea, al. Justinianopolis. 8. Orcistus.

Province of Lycia.

1. Myra. 2. Mastæra. 3. Telmessus. 4. Limyra. 5. Araxe. 6. Aprilla. 7. Tatla. 8. Arnea. 9. Sidyma. 10. Zenopolis. 11. Olympus. 12. Otlæ. 13. Corydala. 14. Cannus. 15. Xanthus. 16. Acrassus. 17. Marciana. 18. Bobus, al. Sophianopolis. 19. Chomas. 20. Onunda. 21. Phellus. 22. Can-dana. 23. Phaselis. 24. Antiphellus. 25. Aca-lissus. 26. Rhodiapolis. 27. Acanda. 28. Lebissus. 29. Eudocias. 30. Paliotæ. 31. Combi. 32. Patara. 33. Barbura. 34. Nessus. 35. Cianea. 36. Melata.

Province of Caria.

1. Stauropolis. 2. Cibyra. 3. Siza. 4. Heraclea Salbaci. 5. Apollonias. 6. Heraclea. 7. Lacyma (which Leunclavius makes but one, Heraclea Lacymorum). 8. Tabi. 9. Larba. 10. Antiochia Mæandri. 11. Tarpassæ. 12. Harpassæ. 13. Neapolis. 14. Orthysias. 15. Anotetarta. 16. Alabandi. 17. Stratoneica. 18. Alinda. 19. Mylassæ. 20. Mezus, al. Amezon. 21. Jassus. 22. Barbilius.

23. Halicarnassus. 24. Hylarima. 25. Cnidus. 26. Metaba. 27. Mindus. 28. Hieron. 29. Cindrama. 30. Cerama. 31. Promissus.

Province of Phrygia Cappatiana, al. Pacatiana.

1. Laodicea. 2. Tiberiopolis. 3. Azana. 4. An-cyrosuna. 5. Pelta. 6. Appia. 7. Ieria. 8. Iluza. 9. Acada. 10. Tranopolis. 11. Sebasta. 12. Eumenia. 13. Timenus Therarum. 14. Agatha Coma. 15. Alina. 16. Tripolis. 17. Attanassus. 18. Tra-pezopolis. 19. Siblia. Note, In Leunclavius there are twenty-one cities, whereof many go by different names in this province; as Acmonæa, Chærotopa, Forium Pœmæni, Cidissus, Lunde, Helaza, Synæum, Thampsiopolis, Justinianopolis, Dioclea and Aristeia.

Province of Phrygia Salutaris.

1. Synada. 2. Dorylæum. 3. Nacolea. 4. Me-dæum. 5. Hipsus. 6. Promissus. 7. Merus. 8. Sibindus. 9. Phytia. 10. Hierapolis. 11. Eucarpia. 12. Lysias. 13. Augustopolis. 14. Bryzus. 15. Otrus. 16. Lycaon. 17. Stectorium. 18. Cinnaborium. 19. Cone. 20. Scordapia. 21. Nico-polis. 22. Ærocla. Here Leunclavius has but twenty cities, and some of those under other names, but Goar's notitia adds two more, Aloplex and Cadenna.

Province of Lycaonia.

1. Iconium. 2. Lystra. 3. Vasada. 4. Ambada, al. Amblada. 5. Vomanoda. 6. Laranda. 7. Bereta. 8. Derbe. 9. Hyda. 10. Savatra. 11. Canus. 12. Berinopolis. 13. Galbana, al. Eudocias. 14. Ilistra. 15. Perta. Leunclavius has the same number, but some names different from these.

Province of Pisidia.

1. Antiochia. 2. Sagalassus. 3. Sozopolis. 4. Apamea. 5. Cibus. 6. Tyrænus. 7. Baris. 8. Adrianopolis. 9. Portus Limenorum. 10. Laodicea Combusta. 11. Seleucia Ferrea. 12. Dada, al. Adada. 13. Zarzela. 14. Timbrias, al. Timomarias. 15. Timandus. 16. Conane. 17. Malus. 18. Sitriandus. 19. Tityassus. 20. Metropolis. 21. Pappa. 22. Parallæ. 23. Mindevus, al. Bindæus.

Province of Pamphylia Secunda.

1. Perga, al. Sileum. 2. Attalia. 3. Magydus, al. Mandus. 4. Telimissus. 5. Isindus. 6. Eudocias. 7. Maximianopolis. 8. Lagina. 9. Palæopolis. 10. Cremnus. 11. Corydala. 12. Peltinissus. 13. Dicytanæra. 14. Ariassus. 15. Pugla. 16. Adriana. 17. Sandida. 18. Barba. 19. Perbæna. 20. Cous.

Note, The fourteen following provinces are in Leunclavius, but no other notitia.

Province of Peloponnesus.

1. Corinthus. 2. Damala. 3. Argos. 4. Monembasia. 5. Cephalenia. 6. Zacynthus. 7. Zemena. 8. Maina.

Province of Hellas.

1. Athens. 2. Euripus. 3. Dialulia. 4. Coronea. 5. Andrus. 6. Oreus. 7. Seyrus. 8. Charystus. 9. Porthmus. 10. Aulon. 11. Syra.

Province of Crete.

1. Gortyna. 2. Gnossus. 3. Arcadia. 4. Cherroneus. 5. Aulopotamus. 6. Agrius. 7. Lampe. 8. Cydonia. 9. Hieria. 10. Petra. 11. Sitea. 12. Cissamus.

Province of Peloponnesus.

1. Patra. 2. Lacedæmonia. 3. Methone. 4. Corone. 5. Helus. 6. Boæna.

Province of Hellas Secunda.

1. Larissa. 2. Demetrias. 3. Pharsalus. 4. Domicus. 5. Zetonium. 6. Ezerus. 7. Lædoricium. 8. Trica. 9. Echinus. 10. Colydrus. 11. Stagæ.

Province of Ætolia.

1. Naupactus. 2. Bunditza. 3. Aquila. 4. Acheulous. 5. Rhegæ. 6. Joannina. 7. Photica. 8. Hadrianopolis. 9. Buthrotus. 10. Chimæra.

Province of Macedonia.

1. Philippi. 2. Theoria. 3. Polystylum. 4. Belicea. 5. Christopolis. 6. Smolæna. 7. Cæsaropolis. 8. Alectryopolis.

Province of Epirus.

1. Dyrrachium. 2. Stephaniaca. 3. Chunobia. 4. Coria. 5. Elisius. 6. Dioclea. 7. Scodra. 8. Drivasus. 9. Polatha. 10. Glabinitza, al. Acroceraunia. 11. Aulonæa. 12. Licinida. 13. Antibaris. 14. Tzerinicum. 15. Polycheropolis. 16. Graditzium.

In Asia under Smyrna the metropolis.

1. Phocæa. 2. Magnesia. 3. Anelium. 4. Clazomenæ. 5. Sosandrus. 6. Archangelus. 7. Petra.

In Armenia under Camachus.

1. Kelzene. 2. Arabraca. 3. Barzanissa. 4. Melus. 5. Melus alter. 6. Romanopolis. 7. Tutileum.

In Phrygia under Cotyaium.

1. Spora. 2. Cone. 3. Gaiocomis.

In Lesbos under Mitylene.

1. Erissus. 2. Strongyla. 3. Tenedus. 4. Berbinc. 5. Perperine. 6. Marmaritza.

In Hellas under Novæ Patræ.

1. Gazala. 2. Cutzagrion. 3. Sibictus. 4. Bariana.

Under Keltzene.

1. Tomus. 2. Chatzoun. 3. Lycopotamia. 4.

Cortzene. 5. Mastrabatz. 6. Chuit. 7. Toparchus. 8. Ambra. 9. Tutara. 10. Marmentitzur. 11. Matzierte. 12. S. Nicholai. 13. Eva Deiparæ. 14. Artzesius. 15. Artzica. 16. Amucium. 17. Percin. 18. S. Georgii. 19. Ostan. 20. S. Elissei. 21. Sedrac Deiparæ. These fourteen metropolitical sees, with their suffragans, are in Leunclavius only: after which the other notitias now proceed again.

Province of Cappadocia.

1. Mocessus. 2. Nazianzus. 3. Colonia. 4. Parnassus. 5. Doara: to which Leunclavius adds Metiana.

Province of Lazica.

1. Phasis. 2. Rhodopolis. 3. Petra. 4. Ecclesia Abissenorum. 5. Ecclesia Ziganeorum. But in Leunclavius there are reckoned sixteen in this province. 1. Trapezus, the metropolis. 2. Cheriana. 3. Chamuzur. 4. Chachæum. 5. Paiper. 6. Ceramea. 7. Tochatzitzi. 8. Bizana. 9. Sacabus. 10. Phasiانا. 11. Tochantierz. 12. Toulnutus. 13. Lerium. 14. Tosermtatus. 15. Andacta. 16. Zarima.

Province of Thrace.

1. Philippopolis. 2. Diocletianopolis. 3. Diospolis. But Leunclavius reckons eleven. 1. Philippopolis. 2. Agathonicæa. 3. Liotitza. 4. Scutarium. 5. Leuca. 6. Bleptus. 7. Dramitza. 8. Joannitza. 9. Constantia. 10. Belicea. 11. Bucuba.

Province of the islands Cyclades.

1. Rhodus, the metropolis. 2. Samus. 3. Chius. 4. Cous. 5. Naxia. 6. Thera. 7. Parus. 8. Lethrus. 9. Andrus. 10. Tenus. 11. Melus. 12. Pissina: to which Leunclavius adds, Icaria, Lerna, Ostypalia, Trachæa, and Nasura.

Province of Hæmimontus.

1. Adrianopolis. 2. Mesembria. 3. Sozopolis. 4. Plutinopolis. 5. Zoida: to which Leunclavius adds, 6. Agathopolis. 7. Debeltus. 8. Trabyzia. 9. Carabus. 10. Bucellus. 11. Probatas. 12. Scopelus. 13. Brisis. 14. Bulgarophugus.

The same Province.

1. Marcianopolis. 2. Rhodostolus. 3. Tramariscus. 4. Nobi. 5. Zecedopa. 6. Sarcara.

The same Province; which is otherwise called Rhodope in Leunclavius.

1. Trajanopolis. 2. Perus. 3. Anastasiopolis: to which Leunclavius adds, 4. Didymotichus. 5. Macra. 6. Misinopolis. 7. Pora. 8. Xantha. 9. Peritheorium. 10. Theodorum.

Province of Phrygia Cappatiana.

1. Hierapolis. 2. Metellopolis. 3. Dionysopo-lis. 4. Anastasiopolis. 5. Antæda. 6. Mosyna : with six others, which are inserted by mistake from the province of Hæmimontus. But Leunclavius adds, Autuda, Phobi, Ancyra, Synaus, Tiberiopolis, Cana, and Zana.

Province of Galatia Secunda.

1. Amorium. 2. Philomelium. 3. Docimeum. 4. Claneus. 5. Polybotus. 6. Pissia. Note, This province is called Phrygia in Leunclavius ; but the cities are the same.

Here it is remarked in all the notitias, that the following metropolitans and their suffragans were taken from the Roman diocese, and added to Constantinople : viz. 1. Thessalonica. 2. Syracuse. 3. Corinth. 4. Rhegium. 5. Nicopolis. 6. Athens. 7. Patræ. 8. Novæ Patræ. As also the metropolitan of Seleucia in Isauria, or, as Leunclavius calls it, Pamphylia, with twenty-three bishops under him. Which conclude the notitia in Leunclavius : for it only contains the account of the patriarchate of Constantinople. Carolus a Sancto Paulo also wholly omits the Roman patriarchate, because his manuscript here, he says, was so corrupt that there was no sense to be made of it : but this defect is supplied by Goar and Bishop Beverege, in whose notitias the following account is given :—

The Province under the most glorious Eparch of Rome, or Italy.

Province of Rome, called Urbicaria.

1. Brittium. 2. Macæria. 3. Luna. 4. Neapolis. 5. Garanta. 6. Vintimilium. 7. Genues. 8. Sipontus. 9. Ponturoma. 10. Insulæ Centumcellæ. 11. Castrum Euoriæ. 12. Castrum Amalphes. 13. Castrum Getteon. 14. Castrum Tiberias. 15. Castrum Nepes. 16. Insula Comanicæ. 17. Castrum Mulium. 18. Castrum Campsas. 19. Castrum Sorcum. 20. Castrum Susas. 21. Castrum Ilbas. 22. Castrum Anagnia.

Province of Campania.

1. Neapolis. 2. Brettania. 3. Pannonia. 4. Calabria. 5. Venetia. 6. Messina. 7. Vicovarina. 8. Taurata. 9. Apulia. 10. Castrum Opiterbetos. 11. Castrum Samnios. 12. Castrum Susias. 13. Castrum Regium. 14. Castrum Taurata. 15. Castrum Sygnias. 16. Castrum Gradum. 17. Castrum Patriarchias. 18. Castrum Scylaceum. 19. Castrum Martyrium. 20. Castrum Ormuvera. 21. Castrum Ortonos. 22. Castrum Oppiterbitum.

Isle of Sicily.

1. Syracuse. 2. Catana. 3. Tærebenium, al. Tauromenium. 4. Sesena, al. Messana. 5. Cephaludium. 6. Thermum. 7. Panormus. 8. Lilybæum. 9. Trocalis. 10. Acragantus, al. Agrigen-tum. 11. Tindarium. 12. Carine, al. Camarina. 13. Leontina. 14. Abeusis, al. Alesa. 15. Gaudus. 16. Melita. 17. Liparis. 18. Bureausus. 19. Dydymi. 20. Urica. 21. Onarea. 22. Basiludin.

Province of Calabria.

1. Rhegium. 2. Loeris. 3. Scylacias. 4. Crotonum, al. Croton. 5. Constantia. 6. Tropæum. 7. Tauriana. 8. Bibonum, al. Cibonum.

Provincia Annonaria.

1. Ravenna. 2. Phanus. 3. Oleusa, al. Asculum. 4. Polus, al. Fulginum. 5. Pecinus, al. Picenum. 6. Pisaurum. 7. Tergetra. 8. Augustopolis. 9. Talbitau. 10. Castrum Ferentinum. 11. Castrum Solernos. 12. Tulericum. 13. Castrum Zanga. 14. Castrum Nobo. 15. Castrum Eurinica. 16. Castrum Semania. 17. Vicomanto. 18. Castrum Vereles. 19. Castrum Tamia. 20. Castrum Varectelia. 21. Castrum Samugia. 22. Castrum Sora. 23. Castrum Suagallia. 24. Castrum Cisines.

Province of Æmia, leg. Æmilia.

1. Castrum Foropompus. 2. Castrum Brizilium. 3. Castrum Brinti.

Under the most glorious Eparch of Africa.

Province of Bizacia.

1. Carthago Proconsularis. 2. Sybiba. 3. Campsia. 4. Cileos. 5. Junce. 6. Talepte. 7. Cascala. 8. Castellæ. 9. Pezana. 10. Mamida. 11. Madasuba. 12. Colule. 13. Capse. 14. Adramytto.

Province of Numidia.

1. Calama. 2. Tebete. 3. Hippo Regius. 4. Nuzidias. 5. Castamagæ. 6. Bade. 7. Meleum. 8. Leradus. 9. Castrum Bedere, al. Castra Vetera. 10. Scele. 11. Egerinesium. 12. Titessin, al. Tiddita. 13. Bage. 14. Constantina. 15. Sitiphi.

Province of Mauritania Prima.

1. Rhinocururum.

Province of Mauritania Secunda.

1. Septum. 2. Septum ad partem Tenessi. 3. Spanias. 4. Mesopot. ad partem Spaniæ. 5. Majorica, al. Majorica Insula. 6. Menyca, al. Minorica Insula. 7. Insula Sardon, vel Sardinia. 8. Carallus Metropolis. 9. Tures. 10. Sanaphas. 11. Sines. 12. Sulces. 13. Phesiana. 14. Chrysopolis. 15. Aristiane. 16. Limne. 17. Castrum Tutar. Note, Goar's notitia reads most of these names differently, and makes but two of these three last, Christianæ Lacus and Tucca. Here Carolus a S. Paulo begins again.

In the Diocese of Egypt.

Province of Augustamnica Prima.

1. Pelusium, the metropolis. 2. Sethroetes. 3. Tânes. 4. Thmues. 5. Rhinocurura. 6. Ostracine. 7. Pentaschanon. 8. Casium. 9. Aphtheum. 10. Hiphestus. 11. Panephusus. 12. Geros. 13. Itageros. 14. Thenusus.

Province of Augustamnica Secunda.

1. Leonto Metropolis. 2. Athrabes. 3. Helius. 4. Bubastus. 5. Carbethus. 6. Arabius.

Province of Ægyptus Prima.

1. Alexandria sub duce et Augustali. 2. Heropolis. 3. Milleos. 4. Costus. 5. Vicus Psaneos. 6. Vicus Cotrideos. 7. Sais. 8. Leontopolis. 9. Naucratis. 10. Andronicus. 11. Zenonopolis. 12. Paphna. 13. Onuphis. 14. Tava. 15. Cleopatri. 16. Mareotes. 17. Manelaites. 18. Schedia. 19. Ternuthes. 20. Sondra.

Province of Ægyptus Secunda.

1. Cabasa. 2. Phragon. 3. Pachnemon. 4. Diospolis. 5. Sebennytyus. 6. Cæno. 7. Busiris. 8. Elearchia. 9. Regeon Paralus. 10. Vicus Parianæ. 11. Vicus Rhicomerium. 12. Xoïs: to which Goar's notitia adds Cyma, and makes Regeon and Paralus two distinct places.

Province of Arcadia.

1. Oxyrynchus. 2. Heracleus. 3. Cæno. 4. Nilopolis. 5. Arsinoetes. 6. Memphilitus, al. Memphis. Goar adds, Clisma, Theodosiopolis, Aphroditon, and Latopolis.

Province of Thebais Prima.

1. Antinous. 2. Hermopolis. 3. Theodosiopolis. 4. Polyco. 5. Hypsele. 6. Apollonias. 7. Anteios. 8. Panos. Goar adds Casus.

Province of Thebais Secunda.

1. Ptolemais. 2. Conto, al. Justinianopolis. 3. Diocletianopolis. 4. Diospolis. 5. Tentyra. 6. Maximianopolis. 7. Thebais. 8. Lato. 9. Iambon. 10. Hermonthon. 11. Apollonos. 12. Vicus Anassæ Magnæ. 13. Thebais Magna. 14. Ibis. 15. Mathon. 16. Trimunthon. 17. Erbon, al. Hermon.

Province of Libya.

1. Dranicon. 2. Paratonium. 3. Tranzala. 4. Ammoniaca. 5. Antipyrgus. 6. Antiphron. 7. Ædonias. 8. Marmarice.

Province of Libya Pentapolis.

1. Sozusa. 2. Cyrine. 3. Ptolemais. 4. Teuchera. 5. Adriane. 6. Beronica.

Province of Tripoli.

1. Tosibon. 2. Leptis. 3. Hyon.

In the Oriental Diocese.

Province of Cilicia.

1. Tarsus. 2. Pompeiopolis. 3. Sebaste. 4. Coricus. 5. Adana. 6. Augustopolis. 7. Mallos. 8. Zephurium.

Province of Cilicia Secunda.

1. Anazarbus. 2. Mopsuestia. 3. Ageia. 4. Epiphania. 5. Eirenopolis. 6. Flavias. 7. Alexandria. 8. Cabissus. 9. Castabala. 10. Rhossus.

Province of Isauria.

1. Seleucia. 2. Cilendre. 3. Anemorius. 4. Titiopolis. 5. Lamus. 6. Antiochia. 7. Heliu-Sebaste, al. Julio-Sebaste. 8. Cestra. 9. Selinuntis. 10. Jostape. 11. Diocæsarea. 12. Olya. 13. Hierapolis. 14. Dalisandus. 15. Claudiopolis. 16. Eirenopolis. 17. Germanicopolis. 18. Neapolis. 19. Zenonopolis. 20. Sbidæ. 21. Philadelphia. 22. Adrassus. 23. Meloe. 24. Domitiopolis. 25. Climata Nauzadææ. 26. Cassorum. 27. Benæorum. 28. Golgosi. 29. Costradis.

Province of Syria Prima.

1. Antiochia ad Daphnen. 2. Paltus. 3. Seleucia. 4. Berrhæa. 5. Chalcis.

Province of Syria Secunda.

1. Apamea. 2. Arethusa. 3. Epiphania. 4. Larissa. 5. Mariamne. 6. Seleucobelus. 7. Raphanæa.

Province of Euphratisia or Hagiopolis.

1. Hierapolis. 2. Cyrus, al. Hagiopolis. 3. Samosata. 4. Doliche. 5. Germanicia. 6. Zeugma. 7. Perrhe. 8. Europus. 9. Nicopolis. 10. Schemarchia. 11. Cæsaria. 12. Sergiopolis. 13. Orimon. 14. Santon.

Province of Theodorias.

1. Laodicea. 2. Balanea. 3. Gabala. Goar adds Paltus.

Province of Osdroene.

1. Edessa. 2. Carræ. 3. Constantia. 4. Theodosiopolis. 5. Batnæ. 6. Callinicus, al. Leontopolis. 7. Nova Valentia. 8. Birthon. 9. Monithilla. 10. Therimachon. 11. Moniauga. 12. Macarta. 13. Marcopolis. 14. Anastasia. 15. Hemerius. 16. Circisia.

Province of Mesopotamia Superior, or Armenia Quarta.

1. Amida. 2. Martyropolis. 3. Darus. 4.

Castrum Ricephas. 5. Castrum Turandios. 6. Castrum Mardes. 7. Castrum Lornes. 8. Castrum Riphthon. 9. Castrum Isporios. 10. Castrum Tzauras. 11. Castrum Audasson. 12. Castrum Amarmes. 13. Castrum Tzinobias. 14. Castrum Banabelorum. 15. Castrum Intzietorum. 16. Castrum Chaddorum. 17. Castrum Æsudios. 18. Castrum Masphronas. 19. Castrum Basilicum. 20. Castrum Spelon et Odelorum. 21. Castrum Bijubaithas. 22. Castrum Manassarorum. 23. Castrum Phirtachabras. 24. Castrum Siteon Chiphas. 25. Castrum Calonos. 26. Castrum Bibasarorum. 27. Castrum Tzauras. 28. Castrum Birthas. 29. Castrum Attachas. 30. Castrum Aphuborum. 31. Castrum Florianarum. 32. Castrum Arimachorum. 33. Castrum Baluos. 34. Castrum Daphnudin. 35. Castrum Samochartorum.

The other Armenia.

1. Dademon. 2. Arsamusaton. 3. Polichnē. 4. Chosana. 5. Chosomacha. 6. Citharizæ. 7. Castrum Marticertum. 8. Castrum Baiuleos. 9. Castrum Polios. 10. Castrum Ardon. 11. Clima Sophines. 12. Regio Jalimbana, where Basilius was born, who wrote the present account. 13. Clima Anzetines. 14. Clima Digesines. 15. Clima Garines. 16. Clima Orziacines. 17. Clima Bilabitenes. 18. Clima Astianices. 19. Clima Mamuzurorum.

Province of Phœnicia Maritima.

1. Tyrus. 2. Sidon. 3. Ptolemais. 4. Beritus. 5. Biblus. 6. Tripolis. 7. Arcæ. 8. Orthosias. 9. Botrys. 10. Vicus Gegarta. 11. Arados. 12. Antarados. 13. Paneas. 14. Gonasitii Saltus. 15. Vicus Politianus. 16. Vicus Trieris.

Province of Phœnicia Libani.

1. Emissa. 2. Laodicea. 3. Heliopolis. 4. Abilla. 5. Damascus. 6. Clima Jabrudorum. 7. Evarius, al. Justinianopolis. 8. Talmyra: in Goar it is Palmyra. 9. Clima Maglydorum. 10. Saltum Gonæticum. 11. Salamias. 12. Clima Orientale.

Province of Palestina⁶ Prima.

1. Ælia, or Jerusalem. 2. Cæsarea. 3. Dora. 4. Antipatris. 5. Diospolis, al. Georgiopolis. 6. Jamnia. 7. Nicopolis. 8. Onus. 9. Sozusa. 10. Joppa. 11. Ascalon. 12. Gaza. 13. Raphia. 14. Anthedon. 15. Diocletianopolis. 16. Eleutheropolis. 17. Neapolis. 18. Sebaste. 19. Regio Apathus. 20. Regio Jericho. 21. Regio Libyæ. 22. Regio Gadara. 23. Azotus Maritima. 24. Azotus Hippinis. 25. Acomazon. 25. Bittymos.

27. Tricomias. 28. Toxus. 29. Saltum Constantiniani. 30. Saltum Geraiticum, al. Barsamon.

Province of Palestina Secunda.

1. Seythopolis. 2. Gadara. 3. Pellæ. 4. Abila. 5. Capetomas. 6. Diocæsarea. 7. Maximianopolis. 8. Gabæ. 9. Tiberias. 10. Hippos. 11. Helenopolis. 12. Clima Gælanes. 13. Tetracomia. 14. Cōmenais.

Province of Palestina Tertia.

1. Petra. 2. Augustopolis. 3. Arindela. 4. Charagmuda. 5. Areopolis. 6. Mapsis. 7. Elusa. 8. Zoara. 9. Birosabon. 10. Elas. 11. Pentacomia. 12. Mamopsora. 13. Metrocomia. 14. Saltum Hieraticum. Goar divides two of these into four, reading them thus, Salton, Mamo, Psora, Hieraticon.

Province of Arabia.

1. Bostra. 2. Adrasus. 3. Dia. 4. Medaba. 5. Gerassa. 6. Neva. 7. Philadelphia. 8. Esbus. 9. Neapolis. 10. Philippopolis. 11. Phenutus. 12. Constantina. 13. Dionysias. 14. Pentacomia. 15. Tricomia. 16. Canothas. 17. Saltum. 18. Bataneos. 19. Exacomia. 20. Enacomia. 21. Vicus Gonias. 22. Vicus Cherus. 23. Vicus Stanes. 24. Vicus Caberæ. 25. Vicus Coreathæ. 26. Vicus Bilbanus. 27. Vicus Caprorum. 28. Vicus Pyrgoaretarum. 29. Vicus Setnes. 30. Vicus Ariacharum. 31. Neotes. 32. Clima Orientalium et Occidentalium. 33. Vicus Ariathæ Saxosæ. 34. Vicus Bebdamus.

Province of Armenia Magna.

Concerning this the author only remarks, that it is an autocephalus, or independent country, not subject to any apostolical throne, but honoured in respect to St. Gregory of Armenia, having two hundred cities and castles.

Province of Cyprus.

The author makes the same observation upon this country, that it is an independent also, in honour of St. Barnabas the apostle, who was found here, having the Gospel of St. Mark laid upon his breast. The cities in this province are,

1. Constantia, the metropolis. 2. Citium. 3. Amathus. 4. Curium. 5. Paphus. 6. Arsena. 7. Soli. 8. Lapithus, the birth-place of Georgius Cyprius, who wrote the book out of which these were taken. 9. Cyrenia. 10. Tamasus. 11. Cythri. 12. Trimithus. 13. Carpasin.

There is added at the end of Goar's notitia: This account was taken anno 6391, in the reign of the

⁶ Note, This province and the next are wanting both in emperor Leo Sapiens, and under the patriarch Photius, that is, anno 891.

Carolus a Sancto Paulo and Goar.

In this description of the church, the reader may observe, that the author being a Greek, is much more accurate in his account of the Greek and Eastern churches, than of the Western and Latin: for here is no account of France, Spain, Britain, Illyricum; and such confused and imperfect accounts of the provinces of Italy and Africa, as show plainly, that the author was not rightly acquainted with the state of the church in those countries; at least not in Italy; for in all Italy and Sicily here are not mentioned above a hundred dioceses, and yet it is clear from the accounts that have been given before out of the subscriptions of ancient councils, that there were nearer three hundred dioceses in those regions. Above one hundred and fifty Italian bishops of distinct sees are found subscribed in one age in the Roman councils held under Hilary, Felix, and Symmachus, and there were almost as many more not mentioned in those councils, but to be found in other councils and ancient records. And though when these notitias were made, several of the ancient dioceses might be united together, yet it appears from the subscriptions of the Roman councils under Eugenius II. and Leo IV. in the ninth century, that there were above double the number to what the notitias mention. So that it must be owned, that they give but an imperfect account of the Latin or Western church. But the account of the Greek and Eastern churches is more complete, and agrees very well with the subscriptions collected out of the ancient councils. And so they one confirm another, and both together fully make out the account that has been given both of the number and extent of dioceses in the ancient church.

CHAPTER VIII.

OF THE DIVISION OF DIOCESES INTO PARISHES, AND THE FIRST ORIGINAL OF THEM.

Sect. 1.
Of the ancient names of parish churches. THERE remains but one thing more to be inquired into on this head, which is the division of dioceses into such lesser precincts as we now call parishes and parish churches. Concerning which I shall here need to say the less, because so much has already been said incidentally in speaking of the extent of ancient dioceses, which we have generally found too large to be confined to a single congregation. All that I shall add upon this subject, therefore, in this place, is only to make a few remarks upon the ancient names of parishes, (because some of them are a little ambiguous,) and show when, and upon what account, and by what degrees dioceses were divided into parishes, to bring them to the present state and form of the church. As to the ancient names, I have had occasion to show before, that the words παροικία, and διοίκησις, for the three first ages were of the same importance, denoting not what we now call a parish church, but a city with its adjacent towns or country region. But in the fourth and fifth ages we find both names promiscuously given as well to country parishes, as episcopal or city churches. For now these lesser divisions of dioceses began to be called parochiæ, as may be seen in the council of Chalcedon,¹ which ordered, That in every church such country parishes as belonged of old time to any bishop, should continue in his possession without any molestation. And in the council of Vaison, anno 442, a decree was made,² That country parishes should have presbyters to preach in them, as well as the city churches. And so the word parochia is often used by St. Jerom,³ Sulpicius Severus,⁴ Theodoret,⁵ Innocentius,⁶ and other writers of those ages. Though still the name parochia continued to signify properly an episcopal diocese, from which it was transferred to denote those lesser parochiæ, because they were a sort of imitation of the former. Which is the account that Socrates⁷ seems to give of them, when, speaking of the villages of the region of Marcotes that were subject to the bishop of Alexandria, he says, they were as so many παροικίας, or lesser dioceses under his city. And upon the same reason the name diocesis was sometimes given to a parish church also, though it most properly belongs to an episcopal diocese. Thus Sidonius Apollinarius⁸ speaks of his own visiting his dioceses, meaning only the parish churches under his episcopal jurisdiction. And so in the Collation of Carthage, it is said⁹ of one place, that there was perfect unity not only in the city, but in all the dioceses, that is, the country parishes or villages belonging to it. Baluzius has observed the same¹⁰ in Ruricius Lemovicensis,¹¹ and Gregory of

¹ Concil. Chalced. can. 17. Τὰς καθ' ἑκάστην ἐκκλησίαν ἀγροικίας παροικίας, ἢ ἐγχωρίους μένειν ἀπαρασαλεύτως τοῖς κατέχουσιν αὐτὰς ἐπισκοποῖς.

² Concil. Vaisionen. 1. c. 2. Placuit ut non solum in civitatibus, sed etiam in omnibus parochiis, verbum faciendi darentur presbyteris potestatem.

³ Hieron. cont. Vigilant. cap. 2.

⁴ Sulpic. Sever. Dial. 1. c. 4

⁵ Theodor. Ep. 113.

⁶ Innoc. Ep. ad Decent. c. 5.

⁷ Socrat. lib. 1. c. 27. Εἰσὶν ὑπὸ τὴν αὐτοῦ πόλιν ὡς παροικίαι.

⁸ Sidon. lib. 9. Ep. 16. p. 611. Peragratis forte diocesium cum domum veni, &c.

⁹ Collat. Carthag. Die 1. c. 176. Unitas illic perfecta est non solum in ipsa civitate, verum etiam in omnibus diocesisibus.

¹⁰ Baluz. Not. ad Gratian. p. 510.

¹¹ Ruricius Lemovic. lib. 2. Ep. 6.

Tours,¹² and some other writers. The reason of this appellation being, as I said before, for that these churches, whereupon single presbyters were fixed, were a sort of lesser dioceses, as the author of the Pontifical¹³ under the name of Damasus terms them; and some canons give them¹⁴ the name of ecclesie diocesanae, diocesan churches; and others, country or village churches, whence the presbyters residing on them were termed ἐπιχώριοι πρεσβύτεροι, country presbyters, by the council of Neocæsarea,¹⁵ in opposition to the city presbyters in the cathedral or mother church. Parish churches were also peculiarly called tituli, as has been noted before,¹⁶ in contradistinction to the bishop's church; being such churches as had particular presbyters and deacons assigned to them, who upon that account are said to have a title. And some learned persons¹⁷ are of opinion, that cardinal presbyters and deacons, at first, were no more but presbyters and deacons so deputed and affixed to the service of particular parish churches, and that as well at Rome as other places.

As to the original of parish churches, there is no doubt but it was necessity, and the conveniences of celebrating Christian offices and holding Christian communion with greater ease, that first gave occasion to them. For when the multitude of believers increased so in large and populous cities, that one church could not contain them, there was a necessity of dividing the assembly, and erecting other churches, where all the solemnities of the Christian worship and the usual offices of Divine service might be performed, as well as in the mother church, to answer the apostolical ordinance of holding Christian communion one with another; which was according to what we read, Acts ii. 42, that men should continue "steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship, and in breaking of bread, and in prayers." The author of the Pontifical under the name of Damasus, in the Life of Marcellus, seems to say, that several of the Roman tituli, or parish churches, were erected¹⁸ for the convenience of baptizing great multitudes that were converted from paganism, and for burying the martyrs. But if there was any necessity upon that account, there was doubtless a greater necessity upon another. For in those days, the whole body of the Christian church was used to communicate weekly at the Lord's table; and it being impossible that one church should suffice in large cities for this purpose, there was an absolute necessity of building more, that Christians might live in communion one with another. And so parish churches must be as ancient as the necessities of the church; and he that knows how to date the one, may easily date the original of the other for any particular city or diocese in the universe.

But as cities and their appendant dioceses differed very much in their size and extent, so it is reasonable to believe, that some of them were obliged to build parish churches much sooner than others. And in such places as Jerusalem and Rome, there is great probability, from several passages in the Acts and St. Paul's Epistles, that there were more churches than one from the days of the apostles. However, it is undeniably evident from Optatus, as I have showed before, that Rome had above forty churches in it before the end of the third century, or in the beginning of the Diocletian persecution. As for the lesser cities, it will be no wonder to find some of them which had but one church whilst the persecution lasted; such as that city in Phrygia, which Lactantius speaks of, where he says, the church and all the people were burnt¹⁹ together by one of the barbarous prefects in the last persecution. Valesius thinks Eusebius speaks of the same city, who says,²⁰ it was all Christian at that time, both magistrates and people, and therefore an army was sent against them, which burnt them all together, men, women, and children, as they were making their supplications to Christ their God. From which it may be concluded, that there were some cities, which were but what Eusebius calls this, πολίχλαι, so very small, as to need no other church beside the bishop's cathedral, even when all the members of them were become universally Christian. And this may seem an argument to some, that there were anciently many episcopal dioceses that never had any parish churches.

But here it must be remembered, what has been abundantly proved before, that generally the ancient cities had their suburbs or country region belonging to them; and some that were very small cities, as Cyrus in Comagene, where Theodoret was bishop, had upon this account very large territories under their jurisdiction. And we find a great many instances of such country regions having country parishes, and country presbyters and deacons residing on them, even in the hottest times of perse-

Sect. 2.
The original of parish churches owing to necessity, and founded upon the apostolical rules of Christian communion.

Sect. 3.
Some of them probably as ancient as the times of the apostles.

Sect. 4.
Some lesser cities had country parishes even in times of persecution.

¹² Greg. Turon. Hist. lib. 4. c. 13. lib. 6. c. 38.

¹³ Pontifical. Vit. Marcelli. Vignati quinque titulos in urbe Roma constituit, quasi dioceses, propter baptismum et pœnitentiam multorum.

¹⁴ Concil. Tarracon. can. 8.

¹⁵ Concil. Neocæsar. can. 13.

¹⁶ Book VIII. chap. 1. sect. 10.

¹⁷ Vid. Joh. Fronto. Epist. de Canonicis Cardinalibus, Par. 1661.

¹⁸ Pontifical. Vit. Marcelli.

¹⁹ Lactant. Instit. lib. 5. c. 11. Aliqui ad occidentum præcipites extiterunt, sicut unus in Phrygia, qui universum populum cum ipso pariter conventiculo concremavit.

²⁰ Euseb. lib. 8. c. 11.

cution; as appears from the canons of the council of Eliberius,²¹ and those of Neocæsarea,²² the former of which was held while the Diocletian persecution lasted, and the latter immediately after it was over, and yet both of them speak of country presbyters and deacons, to whom the care of Christian assemblies was committed. Epiphanius also²³ speaks of village presbyters belonging to the city Caschara in Mesopotamia in the middle of the third century, and Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, about the same time frequently mentions such in the regions of Arsinoe, Alexandria, and other cities of Egypt and Libya, in several fragments of his epistles, recorded in Eusebius, which have already been alleged, and need not here be repeated. From these and many other such instances it is evident, that as soon as the Christian religion began to spread itself from the cities into the country regions in any considerable manner, village churches were erected, and country presbyters fixed on them; the necessities and convenience of the church requiring it so to be for the greater benefit and edification of the whole community. Thus parish churches had their original both in city and country, not all at one time, nor by any general decree, but as the exigencies of every diocese required, the bishop of which was always the properest judge, how many assistants he needed to help him to discharge the several offices belonging to him as chief superintendent of the city and territory under his jurisdiction. In France the council of Vaison speaks of country parishes in the beginning of the fifth century, as I have noted before in the first section of this chapter. But in England we have not so early an account of them, because the records we have remaining of the ancient British church, make no mention of parishes: and after the Saxon conversions were begun, it was some time before our dioceses were divided into parishes, and longer before they had appropriated revenues settled upon them. Some think Honorius, the fifth archbishop of Canterbury, divided so much of the nation as was converted, into parishes about the year 640. So Bishop Godwyn and Dugdale. But others think this division is rather to be understood of dioceses than parishes: for parochia in Bede commonly denotes a bishop's diocese, according to the ancient style and language of the church; as is evident from that canon of the council of Herudford mentioned in Bede,²⁴ which was held above thirty years after this supposed division of Honorius, in the time of Archbishop Theodore, anno 673, where it is decreed, That no bishop shall invade another's parochia, or diocese, but be content with the government of the people committed to him. Bishop Andrews²⁵ indeed brings this very canon for a proof of parishes being now settled all over the nation: but I conceive the other sense of the word parochia to be more proper to that place. Though I will not deny but that toward the latter end of this archbishop's time, who lived to the year 690, the division of parishes might be made. For Bede observes,²⁶ that religion and the affairs of the church made a greater progress in his time than ever they had done before. And Mr. Wheelock,²⁷ in his observations upon the place, cites an ancient manuscript, which speaks of the division of parishes as made under him. Now Christianity had spread itself into the country, and churches were built, and presbyters fixed upon them, and first-fruits and other revenues were settled by King Ina²⁸ among the West Saxons, and by Withred, king of Kent, in the council of Beconceld, anno 694, and patrons, when they founded churches, endowed them with lands for proper maintenance: all which seem to imply, that the original of country parishes was about the latter end of the seventh century in this nation, and in the next age they were fully settled.

But to return to the former times: it is further to be noted concerning the ancient manner of serving the city parish churches, that they were not usually committed to any particular presbyters, as those in the country regions were, but were served in common by the clergy of the bishop's church. Learned men conclude this from a passage in Epiphanius, who seems to note it as a particular custom at Alexandria, that all the churches there had their own particular presbyters assigned them, who dwelt near their own churches, every one in their own streets or divisions,²⁹ which the Alexandrians, in their own language, called laura. Petavius indeed³⁰ thinks Epiphanius was mistaken, and that it was not the peculiar custom of Alexandria, but common to all great cities, to have presbyters fixed upon all their churches. But Valesius³¹ and other learned men defend Epiphanius against his censure, and show this to have been so singular a custom at Alexandria, that perhaps no other city in the world in that age, no, not Rome itself, which had above forty churches, had any one church appropriated to any particular presbyter, but they were all served in common by the clergy of the bishop's church. Valesius observes, that it was so at Rome to the time of Innocent I., who speaks of his sending the bread of the consecrated eucharist to the presbyters ministering in the parish churches on the Lord's day, that they might not on that day think themselves³² separated from his communion. So that they seem to have been the clergy of the great church, sent forth by turns only, to minister in the several tituli on the Lord's day; and then their having a title, or the care of a church, must mean no more but their being deputed in common to the service of the tituli, or parish churches, in contradistinction to the cathedral church. Something of this custom continued at Constantinople to the time of Justinian. For in one of his Novels³³ he takes notice of three churches, St. Mary's, Theodore's, and Irene's, which had no appropriated clergy belonging to them, but were served by the ministers of the great church, who officiated in them according to their courses. It is observed also by some, that a peculiar custom prevailed at Rome, to have two presbyters officiate in every church, whereas in other places there was but one. Dr. Maurice³⁴ infers this from a passage in the Comments of Hilary, the Roman deacon, who commonly goes under the name of St. Ambrose, who says, that though there were but seven deacons in all Rome, yet there was such a number of presbyters as to have two to officiate in every church,³⁵ because the inhabitants communicated twice a week, and there were sick persons to be baptized almost every day. But whether this custom was so peculiar to Rome, as to belong to no other church, is what I had rather the reader should believe upon that learned man's judgment, than my own assertion. As to country churches, the case is very plain, that presbyters were more early fixed and appropriated peculiarly to them, there being not the same convenience of serving them in common by the presbyters of the city church. Therefore we may observe, that the council of Neocæsarea³⁶ makes a distinction between the ἐπιχώριοι πρεσβύτεροι, the country presbyters, and those of the city, forbidding the former to officiate in the city church, except in the absence of the bishop and city presbyters: which plainly implies, that country parishes were then served by fixed presbyters of their own, who had nothing to do with the service of the city church. And the same appears from the account which Athanasius gives of the presbyters of the villages of Mareotis under Alexandria, and many other passages of the ancient writers.

Sect. 5.

The city parishes not always assigned to particular presbyters, but served in common by the clergy of the bishop's church. This otherwise in country parishes.

²¹ Conc. Eliber. c. 77.²² Conc. Neocæsar. c. 13.²³ Epiph. Hær. 66.²⁴ Bede, lib. 4. c. 5. Conc. Herudford. c. 2. Ut nullus episcoporum parochiam alterius invadat, sed contentus sit gubernatione creditæ sibi plebis.²⁵ Andrews de Decimis, inter Opuscula, p. 152.²⁶ Bede, lib. 5. c. 8.²⁷ Wheelock in loc.²⁸ Inæ Leges Eccles. c. 4. Primitiæ seminum ad festum S. Martini redduntur, &c. ap. Spelman, p. 183. Conc. Beconceld. c. 1. Ibid. p. 191.²⁹ Epiph. Hær. 69. Arian. c. 1.³⁰ Petav. Annot. in loc.³¹ Vales. Not. in Sozomen. lib. 1. c. 15. Maurice's Vindic. of the Prim. Ch. p. 65.

But we are to observe, that the being settled in a parish-cure, whether in city or country, did not immediately entitle a man to the revenue arising from that cure, whether in tithes or oblations, or any other kind. For, anciently, all church revenues were delivered into the common stock of the bishop's church, whence, by the direction and approbation of the bishop, who was the chief administrator of the revenues of his diocese, a monthly or an annual division was made among the clergy under his jurisdiction, as has been showed before, in giving an account of ecclesiastical revenues,³⁷ and their distribution. Where, among other things, it has been observed out of Theodorus Lector,³⁸ that at Constantinople no parish church had any appropriated revenues till the time of Genadius, in the middle of the fifth century, anno 460, when Marcian's æconomus first ordered the clergy of every church to receive the offerings of their own church, whereas before the great church received them all. In the Western church, particularly in Spain, in the middle of the sixth century, it appears from the first council of Bracara, that the bishop and city clergy had still all their revenues in a common fund, which was divided into four parts, one for the bishop,³⁹ another for the clergy, a third for the fabric and lights of the church, and a fourth for the relief of the poor, to be dispensed by the hands of the archpresbyter or archdeacon, with the bishop's approbation. But the country clergy, as to their revenues, were now, or shortly after, upon a different foot: for in the second council of Bracara, which was held but nine years after the first, anno 572, we find a canon⁴⁰ forbidding bishops to have any share in the oblations of the parochial churches.

Sec. 6.
Settled revenues not immediately fixed upon parishes at their first division, but paid into the common stock.

³² Innoc. Ep. 1. ad Decent. c. 5. Quarum presbyteri, quia die ipso propter plebem sibi creditam nobiscum convenire non possunt, ideoque fermentum a nobis confectum per acolythos accipiunt, ut se a nostra communione maxime illa die non judicent separatos.

³³ Justin. Novel. 3. c. 1.

³⁴ Maurice of Dioces. Episcop. p. 47.

³⁵ Ambros. Com. in 1 Tim. iii. Nunc autem septem diaconos esse oportet, et aliquantos presbyteros, ut bini sint per ecclesias, et unus in civitate episcopus.—Omni enim hebdomada offerendum est, etsi non quotidie peregrinis, incolis tamen vel bis in hebdomada, etsi non desint qui prope quotidie baptizentur ægri.

³⁶ Conc. Neocæsar. c. 13.

³⁷ Book V. chap. 6. sect. 1.

³⁸ Theodor. Lector. lib. 1. p. 553.

³⁹ Conc. Bracar. 1. c. 25. Placuit ut de rebus ecclesiasticis tres æquæ fiant portiones, id est, una episcopi, alia clericorum, tertia in reparatione vel in luminariis ecclesiæ. De quarta parte sive archipresbyter sive archidiaconus illam administrans, episcopo faciat rationem.

⁴⁰ Conc. Bracar. 2. c. 2. Placuit ut nullus episcoporum per suas dioceses ambulans, præter honorem cathedræ suæ, id est, solidos duos, aliquid aliud per ecclesias tollat. Neque tertiam partem ex quacunque oblatione populi in ecclesiis parochialibus requirat, sed illa tertia pars pro luminariis ecclesiæ vel recuperatione servetur, et per singulos annos episcopō inde ratio fiat.

and assigning that third part to maintain the fabric and lights of the church; only allowing them to receive two solidi by way of honorary acknowledgment, (honor cathedræ, the canon terms it,) in their parochial visitations. So that at least from this time we may date the appropriation of revenues in Spain to the country parochial churches. In the same council there is another canon which corrects an abuse, that plainly implies such an appropriate settlement upon country churches. For some patrons,⁴¹ it seems, would build churches on their own lands, not for piety, but for lucre's sake, that they might go halves with the clergy in whatever was collected of the oblations of the people. To remedy which inconvenience the council orders, That no bishop should consecrate any church for the future, that was built upon such abominable contract and tributary condition. This is a further evidence, that the revenues of country churches were then appropriated to them, else such abuses as these could not have had any foundation. But in Germany and France the revenues of the parochial churches seem to have continued in the hands of the bishop, at least he had his dividend of a fourth part, for some ages longer. For there are rules in the Capitulars of Baluzius and Goldastus's editions, which order⁴² tithes and oblations to be divided into four parts, according to ancient canon, and one-fourth to be given to the bishop. And some learned persons,⁴³ who have narrowly examined our English constitution, seem to be of opinion, that the bishops had their portion of the ecclesiastical revenues with the parochial clergy for some considerable time after the first designation and settlement of parish churches. For they suppose, that originally the bishop's cathedral was the only church in a diocese, from whence itinerant or occasional preachers were sent to convert the country people, who for some time resorted to the cathedral for solemn Divine worship. Afterwards, by degrees, some other churches were built among them: first private oratories, or chapels, without any parish bounds, for the convenience of such as, being at too great distance from the cathedral, might more easily resort to them. Then parish churches with certain limits were erected, some by the liberality of the people themselves in more populous and wealthy places, others by the bishops, and others by the Saxon kings; but chiefly the lords of manors, the thanes, as they then called them, were the great instruments in this work of founding parish churches. Whence it was that parish bounds were conformed to the limits and extent of a manor, as I have showed that the bounds of an ancient diocese were to the territory of a city: and hence the lord of a manor had his original right of patronage and presentation. Yet this did not destroy the bishop's right to a share in the revenue of his whole diocese. But time made an alteration in this matter: for our bishops seem voluntarily to have relinquished their title to parochial revenues, as the Spanish bishops had done before them; though whether they made any canon about it, as the other did, I am not able to inform the reader. But Dr. Kennet has observed⁴⁴ out of Dugdale,⁴⁵ that notwithstanding the alteration that was made in this matter, the bishops of the Isle of Man continued to have their tertiana, or third part of all church revenues in that island. Which, I suppose, was because they were not liable to any alterations made here, as not being then of the English jurisdiction. Thus I have given a short account of the original and ancient state of parochial churches, but it is beyond my design to carry this inquiry any further. They who would know by what steps and encroachments parish churches lost their revenues again, first by the confusion of parish bounds, and a liberty granted to men to pay their tithes and oblations where they pleased, and then by appropriations to monasteries, and impropriations granted to laymen, may find these things handled at large in Dr. Kennet's elaborate Discourse of Impropriations and Augmentation of Vicarages, to which I refer the inquisitive reader.

THE CONCLUSION.

WHEREIN IS PROPOSED AN EASY AND HONOURABLE METHOD FOR ESTABLISHING A PRIMITIVE DIOCESAN EPISCOPACY (CONFORMABLE TO THE MODEL OF THE SMALLER SORT OF ANCIENT DIOCESES) IN ALL THE PROTESTANT CHURCHES.

ALL I have further to add upon this subject, is only to make one seasonable and useful reflection upon what has been discoursed in this last Book, with relation to the long wished-for union of all the churches of the Reformation in the same form of episcopal government, agreeable to the model and practice of the primitive church. One great ob-

⁴¹ Conc. Braear. 2. c. 6. Siquis basilicam non pro devotione fidei, sed pro quæstu cupiditatis ædificat, ut quicquid ibi de oblatione populi colligitur, medium cum clericis dividat, eo quod basilicam in terra sua quæstus causa conderit, quod in aliquibus locis usque modo dicitur fieri. Hoc ergo de cetero observari debet, ut nullus episcoporum tam abominabili voto consentiat, &c.

⁴² Capitular. lib. 7. c. 375. Quatuor partes ex omnibus (decimis et oblationibus) fiant.—Quarta episcopo referenda. Vid. Goldast. Constitut. Imper. t. 3. cap. 23. p. 158.

⁴³ See Dr. Kennet's Case of Impropriations, p. 9, &c. Mr. Wharton's Defence of Pluralities, chap. 2. p. 85.

⁴⁴ Case of Impropriations, p. 28.

⁴⁵ Dugdal. Monastic. Angl. t. 1. p. 718.

jection against the present diocesan episcopacy, and that which to many may look the most plausible, is drawn from the vast extent and greatness of most of the northern dioceses of the world, which makes it so extremely difficult for one man to discharge all the offices of the episcopal function. To take off the main force of which objection, I have been at some pains to show, that for the preservation of episcopacy, there is no necessity that all dioceses should be of the same extent, since there was so great difference in the bounds and limits of the ancient dioceses, but not the least difference about the forms or species of episcopal government, for all that, in any part of the primitive church. And therefore, if ever it shall please God to dispose the hearts of our brethren, in the churches of the Reformation, to receive again the primitive form of episcopacy, (which is much to be wished, and there seems in some of them to be a good inclination and tendency toward it,) there needs be no difficulty from this objection to hinder so useful and peaceable a design; because every church is at liberty to contract her own dioceses, and limit them with such bounds, as she judges most expedient for the edification and benefit of the whole community; there being no certain geometrical rule prescribed us about this, either in the writings of the apostles, or in the laws and practice of the primitive church, any further than that every city, or place of civil jurisdiction, should be the seat of an ecclesiastical magistracy, a bishop with his presbytery, to order the spiritual concerns of men, as the other does the temporal. That this was the general rule observed in the primitive church, I think, I have made it appear beyond all dispute, and that upon this ground there was so great a difference in the extent of dioceses sometimes in the same countries, as in Palestine, Asia Minor, and Italy, especially, because the cities differed so much in the extent of their territories, and the bounds and limits of their jurisdiction. Now, it is not very material in itself whether of these models be followed, since they are both primitive, and allowed in ancient practice. The Church of England has usually followed the larger model, and had very great and extensive dioceses: for at first she had but seven bishoprics in the whole nation, and those commensurate in a manner to the seven Saxon kingdoms. Since that time she has thought it a point of wisdom to contract her dioceses, and multiply them into above twenty; and if she should think fit to add forty or a hundred more, she would not be without precedent in the practice of the primitive church. Archbishop Cranmer was very well apprized of this, and therefore he advised King Henry VIII. to erect several new bishoprics, as a great means among other things for reforming the church. In pursuance of which advice the king himself drew up a list of near twenty new bishoprics which he intended to make, and a bill was passed in parliament, anno 1539, to empower the king to do this by his letters patent. The whole transaction and the names of the intended sees may be read at large in Bishop Burnet's History of the Reformation, vol. i. p. 262. The thing indeed miscarried afterward, and by some accident was never effected; but notwithstanding it shows us the sense of the leading men in the Reformation. What therefore has been and still is allowable in this church, is allowable in others; that is, to multiply dioceses as necessity requires, and divide the great care and burden of the episcopal function into more hands for the greater benefit and advantage of the church. Whenever, therefore, any of the foreign churches of the protestant communion shall think fit to reassume again the ancient episcopal form of government among them, they may both with honour and ease frame to themselves such a model of small dioceses, as will not much exceed the extent of one of their classes, nor much alter its form, and yet be agreeable to the model of the lesser sort of dioceses in the primitive church. A temporary moderator, or a superintendent of a small district, such as are our rural deaneries, will easily be made a bishop, by giving him a solemn ordination to the perpetual office of governing the churches of such a district, as chief pastor, under whom all other inferior pastors of the same district must act in subordination to him, deriving their authority from his imposition of hands, and doing nothing without his consent and approbation. As this will secure the just authority and veneration of episcopal superintendency, whilst, according to the rule of Ignatius, nothing is done without the bishop in the church; so will it be agreeable to the model of the ancient church, which had many small dioceses as well as large ones, particularly in Italy, where many episcopal sees were not above five or six miles from one another, and their dioceses not above ten or twelve miles in extent, such as Narnia and Interamnia, Fidenæ, Fulginum, Hispellum, Forum Flaminii, and many others, that have been particularly spoken of in the foregoing Book. There are now a great many such dioceses in Italy in the realm of Naples, where the whole number is a hundred and forty-seven, twenty of which are archbishoprics; and some of them so small as not to have any diocese beyond the walls of the city, as is particularly noted by Dr. Maurice¹ and others, of Campana and Vesta, out of Ughellus's Italia Sacra, whence it is observed also, that Cava in the same kingdom had but five hundred communicants belonging to it. And there are some dioceses at present in the southern parts of France, which I am told do not very much exceed that proportion. The bishopric of the Isle of Man has now but seventeen parishes, and in Bede's time² the whole island had but the measure of three or four hundred families, according to what was then the English way of computation, though the Isle of Anglesea had thrice that number. So that though dioceses in the protestant churches should be thus contracted, yet no other church, where episcopacy is already settled, can have any just reason to complain of such an episcopacy as this, so long as it appears to be agreeable to the original state, and exactly conformable to ancient practice. Nor can any churches then have ground for dispute with one another about external polity and government, though the dioceses of one church happen to be larger or smaller than those of another; so long as they have each their precedents in the ancient church, they may treat one another with the same catholic charity as the ancient churches did, among whom we never find the least footstep of a dispute upon this foundation. Nor is there now any dispute between the two sister churches of England and Ireland upon this head, though the one has enlarged and the other contracted her dioceses since the Reformation. For in Ireland there are not now above half the number of dioceses that there were before, and consequently they must needs be larger by uniting them together. In England there are more in number than formerly, some new ones being erected out of the old ones, and at present the whole number augmented to three times as many as they were for some ages after the first conversion. Beside that we have another way of contracting dioceses in effect here in England, appointed by law, which law was never yet repealed, which is by devolving part of the bishop's care upon the chorepiscopi, or suffragan bishops, as the law calls them: a method commonly practised in the ancient church in such large dioceses as those of St. Basil and Theodoret, one of which had no less than fifty chorepiscopi under him, if Nazianzen rightly informs us; and it is a practice that was continued here all the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and even to the end of King James; and is what may be revived again whenever any bishop thinks his diocese too large, or his burden too great to be sustained by himself alone. From hence I conclude, that the multiplying bishops and contracting of dioceses in the protestant churches, can give no just offence to any other episcopal churches, since it was ever practised in the ancient church, and is now practised in some of the churches of the Reformation, where still the dioceses remain so great, as to be capable of being divided each into ten, without altering the species of episcopacy, or infringing any rule of the catholic church. If this consideration may contribute anything toward the settlement of a primitive episcopacy in such churches of the Reformation as are still without it, (which may be done by ordaining a supreme pastor in every great town, where there is a civil magistracy, with lesser towns and villages in its dependence, which was the ancient notion of a city when episcopacy was first settled by the apostles,) I shall then think my pains and labour, which have not been small, in discovering the extent and measure of so many ancient dioceses, to be still so much the more useful, not only as opening a way to a clear understanding of the state of the ancient church, but as promoting the unity and firmer settlement of the present church, whose general interest, and not that of any particular church or party interfering with it, I have proposed to myself in this whole work to prosecute and serve. The God of peace and truth prosper the endeavours of all those who have no other design.

¹ Maurice, Diocesan Episc. p. 132.

APPENDIX.

HAVING given no particular catalogue of the ancient dioceses in the six African provinces, in the foregoing Book, as of all other provinces in the world; lest it should be thought an omission, I have here subjoined an account of them, as collected by Carolus a Sancto Paulo and Holstenius, out of the ancient councils, and the Collation of Carthage, and the notitia of Africa, published by Sirmondus, among his Miscellanies, and the works of St. Austin, and Victor Vitensis, who speaks of one hundred and sixty-four bishops in the first of these provinces, called Zeugitana, or the Proconsular Africa; though Car. a Sancto Paulo could find the names only of one hundred and two dioceses, and some of these named twice or thrice over. For Bolita, and Vallis, and Vol, are but three names for the same city. So Abdera, and Abbirita, and Abbir Germaniciorum, are the same. As also Sicca and Zigga. Duassedemsai and Duæsenepsalitinae, two corrupt names for the city Selemsal, as Holstenius observes in his remarks upon them.

² Bede. lib. 2. c. 9.

In Provincia Zeugitana, otherwise called Africa Proconsularis.

1. Carthago. 2. Sicilibra. 3. Maxula. 4. Valis. 5. Uthina. 6. Tuburbo. 7. Abdera. 8. Asurus. 9. Tucabor, al. Tucca Terebinthina. 10. Altibura. 11. Vazua. 12. Ammedera. 13. Sicca Venera. 14. Thinnissa. 15. Tuburbo Minus. 16. Membresa. 17. Melzita. 18. Utica. 19. Theudalis. 20. Hippozaritus, al. Hippo-Diarritorum. 21. Membro. 22. Lapda. 23. Bulla Regia. 24. Tennona, al. Tunnona. 25. Beneventum. 26. Simithu. 27. Thele. 28. Carpis. 29. Utimmira. 30. Misua. 31. Duassedemsai. 32. Migripa. 33. Puppiana. 34. Puppita. 35. Urcita, forsan Uci. 36. Gisipa. 37. Uzita, Uci. 38. Bonusta. 39. Cicsita. 40. Neapolis. 41. Culcita. 42. Curubis. 43. Cœfala. 44. Bulla. 45. Clypea. 46. Meglapolis. 47. Timida Regia. 48. Zigga. 49. Semina. 50. Parisium, forsan Pertusa. 51. Rucuma. 52. Talbora. 53. Tagarata. 54. Cellæ. 55. Uzippare. 56. Abbir Germanicia. 57. Ausana, al. Ausapha. 58. Tabuca. 59. Maraggarita, al. Naraggarita. 60. Muzua. 61. Abitina. 62. Tituli. 63. Eudala. 64. Casula. 65. Tulana. 66. Vina, al. Viva. 67. Volita, al. Bolita. 68. Tunes. 69. Mattiana. 70. Hilita. 71. Zarna. 72. Cubdis. 73. Municipitogia. 74. Elibia. 75. Pîa. 76. Taduua. 77. Uzala. 78. Tizzica. 79. Abora. 80. Libertina. 81. Scilita. 82. Absasalla. 83. Aradita. 84. Veri. 85. Ciumturburbo, which Holstenius takes to be a corrupt reading for Civ. M. Tuburbo. 86. Ofita. 87. Municipium Canapium. 88. Nummula. 89. Tauracina. 90. Ucala. 91. Sinuara. 92. Succuba. 93. Horta, vel Horrea. 94. Trisipellis. 95. Giutrambacaria. 96. Villa Magna. 97. Tigimma. 98. Bolita. 99. Aga. 100. Cæciritæ. 101. Tatia Montanensis. 102. Mullita. 103. Duæ Senepsalitinae, al. Selemsilita. 104. Eguge. Holstenius adds, Furni, Simingita, Aptunga, and Simidita.

In Numidia.

1. Cirta, al. Constantina, the civil metropolis of this province. 2. Cullu. 3. Ruscade. 4. Vaga, al. Bagaia. 5. Lares. 6. Mileum, rectius Milevum. 7. Idicra. 8. Cuiculum. 9. Nobas Parsa. 10. Diana. 11. Gemellæ. 12. Cullicitanis. Holstenius reckons it the same with Culcita. 13. Zama Regia, the royal seat of King Juba. 14. Lambiri. 15. Sinitu. 16. Aquæ Tibilitanæ. 17. Hippo Regius. 18. Tubursica. 19. Calama. 20. Gausaphala, al. Gazophyla. 21. Tigillaba. 22. Rotaria. 23. Tipasa. 24. Tagaste. 25. Thagura, al. Tagora. 26. Altaba. 27. Vegesela. 28. Mascula. 29. Macomades. 30. Tamugada. 31. Lambæsa. 32. Tabuda. 33. Bercera. 34. Municipium, al. Municipium Tullense. 35. Burea. 36. Vada. 37. Centenaria. 38. Niba. 39. Amphora. 40. Buconia. 41. Sugita, al. Siguita. 42. Putea. 43. Ausucuro. 44. Fussala. 45. Noba Barbara. 46. Idassa. 47. Monte. 48. Lamsorte. 49. Tididita. 50. Casæ Medianæ. 51. Cethaquensuca, al. Cathaquensa. 52. Centuzia. 53. Noba Germania. 54. Susicasia. 55. Noba Cæsaris. 56. Vazarita, al. Bazarita. 57. Ressana. 58. Augurium. 59. Octabum. 60. Gilba. 61. Mathara. 62. Midila. 63. Punentiana. 64. Metæ. 65. Cæsarea. 66. Nobasina. 67. Cœlia. 68. Zattara. 69. Tarassa. 70. Castellum Titulianum. 71. Girus Marcelli. 72. Sillita, al. Sillilita. 73. Hizirzada. 74. Rusticiana. 75. Madaurus. 76. Buffada. 77. Sistrioniana. 78. Regium. 79. Tegla. 80. Casæ Nigræ. 81. Tubunia. 82. Tigisi. 83. Zabi. 84. Narangara. 85. Musti. 86. Centurio. 87. Aquæ Novæ. 88. Tebeste. 89. Babra. 90. Moxorita. 91. Tamogazia. 92. Respecta. 93. Legiæ. 94. Mazaca. 95. Lugura. 96. Turres Concordiæ. 97. Belesase. 98. Gaudiabe. 99. Garbis. 100. Marculita. 101. Suaba. 102. Germania. 103. Vadesita. 104. Narateata. 105. Lamiggiza. 106. Lamiggiga. 107. Vagarmilita, al. Magarmelita, et Aquæ. 108. Turres Ammeniarum. 109. Mulia. 110. Ospitum. 111. Vagada, al. Vaga, Vaiana, et Bagaia. 112. Lamasua. 113. Tacarata. 114. Ullita, al. Vallita. 115. Seleucia, al. Solentiana. 116. Vada. 117. Maximiana. 118. Zaradta. 119. Girus Tarasi. 120. Vicus Pacis. 121. Tabraca. 122. Tucca. 123. Quidia. 124. Castellum. 125. Milevi. 126. Gira. 127. Fesseita. 128. Damatcore. 129. Mada. 130. Casæ Calanæ. 131. Arsicarita. 132. Vesili, rectius Vegesela. 133. Villa Regia. 134. Legæ. 135. Lamfua. 136. Vagrava. 137. Gilba. 138. Sile. 139. Gauriana. 140. Forme. 141. Forme altera. 142. Fatum. Holstenius adds nine more—Vicus Nigras, Drusiliana, Zuma, or Summa, Constantia, Limata, Mutugenna, Zerta, Sululitta, Centuria; but then he thinks some others are twice repeated, as Mileum and Milevis, Zabi and Zama, Vaga and Vagada, Veseli and Vegesela, Tamagazia and Tamaguda, Culsita and Cullisitanis, Germania and Nova Germania: and Quida belongs to Mauritania Cæsariensis.

In Byzacena.

1. Adrumetum, the civil metropolis. 2. Horrea Cœlia. 3. Tagasa. 4. Turreblandis. 5. Medianum. 6. Sufes. 7. Afufenia. 8. Cillita. 9. Vicus Ateriæ. 10. Mibiarcesis. 11. Segermis. 12. Miriciana. 13. Gatiana, al. Garriana, et Gratiana. 14. Suffetula. 15. Dicea. 16. Tices. 17. Ancausa. 18. Mascliana. 19. Vadentiniana, al. Va-lentiniana. 20. Nara. 21. Seberiana. 22. Tubulbaca. 23. Midita. 24. Tambaia. 25. Jubelidia. 26. Neptita. 27. Bubelia. 28. Cellæ. 29. Decoriana. 30. Putea. 31. Theuzita. 32. Mac-taris, al. Matiris. 33. Thagamuta. 34. Autentum. 35. Abaradira. 36. Bana. 37. Octabium. 38. Octabum. 39. Aquiba. 40. Hermiana. 41. Paradamium, al. Feradi Minor. 42. Turris. 43. Taraza. 44. Crepedula. 45. Trofiniana. 46. Leptis Minor. 47. Feradimaia, al. Feradi Major. 48. Temuniana, vel Temoniara. 49. Unizibira. 50. Tamalluma. 51. Muzuca. 52. Massimana. 53. Serbatiana. 54. Marazana. 55. Pederodiana. 56. Tuzurita. 57. Matarita. 58. Usula. 59. Irpiniana, al. Hierpiniana. 60. Aquæ Albenses. 61. Mene-phessa. 62. Capse. 63. Acola, al. Aquila. 64. Tasbalte. 65. Municipia, et Gernisiæ. 66. Tizia. 67. Ruspe. 68. Vararita. 69. Febianum. 70. Ce-baradefa. 71. Foratiana. 72. Boana. 73. Mi-miana. 74. Telepte. 75. Præsidium. 76. Natio. 77. Maragua. 78. Tetcitana. 79. Macriana. 80. Gurgaita. 81. Cululi. 82. Arsurita, al. Sarsurita. 83. Tagarbala. 84. Aquæ Regiæ. 85. Quæstori-ana. 86. Carcibia. 87. Victoriana. 88. Mate-riana. 89. Hirina. 90. Gummi. 91. Morotheo-rita. 92. Ticalta. 93. Auzegea. 94. Gawarita. 95. Helia. 96. Talapte. 97. Limica. 98. Junca. 99. Thenæ. 100. Jubaltiana. 101. Tamaza. 102. Unuricopolis. 103. Aggir, al. Aggarita. 104. Bi-zacium. 105. Tapsus. 106. Madassumma. 107. Tysurus. 108. Septimunia. 109. Amurdasa. 110. Abidus, al. Aviduvicus. 111. Benefensis. 112. Dura. 113. Rufiniana. 114. Forontioniana. 115. Egnatia. 116. Frontioniana. 117. Tegariata. 118. Aggarita. 119. Garriana. 120. Castrum. 121. Vite, where Victor Vitensis was bishop, who wrote the History of the Vandalic Persecution. 122. Circina. 123. Præcausa. 124. Cufruta. 125. Fi-lace. 126. Oppenua. 127. Sublecte. 128. Cen-culiana. 129. Suluiana. 130. Vassinassa. 131. Aquæ. Holstenius adds to these eight more, Ta-phrura, Tiella, or Zella, Cabarsussis, Tysurus, Tys-dros, Casulæ Cariunæ, Dionysiana, Aquæ. But then he reckons some names unnecessarily repeated, as Miriciana and Maracia, which are but two names for the same city; so Boana and Bana; and Gurgaita the same with Gurges in Mauritania Cæsariensis.

In Mauritania Sitifensis.

1. Sitifi. 2. Tamalluma. 3. Acufida. 4. Ficus. 5. Lemfocta. 6. Perdices. 7. Tubusuptus. 8. Tucca. 9. Lesuita. 10. Flumen Piscis. 11. Privatum. 12. Gegita. 13. Satafa. 14. Cellæ. 15. Gadamsa. 16. Zabi. 17. Assapha. 18. Vamalla. 19. Surista. 20. Salde. 21. Horrea. 22. Aquæ Albæ. 23. Igilgili, al. Eguilguili. 24. Zarai. 25. Parthenium. 26. Marovana. 27. Cidamus. 28. Maeri.

29. Tamagrasta. 30. Aræ. 31. Mozota, al. Mopta. 32. Hippa. 33. Tamascania. 34. Vescetra. 35. Assuoremita. 36. Serteita. 37. Melicbuza. 38. Covium. 39. Oliva. 40. Equizotum. 41. Castellum. 42. Eminentiana. 43. Nobalicia. 44. Lemefi, al. Lemellense Castellum. 45. Socia. 46. Zallata. Holstenius adds three more, Zabunia, or Medianæ Zabuniorum, Vamaccora, or Bamaccora, and Macriana; but rejects Satafa, as belonging rather to Cæsariensis, where it is also repeated.

In Mauritania Cæsariensis and Tingitana.

1. Cæsarea. 2. Ala Miliarensis. 3. Bilta. 4. Bacanaria. 5. Caputcellanum, al. Caputcellæ. 6. Cissæ. 7. Castellum Medianum. 8. Gurgites. 9. Columnæ. 10. Icosium. 11. Florianum. 12. Minna. 13. Obba. 14. Maturbum. 15. Reperitanum. 16. Rusubicari. 17. Suffara, al. Suffasar. 18. Rustonium. 19. Tigis. 20. Aquæ. 21. Tabora. 22. Mamilla. 23. Sumula, al. Subbula. 24. Ubaba. 25. Tadama. 26. Zuchabari. 27. Tipasa. 28. Ida. 29. Timisi. 30. Tasacora. 31. Vagal. 32. Cartenna. 33. Gratianopolis. 34. Masucaba. 35. Pamararia. 36. Lapidia. 37. Bulturia. 38. Malliana. 39. Castellum Tetraportense. 40. Bapara. 41. Tamazuca. 42. Quidium. 43. Serta. 44. Ita. 45. Girumons. 46. Panatoria. 47. Sucarda. 48. Fitoloma. 49. Novæ. 50. Usunada. 51. Flumenzerita. 52. Amaura. 53. Sestum. 54. Taranamusa. 55. Nasbinca. 56. Villanoba. 57. Vardimissa. 58. Catula. 59. Regium. 60. Vaudinum. 61. Capra. 62. Rusucurum. 63. Sfasteria. 64. Timida. 65. Tabla. 66. Rusgonia. 67. Leosita. 68. Oppidum Novum. 69. Aquisira. 70. Tigava. 71. Rusadir. 72. Castellum. 73. Mutecita. 74. Albula. 75. Bita. 76. Mauriana. 77. Baliana. 78. Arsenaria. 79. Oborita. 80. Labdia. 81. Tenissa. 82. Catabita. 83. Hervis. 84. Voncaria. 85. Gypsaria. 86. Tamadempsis. 87. Vagæ. 88. Tabadcara. 89. Catra, vel Castra. 90. Elephantaria. 91. Garra. 92. Murconium. 93. Ida. 94. Thubunæ. 95. Oppinum. 96. Tuscamia. 97. Gunagita. 98. Maxita. 99. Satafa. 100. Vissalsa. 101. Adsinuada. 102. Castellum Ripense. 103. Numidia. 104. Tamuda. 105. Caltadria. 106. Subur. 107. Ambia. 108. Murustaga. 109. Fallaba. 110. Bida. 111. Manaccenseri. 112. Tifilta, al. Tisilta. 113. Castellum Minus. 114. Tigamibena. 115. Junca. 116. Corniculana. 117. Nobica. 118. Frontæ. 119. Castellum Jabaritanum. 120. Sereddeli. 121. Agna. 122. Macania. 123. Site. 124. Altæa. 125. Benepota. 126. Castra Seberiani. 127. Siccasa. 128. Flenucletu. 129. Metagonium. 130. Voncariana. 131. Maiuca. 132. Nabala. 133. Maura. 134. Tingaria. But Holstenius observes seven of these to be supernumerary; for Zuchabar and Subur are but two names for the same city. So Rustonium and Rusgonia differ only in the manner of pronunciation. Timida belongs to the Proconsular Africa; and Labdia is the same as Lapda in the said province. Herpis is put for Irpiniana in Byzacena; Metagonium for Mutugenna in Numidia; and Macania for Macriana in Byzacena.

In Tripolis.

1. Leptis Magna. 2. Sabrata. 3. Girba. 4. Oea. 5. Tacape.

Beside these sees, which are thus assigned to their respective provinces, Carolus a Sancto Paulo exhibits an alphabetical list of several others, which he could not certainly fix in any province. But Holstenius, in his critical remarks upon them, observes, that a great many of these are only corruptions of the forementioned names; and therefore I shall here give them with his corrections, and some additions that he has made to them from his own observations.

- | | | | |
|---|--|---|---|
| 1. Aurusuliana. | 24. Burugia. | with Cataquensa in Numidia. | 80. Haba. |
| 2. Advocata. | 25. Bauzara. | 51. Celerina. | 81. Hospitia; the same with Ospitum in Numidia. |
| 3. Asenemsala, which Holstenius takes to be the same with Senemsala, in Africa Proconsularis. | 26. Bofeta, the same with Buffada in Numidia. | 52. Cenesta; the same with Tevesta in Numidia. | 82. Horrea Avicinen-sis. |
| 4. Ausugabra. | 27. Bazarididaca. | 53. Casæ Bastalenses. | 83. Haram Celtena; the same as Horrea Celia in Byzacena. |
| 5. Acemerina. | 28. Bosuta. | 54. Casæ Favenses. | |
| 6. Ambura; the same with Amphora in Numidia. | 29. Bencenna. | 55. Cilibia. | |
| 7. Abbeza. | 30. Bartinifia. | 56. Cebarsussa. To these Holstenius adds, | 84. Iziriana. |
| 8. Azuga; a mistake for Vaga. | 31. Betagbara. | 57. Cancopita. | 85. Jucundiana. |
| 9. Anguia. | 32. Bucara; the same with Boncara in Mauritania. | 58. Ceramussa. | 86. Idura. Holstenius adds two more: |
| 10. Abissa. | 33. Buslacena. | 59. Cæsariana. | 87. Jacubaza. |
| 11. Apissana. | 34. Bagai, the same with Vagada, or Vaiana in Numidia. | 60. Dydarita. | 88. Infita. |
| 12. Assaba. | 35. Badi, Holstenius adds three more. | 61. Drusiliana; a city of Numidia, 12 miles from Lares. | 89. Limata. |
| 13. Aptuca, a city in Africa Proconsularis. | 36. Bladia. | 62. Drusita. | 90. Larita. |
| 14. Amaccura, leg. Ab Accura. | 37. Burita. | 63. Drua. | 91. Lambia; the same with Lambesa in Numidia. |
| 15. Aquitana. | 38. Buronita. | 64. Dusa. | 92. Lucimagna. |
| 16. Ausuagiga. | 39. Castrum Galbæ. | 65. Diaba; the same with Zaba in Mauritania Sitifensis. | 93. Lelalita. |
| 17. Abbir, the same with Abbarita in Africa. | 40. Cedas. | 66. Evera; the same with Vera, or Veri, in Africa Proconsularis. | 94. Liberalia. |
| 18. Aniusa, added by Holstenius. | 41. Chullabi. | 67. Edistiana. | 95. Lacus Dulcis. |
| 19. Arena, idem. | 42. Cibaliana. | 68. Ensis; the same with Oea in Tripoli. | 96. Luperciana, mentioned in the council under Cyprian, which Bishop Fell thinks is the same with Lupertina in the Collation of Carthage. |
| 20. Bellulita. | 43. Casæ Silvanæ. | 69. Feradi Major; the same with Feradimaia in Byzacena. | 97. Magarmela; the same with Vagarmela in Numidia. |
| 21. Bazita. | 44. Cemerinianu. | 70. Furvi; the same with Furni in Africa Proconsularis. | 98. Medefessita; the same as Menefessa in Byzacena. |
| 22. Botriana. | 45. Clia. A corruption of Elia, or Helia, in Byzacena. | 71. Fissana; perhaps Fussala in Numidia. | 99. Mesarfelta. |
| 23. Bamacora, the same with Vamacora in Mauritania Sitifensis. | 46. Cathaugura. | 72. A Furnis; the same with Furni. | 100. Merferobita. |
| | 47. Cena. | 73. Feliciana, added by Holstenius. | 101. Munavilita. |
| | 48. Caviopitavora. | 74. Gitti. Municipium Antonino. | 102. Musertita. |
| | 49. Cincarita. | 75. Gazabeta. | 103. Mopta; a city of Mauritania Sitifensis. Holstenius adds to these two more: |
| | 50. Catagna; the same | 76. Gazabiana. To which Holstenius adds, | 104. Munaciana, and |
| | | 77. Ginesita. | 105. Marcelliana and Bazita, whereof one Lucidus is named bishop in the Collation of Carthage. |
| | | 78. Givirta, or Girbis. | |
| | | 79. Guira; if it be not the same with Gira in Numidia mentioned before. | 106. Niciba. |

- | | | | |
|--|---|--|--|
| 107. Nignenses Majores; the same as Nignenses, or Vicus Nigras in Numidia. | 129. Simungita, Simingita, or Simina, in Africa. | Mauritania Cæsariensis. | 176. Vuazia. |
| 108. Nurcona; the same with Murconium in Mauritania Cæsariensis. | 130. Sinnipsa. | 156. Tisedita. | 177. Utumma. |
| 109. Nasaita. | 131. Suboabbrita; the same as Zuchabari in Mauritania. | 157. Thybæ. Holstenius adds eight more: | 178. Victoriana, named before in Byzacena. |
| 110. Nova Petra. | 132. Simidica, a city of Africa Proconsularis. | 158. Tibari. | 179. Vicus Cæsaris. Holstenius adds five more: |
| 111. Nebbita. | 133. Siguita; the same as Sugita in Numidia. | 159. Talabrica. | 180. Vallita, al. Ullita. |
| 112. Nizugubita. | 134. Signi. | 160. Tubia. | 181. Vina; the same as Vica, or Vina Vicus, in Africa. |
| 113. Novasumma; the same with Nobasina, in Numidia. | 135. Sibida. Holstenius adds two more: | 161. Timitica. | 182. Undesia. |
| 114. Onza. | 136. Saturnica. | 162. Tisilita. | 183. Uzittara. |
| 115. Oria. | 137. Salicina. | 163. Thasbalte. | 184. Utinuna, al. Ucimina in Africa. |
| 116. Putzia. | 138. Tibuzabete. | 164. Turuda. | 185. Zura. |
| 117. Pauzera. | 139. Turuda. | 165. Turuzi. | 186. Zella, named before in Byzacena. |
| 118. Pista. To which Holstenius adds three others: | 140. Tunugaba. | 166. Vamaius, Uei Major in Africa Proconsularis. | 187. Zelta. Holstenius thinks it should be Zerta in Numidia. |
| 119. Pisita. | 141. Tignica. | 167. Vinariona. | 188. Zica. |
| 120. Pisidia, a city of Tripolis. | 142. Tabaicaria; the same as Tabadcara in Mauritania Cæsariensis. | 168. Urugita. | 189. Zabunia; the same as Medianæ Zabuniorum, a place near Sitifi in Mauritania. |
| 121. Pertusa, a city in Antonine's Itinerary near Carthage. | 143. Taprura, Taphrura, near the isle of Cercina in Byzacena. | 169. Vartana. | |
| 122. Refala; the same as Cephala in Africa Proconsularis. | 144. Turris Alba. | 170. Visa. | |
| 123. Sinuara, named before in Africa Proconsularis. | 145. Tala. | 171. Vaturba. | |
| 124. Serteita, named before in Cæsarea Sitifensis. | 146. Tubursus, Tubursica in Numidia. | 172. Verrono. | |
| 125. Selemsila, named above in Africa. | 147. Tzella; the same as Zella in Byzacena. | 173. Vensana. | |
| 126. Summa, Zuma in Numidia. | 148. Tibazabula. | 174. Voseta, al. Visica, a city of Mauritania. | |
| 127. Sena. | 149. Tabazaga. | 175. Vinda. | |
| 128. Saya. | 150. Truvascanina. | | |
| | 151. Tuzumma; the same as Zumma in Numidia. | | |
| | 152. Tunusuda. | | |
| | 153. Tesaniana. | | |
| | 154. Tusdrus; the same as Tysdros in Byzacena. | | |
| | 155. Tuzurita; a city of | | |

Holstenius adds one more, called Zenita or Zemta in the Collation of Carthage, from whence the greatest part of the forementioned names are taken. But the reader must not imagine, that so many bishoprics, as have been specified in all the six African provinces, and among these of uncertain position, were all extant at one and the same time. For there never was quite five hundred at one time in Africa, as has been showed before from St. Austin and the notitia published by Sirmondus; and yet here are above six hundred and eighty recounted by Carolus a Sancto Paulo and Holstenius, after sixty are rejected, which are named twice over. So that from first to last there was a change of almost two hundred dioceses in Africa, or at least a change in their names; which I note, lest any should think there were more dioceses than St. Austin mentions.

AN INDEX OF THE PROVINCES.

- A
- ACHAIA, 383
 Adiabene Assyriæ, 369
 Ægyptus Prima, 357
 Ægyptus Secunda, 358
 Æmilia, 395
 Africa Proconsularis, 355
 Alpes Cotticæ, 395
 Alpes Graiæ, 398
 Alpes Maritimæ, ibid.
 Apulia, 393
 Aquensis, vide Narbonensis Secunda
 Aquileiensis, vide Venetia
 Aquitania Prima, 399
 Aquitania Secunda, ibid.
 Arabia Petræa, al. Palestina Tertia, 362
 Arabia Philadelphicæ, 360
 Arcadia, 358
 Arelatensis, vide Viennensis Secunda
 Armenia Prima, 374
 Armenia Secunda, ibid.
 Armenia Magna, al. Persica, 369
 Asia Proconsularis, 376
 Assyria, 369
 Augustamnica Prima, 357
 Augustamnica Secunda, ib.
 Axumitis, vide India
 Axumitica, 370
- B
- Belgica Prima, 399
 Belgica Secunda, ibid.
 Bithynia Prima, 376
 Bithynia Secunda, ibid.
 Bituricensis, vide Aquitania Prima
 Blemyes in Ethiopia, 371
 Bœtica, 400
 Bracarensis, vide Gallecia Prima
 Britannia, 405
 Brutia, 393
 Burdigalensis, vide Aquitania Secunda
 Byzacena, 355
- C
- Calabria, 393
 Campania, 392
 Cappadocia Prima, 373
 Cappadocia Secunda, 374
 Cappadocia Tertia, ibid.
 Caria, 377
 Carthaginensis Hispaniæ, 400
 Chaldæa, 369
 Cilicia Prima, 380
 Cilicia Secunda, ibid.
 Comagene, vide Euphratensis, 365
 Corsica Insula, 394
 Creta Insula, 383
 Cyclades Insulæ, 380
 Cyprus Insula, 365
- D
- Dacia Mediterranea, 384
 Dacia Ripensis, ibid.
 Dacia Antiqua, sive Gothia, 384
 Dalmatia, 385
 Dardania, 384
 Diospontum, vide Helenopontus
- E
- Ebrodunensis, vide Alpes Maritimæ
 Elusana, vide Novempopulania
 Emeritensis, vide Lusitania
 Epirus Vetus, 383
 Epirus Nova, ibid.
 Ethiopia, 371
 Eubœa Insula, vide Achaia
 Euphratesia, 365
 Europa Thraciæ, 382
- F
- Flaminia, 395
 Flavia Britannicæ
- G
- Galatia Prima, 375
 Galatia Secunda, ibid.
 Gallecia Prima, 401
 Gallecia Secunda, ibid.
 Germanica Prima, 400
 Germanica Secunda, ibid.
 Gothia, al. Dacia Antiqua, 384
- H
- Hæmimontis, 382
 Hagiopolitana, vide Euphratensis
 Helenopontus, 375
 Hellespontus, 376
 Hellas, vide Achaia and Thessalia
 Hibernia, 402
 Histria, 396
 Hispalensis, vide Bœtica
 Homeritarum Regio, 370
 Honorias, 375
- I
- Iberia, 371
 Illyricum Occidentale, 385
 Illyricum Orientale, 383
 Immerinorum Regio, 370
 India Axumitica sub Ægypto, ibid.
 Isauria, 379
- L
- Larissena, vide Thessalia
 Latium, 391
 Lazica, 380
 Lesbos Insula, ibid.
 Liguria, 395
 Libya Marmarica, sive Secunda, 358
 Libya Pentapolis, sive Cyrenaica, ibid.
 Lucania, 393
 Lugdunensis Prima, 399
 Lugdunensis Secunda, ibid.
 Lugdunensis Tertia, ibid.
 Lugdunensis Quarta, ibid.
 Lugdunensis Quinta, vide Maxima Sequanorum
 Lusitania, 400
 Lycaonia, 378
 Lycia, ibid.
- Lydia, 377
- M
- Macedonia Prima, 383
 Macedonia Secunda, ibid.
 Mauritania Cæsariensis, 355, 424
 Mauritania Sitifensis, ibid.
 Mauritania Tingitana, 424
 Maxima Cæsariensis Britanniæ
 Maxima Sequanorum, 399
 Mediolanensis, vide Liguria
 Mesopotamia, 365
 Mœsia Prima, sive Superior, 384
 Mœsia Secunda, sive Inferior, 382
- N
- Narbonensis Prima, 399
 Narbonensis Secunda, ibid.
 Nicopolitana, vide Epirus Vetus
 Noricum Mediterraneum, 385
 Noricum Ripense, ibid.
 Notitia Imperii, 342
 Notitia Ecclesiæ, 343
 Novempopulania, 399
 Numidia, 355, 423
- O
- Osrhoena, 365
- P
- Palæstina Prima, al. Salutaris, 361
 Palæstina Secunda, ibid.
 Palæstina Tertia, al. Arabia Petræa, ibid.
 Pamphylia Prima, 378
 Pamphylia Secunda, ibid.
 Pannonia Superior, 385
 Pannonia Inferior, ibid.
 Paphlagonia, 375
 Peloponnesus, vide Achaia
 Persia, 370
 Phœnicia Prima, 365
 Phœnicia Libani, ibid.

Phrygia Pacatiana Prima, 379	Rhætia Prima and Secunda, 396	Senonensis, vide Lugdunensis Quarta	Trevirensis, vide Belgica Prima
Phrygia Salutaris, ibid.	Rhodomagensis, vide Lugdunensis Secunda	Sicilia, 394	Turonensis, vide Lugdunensis Tertia
Phrygia Pacatiana Secunda, ibid.	Rhodope, 382	Syria Prima, 365	Tuscia, 388
Picenum Annonarium, 394		Syria Secunda, ibid.
Picenum Suburbicarium, 391	S		U
Pisidia, 379	Samnium, 393	Tarraconensis, 400	Valeria, 390
Pontus Polemoniacus, 374	Sardinia, 394	Thebais Prima, 358	Venetia, 396
Prævalitana, 384	Saracenorum Regio, 370	Thebais Secunda, ibid.	Viennensis Prima, 398
	Savia, 385	Theodorias, 365	Viennensis Secunda, ibid.
R	Scotia, 404	Thessalia, 383	Umbria, 388
Ravennensis, vide Flaminia	Scythia cis Danubium in Thracia, 380	Thessalonicensis, vide Macedonia
Remensis, vide Belgica Secunda	Scythia trans Danubium, 384	Thracia, 382	Z
		Tripolitana, 356	Zeugitana, vide Africa Proconsularis

AN INDEX OF EPISCOPAL SEES.

A	Adriana, in Hellespontus, 376	Aila, in Palæstina Tertia, 361	Amastris, in Paphlagonia, 375
Abaradira, in Byzacena	Adriana, in Pamphylia Secunda, 378	Alabanda, in Caria, 377	Amathus, in Cyprus, 365
Abdara, in Bœtica, 400	Adrianopolis, in Epirus Vetus, 383	Alæsa, in Sicily, 394	Amathus, in Palæstina Secunda, 361
Abdia, vel Ada, incertæ posit. in Hispania	Adrianopolis, in Honorias, 375	Alba Pompeia, in Alpes Cottia, 395	Ambianum, Amiens, in Belgica Secunda, 400
Ábellinum, in Campania, 393	Adrianopolis, in Pisidia, 379	Albanum, in Latium, 391	Amblada, in Lycaonia, 378
Abrinca, Auranches, in Lugdunensis Secunda, 399	Adrianopolis, in Hæmimontis, 382	Alba, in Latium, ibid.	Ambura, vide Amphora
Abritum, in Mœsia Secunda, 382	Adrianothæ, in Hellespontus, 376	Albensium Civitas, Vivaria, in Viennensis, 398	Ameria, in Umbria, 389
Abula, in Lusitania, 400	Adulis, in Ethiopia, 371	Albige, Alby, in Aquitania Prima, 399	Amida, in Mesopotamia, 365
Abydus, in Hellespontus, 376	Æcœ, in Apulia, 393	Albingaunum, Albenga, in Alpes Cottia, 395	Amisus, in Helenopontus, 375
Abyla, in Phœnicia Libani, 365	Æclanum, in Samnium, ibid.	Aleria, in Corsica, 394	Amiternum, in Valeria, 390
Acarassus, in Lycia, 378	Ægea, in Cilicia Secunda, 380	Aletium, in Calabria, 393	Amorium, in Phrygia Salutaris, 379
Acelum, in Venetia, 396	Ægea, in Asia, 377	Aletium, Alet, in Lugdunensis Prima, 399	Amyzon, in Caria, 377
Acci, Guadix, in Carthagenensis Hispania, 400	Ælia, vide Hierusalem, 361	Aletrium, in Latium, 391	Anagnia, in Campania, 391
Acerræ, in Campania, 392	Æmi, idem cum Æno	Alexandria, in Ægyptus Prima, 356, 359	Anapolis, incertæ posit. ex Concil. Sardicensi
Acherontia, Acerenza, in Apulia, 393	Æmonia, in Histria, 396	Alexandria, Scanderon, in Cilicia Secunda, 380	Anastasiopolis, in Caria, 377
Achrida, in Prævalitana, 384	Ænus, in Rhodope, 382	Alexanum, Alessano, in Calabria, 393	Anastasiopolis, in Galatia Prima, 375
Aconia, in Phrygia Pacatiana, 379	Æsis, in Picenum Annonarium, 394	Algiza, vide Argiza, in Asia	Anastasiopolis, in Phrygia Pacatiana, 379
Acrassus, in Lydia, 377	Agatha, Agde, in Narbonensis Prima, 399	Alinda, in Caria, 377	Anazarbus, in Cilicia Secunda, 380
Acropolis, in Lucania, 393	Agdamia, incertæ posit. in Phrygia	Aliona, in Phrygia Pacatiana, 379	Anchialus, in Hæmimontis, 382
Adada, in Pisidia, 379	Aginnum, Agen, in Aquitania Secunda, 399	Alipha, in Samnium, 393	Anchiasmus, in Epirus Vetus, 383
Adana, in Cilicia Prima, 380	Agrigentum, in Sicily, 394	Altinum, in Venetia, 396	Ancona, in Picenum Suburbicarium, 391
Adra, in Arabia Philadelphicæ, 360	Agrippina, in Germanica Secunda, 400	Amadassa, in Phrygia Salutaris, 379	Ancyra, in Phrygia Pacatiana, 379
Adramyttium, in Asia, 377	Agraga, incertæ Provincie, in Hispania	Amalphia, in Campania, 392	Ancyra, in Galatia Prima, 375
		Amantia, in Epirus Nova, 383
		Amasea, in Helenopontus, 375

- Andera, in Asia, 377
 Andegavum, Angiers, in Lugdunensis Tertia, 399
 Andrapa, in Helenopontus, 375
 Andropolis, in Ægyptus Prima, 356
 Anæa, in Asia, 377
 Anemurium, in Isauria, 379
 Anenysia, forsan Anæa
 Anitha, in Arabia, 360
 Anicium, vide Vellava
 Aninetum, in Asia, 377
 Antaradus, in Phœnicia Prima, 365
 Antæum, in Thebais Prima, 358
 Anthedon, in Palæstina Prima, 361
 Anthysa, urbs incertæ posit.
 Antinoe, in Thebais Prima, 358
 Antiochia ad Mæandrium, in Caria, 377
 Antiochia Mygdoniæ, vide Nisibis, in Mesopotamia
 Antiochia, in Pisidia, 378
 Antiochia, in Syria Prima, 365, 367
 Antiochia ad Tragum, in Isauria, 379
 Antipatris, in Palæstina Prima, 361
 Antiphellus, in Lycia, 378
 Antiphra, in Libya, 358
 Antipolis, Antibe, in Narbonensis Secunda, 399
 Antipyrgus, in Libya, 358
 Antissiodorum, Auxerre, in Lugdunensis Quarta, 399
 Antithou, in Augustamnica Secunda, 358
 Antium, in Latium, 391
 Antrum, incertæ positionis, in Thessalia vel Samothracia
 Apamea, in Pisidia, 379
 Apamea, in Bithynia Secunda, 376
 Apamea, in Syria Secunda, 365
 Aphnæum, in Augustamnica Prima, 356
 Aphrodisias, in Caria, 377
 Aphroditopolis, in Arcadia, 358
 Apiaria, in Mœsia Secunda, 382
 Apira, in Phrygia Pacati-ana, 379
 Apollinis Civitas Parva, in Thebais Prima, 358
 Apollinis Fanum, in Lydia, 377
 Apollonia, in Epirus Nova, 383
 Apollonia, in Lydia, 377
 Apollonias, in Caria, ibid.
 Apollonias, in Bithynia, 376
 Apta Julia, Apt, in Narbonensis Secunda, 399
 Aptuchi Fanum, in Pentapolis, 358
 Aqua Viva, in Tuscia, 388
 Aquæ, in Dacia Ripensis, 384
 Aquæ, Acs, in Novempopulania, 399
 Aquæ Sextiæ, Aix, in Narbonensis Secunda, ibid.
 Aquæ Statiellæ, Acqui, in Alpes Cotticæ, 395
 Aquileia, in Venetia, 396
 Aquinum, in Latium, 391
 Aqaitana, incertæ provincia in Africa
 Arabyssus, in Armenia Secunda, 374
 Araclia, in Palæstina Prima, 361
 Arad, in Palæstina Tertia, ib.
 Aradus, in Phœnicia Prima, 365
 Arana, in Lycaonia, 378
 Arausio, Orange, in Vien-nensis Secunda, 399
 Araxa, in Lycia, 378
 Arca, in Armenia Secunda, 374
 Arca, in Phœnicia Prima, 365
 Arcabrica, Arcas, in Carthaginensis Hispania, 400
 Arcadiopolis, in Asia, 377
 Arcadiopolis, in Europa, 382
 Archelais, in Palæstina Prima, 361
 Ardonæ, in Apulia, 393
 Arelate, Arles, in Viennensis Secunda, 399
 Areopolis, in Lydia and Asia, 377
 Areopolis, in Palæstina Tertia, 361
 Arethusæ, in Syria Secunda, 365
 Aretium, in Tuscia, 388
 Argentoratum, Strasburg, in Germanica Prima, 400
 Argia, in Asia, 377
 Argos, in Achaia, 383
 Ariarathia, in Armenia Secunda, 374
 Ariassus, in Pamphylia Secunda, 378
 Ariminum, in Picenum Annonarium, 395
 Arindela, in Palæstina Tertia, 362
 Arisita, in Aquitania Prima, 399
 Arista, in Bithynia, 376
 Arlana, in Phœnicia Libani, 365
 Armaquetius, urbs incertæ posit. ex Concil. Sardicensi
 Arpi, in Apulia, 393
 Arsinoe, in Arcadia, 358, 359
 Arsinoe, in Cyprus, 365
 Arverni, Clermont, in Aquitania Prima, 399
 Ascalon, in Palæstina Prima, 361
 Asculum, in Picenum Suburbicarium, 391
 Asenemsala, vide Senemsala
 Asinda, Medina Sidonia, in Bœtica, 400
 Apendus, in Pamphylia Prima, 378
 Aspona, in Galatia Prima, 375
 Assisium, in Umbria, 389
 Assus, in Asia, 377
 Asta, Asti, in Alpes Cotticæ, 395
 Asturica, Astorga, in Gallæcia, 402
 Astygis, Ecija, in Bœtica, 400
 Asuna, vide Sasima, 374
 Atanassus, in Phrygia Pacati-ana, 379
 Atella, in Campania, 393
 Aternum, Pescara, in Picenum Suburbicarium, 391
 Athenæ, in Achaia, 383
 Atina, in Campania, 391
 Atribis, in Augustamnica Secunda, 356
 Attalia, in Lydia, 377
 Attalia, in Pamphylia Secunda, 378
 Attudi, in Phrygia Pacati-ana, 379
 Aturum, Aire, in Novempopulania, 399
 Avara, in Arabia, 360
 Auca, in Tarraconensis, 400
 Aucanda, in Lycia, 378
 Avenio, Avignon, in Viennensis Secunda, 399
 Aventicum, Avenche, in Maxima Sequanorum, 399
 Auninia, in Picenum Suburbicarium, 391
 Augusta Rauracorum, Augst, in Maxima Sequanorum, ibid.
 Augusta Suessionum, Sois-sons, in Belgica Secunda, 399, 400
 Augusta, in Cilicia Prima, 350
 Augusta Ausciorum, Aux, in Novempopulania, 399
 Augusta Taurinorum, Turin, in Alpes Cotticæ, 395
 Augusta Trevirorum, Triers, in Belgica Prima, 399
 Augusta Veromanduorum, 400
 Augusta Vindelicorum, Ausburg, in Rhœtia Secunda, 396
 Augustodunum, Autun, in Lugdunensis Prima, 399
 Augustopolis, in Palæstina Tertia, 361
 Augustopolis, in Phrygia Salutaris, 379
 Aulium, in Asia, 377
 Aulon, in Epirus Nova, 383
 Aurelia, Orleans, in Lugdunensis Quarta, 399
 Aureliopolis, in Asia, 377
 Auria, Orense, in Gallæcia, 402
 Ausona, Vich de Ausona, in Tarraconensis, 400
 Auxinum, Osmo, in Picenum Suburbicarium, 391
 Axumis, in Ethiopia, 371
 Azana, in Phrygia Pacati-ana, 379
 Azotus, in Palæstina Prima, 361
 Azuga, vide Vaga

B

- Babylon, in Augustamnica Secunda, 356
 Bactra, eadem cum Bachatha, in Palæstina Tertia, or in Arabia, 360, 361
 Bætiræ, Beziers, in Narbonensis Prima, 399
 Baioca, Baieux, in Lugdunensis Secunda, ibid.
 Balanæa, in Theodorias, 365
 Balandus, in Lydia, 377
 Balbura, in Lycia, 378
 Balcea, urbs incertæ posit.
 Balia, urbs incertæ posit.
 Balneum Regis, Bagnarea, in Tuscia, 388
 Bana, in Lydia, 377
 Bapara, in Mauritania Cæsariensis
 Baptinum, urbs incertæ posit.
 Baratta, in Lycaonia, 378
 Barca, in Pentapolis, 358
 Barcino, Barcelona, in Tarraconensis, 400
 Barcusa, urbs incertæ posit.

- Bares, in Hellespontus, 376
 Bargaza, al. Baretta, in Asia, 377
 Bargyla, in Caria, ibid.
 Barissara, forsan Berissa, in Armenia Prima Baris, in Pisidia, 379
 Barium, in Apulia, 393
 Baschat, vide Bacatha, 361
 Basilinopolis, in Bithynia, 376
 Basti, Baza, in Carthaginiensis, 400
 Batava Castra, vide Patavia, in Noricum, 385
 Batnæ, in Osrhoena, 365
 Bellovacum, Beauvais, in Belgica Secunda, 400
 Bellunum, Belluno, in Venetia, 396
 Beneventum, in Samnio, 393
 Berenice, in Pentapolis, 358
 Bergomum, in Liguria, 395
 Berinopolis, in Galatia Prima, 375
 Berinopolis, in Lycaonia, 378
 Berisse, in Armenia Prima, 374
 Berræa, in Syria Prima, 365
 Berrhæa, in Macedonia, 383
 Berytus, in Phœnicia Prima, 365
 Bethauna, urbs incertæ positionis, in Syria
 Bigastrum, in Carthaginiensis, 400
 Bindeum, in Pisidia, 379
 Bisuntio, Besanson, 399
 Biturigæ, Bourges, in Aquitania Prima, ibid.
 Bivinum, al. Vibinum, Bovino, in Apulia, 393
 Bizya, in Europa Thracia, 382
 Blaccna, al. Blatea, urbs incertæ posit. in Dacia vel Achaia
 Blanda, in Lucania, 393
 Bleandrus, in Phrygia Pacatiana, 379
 Blera, Bieda, in Tuscia, 388
 Bobium, in Alpes Cottiaë, 395
 Bollica, Belley, in Maxima Sequanorum, 399
 Bononia, in Æmylia, 395
 Bononia, Bolougne, in Belgica Secunda, 400
 Boræum, in Pentapolis, 358
 Bosporus, in Scythia trans Danube
 Bossa, urbs incertæ posit.
 Bostra, in Arabia, 360
 Botolium, urbs incertæ posit.
 Botrus, in Phœnicia Prima, 365
 Bova, in Brutia, 394
 Bovianum, Boiano, in Samnium, 393
 Bracara, in Gallecia, 402
 Briocum, in Lugdunensis Tertia, 399
 Brittonia, in Gallecia, 402
 Brixellum, Bressello, in Æmylia, 395
 Brixia, Brescia, in Liguria, ibid.
 Brixino, Brixen, in Rhœtia Secunda, 396
 Brullena, in Asia, 377
 Brundisium, Brindisi, in Calabria, 393
 Brysum, in Phrygia Salutaris, 379
 Bubastus, in Augustamnica Secunda, 356
 Bubon, al. Bunum, in Lycia, 378
 Budine, in Dacia, 384
 Bullidum, in Epirus Nova, 383
 Buna, incertæ posit. in Lycia
 Bura, forsan in Achaia
 Burdigala, Bourdeaux, in Aquitania Secunda, 399
 Busiris, in Ægyptus Secunda, 358
 Buthrotum, in Epirus Vetus, 383
 Butus, in Ægyptus Secunda, 358
 Buxentum, in Lucania, 393
 Byblus, in Phœnicia Prima, 365
 Byzacium, in Byzacena
 Byzantium, in Europa, 382
- C
- Cabasa, in Ægyptus Secunda, 358
 Cabellio, Cavaillon, in Viennensis Secunda, 399
 Cabillonum, Chalons sur Saone, in Lugdunensis Prima, ibid.
 Cabula, urbs incertæ posit.
 Cadi, in Phrygia Pacatiana, 379
 Cadurcum, Cahors, in Aquitania Prima, 399
 Cæna, urbs incertæ posit.
 Caerleon, in Britannia Secunda, 405
 Cæsaraugusta, Saragossa, in Tarraconensis, 400
 Cæsarea, in Bithynia, 376
 Cæsarea, in Cappadocia Prima, 373
 Cæsarea, in Euphratesia, 365
 Cæsarea, in Palæstina Prima, 361
 Cæsarea Philippi, vide Panceas, in Phœnicia Prima, 365
 Cæsena, in Flaminia, 395
 Calagurris, Calahorra, in Tarraconensis, 400
 Calatia, in Campania, 393
 Calenum, Cagli, in Campania, ibid.
 Calinda, in Lycia, 378
 Callinicus, in Osrhoena, 365
 Callipolis, in Calabria, 393
 Callipolis, in Europa Thracia, 382
 Callium, Cagli, in Picenum Annonarium, 395
 Camarina, in Sicilia, 394
 Cameracum, Cambay, in Belgica Secunda, 400
 Camerinum, in Umbria, 389
 Camuliana, in Cappadocia Secunda, 374
 Candas, urbs incertæ posit.
 Candida Casa, Whitern, in Valentia Britannia, 404
 Canna, in Lycaonia, 378
 Cannæ, in Apulia, 393
 Canotha, in Arabia, 360
 Cantanum, in Creta, 384
 Canusium, in Apulia, 393
 Caparcotia, in Palæstina Secunda, 361
 Capitolias, in Palæstina Secunda, ibid.
 Caprulla, in Venetia, 396
 Capua, in Campania, 392
 Caput Cillanum, in Mauritania Cæsariensis
 Caradea, vide Corada
 Caralis, in Sardinia, 394
 Carallus, in Pamphylia Prima, 378
 Carcaso, in Narbonensis, 399
 Carina, in Brutia, 394
 Carissa, in Paphlagonia, incert. positionis
 Caristus, in Achaia, 383
 Carnutum, Chartres, in Lugdunensis Quarta, 399
 Caropti, forsan Carothus, in Cyrenaica
 Carpasia, in Cyprus, 365
 Carpathus, in Insulæ Cyclades, 380
 Carpentoracte, Carpentras, in Viennensis Secunda, 399
 Carpis, in Pannonia Inferior, 385
 Carræ, in Osrhoena, 365
 Carsia, in Achaia, 383
 Carteriopolis, in Cyprus, 365
 Carthage, in Africa Proconsularis, 356
 Carthago, in Carthaginiensis, 400
 Casatana, urbs incertæ posit.
 Caschara, in Mesopotamia, 365, 369
 Cassandria, in Macedonia, 383
 Cassinum, in Latium, 391
 Cassium, in Augustamnica Prima, 356
 Cassus, in Pamphylia Prima, 378
 Castabala, in Cilicia Secunda, 380
 Castrum Martis, in Mœsia Prima, 384
 Castrum Valentini, in Tuscia, 388
 Castrum Uceciense, Uzes, in Narbonensis Prima, 399
 Castulo, Gazlona, in Carthaginiensis, 400
 Casulæ Carianenses, in Byzacena
 Catana, in Sicilia, 394
 Cathaquensa, in Numidia
 Catuellaunorum Civitas, Chalons, in Champagne, in Belgica Secunda, 400
 Caunus, in Lycia, 378
 Cauria, Coria, in Lusitania, 400
 Celenderis, in Isauria, 379
 Celia, in Pannonia Inferior, 385
 Celina, in Venetia, 396
 Cemelene, Cimies, in Alpes Maritimæ, 398
 Ceneta, Ceneda, in Venetia, 396
 Cenomanum, Le Mans, in Lugdunensis Tertia, 399
 Centumcellæ, Civita Vecchia, in Tuscia, 388
 Cepha, in Mesopotamia, 365
 Cephalenia Insula, 383
 Ceramus, in Hellespontus, 376
 Ceramus, in Caria, 377
 Cerasa, in Lydia, ibid.
 Cerasus, in Pontus Polemoniacus, 374
 Cerillus, in Brutia, 394
 Cestrus, in Isauria, 380
 Cetharquensuca, vide Cathaquensa

- Chæretapa, in Phrygia Pacatiana, 379
 Chalcædon, in Bithynia, 376
 Chalcis, in Achaia, 383
 Chalcis, in Syria Prima, 365
 Charadra, in Isauria, 380
 Chatimæa, urbs incertæ positionis, ex Conc. Sard.
 Cherronesus, in Crete, 383
 Chersonesus, in Europa Thracica, 382
 Chios, Insula Cyclades, 380
 Choma, in Lycia, 378
 Chonochara, vide Comoara
 Chytrus, in Cyprus, 365
 Cibalis, in Savia, 385
 Cidissus, in Phrygia Pacatiana, 379
 Cilina, urbs incertæ posit. ex Conc. Ephes.
 Cingulum, in Picenum Suburbicarium, 391
 Cinna, in Galatia Prima, 375
 Cinnaborium, in Phrygia Salutaris, 379
 Circesium, in Osrhoena, 365
 Ciscissa, in Cappadocia Prima, 374
 Citium, in Crete, 383
 Citium, in Cyprus, 365
 Civitas Albensium, 398
 Cius, in Bithynia, 376
 Claudiopolis, in Honorias, 375
 Claudiopolis, in Isauria, 380
 Clazomenæ, in Asia, 377
 Cleopatris, in Ægyptus Prima, 356
 Clusium, in Tuscia, 388
 Clypea, in Africa Proconsularis
 Clysma, in Arcadia, 358
 Cocilianum, in Lucania, 393
 Cœlos, in Europa, 382
 Colobrassus, in Pamphylia Secunda, 378
 Colonia Londinensium, vide Colonia Lindi, in Britannia, 405
 Colonia, in Cappadocia Tertia, 374
 Colonia Agrippina, in Germanica Secunda, 400
 Colophon, in Asia, 377
 Colossa, Chone, in Phrygia Pacatiana, 379
 Comacula, Comacchio, in Flaminia, 395
 Comæa, in Mœsia Secunda, 382
 Comana, in Armenia Secunda, 374
 Comana, in Pontus Polemoniæ, ibid.
 Commachum, in Pamphylia Secunda, 378
 Comoara, in Phœnicia Libani, 365
 Complutum, Alcalá de Henares, in Carthagenensis, 400
 Comum, Como, in Liguria, 395
 Cone, in Phrygia Salutaris, 411
 Conimbrica, Coymbra, in Gallecia, 402
 Consentia, Cosenza, in Bruttia, 394
 Consoranni, Conserans, in Novempopulania, 399
 Constantia, Coutance, in Lugdunensis Secunda, ibid.
 Constantia, Constance, in Maxima Sequanorum, vide Vindonissa
 Constantia, in Cyprus, 365
 Constantia, al. Cirta, in Numidia, 355
 Constantine, in Arabia, 360
 Convenæ, Cominges, in Novempopulania, 399
 Coos, in Insulæ Cyclades, 380
 Coprithis, in Ægyptus Prima, 356
 Coptus, in Thebais Secunda, 358
 Coracesium, in Pamphylia Secunda, 378
 Corada, in Phœnicia Libani, 365
 Corbasa, in Pamphylia Secunda, 378
 Corcyra, Corfu, in Epirus Vetus, 383
 Corduba, Cordova, in Bœtica, 400
 Cordylus, in Pamphylia Secunda, 378
 Corfinium, or Valva, 393
 Coricus, in Cilicia Prima, 380
 Corinthus, in Achaia, 383
 Corisopitum, in Lugdunensis Tertia, 399
 Corissia, in Achaia, 383
 Corna, in Lycaonia, 378
 Cornetum, in Tuscia, 388
 Corniculana, in Mauritania Cæsariensis
 Corone, in Achaia, 383
 Corone, in Bœotia, ibid.
 Cortona, in Tuscia, 388
 Corydalla, in Lycia, 378
 Cotana, in Pamphylia Prima, ibid.
 Cotenopolis, incertæ posit. in Ægyptus, 357
 Cotyaium, in Phrygia Salutaris, 379
 Cratia, al. Flaviopolis, in Honorias, 376
 Cremona, in Liguria, 395
 Crotona, in Bruttia, 394
 Crusa, Insula Doridis, in Sinu Ceramic
 Ctesiphon and Seleucia, in Assyria, 369
 Cucusus, in Armenia Secunda, 374
 Cuma, al. Cyme, in Asia, 377
 Cumæ, in Campania, 392
 Cupersanum, Conversano, in Apulia, 393
 Cures, St. Anthimo, in Valleria, 390
 Curia, Coire, in Rhœtia Prima, 396
 Curium, in Cyprus, 365
 Curta, in Pannonia Inferior, 385
 Cusa, in Thebais Prima, 358
 Cybira, in Caria, 377
 Cybistra, in Cappadocia Secunda, 374
 Cydonia, in Crete, 383
 Cyla, al. Cœlos, in Europa, 382
 Cynopolis Superior, in Arcadia, 356
 Cynopolis Inferior, in Ægyptus Secunda, 358
 Cypera, in Thessalia, 383
 Cypsela, in Rhodope, 382
 Cyrene, in Pentapolis, 358
 Cyrus, in Comagene, 365, 368
 Cysamus, in Crete, 383
 Cyzicus, in Hellespontus, 376
- D
- Dablis, in Bithynia, 376
 Dadibra, in Paphlagonia, 375
 Daldus, in Lydia, 377
 Dalisandus, in Isauria, 380
 Damascus, in Phœnicia Libani, 365
 Danaba, in Phœnicia Libani, ibid.
 Dardanum, in Hellespontus, 376
 Darnis, in Libya, 358
 Dausara, in Osrhoena, 365
 Delos Insula, 380
 Demetrias, in Thessalia, 383
 Derbe, in Lycaonia, 378
 Dertona, Tortona, in Alpes Cottia, 395
 Dertosa, Tortosa, in Tarraconensis, 400
 Develtus, in Hæmimontis, 382
 Dia, or Dea Vocontiorum, Die, in Viennensis Secunda, 399
 Dianium, Denia, in Carthagenensis, 400
 Dicæsarea, in Thessalia, 383
 Diciozanabrus, al. Zenopolis, in Pamphylia, 378
 Dinia, Digne, in Alpes Maritimæ, 398
 Diocesarea, in Isauria, 380
 Diocletiana, in Dardania, 384
 Diocletianopolis, in Thracia, 382
 Dioclia, in Phrygia Pacatiana, 379
 Dionysias, in Arabia, 360
 Dionysiopolis, in Mœsia Secunda, 382
 Dionysiopolis, in Phrygia Pacatiana, 379
 Diospolis, in Thracia, 382
 Diospolis, in Ægyptus Secunda, 358
 Diospolis Magna, al. Thebais Magna, in Thebais Secunda, ibid.
 Diospolis Parva, in Thebais Secunda, ibid.
 Diospolis, al. Lydda, in Palæstina Prima, 361
 Diospontum, name of a province, not of a city, 374
 Disthis, in Pentapolis, 358
 Dium, in Macedonia, 383
 Doara, in Cappadocia Tertia, 374
 Doberus, in Macedonia, 383
 Docimæum, in Phrygia Salutaris, 379
 Doclea, in Dalmatia, 385
 Dodone, in Epirus Vetus, 383
 Dola, in Lugdunensis Tertia, 399
 Doliche, in Comagene, 365
 Domitopolis, in Isauria, 380
 Dora, in Palæstina Prima, 361
 Dorlanis, urbs incertæ posit. ex Conc. Sardic.
 Dorovernia, in Britannia Prima, 405
 Dorylæum, in Phrygia Salutaris, 379
 Drusipara, in Europa, 382

- Duassedemsai, vide Selem-sal
- Dumium, in Gallecia, 402
- Durostorum, in Mœsia Secunda, 382
- Dyrrachium, Doracium, in Epirus Nova, 383
- E
- Ebora, Evora, in Lusitania, 400
- Eboracum, in Britannia, 405
- Ebrodunum, Ambrun, in Alpes Maritimæ, 398
- Ebroica, Eureux, in Lugdunensis Secunda, 399
- Ebusus, Insula, 402
- Echinus, in Thessalia, 383
- Echineota, incertæ posit. in Ægyptus
- Edessa, in Osrhoena, 365, 369
- Egabrum, Cabra, in Bœtica, 400
- Egara, Tarrassa, in Tarraconensis, ibid.
- Egara, in Phrygia Pacatiana, 379
- Egita, Eidania, in Lusitania, 400
- Egnatia, in Byzacena
- Elana, al. Neela, in Arabia, 360
- Elatea, in Achaia, 383
- Elæa, in Asia, 377
- Elearchia, in Ægyptus Secunda, 358, 360
- Elesma, vide Clysmā, in Arcadia, 358
- Eleuthera, in Crete, 383
- Eleutheropolis, in Palæstina Prima, 361, 363
- Elia, in Palæstina Prima, 361
- Eliberis, Elvira, in Bœtica, 400
- Eliocrota, Lorca, in Carthaginensis Hispaniæ, ibid.
- Elusa, Eause, in Novempopulania, 399
- Elusa, in Palæstina Tertia, 361
- Emerita, Merida, in Lusitania, 400
- Emesa, in Phœnicia Libani, 365
- Eminium, incertæ posit. in Hispania
- Emmaus, vide Nicopolis, 361
- Emporiæ, Empurias, in Tarraconensis, 400
- Engolisma, Angoulesine, in Aquitania Secunda, 399
- Epala, al. Epula, urbs incertæ posit.
- Ephesus, in Asia, 377
- Epidaurus, Ragusa, in Dalmatia, 385
- Epiphania, in Syria Secunda, 365
- Epiphania, in Cilicia Secunda, 380
- Eporedia, Jurea, in Liguria, 395
- Ergavica, Alcaniz, in Carthaginensis, 400
- Erissa, in Caria, 377
- Erra, in Arabia, 360
- Erymne, in Pamphylia Prima, 378
- Erythra, in Pentapolis, 358
- Erytra, in Asia, 377
- Esbus, in Arabia, 360
- Etene, in Pamphylia Prima, 378
- Evaria, al. Euroia, al. Justinianopolis, in Phœnicia Libani, 365
- Evaza, in Asia, 377
- Eucarpia, in Phrygia Salutaris, 379
- Eudoxias, in Lycia, 378
- Eudoxias, in Pamphylia Secunda, ibid.
- Eugubium, Gubbio, in Umbria, 389
- Eulandra, urbs incertæ positionis
- Eumenia, in Phrygia Pacatiana, 379
- Euria, in Epirus Vetus, 383
- Europus, al. Amphipolis and Thapsacum, in Euphratesia, 365
- Euusum, vide Ebusus Insula
- F
- Faleronia, Faleroni, in Picenum Suburbicarium, 391
- Fanum Jovis, in Asia, 377
- Fanum Fortunæ, Fano, in Picenum Annonarium, 395
- Faventia, Faenza, in Flaminia, ibid.
- Faustinopolis, in Cappadocia Secunda, 374
- Feltria, Feltri, in Venetia, 396
- Ferentinum, in Latium, 391
- Ferentium, Ferento, in Tuscia, 388
- Fesulæ, Fiezoli, in Tuscia, ibid.
- Ficoclae, Cervia, in Flaminia, 395
- Fidenæ, in Valeria, 390
- Firmum, Firmo, in Picenum Suburbicarium, 391
- Flagonea, vide Phragonea, in Ægyptus Secunda, 358
- Flaviopolis, in Cilicia Secunda, 380
- Florentia, Florence, in Tuscia, 388
- Formiæ, in Latium, 391
- Forontioniana, in Bizacena
- Forum Flamini, For-flammo, in Umbria, 389
- Forum Claudii, Oriolo, in Tuscia, 388
- Forum Novum, Vescovio, in Umbria, 389
- Forum Sempronii, in Picenum Annonarium, 395
- Forum Cornelii, Imola, in Flaminia, ibid.
- Forum Livii, Forli, in Flaminia, ibid.
- Forum Popilii, in Flaminia, ibid.
- Forum Julii, Friuli, in Histria, 396
- Forum Trajani, in Sardinia, 394
- Forum Julii, Frejuz, in Narbonensis Secunda, 399
- Fragonia, in Egyptus Secunda, 358
- Frequentum, Fricenti, in Samnium, 393
- Fulginum, Fulgino, in Umbria, 389
- Fundi, in Latium, 391
- Furconium, Forconio, in Valeria, 390
- G
- Gabala, in Lydia, 377
- Gabala, in Theodorias, 365
- Gabalum, Mandé, in Aquitania Prima, 399
- Gabbus, in Syria Prima, 365
- Gabii, in Latium, 391
- Gadamautus, vide Hydmautus, in Lycaonia, 379
- Gadamusa, in Mauritania Sitifensis
- Gadara, in Palæstina Secunda, 361
- Gaiopolis, forsā Geapolis, in Arabia
- Gangra, in Paphlagonia, 375
- Gargara, in Asia, 377
- Gavea, incertæ posit. in Ægyptus, 358
- Gaza, in Palæstina Prima, 361, 363
- Gazula, incertæ posit. in Ægyptus, 358
- Gegita, in Mauritania Sitifensis
- Geneva, in Viennensis Prima, 398
- Genua, in Alpes Cottia, 395
- Geone, in Pamphylia Secunda, 378
- Gerara, in Palæstina Prima, 361
- Gerasa, in Arabia, 360
- Germa, in Hellespontus, 376
- Germanicia, in Euphratesia, 365
- Germanicopolis, in Isauria, 380
- Geronta, vel Gerus, vel Geranus Locus, urbs incertæ posit. in Armenia, vel Macedonia
- Gerunda, Girona, in Tarraconensis, 400
- Gerus, in Augustamnica Prima, 356
- Gilsata, in Pamphylia Secunda, 378
- Gindarus, in Syria Prima, 367
- Girberis, in Tripolis, 356
- Glandata, Glandeve, in Alpes Maritimæ, 398
- Gnidus, in Caria, 378
- Gnossus, in Crete, 383
- Gomphi, in Thessalia, ibid.
- Gordus, in Lydia, 377
- Gordus, in Bithynia, 376
- Gortena, in Pisidia, 379
- Gortyna, in Crete, 383
- Gradus, Grado, in Venetia, 396
- Gratianopolis, Grenoble, in Viennensis, 398
- Gravisca, Montalto, in Tuscia, 388
- Grumentum, Agrimonte, in Lucania, 393
- H
- Hadria, Adri, in Picenum Suburbicarium, 391
- Hadria, Adri, in Flaminia, 395
- Hadrjana, in Bithynia, 376
- Hadrianopolis, in Hæmimontis, 382
- Haglustade, in Britannia, 407
- Halicarnassus, in Caria, 377
- Harpasa, in Caria, ibid.
- Hebrides Insulæ
- Helena, Elna, in Narbonensis, 399
- Helice, in Achaia, 383

- Heliopolis, in Augustamnica Secunda, 358
Heliopolis, in Phœnicia Libani, 365
Hellene, in Lydia, 377
Hellenopolis, in Bithynia, 376
Helmham, or Elmham, in Britannia, 407
Hephæstia, in Macedonia, 383
Hephæstus, in Augustamnica Prima, 356
Heraclea, in Augustamnica Prima, ibid.
Heraclea, in Macedonia, 383
Heraclea, in Europa Thracia, 382
Heraclea, in Lydia, 377
Heraclea Latmi, in Caria, ibid.
Heraclea Ponti, in Honorias, 375
Heraclea Salbaci, in Caria, 377
Heraclea Superior, in Arcadia, 358
Herdona, Ardonia, in Apulia, 393
Herefordia, in Britannia, 405
Hermonthes, in Thebais Secunda, 358
Hermopolis Parva, in Ægyptus Prima, 356
Hermopolis Magna, in Thebais Prima, 357
Hermopolis, in Isauria, 380
Hierapetra, in Crete, 383
Hierapolis, in Phrygia Pacatiana, 379
Hierapolis, in Isauria, 380
Hierocæsarea, in Lydia, 377
Hieropolis, in Euphratesia, 365
Hierusalem, in Palæstina Prima, 361, 364
Himeria, in Orsnoena, 365
Hippo Diaretorum, in Africa Proconsularis, 355
Hippo Regius, in Numidia, ibid.
Hippus, in Palæstina Secunda, 361
Hipsele, in Thebais Prima, 358
Hipsus, in Phrygia Salutaris, 379
Hircani, in Lydia, 377
Hispalis, Seville, in Bœtica, 400
Hispellum, in Umbria, 389
Honomada, in Lycaonia, 378
Hortanum, Horti, in Tuscia, 388
Hyda, in Lycaonia, 378
Hydmautus, in Lycaonia, 379
Hydrax, in Pentapolis, 358
Hydruntum, Otranto, in Calabria, 393
Hypæpa, in Asia, 377
- I
- Jabruda, in Phœnicia Libani, 365
Jadera, in Dalmatia, 385
Jamna, in Minorica, 402
Jamnia, in Palæstina Prima, 364
Jassus, in Caria, 377
Ibonium, vide Bivinum
Iborea, in Helenopontus, 375
Iconium, in Lycaonia, 378
Jericho, in Palæstina Prima, 361
Ignatia, in Apulia, 393
Ilerda, Lerida, in Tarraconensis, 400
Ilipa, al. Iipla, Niebla, in Bœtica, ibid.
Ilistra, in Lycaonia, 378
Ilium, in Hellespontus, 376
Illicias Alicante, in Carthagenensis, 400
Illiturgis, incertæ posit. in Hispania
Ilusa, in Phrygia Pacatiana, 379
Ingilon, urbs incertæ posit.
Insule, vide Hebrides
Interamna, Terni, in Umbria, 389
Interamna, Teramo, in Picenum Suburbicarium, 391
Jonopolis, vide Junopolis, in Paphlagonia, 375
Joppa, in Palæstina Prima, 361
Jotape, in Isauria, 380
Irenopolis, in Cilicia Secunda, ibid.
Iria Flavia, El Padron, in Gallecia, 402
Isaura, in Lycaonia, 378
Iscus, in Dacia Ripensis, 384
Isinda, in Pamphylia Secunda, 378
Istonium, in Samnium
Italica, Sevilla la Vieja, in Bœtica, 400
Itoana, Bitoana, in Phrygia Pacatiana, 379
Juliopolis, in Galatia Prima, 375
- L
- Labdia, vel Lapda
Lacedæmon, in Achaia, 383
Lacobriga, incertæ posit. in Hispania
Lactoratium, Lectoure, in Novempopulania, 399
Lærus, urbs vel insula incertæ posit. in Ægæo Mari
Lagania, in Pamphylia Secunda, 378
Lamecum, Lamego, in Gallecia, 402
Lamia, in Thessalia, 383
Lamphania, urbs incertæ posit.
Lampsacus, in Hellespontus, 376
Lamus, in Isauria, 379
Landava, Landaff, in Britannia Secunda, 405
Laniobra, incertæ posit. in Hispania
Laodicea, in Phrygia Pacatiana, 379
Laodicea, in Pisidia, ibid.
Laodicea, in Theodorias, 365
Laodicea, in Phœnicia Libani, ibid.
Lapithus, in Cyprus, ibid.
Lappa, i Crete, 383
Laranda, in Lycaonia, 378
Larima, in Caria, 377
Larissa, in Thessalia, 383
Larissa, in Syria Secunda, 365
Lascara, Lescar, in Novempopulania, 399
Latopolis, in Thebais Secunda, 358
Laudunum, Leon, in Belgica Secunda, 400
Laverica, incertæ posit. in Hispania
Lavici, in Latium, 391
Laureacum, Lork, in Noricum, 385
Laus Pompeia, Lodi, in Liguria, 395
Lauzada, in Isauria, 380
Lebedus, in Asia, 377
Ledra, in Cyprus, 365
Legio, Leon, in Gallecia, 402
Lemandus, in Pentapolis, 358
Lemovica, Limoges, in Aquitania Prima, 399
Leontini, Lentini, in Sicilia, 394
Leontopolis, in Augustamnica Secunda, 356
Leptis Magna, in Tripolis, ibid.
Lete, in Macedonia, 383
Letus, in Ægyptus Prima, 356
Lexovium, Lisieux, in Lugdunensis Secunda, 399
Libias, in Palæstina Prima, 361
Lichfield, in Britannia, 407
Lilybæum, Marsala, in Sicilia, 394
Limenopolis, in Pisidia, 379
Limyra, in Lycia, 378
Lindsifarne, in Britannia, 407
Lindocolina, al. Lindum Colonia, Lincoln, in Britannia, 405
Lingones, Langres, in Lugdunensis Prima, 399
Linoc, in Bithynia Secunda, 376
Linternum, in Campania, 392
Lipara Insula, 394
Lisia, urbs incertæ posit.
Lisinia, in Pisidia
Lissus, Alessio, in Prævalitana, 384
Lista, in Valeria, 390
Locri, Gieraci, in Brutia, 393
Londinum, in Britannia, 405
Lorium, in Tuscia, 388
Luca, in Tuscia, ibid.
Lucus Augusti, in Gallecia, 402
Luctum, urbs incertæ posit.
Lugdunum, Lyons, in Lugdunensis Prima, 399
Luna, in Tuscia, 388
Luteva, Lodeue, in Narbonensis Prima, 399
Lybias, in Isauria, 380
Lycopolis, in Thebais Prima, 358
Lychnidus, in Epirus Nova, 383
Lydda, vide Diospolis, 361
Lydda, in Palæstina Prima, ibid.
Lypia, Luspiæ, in Calabria, 393
Lyrbæ, in Pamphylia Prima, 378
Lysias, in Phrygia Salutaris, 379

- Lysimachia, in Europa, 382
 Lysinia, in Pamphylia Secunda, 378
 Lystra, in Lycaonia, ibid.
- M
- Macedonopolis, urbs incertæ posit. in Mesopotamia
 Mæonia, in Lydia, 377
 Magalona, Isle of Magalona, in Narbonensis Secunda, 399
 Magidis, in Pamphylia Secunda, 378
 Magnesia Mæandri, in Asia, 377
 Magnesia Sipyli, in Asia, ibid.
 Magnetum, incertæ posit. in Hispania
 Majorica Insula, 402
 Maiuma, in Palestina Prima, 361, 363
 Malaca, Malaga, in Bætica, 400
 Malleotana, urbs incertæ posit. forsan Malliatha, in Arabia
 Mallus, in Cilicia Prima, 380
 Mallus, in Pisidia, 379
 Manturanum, in Tuscia, 388
 Marathon, in Achaia, 383
 Marcelilanum, vide Cosilianum
 Marciana, in Lycia, 378
 Marcianopolis, in Mæsia Secunda, 382
 Marcopolis, in Osrhoena, 365
 Mareotis, in Ægyptus Prima, 356
 Margus, in Mæsia Prima, 384
 Mariama, Mariamne, in Syria Secunda, 365
 Mariana, in Corsica, 394
 Marianopolis, in Euphratesia, 365
 Marianum, in Venetia, 396
 Marmarica, in Libya, 358
 Maronia, in Rhodope, 382
 Marruvium, al. Marsi, in Valeria, 390
 Martyropolis, in Mesopotamia Prima, 365
 Massilia, Marselles, in Viennensis Secunda, 399
 Mastaura, in Lydia, 377
 Matelica, in Picenum Suburbicarium, 391
 Matisco, Mascon, in Lugdunensis Prima, 399
 Mauriana, St. Jean de Maurienne, in Viennensis, 399
 Maustaura, in Lycia, 378
 Maximianopolis, in Arabia, 360
 Maximianopolis, in Rhodope, 382
 Maximianopolis, in Pamphylia Secunda, 378
 Maximianopolis, in Palestina Secunda, 361
 Maximianopolis, in Thebais Secunda, 358
 Medaba, in Arabia, 360
 Mediolanum, Milan, in Liguria, 395
 Mediomatricum, Metz, in Belgica Prima, 399
 Megalopolis, in Achaia, 383
 Megara, in Achaia, ibid.
 Melda, Meaux, 399
 Melita Insula, 394
 Melitene, in Armenia Secunda, 374
 Melitopolis, in Hellespontus, 376
 Melos Insula, 380
 Melphia, Melfi, in Apulia, 393
 Memphis, in Arcadia, 358
 Menelaïtes, in Ægyptus Prima, 356
 Menevia, St. David's, in Britannia, 405
 Mennith, in Palestina Secunda, 361
 Mentesa, Mentexa, in Carthaginensis, 400
 Mesembria, in Hæmimontis, 382
 Messana, in Sicilia, 394
 Messene, in Achaia, 383
 Metelis, in Ægyptus Prima, 356
 Methymna, in Lesbos, 380
 Metrocomia, vide Bacatha, in Palestina Tertia
 Metropolis, in Asia, 377
 Metropolis, in Thessalia, 383
 Metropolis, in Pisidia, 379
 Mevania, Bevagna, in Umbria, 389
 Midaïum, in Phrygia Salutaris, 379
 Migirpa, in Africa Proconsularis
 Mignenia, urbs incertæ posit. forsan Magniana, in Illyricum Occidentale
 Miletus, in Caria, 377
 Mileum, al. Milevis, in Numidia, 355
 Miniza, al. Mnisus, in Mesopotamia, 365
 Minoida, al. Mennith, in Palestina Secunda, 361
 Minorica Insula, 402
 Minturnæ, in Campania, 392
 Misenum, in Campania, ibid.
 Misthium, in Lycaonia, 378
 Mocissus, vide Justinopolis, in Cappadocia Tertia, 374
 Mocta, vide Mopta vel Mozota
 Moguntiacum, Mentz, in Germanica Prima, 400
 Molitianum, urbs incertæ posit.
 Mopsuestia, in Cilicia Secunda, 380
 Morea, al. Famagorea, urbs incertæ positionis
 Mostena, in Lydia, 377
 Mosynus, in Phrygia Pacatiana, 379
 Muranum, Morano, in Bruttia, 394
 Mursa, in Savia, 385
 Mutina, Modena, in Æmylia, 395
 Myndus, in Caria, 377
 Myra, in Lycia, 378
 Myrrina, in Asia, 377
 Myriangelus, urbs incertæ positionis
 Myrum, al. Merum, in Phrygia Salutaris, 379
 Mytelene, in Lesbos, 380
- N
- Nacolia, in Phrygia Salutaris, 379
 Naissus, in Dacia Ripensis, 384
 Namnetes, Nantes, in Lugdunensis Tertia, 399
 Narbo, in Narbonensis Prima, 399
 Narnia, Narni, in Umbria, 389
 Naucratis, in Ægyptus Prima, 356
 Naulochus, in Asia, 377
 Naupactus, Lepanto, in Achaia, 383
 Naxus Insula, 380
 Nazianzum, in Cappadocia Tertia, 374
 Nea, vide Sanæa, in Phrygia Pacatiana, 379
 Neapolis, Naples, in Campania, 392
 Neapolis, in Macedonia, 383
 Neapolis, in Caria, 377
 Neapolis, in Arabia, 360
 Neapolis, Sichem, in Palestina Prima, 361
 Nebium, in Corsica, 394
 Neela, vide Elana, in Arabia, 360
 Nemausum, Nismes, in Narbonensis, 399
 Neocæsarea, in Pontus Polemoniacus, 374
 Neocæsarea, in Bithynia, 376
 Neocæsarea, vide Cæsarea, in Euphratensis
 Nepe, vulgo Nepi, in Tuscia, 388
 Nephelis, in Isauria, 380
 Neritum, Nardo, in Calabria, 393
 Nessyna, Nessus, in Dardania, 384
 Nibe, Nive, in Arabia, 360
 Nicæa, Nice, in Alpes Maritimæ, 398
 Nicæa, Nice, in Bithynia, 376
 Nicephorium, in Osrhoena, 365
 Nicium, in Ægyptus Prima, 356
 Nicomedia, in Bithynia, 376
 Nicopolis, in Epirus Vetus, 383
 Nicopolis, in Mæsia Secunda, 382
 Nicopolis, in Thracia, ibid.
 Nicopolis, in Armenia Prima, 374
 Nicopolis, Emmaus, in Palestina Prima, 361, 364
 Nicotera, Nicodro, in Bruttia, 394
 Nilopolis, in Arcadia, 358
 Nisibis, in Mesopotamia, 365, 369
 Nisilectum, urbs incertæ posit.
 Nitria, in Ægyptus Prima, 356
 Nivernum, Nevers, in Lugdunensis Quarta, 399
 Nola, in Campania, 392
 Nomentum, Lamentana, in Valeria, 390
 Nosalena, urbs incertæ posit. forsan in Armenia Minor Nova, in Venetia, 396
 Nova Aula, in Asia, 377
 Novæ, in Mæsia Secunda, 382
 Novaria, in Liguria, 395
 Noviodunum, in Savia, 385
 Noviodunum, Noyon, in Belgica Secunda, 400
 Nuceria, Nocera, in Umbria, 389
 Numana, Humana, in Picenum Suburbicarium, 391
 Nursia, Norza, in Valeria, 390

- Nysa, vel Nesus, in Lycia, 378
 Nyssa, in Asia, 377
 Nyssa, in Cappadocia Secunda, 374
- O
- Oasis Magna, in Thebais Prima, 358
 Occa, in Hellespontus, 376
 Oericulum, in Umbria, 389
 Octodurum, Martenach, in Alpes Graiae, 398
 Odessus, in Mœsia Secunda, 382
 Œœa, in Tripolis, 356
 Œeneanda, in Lycia, 378
 Olbia, in Pamphylia Secunda, ibid.
 Olbia, in Pentapolis, 358, 359
 Olbus, in Isauria, 380
 Olero, Oleron, in Novempopulania, 399
 Oliva, in Mauritania Sitifensis
 Olympus, in Lycia, 378
 Olyssippo, Lisbona, in Lusitania, 400
 Onosada, al. Usada, in Lycaonia, 378
 Onosarta, in Syria Prima, 365
 Onium, al. Iium, in Augustamnica Secunda, 356
 Onuphis, in Ægyptus Prima, ibid.
 Opita, urbs incertæ posit.
 Optergium, Oderzo, in Venetia, 396
 Opus, in Achaia, 383
 Orchades, in Britannia, 404
 Orcistus, in Galatia Secunda, 375
 Orestis, in Brutia, 394
 Oretum, Oreto, in Carthaginensis, 400
 Oreum, in Achaia, 383
 Orgellum, in Tarraconensis, 400
 Orthosias, in Phœnicia Prima, 365
 Orthosias, in Caria, 377
 Ortona, in Samnium, 393
 Osca, in Tarraconensis, 400
 Ossismorum, in Lugdunensis Tertia
 Ossonaba, Estoy, in Lusitania, 400
 Ostia, in Latium, 387, 391
 Ostracina, in Augustamnica Prima, 356
 Otrum, in Phrygia Salutaris, 379
 Ovilabis, in Noricum, 385
- P
- Pachneumonis, in Ægyptus Secunda, 358
 Pæmanium, in Hellespontus, 376
 Pæstum, Pesto, in Lucania, 393
 Palæbisca, in Pentapolis, 358
 Palæopolis, in Asia, 377
 Palæopolis, in Pamphylia Secunda, 378
 Palladianum, urbs incertæ posit.
 Pallentia, in Carthaginensis, 400
 Palma, in Majorica, 402
 Palmyra, in Phœnicia Libani, 365
 Paltus, in Theodorias, al. Syria Prima, ibid.
 Pampelona, in Tarraconensis, 400
 Panæphysus, in Augustamnica Prima, 356, 360
 Paneas, al. Cæsarea Philippi, in Phœnicia Prima, 365
 Panemoticus, in Pamphylia Secunda, 378
 Panium, in Europa, 382
 Panopolis, in Thebais Prima, 358
 Panormus, Palermo, in Sicilia, 394
 Paphos, in Cyprus, 365
 Pappa, in Lycaonia, 378
 Parætonium, in Libya, 358
 Paralaus, in Pisidia, 379
 Parallus, in Arcadia, 358
 Paralus, in Ægyptus Secunda, ibid.
 Paraxia, urbs incertæ posit. in Macedonia
 Parembola, in Arabia, 360
 Parentium, in Histria, 396
 Parisii, Paris, in Lugdunensis Quarta, 399
 Parium, in Hellespontus, 376
 Parma, in Æmylia, 395
 Parnassus, in Cappadocia Tertia, 374
 Paros Insula, 380
 Parosithus, urbs incertæ positionis
 Partenium, in Mauritania Sitifensis
 Partucopolis, in Macedonia, 383
- Parus, urbs incertæ posit. in Pisidia
 Patara, in Lycia, 378
 Patavia, al. Batava Castra, Passaw, in Noricum, 385
 Patavium, Padua, in Venetia, 396
 Patavium, in Bithynia, 376
 Paternum, urbs incertæ posit. in Cappadocia Secunda, forsans Parnassus
 Pausola, in Picenum Suburbicarium, 391
 Pautalia, in Dardania, 384
 Pella, in Pamphylia Secunda, 378
 Pella, in Palæstina Secunda, 361
 Pelte, in Phrygia Pacatiانا, 379
 Pelusium, in Augustamnica Prima, 356
 Pentenessus, al. Pednelisus, in Pamphylia Secunda, 378
 Pepere, vel Perpere, in Asia, 377
 Perga, in Pamphylia Secunda, 378
 Pergamus, in Asia, 377
 Periorcis, urbs incertæ posit. in Libya vel Ægypto
 Perre, in Euphratesia, 365
 Perte, in Lycaonia, 378
 Perugia, in Tuscia, 388
 Pessinus, in Galatia Secunda, 375
 Petavia, Petow, in Pannonia, 385
 Petenessus, in Galatia Secunda, 375
 Petra, in Lazica, 380
 Petra, in Palæstina Prima, 361
 Petra, in Palæstina Tertia, ibid.
 Petræ, in Achaia, 383
 Petrocorium, Perigueux, in Aquitania Secunda, 399
 Phacusa, in Augustamnica Prima, 356
 Phalaris, in Tuscia, 388
 Pharan, in Palæstina Tertia, 361
 Pharbæthus, in Augustamnica Secunda, 356
 Pharnacea, urbs incertæ posit. in Pontus, al. Cilicia
 Phaselis, in Lycia, 378
 Phasis, in Lazica, 380
 Phausania, in Sardinia, 394
 Phellus, in Lycia, 378
 Phenon, in Palæstina Tertia, 361
 Philadelphia, in Lydia, 377
- Philadelphia, in Isauria, 380
 Philadelphia, in Arabia, 360
 Philippi, in Macedonia Secunda, 383
 Philippopolis, in Phrygia Pacatiانا, 379
 Philippopolis, in Thracia, 382
 Philippopolis, in Arabia, 360
 Philomelium, in Pisidia, 379
 Phocæa, in Asia, 377
 Phœnicia, in Epirus Vetus, 383
 Photica, in Epirus Vetus, ib.
 Phragonea, in Ægyptus Secunda, 358, 360
 Phthenoti Nomus, in Ægyptus Prima, 356
 Phuphena, urbs incertæ positionis, in Isauria vel Armenia Minor
 Phylæ, in Thebais Secunda, 358
 Pictavi, Poitiers, in Aquitania Secunda, 399
 Pinna, Penna, in Picenum Suburbicarium, 391
 Pionia, in Hellespontus, 376
 Pisa, in Tuscia, 388
 Pisaurum, Pesaro, in Picenum Annonarium, 395
 Pisinda, in Pamphylia Secunda, 378
 Pitane, in Asia, 377
 Pitinum, in Valeria, 390
 Pitius, in Pontus, 375, 380
 Placentia, in Æmylia, 395
 Placia, urbs incertæ posit. in Galatia vel Bithynia
 Platanus, urbs incertæ posit. in Syria vel Phœnicia
 Platea, in Achaia, 383
 Plutinopolis, in Hæmiontis, 382
 Podalæa, in Lycia, 378
 Pola, in Histria, 396
 Polemonium, in Pontus Polemoniicus, 374
 Polybotus, in Phrygia Salutaris, 379
 Polymartium, Bomarso, in Tuscia, 388
 Pompeiopolis, in Paphlagonia, 375
 Pompeiopolis, in Cilicia Prima, 380
 Populonia, in Tuscia, 388
 Poroselene Insula, 380
 Porphyrium, in Phœnicia Prima, 365
 Porthmus, in Achaia, 383
 Portus Orestis, in Brutia, 394
 Portus Calensis, El Puerto in Gallecia, 402

- Portus Augusti, Porto, in Tuscia, 388
- Potentia, in Picenum Suburbicarium, 391
- Potentia, Potenza, in Lucania, 393
- Præconesus, in Hellespontus, 376
- Præneste, Palestrina, in Valeria, 390
- Præneste, in Latium, 391
- Prænetum, in Bithynia, 376
- Præpenisus, in Phrygia Salutaris, 379
- Priene, in Asia, 377
- Primopolis, in Pamphylia Secunda, 378
- Primula, in Macedonia, 383
- Prina, in Epirus Nova, ibid.
- Prista, al. Tristra and Sextantaprista, in Mœsia Secunda, 382
- Privatum, in Mauritania Sittifensis
- Prosolene Insula, vide Poroselene
- Prostama, in Pisidia, 379
- Prusa, in Bithynia, 376
- Prusias, in Honorias, 375
- Prymnesia, in Phrygia Salutaris, 379
- Psychus, vide Oxyrinchus, 358
- Ptolemais, in Thebais Secunda, ibid.
- Ptolemais, Acon, in Phœnicia Prima, 365
- Ptolemais, in Pentapolis, 358
- Ptyusium, in Lazica vel Pontus Polemoniacus, 380
- Pugla, in Pamphylia Secunda, 378
- Puteoli, Puzzolo, in Campania, 392
- Q
- Quintanæ, in Rhœtia Secunda, 396
- R
- Rabba, vide Petra, 361
- Rachlæna, urbs incertæ positionis, in Phœnicia
- Raphanæa, in Syria Secunda, 365
- Raphia, in Palæstina Prima, 361
- Rapta, urbs incertæ posit. in Africa
- Ratispona, in Rhœtia Secunda, 396
- Ravenna, in Flaminia, 395
- Reate, Rieti, in Valeria, 390
- Redones, Renes, in Lugdunensis Tertia, 399
- Regium Lepidi, Reggio, in Æmylia, 395
- Regium, or Reii, Riez, in Narbonensis Secunda, 399
- Remessiana, in Dacia, 384
- Remi, Reims, in Belgica Secunda, 399
- Rhegium, Rezo, in Brutia, 393, 394
- Rhesina, in Mesopotamia, 365
- Rhinocurura, in Augustamnica Prima, 356
- Rhizinium, in Prævalitana, 384
- Rhodia, in Lycia, 378
- Rhodus Insula, 380
- Rhofi, Rochester, in Britannia, 405
- Rocus, urbs incertæ posit.
- Roma, in Latium and Tuscia, 387
- Romatiana, vide Remessiana
- Rossus, in Cilicia Secunda, 380
- Rothomagum, Rouen, in Lugdunensis Secunda, 399
- Rubisium, Ruvo, in Apulia, 393
- Rusella, in Tuscia, 388
- Rutena, Rhodes, in Aquitania Prima, 399
- S
- Sabaria, in Pannonia Prima, 385
- Sabatra, in Lycaonia, 378
- Sabiona, in Venetia, 396
- Sabrata, in Tripolis, 356
- Sæpinum, in Samnium, 393
- Sagalassus, in Pisidia, 379
- Sagium, Siez, in Lugdunensis Secunda, 399
- Sais, in Ægyptus Prima, 356
- Salamis, vide Constantia
- Salapia, Salpe, in Apulia, 393
- Salaria, in Carthaginensis, 400
- Salernum, in Campania, 392
- Salmantica, Salamanca, in Lusitania, 400
- Salona, in Dalmatia, 385
- Salpis, in Tuscia, 388
- Samnium, in Samnium, 393
- Samos Insula, 380
- Samosata, in Euphratesia, 365
- Sanafer, in Sardinia, 394
- Sanicium, Senez, in Alpes Maritimæ, 398
- Sanis, in Phrygia Pacatiana, 379
- Santonnes, Saintes, in Aquitania Secunda, 399
- Saracene, incertæ posit. in Arabia, 365
- Sardica, in Dacia, 384
- Sardis, in Lydia, 377
- Sarsina, in Flaminia, 395
- Sarta, urbs incertæ posit.
- Sasima, in Cappadocia Secunda, 373
- Satala, in Lydia, 377
- Satala, in Armenia Prima, 374
- Savona, in Alpes Cotticæ, 395
- Sbide, in Isauria, 380
- Scampes, in Epirus Nova, 383
- Scarabantia, in Pannonia, 385
- Scarphia, in Thessalia, 383
- Scenæ Mandrorum, in Augustamnica Secunda, 358
- Scepsis, in Hellespontus, 376
- Schedia, in Ægyptus Prima, 356, 359
- Scodra, in Prævalitana, 384
- Scupi, in Dardania, ibid.
- Scyllatium, in Brutia, 394
- Scythopolis, in Palæstina Secunda, 361
- Sebasta, in Phrygia Pacatiana, 379
- Sebaste, in Cilicia Prima, 380
- Sebaste, Samaria, in Palæstina Prima, 361
- Sebastea, in Armenia Prima, 374
- Sebastopolis, in Armenia Prima, 374
- Sebennythus, in Ægyptus Secunda, 358
- Secobia, Segovia, in Carthaginensis, 400
- Secorus, in Achaia, 383
- Sedunum, Syon en Valez, in Alpes Graiæ, 398
- Segestero, Cisteron, in Narbonensis Secunda, 399
- Segobriga, Segorbe, in Carthaginensis, 400
- Segontia, al. Saguntum, Siguenza, in Carthaginensis, ibid.
- Sela, in Augustamnica Prima, 356
- Seleucia and Ctesiphon, in Assyria, 369
- Seleucia, in Pisidia, 379
- Seleucia, in Pamphylia Secunda, 378
- Seleucia Pieria, in Syria Prima, 365
- Seleucia Belum, in Syria Secunda, ibid.
- Seleucia, in Isauria, 379
- Selga, in Pamphylia Prima, 378
- Selinus, in Isauria, 380
- Sellæ, urbs incertæ posit.
- Selymbria, in Europa, 382
- Semneam, in Pamphylia Prima, 378
- Sena, in Tuscia, 388
- Senæ, in Augustamnica Secunda
- Senia, Segna, in Dalmatia, 385
- Senna, in Pamphylia Secunda, 378
- Senogallia, Senegaglia, in Picenum Annonarium, 394
- Senones, Sens, in Lugdunensis Quarta, 399
- Septe, in Lydia, 377
- Septempeda, S. Severino, in Picenum Suburbicarium, 391
- Sergiopolis, in Euphratesia, 365
- Serre, al. Philippi, in Macedonia, 383
- Sestus, in Hellespontus
- Setabis, Xativa, in Carthaginensis, 400
- Sethræte, in Augustamnica Prima, 356
- Setta, in Lydia, 377
- Sextantaprista, in Mœsia Secunda, 382
- Sichem, vide Neapolis, 361
- Sida, in Pamphylia, 378
- Sidnacester, in Britannia, 407
- Sidon, in Phœnicia Prima, 365, 367
- Sidyra, in Lycia, 378
- Signia, Segni, in Campania, 391
- Silandus, in Lydia, 377
- Silbium, in Phrygia Pacatiana, 379
- Simidica, in Africa Proconsularis
- Sinaus, in Phrygia Pacatiana, 379
- Siniandus, in Pisidia, ibid.
- Sinna Municipium, in Africa Proconsularis, incertæ posit.
- Sinope, in Helenopontus, 375
- Sion, in Asia, 377
- Sipontum, in Apulia, 393
- Sirmium, in Pannonia Inferior, 385

- Siscia, in Pannonia Inferior, 385
 Siteum, vide Citium, in Crete, 383
 Smyrna, in Asia, 377
 Soderia, in Iona Insula
 Sodomia, in Palestina Tertia, 361
 Soli, in Cyprus, 365
 Solva, in Noricum, 385
 Sophene, in Armenia Magna, 374
 Sora, in Latium, 391
 Sora, in Paphlagonia, 375
 Sozopolis, in Hænimontis, 382
 Sozopolis, in Pisidia, 379
 Sozusa, in Pentapolis, 358
 Sozusa, in Palestina Prima, 361
 Spira Nemetum, in Germanica Prima, 400
 Spoletum, Spoleto, in Umbria, 389
 Stabia, in Campania, 392
 Standitana, in Lydia, 377
 Stauropolis, in Caria, ibid.
 Stectorium, in Phrygia Salutaris, 379
 Stephane, urbs incertæ posit. in Phocide vel Galatia
 Stobi, in Macedonia, 383
 Strategis, in Achaia, ibid.
 Stratonicæ, in Caria, 377
 Stratonicia, in Lydia, ibid.
 Stridonium, in Pannonia Inferior, 385
 Suana, in Tuscia, 388
 Subaugusta Helena, in Latium, 387, 391
 Subrita, in Crete, 383
 Subsadia, in Europa, 382
 Suessa, in Campania, 392
 Sulchi, in Sardinia, 394
 Sulmo, in Samnium, 393
 Sura, in Euphratesia, 365
 Surrentum, in Campania, 392
 Sutrium, in Tuscia, 388
 Sycamozon, in Palestina Prima, 361
 Sycaminum, in Phœnicia Prima, 365
 Sylva Candida, Sancta Rufina, in Tuscia, 388
 Sylvanectum, Senlis, in Belgica Secunda, 400
 Synnada, in Phrygia Salutaris, 379
 Syracuse, in Sicilia, 394
 Sysdra, in Pamphylia Prima, 378
- T
 Tabæ, in Caria, 377
 Tabia, in Galatia Prima, 375
 Tacapa, in Tripolis, 356
 Tadinum, in Umbria, 389
 Talbonda, in Pamphylia Secunda, 378
 Tamita, in Corsica, 394
 Tanagra, in Achaia, 383
 Tanis, in Augustamnica Prima, 356
 Tarantasia, in Alpes Graiæ, 398
 Tarba, al. Bigorra, Tarbes, in Novempopulania, 399
 Tarentum, Taranto, in Calabria, 393
 Tarquina, in Tuscia, 388
 Tarracina, in Latium, 391
 Tarracona, in Tarraconensis, 400
 Tarsus, in Cilicia Prima, 380
 Tarvisium, Treviso, in Venetia, 396
 Tathyris, in Thebais Secunda, 358
 Taua, in Ægyptus Prima, 356
 Taurianum, Seminara, in Brutia, 394
 Tauromenium, Taormina, in Sicilia, 394
 Teanum, in Campania, 392
 Tegea, in Achaia, 383
 Tegula, in Sardinia, 394
 Telmessus, in Lycia, 378
 Temenothyra, in Phrygia Pacatiana, 379
 Temesa, in Brutia, 394
 Temnus, in Asia, 377
 Tenedos Insula, 380
 Tentyra, al. Teuchira, in Thebais Secunda, 358
 Tenus Insula, 380
 Teos, in Asia, 377
 Tephra, in Homeritarum Regione Arabica, 370
 Tergestum, Trieste, in Histria, 396
 Termessus, in Pamphylia Secunda, 378
 Teruanna, Therouenne, in Belgica Secunda, 400
 Teuchira, in Pentapolis, 358
 Teuchira, in Thebais Secunda, ibid.
 Thamassus, in Cyprus, 365
 Thamiæ, in Arcadia, 358
 Thassus, in Macedonia, 383
 Theatea, in Samnium, 393
 Thebæ Pthioticæ, in Thessalia, 383
 Thebæ, in Achaia, ibid.
 Thebais, in Thebais Secunda, 358
 Themisonium, in Phrygia Pacatiana, 379
 Thennesus, in Augustamnica Prima, 356, 360
 Theodosiopolis Nova, in Europa, 382
 Theodosiopolis, in Cappadocia Prima, 374
 Theodosiopolis, in Arcadia, 358
 Theodosiopolis, in Pisidia, 379
 Thera Insula, 380
 Therenunthis, in Thebais Secunda, 358
 Thermæ, in Sicilia, 394
 Thermæ Regiæ, in Hellespontus, vide Germa, 376
 Thermæ, in Cappadocia Prima, 374
 Thespie, in Achaia, 383
 Thessalonica, in Macedonia Prima, ibid.
 Thinis, in Thebais Secunda, 358
 Thmuis, in Augustamnica Prima, 356
 Thoi, in Thebais Secunda, 358
 Thou, in Augustamnica Secunda, ibid.
 Thurium, in Brutia, 394
 Thyatira, in Lydia, 377
 Thymbria, in Asia, ibid.
 Tiberias, in Palestina Secunda, 361
 Tiberiopolis, in Phrygia Pacatiana, 379
 Tiberiopolis, in Cyprus, 365
 Tibur, Tivoli, in Valeria, 390
 Ticelia, in Pentapolis, 358
 Ticinum, Pavia, in Liguria, 395
 Tiella, vide Zella, in Bizacena
 Tifernum Tiberinum, Citta di Castello, in Umbria, 389
 Tifernum Metaurense, in Picenum Annonarium, 395
 Tindarium, in Sicilia, 394
 Titopolis, in Isauria, 380
 Tium, in Honorias, 376
 Tlos, in Lycia, 378
 Tolentinum, in Picenum Suburbicarium, 391
 Toletum, Toledo, in Carthaginensis, 400
 Tolonium, Toulon, in Viennensis, 399
 Tolosa, Thoulouse, in Narbonensis, ibid.
 Tomi, in Scythia, 380
 Topirus, in Rhodope, 382
 Torcellum, in Venetia, 396
 Torone, in Macedonia, 383
 Tournacum, Tournay, in Belgica Secunda, 400
 Trajanopolis, in Rhodope, 382
 Trallis, in Asia, 377
 Trallis, in Lydia, ibid.
 Tranopolis, in Phrygia Pacatiana, 379
 Tranum, in Apulia, 393
 Trapezopolis, in Phrygia Pacatiana, 379
 Trapezus, in Pontus Polemoniacus, 374
 Trebia, in Umbria, 389
 Treca, Troyes, in Lugdunensis Quarta, 399
 Tremenothyri, in Phrygia Pacatiana, vide Temenothyra, 379
 Tremithus, in Cyprus, 365
 Tres Tabernæ, Cisterna, in Latium, 391
 Tricastini, or Augusta Tricastinorum, St. Paul des Trois Chasteaux, in Viennensis Secunda, 399
 Triceæ, in Thessalia, 383
 Tridentum, Trent, in Venetia, 396
 Tripolis, in Phœnicia Prima, 365
 Tripolis, in Lydia, 377
 Troas, in Hellespontus, 376
 Trocala, in Sicilia, 394
 Trochmi, in Galatia Secunda, 375
 Tropæa, in Brutia, 394
 Truentum, in Picenum Suburbicarium, 391
 Tucci, Martos, in Bœtica, 400
 Tude, Tuy, in Gallecia, 402
 Tuder, Todi, in Umbria, 389
 Tullum, Toul, in Belgica Prima, 399
 Tungri, Tongres, in Germanica Secunda, 400
 Turones, Tours, in Lugdunensis Tertia, 399
 Turre Blandis, in Bizacena
 Turris Libisonis, in Sardinia, 394
 Tuscania, in Tuscia, 388
 Tusculum, Frescati, in Latium, 387, 391
 Tyana, in Cappadocia Secunda, 374
 Tyrassona, Tarazona, in Tarraconensis, 400
 Tyrus, in Phœnicia Prima, 365, 367

V

- Valentia, Valence, in Viennensis Prima, 399
 Valentia, Valencia, in Carthaginensis, 400
 Valentia ad Minium, Valenzia, al. Menno, in Gallæcia, 402
 Valentianopolis, in Asia, 377
 Valva, in Samnium, 393
 Vantena, vide Antinoe, in Thebais Prima, 358
 Vapincum, Gap, in Narbonensis Secunda, 399
 Vasada, vide Lauzada, in Cilicia Secunda
 Vasatæ, Basas, in Novempopulania, 399
 Vasio, Vaison, in Viennensis Secunda, ibid.
 Ucetia, Uzes, in Narbonensis Prima, ibid.
 Velia, in Lucania, 393
 Velia, Veleia, in Tarracoenensis, 400
 Velitræ, in Latium, 391
 Vellava, al. Anicium, le Puy en Velay, in Aquitania Prima, 399
 Venafrum, in Campania, 393
 Venetia, Vennes, in Lugdunensis Tertia, 399
 Venta, Winchester, in Britannia, 407
 Ventio, Vence, in Alpes Maritimæ, 398
 Venusia, in Apulia, 393
 Vercellæ, Vercelli, in Liguria, 395
 Verodunum, Verdun, in Belgica Prima, 399
 Verona, in Venetia, 396
 Verulæ, Veroli, in Latium, 392
 Vesontio, Bezanson, in Maxima Sequanorum, 399
 Vettonium, Bittona, in Umbria, 389
 Vibo-Valentia, Bivona, in Brutia, 394
 Vicentia, Vicenza, in Venetia
 Vicohabentia, Vicovenza, in Flaminia, 395
 Vienna, in Viennensis Prima, 398
 Vigiliæ, in Apulia, 393
 Vigintimilium, Vintimiglia, in Alpes Cottia, 395
 Vindobona, Vienna, in Pannonia Superior, 385
 Vindonissa, Winich, in Maxima Sequanorum, 399
 Viseum, Viseo, in Gallæcia, 402
 Ulpianum, in Dardania, 384
 Unnogorita, urbs incertæ positionis
 Unzela, in Pamphylia Secunda, 378
 Volaterræ, in Tuscia, 388
 Voleria, Valera la Vieja, in Carthaginensis, 400
 Volsæ, al. Vulci, in Tuscia, ibid.
 Volsinium, Bolsena, in Tuscia, 388
 Urbinum, in Picenum Annonarium, 395
 Urbs Salvia, Urbisaglia, in Picenum Suburbicarium, 391
 Urbs Vetus, Orvieto, in Tuscia, 388
 Urci, Orce, in Carthaginensis, 400
 Urcinium, in Corsica, 394
 Uria, in Calabria, 393
 Urima, in Euphratesia, 365
 Vulturum, in Campania, 392
 Uxentum, Ugento, in Calabria, 393

W

- Winchester, in Britannia, 407
 Wormacia Vangionum, Worms, in Germanica Prima, 400

Worcester, in Britannia, 407

X

- Xanthus, in Lycia, 378
 Xoes, in Ægyptus Secunda, 358

Z

- Zabulon, in Palæstina Prima, 361
 Zagula, in Libya, 358
 Zapara, in Macedonia, 383
 Zarmizegethusa, in Gothia, 384
 Zela, in Helenopontus, 375
 Zelona, 374
 Zena, forsan Zenopolis
 Zenopolis, in Lycia, 378
 Zephyrium, in Cilicia Prima, 380
 Zerabena, in Arabia, 360
 Zerta, in Numidia
 Zeugma, in Euphratesia, 365
 Zicchia, in Scythia
 Zichna, urbs incertæ posit. in Macedonia
 Zigga, vide Sicca Venerea
 Zoara, in Palæstina Tertia, 361
 Zoropassa, urbs incertæ posit. in Cilicia vel Isauria
 Zuchabari, in Mauritania Cæsariensis
 Zygris, in Libya, 358

BOOK X.

OF THE INSTITUTION OF THE CATECHUMENS, AND THE FIRST USE OF THE CREEDS OF THE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

OF THE SEVERAL NAMES OF CATECHUMENS, AND THE SOLEMNITY THAT WAS USED IN ADMITTING THEM TO THAT STATE IN THE CHURCH. ALSO OF CATECHISING, AND THE TIME OF THEIR CONTINUANCE IN THAT EXERCISE.

HAVING hitherto discoursed of the several orders of men which made up the great body of the Christian church, and of churches themselves, or places of worship, and of the several districts into which the body diffusive was divided, I come now to consider the service of the church, or its public offices and exercises, by which men were disciplined and trained up to the kingdom of heaven. And to speak of these in their most natural order, it will be necessary to begin with the institution of the catechumens, who were the lowest order of men that had any title to the common name of Christians, and their instruction was the first part of the church's service. Some things relating to these have been already touched upon in speaking of the difference between them and the πιστοι, or perfect Christians, in the first Book.¹ The office of the catechist has also been considered in speaking of the inferior orders² of the clergy: and the places of instruction, or catechetical schools, have been treated of in the account³ that has been given of the ancient churches. So that, omitting these things, I shall only speak in this place of such rites and customs as were observed in the practice of the church in training up the catechumens, and preparing them for baptism; premising something concerning the several names that were given them. They were called catechumens from the Greek words κατηχέω and κατήχησις, which signify in general the instruction that is given in the first elements or rudiments of any art or science; but in a more restrained ecclesiastical sense, the instruction of men in the first principles of the Christian religion. Hence they had also the names of novitiosi, and tyrones Dei, new soldiers of God, as we find in Tertullian⁴ and St. Austin,⁵ because they were just entering upon that state, which made them soldiers of God and candidates of eternal life. They are sometimes also called audientes, hearers, from their instruction: though that name more commonly denotes one particular sort of them, such as were allowed to hear sermons only, but not to partake in any of the prayers of the church; of which more hereafter in the following chapter.

I have already observed in another place,⁶ that the catechumens, by virtue of their admission into that state, had some title to the common name of Christians also; being a degree higher than either heathens or heretics, though not yet consummated by the waters of baptism. And upon this account, they were admitted to this state not without some ceremony and solemnity of imposition of hands and prayer. Which appears evidently from what Sulpicius Severus⁷ says of St. Martin, That passing through a town, where they were all Gentiles, and preaching Christ unto them, and working some miracles, the whole multitude professed to believe in Christ, and desired him to make them Christians: upon which, he immediately, as he was in the field, laid his hands upon them, and made them catechumens, saying to those that were about him, that it was not unreasonable to make catechumens in the open field, where martyrs were used to be consecrated unto God. Where we may observe, that to make Christians, and to make catechumens, is the same thing, and that this was done by imposition of hands and prayer. Which observation

Sect. 1.
The reason of the names, κατηχούμενοι, novitiosi, tyrones, &c.

Sect. 2.
Imposition of hands used in the first admission of catechumens.

¹ Book I. chap. 4. sect. 5.

² Book III. chap. 10.

³ Book VIII. chap. 7. sect. 12.

⁴ Tertul. de Pœnitent. cap. 6.

⁵ August. de Fide ad Catechumen. lib. 2. cap. 1.

⁶ Book I. chap. 3. sect. 3.

⁷ Sulpic. Vit. Martin. Dialog. 2. cap. 5. p. 294. Cuncti catervatim ad genua b. viri ruere cœperunt, fideliter postulantes, ut eos faceret Christianos. Nec cunctatus, in medio ut erat campo, cunctos, imposita universis manu, catechumenos fecit; cum quidem ad nos conversus diceret, Non irrationabiliter in campo catechumenos fieri, ubi solerent martyres consecrari.

will help us to the right understanding of some obscure canons and difficult passages in ancient writers, which many learned men have mistaken. In the first council of Arles⁸ there is a canon, which orders imposition of hands to be given to such Gentiles as in time of sickness express an inclination to receive the Christian faith. And in the council of Eliberis⁹ there is another canon to the same purpose, which says, That if any Gentiles, who have led a tolerable moral life, desire imposition of hands, they should have it allowed them, and be made Christians. Now the question is, what is here meant by imposition of hands, and being made Christians? Mendoza¹⁰ and Vossius¹¹ take it for imposition of hands in baptism; and Albaspinus,¹² for imposition of hands in confirmation. But the true sense is no more than this imposition of hands used in making catechumens, which in some sort gave Gentile converts an immediate title to be called Christians. And so I find Valesius,¹³ and Basnage,¹⁴ and Cotelerius,¹⁵ understand it. And this must be the meaning of that passage in Eusebius,¹⁶ where, speaking of Constantine's prayers in the church of Helenopolis a little before his death, he says, It was the same church where he had first been admitted to imposition of hands and prayer; that is, had been made a catechumen with those ceremonies: for no other imposition of hands can here be meant, since it is now agreed on all hands, that Constantine was not baptized till he had left Helenopolis, and was come to Nicomedia, a little before his death. By this also we may understand the meaning of those canons of the first general council of Constantinople,¹⁷ and the council of Trullo,¹⁸ where, speaking of the reception of such heretics as the Eunomians, and Montanists, and Sabellians, who had not been truly baptized, they say, They should be received only as heathens, viz. the first day be made Christians, the second day catechumens, the third day be exorcised, then instructed for a considerable time in the church, and at last baptized. Here being made Christians, evidently signifies no more than their being admitted to the lowest degree of catechumens, by imposition of hands and prayer; after which came many intermediate ceremonies of exorcising, catechising, &c., before they were made complete Christians by baptism. So that, as Theodosius observes¹⁹ in one of his laws, there were two sorts of men that went by the name of Christians, one called Christiani ac fideles, Christians and believers, and the other, Christiani et catechumeni tantum, Christians and catechumens only: the former whereof were made so by baptism, and the other by imposition of hands and prayer. Which was a ceremony used in most of the offices of religion, in baptism, confirmation, ordination, reconciling of penitents, consecration of virgins, curing the sick, and, as we have now seen, particularly in the first admission of new converts to the state of catechumens.

Here also, as in most other offices of the church, they used the sign of the cross. St. Austin joins all these ceremonies together, when he says, That catechumens²⁰ were in some sort sanctified by the sign of Christ, and imposition of hands and prayer; meaning, that these ceremonies were used as indications of their forsaking the Gentile state, and becoming retainers to the Christian church. The same rite is mentioned also by St. Austin in his Confessions,²¹ as used upon himself during his being a catechumen; but whether he means there his first admission, or his continuance in that state, is not certain. But in the Life of Porphyrius, bishop of Gaza, written by his disciple Marcus, it is more plainly expressed; for that author, speaking of some new converts, says, They fell down at the bishop's feet and desired the sign of Christ. Upon which, he signed them with the sign²² of the cross, and made them catechumens; commanding them to attend the church. And so in a short time after, having first instructed them in the catechism, he baptized them.

The circumstance of time here mentioned, may lead us in the next place to inquire, at what age persons were admitted catechumens? And how long they continued in that state before they were baptized? The ⁸ Conc. Arlat. l. cap. 6. De his qui in infirmitate credere volunt, placuit debere eis manum imponi.

⁹ Conc. Eliber. c. 39. Gentiles si in infirmitate desideraverint sibi manum imponi, si fuerit eorum ex aliqua parte vita honesta, placuit eis manum imponi et fieri Christianos.

¹⁰ Mendoza, Not. in Conc. Eliber. c. 39.

¹¹ Voss. de Baptismo, Disp. 12. Thes. 5. p. 164.

¹² Albaspin. Not. in Conc. Eliber. c. 39.

¹³ Vales. Not. in Euseb. de Vit. Constant. lib. 4. c. 61.

¹⁴ Basnag. Critic. in Baron. an. 44. p. 482.

¹⁵ Coteler. Not. in Constitut. Apostol. lib. 7. c. 39.

¹⁶ Euseb. de Vit. Const. lib. 4. c. 61. Ἐνθα δὴ καὶ πρῶτον τῶν διὰ χειροθεσίας εὐχῶν ἡξιοῦτο.

¹⁷ Conc. Constant. l. c. 7. Ὡς Ἑλληνας δεχόμεθα, καὶ τὴν πρώτην ἡμέραν ποιούμεν αὐτοὺς Χριστιανούς, τὴν δὲ δευτέραν κατηχομένους, εἶτα τῇ τρίτῃ ἔξορκίζομεν αὐτοὺς—καὶ τότε αὐτοὺς βαπτίζομεν.

¹⁸ Conc. Trull. c. 95. Vide etiam Anonymi Epist. ad Martyrium Antiochenum, ap. Beveregii Pandect. t. 2. p. 100.

¹⁹ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 7. de Apostat. Leg. 2.

²⁰ Aug. de Peccator. Meritis, lib. 2. c. 26. Catechumenos secundum quandam modum suum per signum Christi et orationem, manūs impositione puto sanctificari.

²¹ Aug. Confess. lib. 1. c. 11.

²² Marcus, Vit. Porphyry. Prociderunt ad ejus pedes petentes Christi signaculum. Beatus vero cum eos signasset, et fecisset catechumenos, dimisit illos in pace, præcipiens eis ut vacarent sanctæ ecclesie. Et paulo post, cum eos catechesi instituisset, baptizavit.

first question concerns only heathen converts: for, as for the children of believing parents, it is certain, that as they were baptized in infancy, so they were admitted catechumens as soon as they were capable of learning. But the question is more difficult about heathens. Yet I find in one of the Resolutions of Timothy, bishop of Alexandria, that children, before they were seven years old, might be catechumens. For he puts the question thus: Suppose a child of seven years old,²³ or a man that is a catechumen, be present at the oblation, and eat of the eucharist; what shall be done in this case? And the answer is, Let him be baptized. By which it is plain, he speaks of heathen children, and not of Christians, who received not only baptism, but the eucharist, in their infancy, by the rule and custom of the church then prevailing, as will be showed in their proper place.

As to the other point, how long they were to continue catechumens, there was no certain general rule fixed about that; but the practice varied according to the difference of times and places, or the readiness and proficiency of the catechumens themselves. In the apostolical age, and the first plantation of the church, we never read of any long interval between men's first conversion and their baptism. The history of Cornelius, and the Ethiopian eunuch, and Lydia, and the jailer of Philippi, in the Acts of the Apostles, to mention no more, are sufficient evidence, that in those days catechising and baptism immediately accompanied one another. And there were good reasons for it: the infant state of the church, and the zeal of the converts, both required it. But in after ages, the church found it necessary to lengthen this term of probation, lest an over-hasty admission of persons to baptism, should either fill the church with vicious men, or make greater numbers of renegades and apostates in time of persecution. For this reason, the council of Eliberis²⁴ appointed two years' trial for new converts, that if in that time they appeared to be men of a good conversation, they might then be allowed the favour of baptism. Justinian, in one of his Novels,²⁵ appointed the same term for Samaritans, because it was found by experience, that they were wont frequently to relapse to their old religion again. The Apostolical Constitutions²⁶ lengthen the term to three years, but with this limitation, that if men were very diligent and zealous, they might be admitted sooner; because it was not length of time, but men's conversation and behaviour, that was to be regarded in this case. The council of Agde, anno 506, reduced the time for Jewish converts²⁷ to eight months, giving the same reason why they made the time of probation so long, because they are often found to be perfidious, and returned to their own vomit again. In other places, the time is thought by some to be limited to the forty days of Lent; for so some learned men conjecture from a passage or two in St. Jerom, and Cyril's Catechetical Discourses. St. Jerom²⁸ says, it was customary in his time to spend forty days in teaching catechumens the doctrine of the blessed Trinity. And St. Cyril seems to imply as much, when he asks the catechumens, why they should not think it reasonable²⁹ to spend forty days upon their souls, who had spent so many years upon their own vanities and the world? The time of Lent is not expressly mentioned in either place, but it seems to be intended, because in those ages, Easter was the general time of baptizing over all the world. But I understand this only of the strict and concluding part of this exercise. In some cases, the term of catechising was reduced to a yet much shorter compass, as in case of extreme sickness, or the general conversion of whole nations. Socrates observes, that in the conversion of the Burgundians, the French bishop that converted them, only took seven days' time to catechise them,³⁰ and on the eighth day baptized them. So in case of desperate sickness, the catechumens were immediately baptized with clinic baptism; as appears from the forementioned council of Agde, which, though it prescribes eight months' time for the catechising of Jews, yet in case of extreme danger,³¹ if their life was despaired of, it allows them to be baptized at any time within the term prescribed. Cyril of Alexandria,³² in one of his canonical epistles, gives the same orders concerning catechumens who had lapsed, and were for their crimes expelled the church, that notwithstanding this, they should be baptized at the hour of death. St. Basil takes notice, that Arintheus, the Roman consul,³³ being converted by his wife, and ²³ Timoth. Alex. Resp. Canon. qu. 1.

²⁴ Conc. Eliber. c. 42. Eos qui ad fidem primam creditatis accedunt, si bonæ fuerint conversationis, intra biennium placuit ad baptismi gratiam admitti.
²⁵ Justin. Novel. 144. Per duos primum annos in fide instituatur, et pro viribus Scripturas ediscant, tuncque demum sacro redemptionis offerantur baptismati.
²⁶ Constit. Apost. lib. 8. c. 32. Ὁ μέλλον κατηχέσθαι, τρία ἔτη κατηχέσθω, &c.
²⁷ Conc. Agathen. c. 34. Judæi, quorum perfidia frequenter ad vomitum redit, si ad legem catholicam venire voluerint, octo menses inter catechumenos ecclesie limen introant, &c.

²⁸ Hieron. Ep. 61. ad Pammach. c. 4. Consuetudo apud nos ejusmodi est, ut iis qui baptizandi sunt per quadraginta dies publice tradamus sanctam et adorandam Trinitatem.
²⁹ Cyril. Catech. 1. n. 5. p. 18.
³⁰ Socrat. lib. 7. c. 30.
³¹ Conc. Agathen. c. 34. Quod si casu aliquo periculum infirmitatis intra præscriptum tempus incurrerint, et desperati fuerint, baptizentur.
³² Cyril. Ep. Canon. ad Episc. Libyæ et Pentapol. ap. Bevereg. Pandect. t. 2. p. 178.
³³ Basil. Ep. 186.

in danger of death, was immediately baptized. And there are infinite numbers of such examples to be met with in ecclesiastical history, to verify the general observation which Epiphanius³⁴ makes upon the practice of the church, that such catechumens as were at the point to die, were always, in hopes of the resurrection, admitted to baptism before their death.

But excepting these cases, a longer time was generally thought necessary to discipline and train men up gradually for baptism; partly for the reason already mentioned, that some just experiment might be made of their conversation during that time; and partly to instruct them by degrees, first in the more common principles of religion, to wean them from their former errors, and then in the more recondite and mysterious articles of the Christian faith: upon which account they usually began their discourses with the doctrine of repentance and remission of sins, and the necessity of good works, and the nature and use of baptism, by which the catechumens were taught, how they were to renounce the devil and his works, and enter into a new covenant with God. Then followed the explication of the several articles of the Creed, to which some added the nature and immortality of the soul, and an account of the canonical books of Scripture; which is the substance and method of St. Cyril's eighteen famous discourses to the catechumens. The author of the Apostolical Constitutions³⁵ prescribes these several heads of instruction: Let the catechumen be taught before baptism the knowledge of the Father unbegotten, the knowledge of his only begotten Son, and Holy Spirit; let him learn the order of the world's creation, and series of Divine providence, and the different sorts of legislation; let him be taught, why the world, and man, the citizen of the world, were made; let him be instructed about his own nature, to understand for what end he himself was made; let him be informed how God punished the wicked with water and fire, and crowned his saints with glory in every generation, viz. Seth, Enos, Enoch, Noah, Abraham and his posterity, Melchisedeck, Job, Moses, Joshua, Caleb, and Phineas the priest, and the saints of every age; let him also be taught, how the providence of God never forsook mankind, but called them at sundry times, from error and vanity to the knowledge of the truth, reducing them from slavery and impiety to liberty and godliness, from iniquity to righteousness, and from everlasting death to eternal life. After these, he must learn the doctrine of Christ's incarnation, his passion, his resurrection, and assumption; and what it is to renounce the devil, and enter into covenant with Christ. These were the chief heads of the ancient catechisms before baptism: in which it is observable, there is no mention made of the doctrine of the eucharist, or confirmation, because these were not allowed to catechumens till after baptism; and the instruction upon the former points was not given all at once, but by certain degrees, as the discipline of the church then required, which divided the catechumens into several distinct orders or classes, and exercised them gradually, according to the difference of their stations: of which I shall give a more particular account in the following chapter.

Here I shall only remark further, that they allowed them to read some portions of the Scripture; for the moral and historical books were thought most proper at first for their instruction; and the chief use of those which are now called apocryphal books, was then to instil moral precepts into the catechumens. Upon this account Athanasius says,³⁶ Though they were not canonical books, as the rest of the books of the Old and New Testament; yet they were such as were appointed to be read by those who were new proselytes, and desirous to be instructed in the ways of godliness: such were The Wisdom of Solomon, The Wisdom of Sirach, Esther, Judith, Tobit; to which he also adds, the book called, The Doctrine of the Apostles, and the Shepherd, that is, Hermes Pastor. The author³⁷ of the Synopsis of the Holy Scripture also, under the name of Athanasius, has much the same observation, That besides the canonical books, there were other books of the Old Testament, which were not in the canon, but only read to or by the catechumens. But this was not allowed in all churches; for it seems to have been otherwise in the church of Jerusalem, at the time when Cyril³⁸ wrote his Catechetical Discourses; for he forbids his catechumens to read all apocryphal books whatsoever, and charges them to read those books only which were securely read in the church, viz. those books which the apostles and ancient bishops (who were wiser than the catechumens) had handed down to them. Then he specifies particularly the canonical books of the Old and New Testament, all the same as are now in our Bibles, except the Revelation, because I presume it was not

³⁴ Epiphanius. Hær. 28. Christianian. n. 6

³⁵ Constit. Apost. lib. 7. c. 39.

³⁶ Athan. Ep. Heortastic. t. 2. p. 39. "Ἔστιν καὶ ἕτερα βιβλία τοῦτων ἕξωθεν ἢ κανονίζόμενα μὲν, τετυπωμένα δὲ παρὰ τῶν πατέρων ἀναγινώσκεισθαι τοῖς ἄρτι προσερχομένοις, καὶ βουλομένοις κατηχεῖσθαι τὸν τῆς εὐσεβείας λόγον." Σοφία Σολομῶνος, &c. καὶ διδαχὴ καλουμένη, τῶν

Ἀποστόλων, καὶ ὁ ποιήν.

³⁷ Athan. Synops. Scriptur. t. 2. p. 55. "Ἐκτὸς τῶν κανονιζομένων ἕτερα βιβλία τῆς παλαιᾶς διαθήκης, ἢ κανονιζόμενα μὲν, ἀναγιωσκόμενα δὲ μόνον τοῖς κατηχημένοις.

³⁸ Cyril. Catech. 4. n. 22. p. 66. Πρὸς τὰ ἀπόκρυφα μηδὲν ἔχει κοινόν, &c. Ibid. p. 67. "Ὅσα ἐν ἐκκλησίαις μὴ ἀναγιώσκεται, ταῦτα μηδὲ κατὰ σαυτὸν ἀναγιώσκει.

then read in the church: and at last concludes with this charge to the catechumens, that they should not read any other books privately by themselves, which were not read publicly in the church. From whence I conclude, that as the books which we now call apocryphal, were not then read in the church of Jerusalem, so neither were they allowed to be read by the catechumens, though they were read both publicly and privately in many other churches. I know some learned persons are of a different opinion, and think that Cyril, by apocryphal books, means not those which we now call apocryphal, viz. Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, &c., but other pernicious and heretical books, which were absolutely reprobated and forbidden to all Christians. But if that had been his meaning, he would not have said, that the canonical books were the only books that were read in the church of Jerusalem, but would have distinguished, as other writers in other churches do, between canonical, ecclesiastical, and apocryphal books, and have intimated that the ecclesiastical books were such as were allowed to be read in the church, as well as the canonical, for moral instruction, though not to confirm articles of faith. Whereas he says nothing of this, but the express contrary, that none but the canonical books were read publicly in the church, nor were any other to be read privately by the catechumens. Which, at least, must mean thus much, that in the church of Jerusalem there was a different custom from some other churches; and that though in some churches the catechumens were allowed to read both the canonical books and the apocryphal, or, as others call them, the ecclesiastical; yet in the church of Jerusalem they were allowed to read only the canonical Scriptures, and no other. However, it is observable, that no church anciently denied any order of Christians the use of the Holy Scriptures in the vulgar tongue, since even the catechumens themselves, who were but an imperfect sort of Christians, were exhorted and commanded to read the canonical books in all churches, and the apocryphal books in some churches for moral instruction. Nay, if we may believe Bede, they were obliged to get some of the Holy Scriptures by heart, as a part of their exercise and discipline, before they were baptized. For he commends it as a laudable custom in the ancient church,³⁹ that such as were to be catechised and baptized, were taught the beginnings of the four Gospels, and the intent and order of them, at the time when the ceremony of opening their ears was solemnly used; that they might know and remember, what, and how many, those books were, from whence they were to be instructed in the true faith. So far were they from locking up the Scriptures from any order of men in an unknown tongue, that they thought them useful and instructive to the meanest capacities; according to that of the psalmist, "Thy word giveth light and understanding to the simple." And therefore they allowed them to be vulgarly read, not only by the more perfect and complete Christians, but even by the very catechumens; among whom, as St. Austin and others have observed, those were commonly the most tractable and the best proficients, who were the most conversant in the Holy Scriptures. For which reason they made it one part of the catechumens' care, to exercise themselves in the knowledge of them, and did not then fear that men should turn heretics by being acquainted with the word of truth.

CHAPTER II.

OF THE SEVERAL CLASSES OR DEGREES OF CATECHUMENS, AND THE GRADUAL EXERCISES AND DISCIPLINE OF EVERY ORDER.

THAT there were different orders or degrees of catechumens in all such churches as kept to the term of catechising for two or three years together, is acknowledged on all hands by learned men; but what was the precise number of these orders, is not so certainly agreed. The Greek expositors of the ancient canons usually make but two sorts, the ἀτελείεροι and the τελειώτεροι, the imperfect and the perfect, the beginners and the proficients, who were the immediate candidates of baptism. So Balzamon,¹ and Zonaras,² Alexius Aristenus,³ and Blastares. And in this opinion they are followed by many modern writers. Dr. Cave⁴ makes no other distinction but this of the perfect and imperfect, and says of the imperfect, that they were as yet accounted heathens; which, for the reasons given in the foregoing chapter, I cannot subscribe to: for I have showed, that from the time that they received imposition of hands to make them catechumens, they were always both called and accounted Christians, though but in an imperfect state, till they were completed by baptism. Bishop Beverege⁵ makes but two sorts of catechumens likewise, the ἀκροώμενοι, and the εὐχόμενοι, or γοιυκλίνου-

Sect. 1.
Four orders or degrees of catechumens among the ancients.

³⁹ Bed. de Tabernac. lib. 2. c. 13. t. 4. p. 887. Pulcher in ipsa ecclesia mos antiquitus inolevit, ut his qui catechizandi, et Christianis sunt sacramentis initiandi, quatuor Evangeliorum principia recitentur, ac de figuris et ordine eorum in apertione aurium suarum solemniter erudirentur: quo sciant exinde ac meminerint, qui et quot sint libri, quorum verbis maxime in fide veritatis debeant erudiri.

¹ Balzam. Not. in Conc. Neocæsar. c. 5.

² Zonaras, ibid.

³ Alex. Aristen. in Conc. Ancyr. c. 14.

⁴ Cave, Prim. Christ. lib. 1. c. 8. p. 211.

⁵ Bevereg. Not. in Conc. Nicen. c. 14.

τες, that is, the hearers, who only stayed to hear the sermon and the Scriptures read, and the kneelers or substrators, who stayed to receive the minister's prayers and benediction also. Suicerus⁶ and Basnage⁷ go much the same way, dividing them into two classes, the audientes and competentes. Maldonat⁸ adds to these a third class, which he calls catechumeni pœnitentes, such catechumens as were under the discipline and censures of the church. Cardinal Bona⁹ augments the number to four kinds, viz. the audientes, geniflectentes, competentes, and electi. And indeed it appears, that there were four kinds of them; yet not exactly the same as Bona mentions; for the competentes and electi were but one and the same order. But there was another order antecedent to all these, which none of these writers mention, which we may call the ἐξωθούμενοι, that is, such catechumens as were instructed privately, and without-doors, before they were allowed to enter the church.

That there was such an order or degree of catechumens as this, is evidently deduced from one of the canons of the council of Neocæsarea, which speaks of several sorts of catechumens, and this among the rest, in these words: If any catechumen,¹⁰ who enters the church, and stands amongst any order of catechumens there, be found guilty of sin; if he be a kneeler, let him become a hearer, provided he sin no more; but if he sin while he is a hearer, let him be cast out of the church. Here it seems pretty evident, that there was an order of catechumens not allowed to enter the church, to which such of the superior orders as had offended, were to be degraded by way of punishment, which the canon calls expulsion from the church. Which does not mean, utterly casting them off as heathens again, but only reducing them to that state in which they were before, when they first received imposition of hands to make them catechumens; which was a state of private instruction, before they were allowed to enter the church. Maldonat calls these, The order of penitents among the catechumens; and Balzamon and Zonaras, on this canon, style them mourners; which expresses something of this order, but not the whole: for there were catechumens privately instructed out of the church, who were not properly mourners or penitents, as persons cast out of the church by any censure, but they were such as never had yet been in the church, but were kept at a distance for some time from that privilege, to make them the more eager and desirous of it. And till we can find a better name for these, I call them from this canon, the ἐξωθούμενοι, which is a general name, that will comprehend both this lowest order of catechumens privately instructed out of the church, and also such delinquents of the superior orders as were reduced back again to it by way of punishment for their faults.

The next degree above these, were the hearers, which the Greeks call ἀκροόμενοι, and the Latins, audientes.^{Sect. 3. Secondly, The ἀκροόμενοι, audientes, or hearers.} Who were so called from their being admitted to hear sermons and the Scriptures read in the church, but they were not allowed to stay any of the prayers, no, not so much as those that were made over the rest of the catechumens, or energumens, or penitents; but before those began, immediately after sermon, at the word of command then solemnly used, Ne quis audientium, Let none of the hearers be present, they were to depart the church. As appears from the author of the Apostolical Constitutions,¹¹ who orders the deacon to dismiss the hearers and unbelievers with that solemn form of words, before the liturgy or prayers of the church began. Upon which account the council of Nice¹² calls them, ἀκροόμενους μόνον, hearers only, to distinguish them from such catechumens as might not only hear sermons, but also attend some particular prayers of the church, that were especially offered up for them, whilst they were kneeling upon their knees, and waiting for imposition of hands, and the minister's benediction.

Hence arose a third sort of catechumens, which the Greeks call γονυκλίνοντες, and the Latins, geniflectentes and prostrati, that is, kneelers or prostrators.^{Sect. 4. Thirdly, The γονυκλίνοντες, or geniflectentes, the kneelers.} These sometimes have the name of catechumens more especially appropriated to them, as in the forementioned canon of the council of Nice, which runs in these terms, "It is decreed by the great and holy synod, concerning the catechumens that have lapsed, That they for three years shall be hearers only; and after that, pray with the catechumens again." Hence that part of the liturgy which respected them, was particularly called κατηχομένων εὐχή, The prayer of the catechumens, which came immediately after the bishop's sermon, together with the prayers of the energumens and penitents, as we learn from the council of Laodicea,¹³ which orders the method of them; and the forms of these prayers are recited both in the Apostolical Constitutions¹⁴ and St. Chrysostom,¹⁵ which I do

⁶ Suicer. Thesaur. t. 2. p. 72.

⁷ Basnag. Critic. in Baron. p. 481.

⁸ Maldonat. de Baptism. c. 1. p. 79.

⁹ Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. 1. c. 16. n. 4.

¹⁰ Conc. Neocæs. c. 5. Κατηχοόμενος, ἐν εἰσερχόμενος εἰς κυριακὸν ἐν τῇ τῶν κατηχοουμένων τάξει τήκη, ἕτος δὲ ἀμαρτάνων, ἐὰν μὲν γόνυ κλίνων, ἀκροάσθω, μηκέτι ἀμαρτάνων· ἐὰν δὲ ἀκροόμενος ἔτι ἀμαρτάνη, ἐξωθείσθω.

¹¹ Constit. Apost. lib. 8. c. 5.

¹² Conc. Nicen. can. 14.

¹³ Conc. Laod. c. 19.

¹⁴ Constit. Apost. lib. 8. c. 6.

¹⁵ Chrysost. Hom. 2. in 2 Cor.

not here insert, because they will have a more proper place in the liturgy of the church. Together with these prayers they always received imposition of hands, kneeling upon their knees: whence the council of Neocæsarea,¹⁶ and others, distinguish them by the name of γονυκλίνοντες, the kneelers; the prayer is called oratio impositionis manûs, the prayer of imposition of hands, which was frequently repeated both in the public and private exercises of the catechumens.

Above these was a fourth order, which the Greeks call βαπτιζόμενοι and φωτιζόμενοι; and the Latins, competentes and electi: all which words are used among the ancients to denote the immediate candidates of baptism, or such as gave in their names to the bishop, signifying their desire to be baptized the next approaching festival. Their petitioning for this favour gave them the name of competentes; and from the bishop's examination and approbation or choice of them, they were styled electi. St. Cyril of Jerusalem, in his Catechetical Discourses,¹⁷ always terms them φωτιζόμενοι, which though it frequently signifies persons already baptized, or illuminated by the sacrament of baptism, yet in his style, it denotes persons yet to be baptized, or such as had only the illumination of catechetical instruction antecedent to baptism. And so the name βαπτιζόμενοι, in the author of the Apostolical Constitutions,¹⁸ is taken, not for persons actually baptized, but for those catechumens who were desirous to be baptized. Whence, in the same author, the prayer that is said over the catechumens in the church is called βαπτιζομένων and φωτιζομένων εὐχή, the prayer for those that went about to be illuminated and baptized. Which also shows, that the substrati and competentes were different orders or degrees of the catechumens, (contrary to what Mr. Basnage and some others have asserted,) since different prayers, at different times in the church, were offered up for them.

These competentes, as I said, were so called from their petitioning for the sacrament of baptism, as we learn from St. Austin, who often gives this reason¹⁹ for it, telling us, that upon the approach of the Easter festival, it was usual for the catechumens to give in their names in order to be baptized, whence they were called competentes, petitioners or candidates for baptism. When their names were given in, and their petition accepted, then both they and their sponsors were registered in the books of the church; as is noted by the author under the name of Dionysius²⁰ the Areopagite, who brings in the bishop commanding the priests to register both the catechumen and his sponsor or susceptor together. And in the council of Constantinople, under Mennas,²¹ there is mention made of an officer in the church, particularly appointed to this business, one whose appropriated office it was to register the names of those who offered and presented themselves to baptism. These registers were called their diptychs; but as they had several sorts of diptychs, some for the dead and some for the living, these were particularly called διπτυχα ζώντων, the diptychs or books of the living, as is observed by Pachymeres,²² in his comment upon the foresaid place of Dionysius.

When their names were thus registered, then followed a scrutiny or examination of their proficiency under the preceding stages of the catechetical exercises. And this was often repeated before baptism, according to the direction given in this case by the fourth council²³ of Carthage. They that were approved upon such examination, were sometimes called electi, the chosen, as we find in the decrees of Pope Leo Magnus, who speaks of them under this appellation,²⁴ because they were now accepted and chosen as persons qualified for baptism at the next approaching festivals of Easter or Whitsuntide, which were the usual times of baptizing. Cardinal Bona makes these electi a distinct order from the competentes; but there seems to be no ground for such a distinction, because their exercises were all the same henceforward till they arrived at baptism.

For as they were all examined, so they were all exorcised alike for twenty days before baptism. This custom is often mentioned by the ancient writers, both of the Greek and Latin church. St. Austin, more than once, speaks of it as the common practice of the African church; joining examination,²⁵ catechising, and exorcism together, and telling us that the fire of exorcism, as Sect. 5. Fourthly, The competentes and electi; the immediate candidates of baptism.

Sect. 7. Partly by frequent examinations, in which such as approved themselves had the name of electi.

Sect. 6. How this last order were particularly disciplined and prepared for baptism.

Sect. 8. Partly by exorcism, accompanied with imposition of hands, and the sign of the cross, and insufflation.

¹⁶ Conc. Neocæsar. c. 5. ¹⁷ Cyril. Catech. 1, 2, &c.

¹⁸ Constit. Apost. lib. 8. c. 8.

¹⁹ Aug. de Fide et Oper. c. 6. Cum fontis illius sacramenta peteremus, atque ab hoc competentes etiam vocemur, &c. Id. de Cura pro Mortuis, c. 12. Pascha appropinquante dedit nomen inter alios competentes.

²⁰ Dionys. Hierarch. Eccles. c. 2. n. 4. p. 216. Ἰεράρχης ἀπογράψασθαι, κελύει τοῖς ἱερεῦσι τὸν ἄνδρα καὶ τὸν ἀνάδοχον.

²¹ Conc. Constant. sub Menna. Act. 5. t. 5. p. 221. Ὁ τῆς προσηγορίας τῶν εἰς τὸ βάπτισμα προσπίπτων ἐγγράφειν τεταγμένους.

²² Pachymer. in Dionys. p. 234.

²³ Conc. Carthag. 4. can. 84. Crebra examinatione baptismum percipiant.

²⁴ Leo, Ep. 4. ad Episc. Siculos, c. 5. In baptizandis in ecclesia electis, hæc duo tempora, de quibus locuti sumus, esse legitima, &c.

²⁵ Aug. in Psal. lxxv. Post ignem exorcismi venitur ad baptismum. Id. de Fide et Oper. c. 6. Suis nominibus datis, abstinentia, jejuniis, exorcismisque purgantur.— Ipsis diebus quibus catechizantur, exorcizantur, scrutantur.

his phrase is, always preceded baptism. We learn the same from Cyprian, and the council of Carthage, held under him, about the validity of heretical baptism: for there it is often said, that heretics²⁶ and schismatics were first to be exorcised with imposition of hands, and then baptized, before they could be admitted as true members of the catholic church. And we learn from thence also, that the practice was so universal, that the heretics themselves did not omit it, though it was esteemed of no effect by the catholics when done by them, but looked upon only as a mock-practice, where one demoniac²⁷ exorcised another, as Cæcilius a Bilta phrases it in the same council. Ferrandus Diaconus²⁸ also speaks of this exorcism, which immediately followed the scrutiny or examination of the competentes. And the like testimonies may be seen in Petrus Chrysologus,²⁹ and the second council of Bracara,³⁰ for the practice of the Italic and Spanish churches. In the last of which, it is particularly specified that these exorcisms shall continue for twenty days before baptism. Gennadius of Marseilles³¹ testifies not only for the French church, but the universal church throughout the whole world, that exorcisms and exufflations were uniformly used both to infants and adult persons, before they were admitted to the sacrament of regeneration and fountain of life. And for the Greek church in particular, (though the author of the Apostolical Constitutions, for a peculiar reason, makes no mention of this ceremony, because he represents the business of an exorcist not as a standing and ordinary office in the church, but as an extraordinary and miraculous gift of God,³² as it was in the age of the apostles,) yet Gregory Nazianzen, and Cyril of Jerusalem, are undeniable evidences of the practice: for Nazianzen, in his Oration upon Baptism,³³ thus speaks his catechumen: Despise not thou the medicinal office of exorcism, neither grow weary of the length or continuance of it; for it is a proper trial of a man's sincerity in coming to the grace of baptism. Cyril, in like manner,³⁴ bids his catechu-men to receive exorcism with diligence in the time of catechizing. For whether it was insufflation or exorcism, it was to be esteemed salutary to the soul; for as mixed metals could not be purged without fire, so neither could the soul be purged without exorcisms, which were Divine, and gathered out of the Holy Scriptures. He adds a little after, that the exorcists did thus, by the power of the Holy Spirit, cast a terror upon the evil spirit, and make him fly from the soul, and leave it in a salutary state and hope of eternal life; where we may observe two things that give great light in this matter: 1. Why it is so often called by the ancients the "fire of exorcism;" because it purges the soul, and as it were fires the evil spirit from it. 2. That these exorcisms were nothing but prayers, collected and composed out of the words of the Holy Scriptures, to beseech God to break the dominion and power of Satan in new converts, and to deliver them from his slavery by expelling the spirit of error and wickedness from them. Therefore Cyril³⁵ in another place calls them λόγοι εὐχῆς, the words of prayer, by which a devil, or a demoniac, who could not be held in chains of iron by many, was often held by one, through the power of the Holy Ghost working in him; and the bare insufflation of an exorcist, was a fire of sufficient force to expel the invisible spirits. So that the whole business of exorcism, and the power of it, is to be resolved into prayer, some forms of which are now extant in the Euchologium,³⁶ or Rituals of the Greek Church, published by Goar, and the Rituals of the Ancient Gallican Church, published by Mabillon.³⁷ From whence also it appears, that the insufflation, and imposition of hands, and the sign of the cross, [which was used at the same time, as we find in the writings of St. Austin³⁸ and St. Ambrose,³⁹] were only looked upon as decent ceremonies or concomitants of prayer; to whose energy, and not to the bare ceremonies, the whole efficacy and benefit of this part of the catechumens' discipline is to be attributed. For though the ceremonies be sometimes only men-

²⁶ Conc. Carthag. ap. Cyprian. p. 232. Censeo omnes hæreticos et schismaticos, qui ad catholicam ecclesiam voverint venire, non ante ingredi, nisi exorcizati et baptizati prius fuerint. Ibid. p. 237. Primo per manûs impositionem in exorcismo, secundo per baptismi regenerationem, tunc possunt ad Christi pollicitationem venire.

²⁷ Ibid. p. 230. Apud hæreticos omnia per mendacium aguntur, ubi exorcizat demoniacus, &c.

²⁸ Ferrand. Ep. ad Fulgent. de Catechizando Æthiope, inter Fulgentii Opera, p. 606. Celebrato solenniter scrutinio, per exorcismum contra diabolum vindicatur.

²⁹ Pet. Chrysolog. Serm. 52. Hinc est quod veniens ex gentibus impositione manûs et exorcismis ante a dæmone purgatur. Vid. Serm. 105.

³⁰ Conc. Bracar. 2. c. 1. Ante viginti dies baptismi ad purgationem exorcismi concurrant catechumeni, &c.

³¹ Gennad. de Dogmat. Eccles. c. 31. Illud etiam quod circa baptizandos in universo mundo sancta ecclesia uniformiter agit, non otioso contemplantur intuitu: cum sive parvuli sive juvenes ad regenerationis veniunt sacramentum, non prius fontem vitæ adeant, quam exorcismis et exufflationibus clericorum spiritus ab eis immundus abigatur.

³² Constit. Apost. lib. 8. c. 26.

³³ Naz. Orat. 40. de Bapt. p. 657. Μὴ διαπτύσῃς ἔξορκισμῶν Θεραπεῖαν, μηδὲ πρὸς τὸ μήκος ταύτης ἀπαγορεύσῃς. Βάσανός ἐστὶ καὶ αὕτη τῆς περὶ τὸ χάρισμα γνησιότητος.

³⁴ Cyril. Præfat. ad Catech. n. 5. p. 7. Τὸς ἐπορκισμῶν δέχῃ μετὰ σπιδήν· κἂν ἐμφουσηθῆς κἂν ἐπορκισθῆς, σωτηρία σοι τὸ πρᾶγμα νόμισον εἶναι, &c. Vid. Catech. I. n. 5. p. 18.

³⁵ Cyril. Catech. lib. n. 9. p. 234.

³⁶ Eucholog. p. 335.

³⁷ Mabillon. Musæum Italic. t. I. p. 323.

³⁸ Aug. Confes. lib. I. c. 11.

³⁹ Ambros. de iis qui imitantur, c. 4.

tioned, yet prayer is always to be understood, and to be taken for the substance of the action, whilst the other were only the circumstances of it.

During this same term of twenty days the catechumens were also exercised with abstinence and fasting, as a suitable preparation for their ensuing baptism. The fourth council of Carthage has a canon which joins all these things together: Let such as give in their names to be baptized,⁴⁰ be exercised a long time with abstinence from wine and flesh, and with imposition of hands, and frequent examination, and so let them receive their baptism. In like manner St. Austin puts abstinence,⁴¹ fastings, and exorcism together, and particularly mentions abstinence from the marriage bed, during this time of preparation for baptism. So Socrates tells us,⁴² when the Burgundians desired baptism of a French bishop, he first made them fast seven days. And when a certain Jewish impostor, who had been baptized by the Arians and Macedonians, came at last to Paul, the Novatian bishop, to desire the like favour of him, the same author observes,⁴³ That Paul would not admit him, till he had first exercised him with fasting many days, and taught him the rudiments of the Christian faith. These fastings are also mentioned by Justin Martyr and Tertullian, where they speak of men's preparation for baptism. As many, says Justin Martyr,⁴⁴ as believe the things to be true which we teach, and promise to conform their lives to the laws of our religion, they first of all learn to ask pardon of their by-past sins of God by prayers and fastings, we joining our prayers and fastings with theirs. So Tertullian,⁴⁵ They that are about to receive baptism, must first use frequent prayers and fastings, and geniculations and watchings, and make confession of all their former sins, in imitation of John's baptism, taking it for a favour, that they are not obliged to make public confession of their flagitious crimes and offences. Whence we may conclude, that these confessions were sometimes public, and sometimes private, as directed by the wisdom of the church. They who would see more of this matter, may consult St. Cyril's Catechetic Discourses,⁴⁶ and Gregory Nazianzen's Oration about Baptism,⁴⁷ who, to confession, and prayers, and fasting, add humicubations, and groans and tears, and forgiving of enemies, as proper indications of a penitent mind, before men came to receive the seal of forgiveness at God's hand by the ministry of his church.

At this time also the competentes were taught the words of the Creed, which they were obliged to get by heart, in order to repeat it before the bishop at their last examination before baptism. This part of catechising was often performed by the bishop himself, as we may learn from those words of St. Ambrose,⁴⁸ where he thus distinguishes the competentes from the other catechumens: When the catechumens were dismissed, I recited the Creed to the competentes in the baptisteries of the church. This was done in some churches twenty days before baptism; for so the second council of Bracara ordered⁴⁹ for the Spanish churches. But the council of Agde in France⁵⁰ speaks only of eight days before Easter, appointing Palm Sunday to be the day when the Creed should be publicly taught the competentes in all their churches. But perhaps we are to distinguish betwixt the public and private teaching of the Creed; and so one might be done privately twenty days before by the catechists in the baptisteries or catechetic schools, and the other publicly, eight days before, by the ministers of the church. However this was, there was a certain day appointed for these catechumens to give an account of their Creed, and that was the parasceue, or day before our Saviour's passion, which the council of Laodicea⁵¹ calls the fifth day of the great and solemn week, when such as were to be baptized, having learnt their Creed, were to repeat it before the bishop or presbyters in the church. And this was the only day, for several ages, that ever the Creed was publicly repeated in the Greek churches, as Theodorus Lector⁵² informs us, who says, It was used to be recited only once a year, and that was on the parasceue, or Sect. 9. Partly by the exercises of fasting and abstinence, and confession, and repentance.

Sect. 10. Partly by learning the words of the Creed, and the Lord's prayer.

⁴⁰ Conc. Carthag. 4. c. 84. Baptizandi nomen suum dent, et diu sub abstinentia vini et carnum, ac manūs impositione, crebra examinatione baptismum accipiant.

⁴¹ Aug. de Fide et Oper. c. 6. Sine dubio non admitterentur, si per ipsos dies quibus eandem gratiam percipitur, suis nominibus datis, abstinentia, jejuniis, exorcismisque purgantur, cum suis legitimis et veris uxoribus se concubituros profiterentur, atque hujus rei, quamvis alio tempore licite, paucis ipsis solennibus diebus nullam continentiam servaturos.

⁴² Socrat. lib. 7. p. 30.

⁴³ Ibid. c. 17.

⁴⁴ Justin. Apol. 2. p. 93.

⁴⁵ Tertul. de Bapt. c. 20. Ingressuros baptismum, orationibus crebris, jejuniis et geniculationibus et pervigiis orare oportet, et cum confessione omnium retro delictorum, ut exponant etiam baptismum Johannis. Tingebantur, inquit, confitentibus delicta sua. Nobis gratulandum est, si non publice confitemur iniquitates aut turpitudines nostras. Vid. Tertul. de Pœnitent. c. 6.

⁴⁶ Cyril. Catech. I. n. 5 et 6. p. 13 et 19.

⁴⁷ Naz. Orat. 40. de Bapt.

⁴⁸ Ambros. Ep. 33. ad Marcellinam sororem, p. 158. Dimissis catechumenis, symbolum aliquibus competentibus tradebam in baptisterii basilicæ.

⁴⁹ Conc. Bracar. 2. c. 1. Ante viginti dies baptismi, catechumeni symbolum, quod est, Credo in Deum Patrem Omnipotentem, specialiter doceantur.

⁵⁰ Conc. Agathen. c. 9. Symbolum etiam placuit ab omnibus ecclesiis una die, id est, ante octo dies Dominicæ resurrectionis, publice in ecclesia competentibus prædicari.

⁵¹ Conc. Laodic. c. 46. Ὅτι δεῖ τοὺς φωτιζομένους τὴν πίστιν ἐκμανθάνειν, καὶ τῇ πέμπτῃ τῆς ἑβδομάδος ἀπαγγέλλειν τῷ ἐπισκόπῳ ἢ τοῖς πρεσβυτέροις.

⁵² Theodor. Lector. lib. 2. p. 563.

day of preparation to our Saviour's passion, now called Holy Thursday; at which time, the bishop was always wont to catechise the competentes in the church. When they had learned the Creed, they were also taught the Lord's prayer, which was not allowed ordinarily to the catechumens till immediately before their baptism. For this prayer was usually called, ἐὺχὴ πιστῶν, the prayer of the faithful, as being peculiarly used only by persons baptized, who were made sons of God by regeneration, and had a title, as such, to address God under the denomination of their Father which is in heaven: which catechumens, at least those of the first orders, could not so properly do; but when they arrived at this last degree of competentes, and stood as immediate candidates of baptism, then this form was part of their instruction, and not before. As we learn from Ferrandus Diaconus, who speaks first of their repeating the Creed, and then learning⁵³ the Lord's prayer. And the same is evident from Chrysostom, Austin, and Theodoret, of whom I shall have occasion to speak more particularly in chap. v. sect. 9, where I treat of the ancient discipline in concealing the sacred mysteries from the catechumens.

Together with the Creed, they were also taught how to make their proper responses in baptism; particularly the form of renouncing the devil and his works, his pomps, his worship, his angels, his inventions, and all things belonging to him; and the contrary form of covenanting with Christ, and engaging themselves in his service: for though these acts in their highest solemnity did properly appertain to the substance of baptism itself; yet it was necessary to instruct the catechumens beforehand, how they were to behave themselves in these matters, that they might not, through ignorance, be at a loss when they came to baptism. And therefore the author of the Apostolical Constitutions⁵⁴ orders it to be one special part of the catechumens' instruction, just before their baptism, that they should learn what related to the renunciation of the devil, and covenanting with Christ. And these engagements they actually entered into,

Sect. 11.
And the form of renouncing the devil, and covenanting with Christ, and other responses to be used in baptism.

not only at their baptism, but before it, as a just preparation for it: for, says that author, they ought first to abstain from the contraries, and then come to the holy mysteries, having purged their hearts beforehand of all spot and wrinkle, and habits of sin. And the same thing is intimated by Tertullian, and Ferrandus the deacon of Carthage; for Ferrandus says expressly,⁵⁵ that the catechumens, at the same time that they were exorcised, made their actual renunciation of the devil, and then were taught the Creed. And Tertullian means the same thing, when he says, that this renunciation was made twice; first in the church,⁵⁶ under the hands of the bishop, and then again when they came to the water to be baptized. And hence it became one part of the ancient office of deaconesses, to instruct the more ignorant and rustic sort of women, how they were to make their responses at the time of baptism to such interrogatories as the minister should then put to them, as I have had occasion to show from a canon of the fourth council of Carthage,⁵⁷ in discoursing of the office of deaconesses in another⁵⁸ place.

Beside these parts of useful discipline and instruction, there were some other ceremonies of less note used toward the catechumens, which I must not wholly pass over. Among these was the ceremony of the competentes going veiled, or with their faces covered, for some days before baptism: which custom is taken notice of by Cyril of Jerusalem,⁵⁹ together with the reason of it: Your face, says he to the catechumens, was covered, that your mind might be more at liberty, and that the wandering of your eyes might not distract your soul. For when the eyes are covered, the ears are not diverted by any impediments from hearing and receiving the saving truths. St. Austin and Junilius give a more mystical reason for it. For they suppose the catechumens went veiled in public, as bearing the image of Adam's slavery after his expulsion out of Paradise; and that these veils, being taken away after baptism,⁶⁰ were an indication of the liberty of the spiritual life, which they obtained by the sacrament

Sect. 12.
What meant by the competentes going veiled some time before baptism.

⁵³ Ferrand. Ep. ad Fulgent. de Catechizando Æthiopo. Ipsa insuper sancti symboli verba memoriter in conspectu fidelis populi clara voce pronuncians, piam regulam Dominicæ orationis accepit.

⁵⁴ Constit. Apost. lib. 7. c. 39 et 40. Μανθανέτω τὰ περι τῆς ἀποταγῆς τοῦ διαβόλου, καὶ τὰ περι τῆς συνταγῆς τῆ Χριστοῦ, &c.

⁵⁵ Ferrand. Ep. ad Fulgent. inter Opera Fulgentii, p. 606. Per exorcismum contra diabolum vindicatur: cui se renunciare constanter, sicut hic consuetudo poscebat, auditurus symbolum, proficitur.

⁵⁶ Tertul. de Coron. Mil. c. 3. Aquam adituri, ibidem, sed et aliquanto prius in ecclesia sub antistitis manu contestamur nos renunciare diabolo, et pompæ et angelis ejus.

⁵⁷ Conc. Carthag. 4. c. 12. Viduæ vel sanctimoniales, quæ ad ministerium baptizandarum mulierum eliguntur, tam instructæ sint ad officium, ut possint apto et sano sermone docere imperitas et rusticas mulieres, tempore quo baptizandæ sunt, qualiter baptizatori interrogatæ respondeant, et qualiter accepto baptismate vivant.

⁵⁸ Book II. chap. 22. sect. 9.

⁵⁹ Cyril. Præfat. ad Catech. n. 5. p. 7. Ἐσκέπασαί σου τὸ πρόσωπον, ἵνα σχολάσῃ λοιπὸν ἡ διάνοια.

⁶⁰ Aug. Ser. 4. in Dominic. Octav. Paschæ, 155. de Tempore. Hodie octavæ dicuntur infantium: revelanda sunt capita eorum, quod est indicium libertatis. Habet enim libertatem ista spiritalis nativitas. Junil. de Partibus Divinæ Legis, lib. 2. c. 16. Bibl. Patr. t. 1. p. 15. Typum gerunt Adæ Paradiso exclusi—propter quod et per publicum capitibus tectis incedunt.

of regeneration. However it be, the evidences are plain, that there was such a ceremony used to the catechumens: but, as Valesius⁶¹ rightly observes, it did not respect them all, but only that order of them that were peculiarly called the competentes.

Another ceremony of this nature, Sect. 13. Of the ceremony called Ephphata, or opening of the ears of the catechumens. was the custom of touching the ears of the catechumens, and saying unto them, Ephphata, Be opened: which Petrus Chrysologus⁶² joins with imposition of hands and exorcism; making it to have something of mystical signification in it, to denote the opening of the understanding to receive the instructions of faith. And St. Ambrose,⁶³ or an author under his name, describes the same custom, deriving the original of it from our Saviour's example, in saying, Ephphata, Be opened, when he cured the deaf and the blind. But this custom seems not to have gained any great credit in the practice of the church; for besides these two authors, there is scarce any other that so much as mentions it; and whether it was used to the first or last order of the catechumens, is not very easy to determine.

The like may be said of another ceremony which is mentioned in St. Ambrose, which was the custom of anointing the eyes with clay, in imitation of our Saviour's practice, when he cured the blind man by making clay of his spittle, and anointing his eyes with it, John ix. 6. The design of this ceremony, as that author explains it,⁶⁴ was to teach the catechumens to confess their sins, and to review their consciences, and repent of their errors, that is, to acknowledge what state and condition they were in by their first birth. St. Austin seems also⁶⁵ to refer to this practice in his discourse upon the blind man cured by our Saviour, where he says, The catechumens were anointed before baptism, as the blind man was by Christ, who was thereby perhaps made a catechumen.

Vicecomes⁶⁶ and Mr. Basnage⁶⁷ mention another custom, which was peculiar in their opinion to the African church, viz. the use of a lighted taper put into the hands of the catechumens in time of exorcism, to signify (as Mr. Basnage explains it) the illustration of the Holy Ghost; or, as Vicecomes would have it, the power of exorcism in expelling Satan. But their observation, I think, is grounded upon a mere mistake, interpreting some words of St. Cyprian and St. Austin in a literal sense, which are only figurative and metaphorical. Cyprian, speaking of the power of Christians over unclean spirits, says,⁶⁸ among many other things, that they could oblige them by their powerful stripes to forsake the persons they had possessed; that they could put them to the rack, and make them confess, and cry out, and groan; that they could scourge them with their whips, and burn them with their fire. Where it is plain enough to any unprejudiced reader, that the fire of exorcism here spoken of, is of the same kind with the whips, and stripes, and rack; that is, the spiritual and invisible power of the Holy Ghost, as Cyprian himself immediately explains them, when he says, All this was done, but not seen; the stroke was invisible, and the effect of it only appeared to men. So that it was not a material fire, or a lighted taper in the hands of the catechumens, that Cyprian speaks of, as Vicecomes fancies, but the invisible fire or power of the Holy Ghost. And it is the same fire that St. Austin means, whose authority only is urged by Mr. Basnage to found this custom on. He speaks of a fire indeed in the sacraments,⁶⁹ and in catechising, and in exorcising. For whence otherwise should it be, says he, that the unclean spirits so often cry out, I burn, if there be not a fire that burns them? From the fire of exorcism we pass to baptism, as from fire to water, and from water to a place of rest. There is nothing in all this that can signify a lighted taper in the hands of the catechumens, which certainly has no power to burn an unclean spirit: but the fire of exorcism is the invisible fire of the Holy Ghost, that is, the energy and powerful operation of God's Spirit, which casts out devils with a word, and makes Satan fall like lightning from heaven. Though I deny not but that this custom might come into the church in after ages; for Albi-⁶¹ Vales. Not. in Euseb. de Vit. Constant. lib. 4. c. 62.

⁶² Chrysolog. Serm. 52. p. 286. Hinc est quod veniens ex gentibus impositione manuum et exorcismis ante a dæmone purgatur; et aptionem aurium percipit, ut fidei capere possit auditum.
⁶³ Ambros. de iis qui initiantur, c. 1. Quod vobis significavimus, cum aptionem celebrantes mysterium, diceremus, Effeta, quod est, aperire. — Hoc mysterium celebravit Christus in evangelio, cum mutum curaret et surdum. Id. de Sacramentis, lib. 1. c. 1. Mysteria celebrata sunt aptionem, quando tibi aures tetigit sacerdos et nares.
⁶⁴ Ambros. de Sacram. lib. 3. c. 2. Ergo quando dedisti nomen tuum, tulli lutum et linivisti super oculos tuos. Quod significat ut peccatum tuum fatereris, ut conscientiam tuam recognosceres, ut pœnitentiam ageres delictorum, hoc est, sortem humanæ generationis agnosceres.

⁶⁵ Aug. Tract. 44. in Johan. t. 9. p. 133. Catechumenus inunctus est nondum lotus.
⁶⁶ Vicecomes de Ritib. Bapt. lib. 2. c. 32.
⁶⁷ Basnag. Critic. in Baron. p. 488.
⁶⁸ Cypr. ad Donatum. p. 4. Facultas datur, immundos et erraticos spiritus ad confessionem minis increpantibus cogere; ut recedant duris verberibus urgere; condicantes, ejulantes, gementes, incremento pœnæ propagantis extendere; flagris cœdere, igne torrere. Res illic geritur, nec videtur; occulta plaga, et pœna manifesta.
⁶⁹ Aug. Enarrat. in Psal. lxxv. p. 277. In sacramentis et in catechizando et in exorcizando adhibetur prius ignis. Nam unde immundi spiritus plerumque clamant, Ardeo, si ille ignis non est? Post ignem autem exorcismi venit ad baptismum, &c.

nus Flaccus, a ritualist of the eighth century, speaks of a custom like to it,⁷⁰ as used at least the night before the catechumens were to be baptized. For, describing the ceremonies of the vigil of the great sabbath before Easter, he says, A wax taper was used to be carried before the catechumens, which signified the illumination wherewith Christ enlightened that night by the grace of his resurrection, and the catechumens coming to baptism. And this was it that deceived Vicecomes, who would have all modern customs appear with a face of antiquity, and therefore wrested the words of St. Cyprian and St. Austin, to patronize a novel ceremony, which in their days was not so much as thought of.

There is another mistake which runs through the writings of many modern authors, concerning what the ancients call the sacrament of the catechumens. They suppose, that though the catechumens were not allowed to participate of the eucharist, yet they had something like it, which they call eulogia, or panis benedictus, consecrated bread, taken out of the same oblations, out of which anciently the eucharist itself was taken. Baronius⁷¹ was the first that maintained this opinion, and after him Bellarmine,⁷² and Vicecomes,⁷³ Albaspinus,⁷⁴ Petavius,⁷⁵ Bishop Beverege,⁷⁶ Estius, Maldonate, and many others follow him in the same assertion. But the opinion is wholly grounded upon a mistaken passage in St. Austin, who speaks indeed of something that, according to the language of his age, was then called the sacrament of the catechumens; but he does not say, that it was consecrated bread, or part of the same eulogia out of which the eucharist was taken. His words are these:⁷⁷ That which the catechumens receive, though it be not the body of Christ, is yet a holy thing, and more holy than the common meat which sustains us, because it is a sacrament. He gives it the name of sacrament, according to the custom of that age, which was, to call every thing a sacrament, that had either any thing of mystery or of spiritual signification in it. But that this sacrament was not the consecrated bread, but only a little taste of salt, we may learn from the same St. Austin, who, speaking of himself as a catechumen, says, At that time⁷⁸ he was often signed with the cross of Christ, and seasoned with his salt. And that it was this, and no more, appears further from a canon of the third council of Carthage, at which St. Austin was present, which orders,⁷⁹ That no other sacrament should be given to the catechumens on the most solemn days of the paschal festival, except their usual salt; giving this reason for it, That forasmuch as the faithful did not change their sacraments on those days, neither ought the catechumens to change theirs. From whence it is easy to be inferred, that the sacrament of the catechumens means no more than this ceremony of giving them a little taste of the salt, like milk and honey that was given after baptism, as Cardinal Bona,⁸⁰ and Mr. Aubertine,⁸¹ and Basnage,⁸² have rightly concluded: the design of the thing being not to give them any thing in imitation of the eucharist, or introductory to that, which they always kept hid as a secret from them; but that by this symbol they might learn to purge and cleanse their souls from sin; salt being the emblem of purity and incorruption.

I have but two things more to observe concerning the discipline used towards the catechumens. The one relates to those ecclesiastical censures and punishments, which were usually inflicted on them, in case they were found to have lapsed into any gross and scandalous offences. These being not yet admitted into full communion with the church, could not be punished as other offenders, by being subjected to those several rules of penance as other offenders were; nor did the church think fit to be so severe upon them, as upon other penitents that lapsed after baptism: but their punishment was commonly no more but a degradation of them from one degree of catechumenship to another, or at most a prorogation of their baptism to the hour of death. This appears plainly from the fifth canon of the council of Neocæsarea, which speaks thus of the several degrees of catechumens and their punishment: If any catechumen, who comes to church, and stands in any order of catechumens there, be found guilty of sin; if he be a kneeler or prostrator, let him become a hearer, if he sins no more; but if he sin while he is a hearer, let him be cast out of the church. After the same manner it

⁷⁰ Albin. al. Alcuin. de Divin. Offic. c. 19. Cereus præcedit catechumenos nostros; lumen ipsius Christum significat, quo præsens nox illuminetur, gratia scilicet resurrectionis, et catechumeni ad baptismum venturi.

⁷¹ Baron. an. 313. n. 55.

⁷² Bellarm. de Sacram. lib. 2. c. 25.

⁷³ Vicecom. de Ritib. Bapt. lib. 2. c. 9. p. 259.

⁷⁴ Albaspin. Observat. lib. 2. c. 36.

⁷⁵ Petav. Animadvers. in Epiphan. Exposit. Fidei, p. 366.

⁷⁶ Beverege. Not. in Can. 2. Conc. Antioch. Estius in Sentent. lib. 4. Dist. 10. sect. 5.

⁷⁷ Aug. de Peccator. Meritis, lib. 2. c. 26. Quod accipiunt catechumeni, quamvis non sit corpus Christi, sanctum est tamen, et sanctius quam cibi quibus alimur, quoniam sacramentum est.

⁷⁸ Aug. Confess. lib. 1. c. 11. Audieram ego adhuc puer de vita æterna nobis promissa per humilitatem Filii tui Domini Dei nostri, et signabar jam signo crucis, et condiebar ejus sale.

⁷⁹ Conc. Carthag. 3. can. 5. Placuit ut per solemnissimos paschales dies sacramentum catechumenis non detur, nisi solitum sal: quia si fideles per illos dies sacramenta non mutant, non catechumenis oportet mutari.

⁸⁰ Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. 1. c. 16. n. 3.

⁸¹ Albertinus de Eucharist. lib. 2. p. 650 et 711.

⁸² Basnage. Exercit. Critic. in Baron. p. 487.

Sect. 16.
What meant by the sacrament of the catechumens.

Sect. 17.
How the catechu-mens were punished, if they fell into gross sins.

was decreed by the great council⁸³ of Nice, That if any of the catechumens (by whom they more especially mean the kneelers) were found guilty of sin, they should be degraded to the classis of the hearers for three years, and after that be admitted to pray with the catechumens again. In the council of Eliberis there are several canons to this purpose. For whereas the ordinary time of continuing catechumens was but two years, as appointed by that⁸⁴ council; yet in case of lapsing, they were obliged to continue catechumens sometimes three years, sometimes five, and sometimes to the hour of death, before they were baptized, according to the nature and quality of their offences. If a catechumen took upon him the office of a heathen flamen, and did not sacrifice,⁸⁵ but only exhibit the usual games, he was to be punished with the prorogation of his baptism for three years from the time of his lapsing. If a woman who was a catechumen divorced herself from her husband,⁸⁶ her punishment was five years' prorogation. But if she committed adultery, and after conception used any arts to destroy her infant in the womb, then her baptism was to be deferred to the hour⁸⁷ of death. And this was the highest punishment that ever was inflicted upon catechumens. For though in this council many times communion, even at the hour of death, be denied to believers that had lapsed after baptism; yet we meet with no instance or command, in this or any other place, prohibiting catechumens to be baptized at their last hour. The sixty-seventh canon of this council⁸⁸ orders them for some crimes to be cast out of communion; which is the same as the council of Neocæsarea calls casting out of the church, or reducing them back to the lowest rank of private catechumens, who were not allowed to enter the church: but when this was done, if ever after⁸⁹ they showed true signs of repentance, and a desire to be baptized, they were admitted to this privilege at the hour of death, if not before: and this council gives a reason for this moderation toward them in comparison of others, because their sins were committed whilst they were unregenerate in the old man, and therefore were more easily pardoned than crimes committed by believers after baptism. This was the distinction universally observed between the punishments of the catechumens, and those that had arrived to greater perfections in the church.

But in case the catechumens died without baptism, by neglect or their own default, then they were punished as other malefactors, who unqualified themselves for the solemnities of a Christian burial. They were put into the same rank as those who laid violent hands on themselves, or were publicly executed for their crimes. The first council of Bracara joins all these⁹⁰ together, as persons unworthy to be interred with the usual solemnities of singing of psalms, or to be commemorated amongst the faithful in the oblations and prayers of the church. For in ancient times, prayers, and oblations, and thanksgivings were solemnly made in the communion service, for all that died in the faith of Christ, and in full communion with the church: but such as neglected their baptism, were none of this number; and therefore they were buried in silence, and no mention was ever after made of them among others in the prayers of the church. Chrysostom⁹¹ says expressly, This was the peculiar privilege of those that died in the faith, but catechumens were excluded from this benefit and all other helps, except that of alms and oblations for them.

This discipline plainly respected those who put a contempt upon the holy ordinance of baptism, and neglected to receive it, when the time of their catechumenhip perhaps was expired, and they were under an obligation by the laws of the church to have received it. But in case there was no contempt, but only an unforeseen and unavoidable necessity hindered their baptism, whilst they were diligently preparing for it; in that case, they were treated a little more favourably by the ancients, who did not generally think the mere want of baptism in such circumstances to be such a peculiar crime, as to exclude men absolutely from the benefit of church communion, or the hopes of eternal salvation. Some few of them indeed are pretty severe upon

Sect. 18.
How they were treated by the church, if they died without baptism.

Sect. 19.
What opinion the ancients had of the necessity of baptism.

⁸³ Conc. Nicen. c. 14. Περὶ τῶν κατηχημένων καὶ παραπεσόντων ἔδοξε τῇ ἁγίᾳ καὶ μεγάλῃ συνόδῳ, ὥστε τριῶν ἐτῶν αὐτοῦ ἀκρωμένων μόνου, μετὰ ταῦτα εὐχέσθαι μετὰ τῶν κατηχημένων.

⁸⁴ Conc. Eliber. c. 42.

⁸⁵ Ibid. c. 4. Item flamines, si fuerint catechumeni, et se a sacrificiis abstinerunt, post triennii tempora, placuit ad baptismum admitti debere.

⁸⁶ Ibid. c. 10 et 11. Intra quinquennii autem tempora, catechumena si graviter fuerit infirmata, dandum ei baptismum placuit non denegari. Vid. can. 73. de Delatoribus.

⁸⁷ Ibid. can. 68. Catechumena, si per adulterium conceperit, et conceptum necaverit, placuit eam in fine baptizari. Vid. can. 73. ibid.

⁸⁸ Conc. Eliber. can. 67. Prohibendum ne qua fidelis vel catechumena aut comicos aut viros cinerarios (al. scenicos) habeat; quæcunque hoc fecerit a communione arceatur.

⁸⁹ Ibid. c. 45. Qui aliquando fuerit catechumenus, et per infinita tempora nunquam ad ecclesiam accesserit, si eum de clero quisquam cognoverit esse (al. voluisse esse) Christianum, aut testes aliqui extiterint fideles, placuit, ei baptismum non negari, eo quod in veterem hominem deliquisse videatur.

⁹⁰ Conc. Bracar. I. c. 35. Catechumenis sine redemptione baptismi defunctis, simili modo, non oblationis sanctæ commemoratio, neque psallendi impendatur officium.

⁹¹ Chrysost. Hom. 3. in Phil. p. 1225. Οἱ δὲ κατηχούμενοι οὐδὲ ταύτης ἀξιοῦνται τῆς παραμυθίας, &c.

infants dying without baptism, and some others seem also, in general terms, to deny eternal life to adult persons dying without it: but yet, when they interpret themselves, and speak more distinctly, they make some allowance, and except several cases, in which the want of baptism may be supplied by other means, when the want of it proceeded not from contempt, but from some great necessity and disability to receive it. They generally ground the necessity of baptism upon those two sayings of our Saviour, "He that believeth and is baptized, shall be saved;" and, "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." But then, in their exposition of these texts, they limit the sense to the ordinary method of salvation, and such cases wherein baptism may be had. And as for extraordinary cases, wherein baptism could not be had, though men were desirous of it, they made several exceptions in behalf of other things, which, in such circumstances, were thought sufficient to supply the want of it.

The chief of these excepted cases was martyrdom, which commonly goes by the name of second baptism, or baptism in men's own blood, in the writings of the ancients, because of the power and efficacy it was thought to have, to save men by the invisible baptism of the Spirit, without the external element of water. Tertullian,⁹² upon this account, not only dignifies it with the title of second baptism, but says, it was that which men desired to suffer, as that which procured the grace of God and pardon⁹³ of all sins by the compensation of their own blood; for by this act all sins were pardoned. This was that second baptism⁹¹ in men's own blood, with which our Lord himself was baptized after he had been baptized in water. This baptism was of force both to compensate for want of baptism, and to restore it when men had lost it. Cyprian treads in the steps of his master Tertullian; for speaking of the catechumens, who were apprehended and slain for the name of Christ, before they could be baptized in the church, he says, These were not deprived⁹⁵ of the sacrament of baptism, seeing they were baptized in the most glorious and celebrated baptism of their own blood; to which our Lord had reference, when he said, "I have another baptism to be baptized with." And, says he, that they who are thus baptized in blood, are also sanctified and consummated by their passion, and made partakers of the grace which God hath promised, is further declared by our Saviour in his Gospel, in that he said to the thief, who believed and confessed him upon the cross, "To-day thou shalt be with me in paradise." Cyprian has many other noble encomiums and flights upon this second baptism, and he excepts no sort of men from the benefit of it, but only one, that is, heretics and schismatics, because they wanted the grace of charity, and died out of the communion of the church without repentance; in which case he thought martyrdom itself not sufficient⁹⁶ to expiate their crimes, though it was available to purge away any others. Origen was wont to speak of this kind of baptism, under the name of baptism by fire, as that which often translated even catechumens to heaven, though they wanted baptism by water. For so Eusebius represents both Origen's sense and his own, when, speaking of the martyrs that suffered out of the school of Origen, he says, Two of them were only catechumens; Heraclides among the men, and Herais among the women,⁹⁷ were in this class only, when they died, but they received baptism by fire, as Origen was used to phrase it. And that this baptism did purge away sins, as well as baptism by water, Origen himself declares: for he argues thus, That martyrdom⁹⁸ is rightly called baptism, because it procures remission of sins, as baptism by water and the Spirit doth; and that by virtue of Christ's promise, who ascertains pardon of sins to all that suffer martyrdom, saying, "Whosoever shall confess me before men, him will I confess before my Father which is in heaven." And that this was then the general doctrine of the Christians in that age, appears further from this, that it was so common and well known, that the heathens themselves were not ⁹² Tertul. de Patient. c. 13. Quum vero producitur ad experimentum felicitatis, ad occasionem secundæ intinctionis, &c.

⁹³ Tertul. Apol. c. 50. Quis non ubi requisivit accedit? ubi accessit, pati exoptat? ut totam Dei gratiam redimat, ut omnem veniam de eo compensatione sanguinis sui expediat? Omnia enim huic operi delicta donantur.

⁹¹ Tertul. de Bapt. c. 16. Est quidem nobis etiam secundum lavacrum, unum et ipsum, sanguinis scilicet: de quo Dominus, Habeo, inquit, baptismum tinguere, quum jam tinctus fuisset.—Hic est baptismus, qui lavacrum et non acceptum representat, et perditum reddit.

⁹⁵ Cypr. Ep. 73. ad Jubaian, p. 208. Deinde nec privari baptismi sacramento, utpote qui baptizentur gloriosissimo et maximo sanguinis baptismo, de quo et Dominus dicebat, habere se aliud baptismum baptizari, &c.

⁹⁶ Cypr. de Orat. Domin. p. 150. Quale delictum est, quod nec baptismo sanguinis potest abluere? Quale crimen est, quod martyrio non potest expiari? Vid. Cypr. de Unit. Eccl. p. 113. It. Ep. 55. ad Antonian. p. 108. Ep. 57 et 60. ad Cornel. Ep. 73. ad Stephan. p. 207.

⁹⁷ Euseb. Hist. lib. 6. c. 4. Ἡραῖς ἐν τῇ καθήκοντι, τὸ βάπτισμα, ὡς περ φησὶν αὐτὸς, τοῦ διὰ πυρὸς λαβῆσα, τὸν βίον ἐξελίχθη.

⁹⁸ Orig. Tract. 12. in Matth. p. 85. Si baptismus indulgentiam peccatorum promittit, sicut accepimus de baptismo aquæ et Spiritûs: remissionem autem accepit peccatorum et qui martyrii suscipit baptismum: sine dubio ipsum martyrium rationabiliter baptismus appellatur. Quoniam autem remissio fit peccatorum omni martyrium sustinenti, manifestum est ex eo quod ait, Omnis qui confessus fuerit in me coram hominibus, et ego confitebor in illo coram Patre meo qui est in cælis.

ignorant of it. For in the Acts of the Martyrdom of St. Felicitas and Perpetua, who suffered about the time of Origen and Tertullian, one Saturus a catechumen⁹⁹ is spoken of as being thrown to a leopard, who by the first bite of the wild beast was so washed all over in blood, that the people, as he returned, gave him the testimony of the second baptism, crying out, Salvum lotum; salvum lotum; Baptized and saved; baptized and saved. This they said only by way of ridicule of the Christian doctrine of martyrdom's being esteemed a second baptism, and a means of salvation: but the author of the Acts rightly observes, that he was saved indeed, who was so baptized.

Nor was this only the doctrine of the more ancient writers, who lived in the times of persecution and martyrdom, but of those that followed after, and who are commonly imagined more rigid defenders of the necessity of baptism. For even St. Austin and all his contemporaries, who were engaged against Pelagius, made the same allowance in the case of martyrdom. St. Austin declares himself¹⁰⁰ wholly of Cyprian's opinion, that martyrdom does many times supply the room of baptism; and he thinks Cyprian argued well from the instance of the thief upon the cross, to whom it was said, though he was not baptized, "To-day thou shalt be with me in paradise." St. Austin often argues from the same¹⁰¹ example of the thief in other places, telling us, That by the ineffable power and justice of God, baptism was imputed to the thief upon his faith, and it was accounted to him as if he had received it, because he had a good mind and will toward it, though he could not actually receive it in his body by reason of his crucifixion. Therefore he reckons him¹⁰² among those who are sanctified by the invisible grace without the visible sacrament, as he thinks many were both under the Old and New Testament: from whence yet it does not follow, that the visible sacrament may be contemned by any; for the contemner of it cannot by any means be sanctified by the invisible grace thereof. In his book De Civitate Dei, he speaks more generally¹⁰³ of all those that suffer martyrdom, that though they have not been washed in the laver of regeneration, yet their dying for the confession of Christ avails as much toward the remission of sins, as if they had been washed in the holy fountain of baptism. For which he alleges those sayings of our Saviour, "He that loses his life for my sake, shall find it;" and, "He that confesses me before men, him will I confess before my Father which is in heaven." This passage is repeated and approved by Prosper, in his *Collection of Sentences*¹⁰⁴ out of St. Austin's works: to which he adds an epigram of his own, expressing his sense to this purpose: They are not¹⁰⁵ deprived of the holy baptism of Christ, who, instead of a font, are washed in their own blood; for whatever benefit accrues to any by the mystical rite of the sacred laver, is all fulfilled by the glory of martyrdom. Fulgentius is as severe as any man, yet he allows martyrdom¹⁰⁶ to compensate for the want of baptism. Though he pronounces peremptorily of all others, that die without the sacrament of faith and repentance, which is baptism, that they shall not inherit eternal life; yet he excepts those that are baptized in their own blood for the name of Christ. And Gennadius, after he has said, that none but persons¹⁰⁷ baptized are in the way of salvation; and that no catechumen, though he die in good works, can have eternal life; yet he excepts the case of martyrdom, because in that all the mysteries of baptism are fulfilled. A martyr, as the author of the *Apostolical Constitutions*¹⁰⁸ expresses ⁹⁹ Acta Perpetuæ et Felicit. ad calcem Lactantii de Mort. Persecutor. p. 31. Statim in fine spectaculi leopardo ejecto, de uno morsu tanto perfusus est sanguine, ut populus reverenti illi secundi baptismatis testimonium reclamaverit: Salvum lotum: salvum lotum. Plane utique salvus erat, qui hoc modo laverat.

¹⁰⁰ Aug. de Bapt. lib. 4. c. 22. Baptismi sane vicem aliquando implere passionem, de latrone illo, cui non baptizato dictum est, Hodie mecum eris in paradiso, non leve documentum B. Cyprianus assumit.

¹⁰¹ Aug. Octogint. Quæst. lib. qu. 62. t. 4. Ineffabili potestate dominantis Dei atque justitia deputatum est etiam baptismum credenti latroni, et pro accepto habitum in animo libero, quod in corpore crucifixo accipi non poterat.

¹⁰² Aug. Quæst. in Levit. qu. 84. t. 4. Hoc et de latrone illo, cui secum crucifixo Dominus ait, Hodie mecum eris in paradiso. Neque enim sine sanctificatione invisibili tanta felicitate donatus est. Proinde colligitur invisibilem sanctificationem quibusdam affuisse atque profuisse sine visibilibus sacramentis. — Nec tamen ideo sacramentum visibile contemnendum est; nam contemptor ejus sanctificari nullo modo potest.

¹⁰³ Aug. de Civ. Dei, lib. 13. c. 7. Quicumque etiam non percepto regenerationis lavacro, pro Christi confessione moriuntur, tantum eis valet ad dimittenda peccata quantum si abluerentur sacro fonte baptismatis. It. Ep. 108. ad Seleucian. Ipsa passio pro baptismo deputata est. It. de Orig. Animæ, lib. 1. c. 9.

¹⁰⁴ Prosper. Sentent. 149.

¹⁰⁵ Id. Epigram. 88.

Fraudati non sunt sacro baptismate Christi,

Fons quibus ipsa sui sanguinis unda fuit

Et quicquid sacri fert mystica forma lavacri,

Id totum implevit gloria martyrii.

¹⁰⁶ Fulgent. de Fide ad Petrum, c. 30. Firmissime tene et nullatenus dubites, exceptis illis qui pro nomine Christi suo sanguine baptizantur, nullum hominem accepturum vitam æternam, qui non hic a malis suis fuerit per pœnitentiam fidemque conversus, et per sacramentum fidei et pœnitentiæ, id est, per baptismum liberatus. Vid. Fulgent. de Baptismo Æthiopsis, c. 8.

¹⁰⁷ Gennad. de Eccles. Dogmat. c. 74. Baptizatis tantum iter esse salutis credimus; nullum catechumenum, quanvis in bonis operibus defunctum, vitam æternam habere credimus, excepto martyrio, ubi tota baptismi sacramenta complentur.

¹⁰⁸ Constit. Apost. lib. 5. c. 6.

it, may rejoice in the Lord, and leave this life without sorrow, though he be but a catechumen; because his passion for Christ is a more genuine baptism: he really and experimentally dies with his Lord, whilst others only do it in figure. It were easy to add many other such testimonies out of St. Chrysostom,¹⁰⁹ and St. Jerom,¹¹⁰ St. Basil,¹¹¹ Gregory Nazianzen,¹¹² Cyril of Jerusalem,¹¹³ and St. Ambrose:¹¹⁴ but enough has been already said to show this to be the general sense of the ancients, that catechumens were not to be despaired of, though they died without baptism, if they were baptized in their own blood.

Nor was it only the case of martyrs they speak so favourably of, but of all other catechumens, who, whilst they were preparing for baptism by the exercises of faith, and repentance, and a pious life, were suddenly cut off, before they could have opportunity to put their desires in execution. St. Ambrose joins these two cases together, and makes them in a manner parallel. For in his funeral oration upon the younger Valentinian, who was thus snatched away before he could attain to his desired baptism, he thus makes apology for him: If any one¹¹⁵ is concerned that the holy rites of baptism were not solemnly administered to him, he may as well say, that the martyrs are not crowned, if they happen to die whilst they are only catechumens: but if the martyrs are washed in their own blood, then this man also was washed by his piety and desire of baptism. St. Austin was entirely of the same opinion, that not only martyrdom,¹¹⁶ but faith and repentance joined with a desire of baptism, was sufficient to save a man in the article of necessity, when there was otherwise no opportunity to receive it. Considering, says he, over and over again the case of the thief upon the cross, I find that not only suffering for the name of Christ may supply that which was wanting of baptism, but also faith and true conversion of heart, if want of time in extreme necessity would not suffer the sacrament of baptism to be administered. For that thief was not crucified for the name of Christ, but for the merit of his own crimes; nor did he suffer because he was a believer, but he became a believer whilst he was a suffering. Therefore his case declares how far that saying of the apostle avails, without the visible sacrament of baptism, "With the heart man believeth unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation:" but then only this invisible operation is performed, when the ministry of baptism is excluded purely by the article of necessity, and not any contempt of religion. Therefore when these writers speak in general terms of the absolute necessity of baptism, they must be allowed to interpret themselves with these two limitations and restrictions. As when St. Ambrose says,¹¹⁷ No man ascends into the kingdom of heaven, but by the sacrament of baptism, he must be understood to except martyrs, and such catechumens as were desirous of baptism, but could not have it by reason of some pressing necessity intervening to hinder it: such as was the case of Valentinian, who was slain suddenly before he had opportunity to receive it. The like interpretation must be put upon all such passages in St. Austin,¹¹⁸ Chrysostom,¹¹⁹ Cyril of Jerusalem,¹²⁰ or any others, who speak in general terms of the absolute necessity of baptism for catechumens or adult persons.

Cyprian also had a very charitable opinion concerning all such heretics and schismatics, as forsook their errors, and returned to the unity of the catholic church. For though according to his principles [who denied the validity of their baptism] none of these could be really and truly baptized, unless they were rebaptized upon their return to the church; yet if any such died in the unity of the church without being rebaptized, he did not think their condition deplorable, [though in his opinion they died without baptism,] but charitably hoped they might find mercy and favour with the Lord. For he thus answers the objection that was made against his own opinion about rebaptization: Some man will say,¹²¹ What then becomes

Sect. 21.
And by faith and repentance in such catechumens as were piously preparing for baptism.

Sect. 22.
The case of heretics returning to the unity of the church. How far charity in that case was thought to supply the want of baptism.

¹⁰⁹ Chrys. Hom. 11. in Ephes. p. 1107.

¹¹⁰ Hieron. Com. in Rom. vi. t. 9. p. 277.

¹¹¹ Basil. de Spir. Sanct. c. 15. t. 2. p. 323.

¹¹² Nazianzen. Orat. 39. in S. Lumina. t. 1. p. 634.

¹¹³ Cyril. Catech. 3. n. 7.

¹¹⁴ Ambros. de Virginib. lib. 3. p. 118.

¹¹⁵ Ambros. de Obitu Valentin. p. 12. Si quia solenniter non sunt celebrata mysteria, hoc movet: ergo nec martyres, si catechumeni fuerint, coronantur. Quod si suo abluantur sanguine, et hunc sua pietas abluit et voluntas.

¹¹⁶ Aug. de Bapt. lib. 4. c. 22. Etiam atque etiam considerans, invenio non tantum passionem pro nomine Christi id quod ex baptismo deerat, posse supplere, sed etiam fidem conversionemque cordis, si forte ad celebrandum mysterium baptismi in angustiis temporum succurri non potest. Neque enim latro ille pro nomine Christi crucifixus est, sed pro meritis facinorum suorum; nec quia credidit passus est, sed dum patitur credit. Quantum igitur valet etiam sine visibili sacramento baptismi quod ait apostolus, corde creditur ad justitiam, ore autem confessio fit ad salutem, in illo latrone declaratum est: sed tunc impletur invisibiliter, cum ministerium baptismi non contemptus religionis, sed articulus necessitatis excludit.

¹¹⁷ Ambros. de Abrah. Patriarch. lib. 2. c. 10. Nemo ascendit in regnum cælorum, nisi per sacramentum baptismatis.

¹¹⁸ Aug. de Bapt. lib. 4. c. 21.

¹¹⁹ Chrys. de Sacerdot. lib. 3. c. 5. It. Hom. 3. in Philip. p. 1224. Hom. 3. in 1 Cor. p. 347.

¹²⁰ Cyril. Catech. 3. n. 7.

¹²¹ Cypr. Ep. 73. ad Jubaian. p. 208. Sed dicit aliquis: Quid ergo fiet de his qui in præteritum de hæresi ad ecclesiam venientes, sine baptismo admissi sunt? Potens est Dominus misericordiâ suâ indulgentiam dare, et eos qui ad

of all those, who in times past came over from heresy to the church, and were admitted without baptism? The Lord, says he, is able of his mercy to grant them indulgence, and not exclude them from the gifts of his church, who are simply admitted into the church, and die in the communion of it. Firmilian, bishop of Cæsarea, delivers himself much after the same manner in answer to the same objection: What shall become of those¹²² who, returning from heretics, are admitted without the baptism of the church? If they depart out of the world, says he, in that condition, we reckon them in the number of such catechumens among us as die before they are baptized. So that in his opinion two sorts of persons might be saved without baptism, that is, catechumens in the church, and such heretics as returned to the peace and unity of the church, though, according to his sentiments, they were not baptized. St. Austin often mentions and approves this opinion of Cyprian;¹²³ nay, and urges it in favour of the church against the Donatists: for supposing the catholics did err in admitting heretics without baptism, yet they were in the number of those, whom Cyprian presumed capable of pardon for the sake of unity and charity, which covers a multitude of sins. St. Basil also, as Vossius¹²⁴ has rightly observed, seems to have been of Cyprian's opinion, that God in his mercy was able to save such schismatics as returned to the peace and unity of the church, even without baptism. For though he thought their baptism null and void, as Cyprian did, yet he advises men to comply with the custom of receiving¹²⁵ such to communion in those churches which received their baptism, rather than break the peace and unity of the church upon it. Which advice he would hardly have given, had he not thought such men in such circumstances capable of salvation by God's mercy without baptism.

I find one case more in which some of the ancients made an allowance for the want of baptism; and that was, when the church, presuming a person to have been truly baptized, (he himself bona fide presuming so too,) admitted him to communicate constantly at the altar for many years, though it appeared at last that either he had not been baptized at all, or at least with a very doubtful and suspicious baptism; yet in this case constant communicating with the church was thought to supply this defect or want of baptism. A single act of communicating, indeed, in a child, or a catechumen, happening only by some surprise or mistake, was not deemed sufficient to compensate for baptism; for in that case the canons provided, that whenever any such thing happened the party should be immediately baptized. Thus in the canonical determinations of Timothy, bishop of Alexandria, the question being put, What should be done in case a youth of seven years old, or a man that was only a catechumen, being present at the oblation, had communicated through ignorance or mistake? the answer¹²⁶ is, Let him be baptized. And so the author of the Apostolical Constitutions brings in the apostles making this decree,¹²⁷ That if any unbaptized person should, through ignorance, partake of the eucharist, they should immediately instruct and baptize him, that he might not go away a despiser. But in case a man, upon presumption of his being truly baptized, when he was not so, had been allowed to communicate with the church for many years, his communicating at the altar was thought to supersede the necessity of baptism, and such a one was allowed to continue in the church without rebaptizing. There is a famous instance in Eusebius of such a case that happened at Alexandria in the time of Dionysius, which Eusebius relates out of an epistle of Dionysius to Xystus, bishop of Rome, where he asks the bishop of Rome's advice upon it. A certain person, who for many years had assembled and communicated¹²⁸ with the church, both in his own time, and in the time of his predecessor, Heraclas, happening to be present at the baptism of some who were lately baptized, upon hearing the interrogatories and answers that are usually made in that solemnity, came to me weeping and lamenting himself, and falling down at my feet, confessed, with a most solemn protestation, that the baptism which he had received among heretics, was not like this, nor had any thing common with it, for it was full of blasphemy and impiety; and therefore he said his soul was full of trouble, and he had not confidence to lift up his eyes unto God, being initiated with such impious words and ceremonies. He prayed, therefore, that I would give him our sincere baptism, and admit him to the adoption and ecclesiam simpliciter admissi, in ecclesia dormierunt, ab ecclesiæ suæ muneribus non separare.

¹²² Firmil. Ep. 75. ap. Cyprian. p. 226. Quid ergo, inquit, fiet de his qui ab hæreticis venientes, sine ecclesiæ baptismo admissi sunt? Si de sæculo excesserunt, in eorum numero, qui apud nos catechizati quidem, sed priusquam baptizarentur obierunt, habentur.

¹²³ Aug. de Bapt. lib. 2. c. 13. Cum arbitraretur eos qui extra ecclesiæ communionem baptizarentur, baptismum non habere, credidit eos tamen in ecclesiam simpliciter admissos, propter ipsius unitatis vinculum posse ad veniam pervenire. It. lib. 5. c. 2. Bene quidem præsumpsit, quod charitas unitatis possit cooperire multitudinem peccatorum.—Nos autem si ad ecclesiam sine baptismo admittimus, in eo numero sumus quibus Cyprianus propter unitatis custodiam ignosci posse præsumpsit. It. lib. 5. c. 28. It. cont. Crescon. lib. 2. c. 33 et 35.

¹²⁴ Voss. de Baptismo, Disput. 11. p. 156.

¹²⁵ Basil. Can. Epist. c. 1.

¹²⁶ Timoth. Respons. Canon. qu. 1. ap. Bevereg. Pandect. t. 2.

¹²⁷ Constit. Apost. lib. 7. c. 25.

¹²⁸ Dionys. Epist. ad Xystum, ap. Euseb. lib. 7. c. 9.

Sect. 23.

The case of persons communicating with the church without baptism. How far that was thought to supply the want of baptism.

grace of the church. Which thing I durst not do, but told him, his communicating for so long time at the altar was sufficient to this purpose. For I durst not rebaptize one who had so often heard the solemn thanksgiving, and joined with the rest in saying Amen to it; who had stood at the Lord's table, and stretched forth his hand to receive the holy food; who had taken it and been so long used to partake of the body and blood of Christ. But I bid him be of good courage, and with a firm belief, and a good conscience, continue to partake of the holy mysteries. This was a nice resolution of a rare and singular case, and we scarce meet with such another instance in ancient history; but I have mentioned this and all the preceding cases, to show, that the ancients had not generally that rigid opinion of the absolute necessity of baptism (barring the neglect and contempt of the sacred institution) which some would father upon them; since they thought the bare want of it might be dispensed with and supplied so many several ways; either, 1. By martyrdom; or, 2. By faith and true conversion; or, 3. By an immense charity, and love of unity and peace; or, 4. By a constant partaking of the eucharist in the bosom of the church.

But it is to be observed, that these allowances were chiefly made to adult persons, who could exhibit faith and repentance, the essential parts of religion, to make some compensation for the want of the external ceremony of baptism; but as to infants, the case was thought more difficult, because there was no personal faith or repentance could be pleaded in their behalf, so that they were destitute both of the outward visible sign, and the inward spiritual grace, of baptism. Upon this account, they who spoke the most favourably of them, would only venture to assign them a middle state, neither in heaven nor hell. As Gregory Nazianzen,¹²⁹ who says, That such children as die unbaptized without their own fault, shall neither be glorified nor punished by the righteous Judge, as having done no wickedness, though they die unbaptized, and as rather suffering loss than being the authors of it. Severus, bishop of Antioch, follows Nazianzen in this opinion; for, first, he says,¹³⁰ That if children die unbaptized, without partaking of the laver of regeneration, they are certainly excluded from the kingdom of heaven; but then he adds, that forasmuch as they have committed no sin, they shall not undergo any punishment or torment, but be consigned to a sort of middle state, which he describes as a state betwixt the glory of the saints and the punishment of the damned. But this opinion of a middle state never found any acceptance among the Latins. For they make but two places to receive men after the day of judgment, heaven and hell; and concluded, that since children, for want of washing away original sin, could not be admitted into heaven, they must of necessity be in hell, there being no third place between them. St. Austin frequently insists upon this against the Pelagians, who distinguish between the kingdom of God and eternal life, asserting, that children dying unbaptized might be admitted to eternal life and salvation, though not to the kingdom of God: whom he opposes after this manner in his books about the Merits and Remission of Sin: Though, he says, the condemnation¹³¹ of those shall be greater, who to original sin add actual sins of their own; and every man's condemnation so much the greater, by how much greater sin he commits; yet original sin alone does not only separate from the kingdom of God, whither children, dying without the grace of Christ, cannot enter, as the Pelagians themselves confess; but also it excludes them from eternal life and salvation, which can be no other than the kingdom of God, into which our communion with Christ alone can introduce us. A little after¹³² he says plainly, that children dying without baptism are under condemnation, though theirs be the mildest of any other. But he is very much deceived, and deceives others, who teaches that they are in no condemnation at all, whilst the apostle declares, that "judgment was by one offence to condemnation." And again, that "by the offence of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation." He tells us,¹³³ upon this account the Punic Christians were used to call baptism by the name of salvation, and the sacrament of the body of Christ, life. And therefore, since no one could hope for salvation and eternal life without baptism and the body and blood of the Lord, it was in vain to promise children salvation without them. In the same book¹³⁴ he de-¹²⁹ Naz. Orat. 40. t. i. p. 653.

¹³⁰ Sever. Catena in Joh. iii. p. 83.

¹³¹ Aug. de Peccat. Meritis, lib. l. c. 12. Quamvis condemnatio gravior sit eorum, qui originali delicto etiam propria conjunxerunt, et tanto singulis gravior, quanto gravior quisque peccavit: tamen etiam illud solum quod originaliter tractum est, non tantum a regno Dei separatur, quo parvulos sine accepta gratia Christi intrare non posse, ipsi etiam confitentur; verum et a salute ac vita æterna facit alienos, quæ nulla alia esse potest præter regnum Dei, quo sola Christi societas introducitur.

¹³² Ibid. c. 16. Potest proinde recte dici, parvulos sine

baptismo de corpore exeuntes in damnatione omnium mitissima futuros. Multum autem et fallit et fallitur, qui eos in damnatione prædicat non futuros, dicente apostolo, Judicium ex uno delicto in condemnationem. Et paulo post, Per unius delictum in omnes homines ad condemnationem.

¹³³ Ibid. c. 24. Optime Punici Christiani baptismum ipsum nihil aliud quam salutem, et sacramentum corporis Christi, nihil aliud quam vitam vocant.—Si ergo nec salus, nec vita æterna sine baptismo, et corpore et sanguine Domini cuiquam speranda est, frustra sine his promittitur parvulis.

¹³⁴ Ibid. c. 28. Nec est ullus ulli medius locus, ut possit clares peremptorily against the doctrine of a middle state for infants or any other. There is no middle place for any, says he; he must be with the devil, who is not with Christ. For our Lord himself, intending to take away this opinion of a middle state, which some erroneously endeavour to assign to children dying unbaptized, as if by virtue of their innocence they might be in eternal life, though not with Christ in his kingdom, so long as they wanted baptism, pronounced this definitive sentence to stop the mouths of these men, saying, "He that is not with me, is against me." He argues against this middle state in many other places¹³⁵ against the Pelagians, and urges the necessity of baptism to take away original sin in children, and bring them by regeneration to eternal life: Therefore, he says, men ran with their children to be baptized, because they verily believed they could not otherwise be made alive in Christ. Fulgentius¹³⁶ is rather more peremptory and severe than St. Austin: he says, It is to be believed, without all doubt, that not only men, who are come to the use of reason, but infants, whether they die in their mother's womb, or after they are born, without baptism in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, are punished with everlasting punishment in eternal fire, because though they have no actual sin of their own, yet they carry along with them the condemnation of original sin from their first conception and birth. The author under the name of Justin Martyr,¹³⁷ also speaking of infants, says, There is this difference between those that die baptized, and those that die unbaptized, that the one obtain the benefits that come by baptism, which the other do not obtain. And the author of the Hypognostics,¹³⁸ under the name of St. Austin, who is supposed by learned men to be either Marius Mercator, or Sixtus, bishop of Rome, disputing against the Pelagians, treads exactly in the steps of St. Austin; for he says, There is no middle state between heaven and hell; a third place for unbaptized infants is no where mentioned in Scripture. This was only an invention forged in the shop of the Pelagians, to find out a place where infants might have rest and glory without the grace of Christ. These are pretty severe expressions, and yet, considering the state of the controversy between the catholics and Pelagians, there seems to have been pretty good reason for them. For Pelagius said, There was no original sin, nor any need of baptism to wash away the guilt of it, but children might obtain salvation and eternal life, distinct from the kingdom of God, without it. In opposition to this, the catholics maintained the necessity of baptism for infants, as well as adult persons, to purge away original sin, and procure eternal life for them. But they have not so plainly told us, whether there be any excepted cases as to what concerns infants, as they have concerning adult persons; whether a bare want of baptism in the child, when there was no contempt or neglect of baptism in the parent, but an unavoidable necessity and sudden death intervening, debars the child from the kingdom of heaven? Among all the ancients, only Fulgentius has declared absolutely against the salvation of infants dying before the birth in the mother's womb. But others seem to speak more favourably, except where the parents were guilty of a contempt or neglect of baptism, in not bringing their children to be baptized when they had time and opportunity to do it, in which case the child might fail of salvation for the parents' fault, and there be no impeachment of God's justice or mercy in the punishment. This seems to have been the judgment of that excellent author, who wrote the book De Vocatione Gentium, which goes under the name of Prosper or St. Ambrose. For he gives this reason, why this doctrine about the necessity of baptism for the salvation of infants was so earnestly pressed upon men, That parents might not be remiss or negligent in bringing their children to baptism; which they certainly would be, if they were once possessed with an opinion that there was no necessity of baptism to salvation. We ought not to believe, says he,¹³⁹ in general terms, that they who obtain not the sacrament of regeneration, can appertain to the society of the blessed. For every esse, nisi cum diabolo, qui non est cum Christo. Hinc et ipse Dominus volens auferre de cordibus male credentium istam nescio quam medietatem, quam conantur quidam parvulis non baptizatis tribuere, ut quasi merito innocentiae sint in vita aeterna, sed quia non sunt baptizati, non sint cum Christo in regno ejus, definitivam protulit ad haec ora obstruenda sententiam, ubi ait, Qui mecum non est, adversum me est.

¹³⁵ Aug. de Anima, lib. 1. c. 9. lib. 2. c. 12. lib. 3. c. 13. It. Epist. 28. ad Hieron.

¹³⁶ Fulgent. de Fide ad Petrum, c. 27. Firmissime tene et nullatenus dubites, non solum homines jam ratione utentes, verum etiam parvulos, qui sive in uteris matrum vivere incipiunt et ibi moriuntur, sive cum de matribus nati, sine sacramento sancti baptismatis, quod datur in nomine Patris, Filii, et Spiritus Sancti, de hoc saeculo transeunt, ignis aeterni sempiterno supplicio puniendos: quia etsi propriae actionis peccatum nullum habuerunt, originalis tamen pec-cati damnationem carnali conceptione et nativitate traxerunt. Vid. Fulgent. de Baptismo Aethiopiae, c. 8.

¹³⁷ Justin. Quaest. et Respons. ad Orthodox. qu. 56.

¹³⁸ Aug. Hypognostic. lib. 5. c. 5. Primum locum fides catholicorum divina autoritate regnum credidit esse caelorum, unde, ut dixi, non baptizatus excipitur; secundum, Gehennam, ubi omnis apostata, vel a Christi fide alienus, aeterna supplicia experietur. Tertium penitus ignoramus, imo nec esse in Scripturis Sanctis invenimus. Finge, Pelagiane, locum ex officina perversi dogmatis tui, ubi alieni a Christi gratia vitam requiei et gloriae possidere parvuli possint.

¹³⁹ Prosper. de Vocat. Gentium, lib. 2. c. 8. Neque credi fas est, eos qui regenerationis non adepti sunt sacramentum, ad ullum beatorum pertinere consortium.—Non latet quantum cordibus fidelium desidia gigneretur, si in baptizandis parvulis nihil de cujusquam negligentia, nihil de ipsorum esset mortalitate metuendum.

one must be sensible, how easily sloth and negligence would creep into the hearts of the faithful, if in the business of baptizing infants nothing was to be feared from the parents' carelessness, or the mortality of their children. This author presses the necessity of baptizing infants, as all good Christians do, upon supposition of some benefit which the parents' care may bring to the child; and contrariwise, an irreparable damage and loss which the child may sustain by the parents' default and negligence. And this is sufficient to quicken the care and watchfulness of parents, though it be allowed, that in cases of extreme necessity children may be saved without baptism. Nor is it improbable, that the ancients intended no more, though their expressions run in severe and general terms, without standing precisely to make exceptions. For it cannot be denied but that infants may be martyrs as well as adult persons; such were the children which Herod slew at Bethlechem: parents may likewise desire baptism for their children, vowing faith and repentance in their name, when some extreme necessity only, and not any culpable neglect, hinders the obtaining of it. And in such cases, if adult persons may be saved without baptism, [as all the ancients agree,] there seems to be a parity of reason to extend the same charity and indulgence to little children. Hincmar, archbishop of Rheims, a man of great reputation and learning in his time, and one well versed in the writings of the ancients, gives this solution of the whole matter upon a remarkable case that happened in his time. A certain bishop of the same country, Hincmar, bishop of Laon, had for some unjust cause hindered the baptism of infants in his diocese, when their parents or godfathers desired they might be baptized; by which means many children died without baptism. Now, the question was concerning the future state of these infants, whether the parents' desire and presenting them to baptism was sufficient for the salvation of their children? This, without any scruple, Hincmar¹⁴⁰ resolves in the affirmative, That as children, who are subject to original sin, which is the sin of other men, are saved by the faith of others, that is, their godfathers, answering for them in baptism; so those infants, who, by the command of that perverse bishop, were denied baptism, might be saved by the faith and faithful desire of their parents or godfathers, who had required both in heart and words that their children might be baptized; and this by the gift of him, whose Spirit, that is the author of regeneration, bloweth where it listeth. If we thus interpret the sense of the ancients with Hincmar, then all those passages which condemn infants dying without baptism, must be understood not of the bare want of baptism, when it could not be had, but of the parents' contempt or neglect in not desiring or procuring baptism for their children, when it was in their power to do it. I have been the longer in explaining and confirming the truth of these points concerning the necessity of baptism both for infants and adult persons, because the ancients are mistaken by some, and accused by others, as too severe in urging the necessity of baptism; when yet it appears their sentiments about it were exact enough as to what concerned the case of catechumens, and also capable of a favourable interpretation in the case of infants, if we do not over-rigidly force their general expressions beyond the true design and intentions of the authors.

I should here have put an end to this discourse concerning the institution and discipline of the catechumens, but only that there are two things that may seem to require a little more distinct handling than has been allowed them above: 1. Concerning the original, nature, and use of the ancient creeds of the church, which were chiefly drawn up for the institution and service of the catechumens, and therefore are most proper to be considered in this place. 2. Concerning that part of their discipline, which consisted in concealing from them for some time the distinct and full knowledge of some of the higher doctrines and mysterious rites of the church. The consideration of which things shall be the subject of the following chapters.

CHAPTER III.

OF THE ORIGINAL, NATURE, AND NAMES OF THE ANCIENT CREEDS OF THE CHURCH

IN speaking of the creed, it will be proper to say something, in the first place, of its several ancient names, and the reasons of them, because some of them are a little obscure, and liable to be mistaken. The most usual name of the creed was symbolum; but why it was called so, is not agreed among learned men. Baronius¹ assigns three reasons of the name: 1. He supposes every apostle cast in his symbola, his article or part, to the composition of it; and therefore it might be called their symbol or collation. But if the foundation of this supposition be

Sect. 1.
Why the creed is called symbolum.

¹⁴⁰ Hincmar. Opusc. 55. Capit. c. 48. Sicut parvulis naturali, id est, alieno peccato, obnoxiiis, aliorum, id est, patronorum fides pro eis respondentium in baptisate sit ad salutem: ita parvulis, quibus baptismum denegari jussisti, parentum vel patronorum corde credentium, et pro parvulis suis fideli verbo baptismum expetentium, sed non impetantium, fides et fidelis postulatio prodesse poterunt, dono ejus ejus Spiritus, quo regeneratio fit, ubi vult spirat.

¹ Baron. an. 44. n. 15.

uncertain, (as we shall see hereafter that it is,) this could not be the reason of the name. 2. He thinks it might be so called, because it was like the tessera militaris among the Roman soldiers, a sort of mark or badge, by which true Christians might be distinguished from infidels, or heretics. 3. Because it was a collation or epitome of the Christian doctrine. Suicerus² adds to these a fourth reason of the name. It might be so called, he thinks, not from the military badge, but the military oath or contract, which soldiers made with the emperor, when they entered into his service. For the creed is a token of the contract which we make with God at our baptism. For this he alleges the testimony of St. Ambrose,³ who calls the creed, the oath or bond of our warfare; and Petrus Chrysologus,⁴ who says, an agreement or covenant is called symbolum both in human and Divine contracts. This last signification is not improbable; but the second is more generally received and approved by modern⁵ authors, and has also the countenance of some ancient writers. For Maximus Taurinensis⁶ supposes it to be, called the symbol, because it is a sign or mark by which believers are distinguished from unbelievers and renegadoes. And Ruffinus⁷ allows this signification, when he says, It was therefore called the sign or mark, because at that time (when, according to his opinion, it was made by the apostles) many of the circumcised Jews, as is related both by St. Paul, and in the Acts of the Apostles, did feign themselves to be the apostles of Christ; and to serve their own lucre or their belly, went forth to preach; naming indeed the name of Christ, but not preaching him according to the true lines of tradition. Therefore the apostles laid down this mark or test, whereby to discern him who preached Christ truly, according to the apostolical rules. It is further reported to be a customary thing in civil wars, that because their arms, language, methods, and manner of fighting are the same, therefore every general, to prevent fraud, should give his soldiers a distinct symbol, which in Latin is called a sign or token; that if one met another, of whom he had reason to doubt, by asking him the symbol, he might discover whether he was friend or foe. But this does not satisfy a late learned writer,⁸ who thinks, "That this name was not derived from any military custom, but rather to be fetched from the sacra, or religious services of the heathens, where those who were initiated in their mysteries, and admitted to the knowledge of their peculiar services, which were hidden and concealed from the greatest part of the idolatrous multitude, had certain signs or marks, called symbola, delivered unto them, by which they mutually knew each other, and upon the declaring of them, were without scruple admitted in any temple to the secret worship and rites of that god whose symbols they had received." The use of these symbols among the heathens is abundantly proved by that learned author, both from heathen and Christian writers; but then he alleges no authority to prove that the Christians called their creed by the name of symbol, in imitation of that heathen practice: and it is some prejudice against it, that no such thing is said or hinted by any ancient writer. Neither is it very likely that the Christians would have so nice a regard to the abominable and filthy mysteries of the heathens, as to choose that signification of the name symbol for their creed, when with much more decency it might be fetched from the innocent and ordinary customs used in military affairs or civil contracts, from which it is with greater probability derived, both by ancient and modern writers.

Another usual name of the creed was κανών, the rule, so called because it was the known standard or rule of faith, by which orthodoxy and heresy were examined and judged. As when the council of Antioch⁹ says of Paulus Samosatensis, that he was an apostate from the rule, it is plain the meaning is, he had deviated in his doctrine from the creed, the rule of faith. Agreeably to this, it is commonly styled among the Greeks,¹⁰ ὄρος and ἐκδοσις πίστεως, the determination or exposition of the faith; and sometimes simply πίστις, the faith;¹¹ which answers to the Latin name, regula fidei, the rule of faith, the common appellation of it in Irenæus,¹² Tertul-

Sect. 2.
Why called canon,
and regula fidei.

² Suicer. Thesaur. Eccles. voce Σύμβολον.

³ Ambros. de Veland. Virgin. lib. 3. Symbolum cordis signaculum, et nostræ militiæ sacramentum.

⁴ Chrysolog. Hom. 62. Placitum vel pactum, quod lucri spes venientis continet, vel futuri symbolum nuncupari, contractu etiam docetur humano, &c.

⁵ Forbes, Instruct. Histor. Theolog. lib. 1. c. 1. n. 2.

⁶ Maxim. Taurin. Homil. in Symbol. p. 239. Signaculum symboli inter fideles perfidosque discernit.

⁷ Ruffin. Expos. Symboli ad calcem Cypriani, p. 17. Indicium autem vel signum idcirco dicitur, quia illo tempore, sicut et Paulus apostolus dicit, et in Actis Apostolorum refertur, multi ex circumcisis Judæis simulabant se esse apostolos Christi, et lucri alicujus vel ventris gratia ad prædicandum proficiscerentur; nominantes quidem Christum, sed non integris traditionum lineis nunciantes. Idcirco ergo istud indicium posuere, per quod agnosceretur is, qui Christum vere secundum apostolicas regulas prædicaret. Denique et in bellis civilibus hoc observari ferunt: quoniam et armorum habitus par, et sonus vocis idem, et mos unus est, atque eadem instituta bellandi, ne qua doli subreptio fiat, symbola discreta unusquisque dux suis militibus tradit; quæ latine vel signa vel indicia nominantur: ut si forte occurrerit quis de quo dubitetur, interrogatus symbolum, prodat si sit hostis, an socius.

⁸ Critical History of the Creed, p. 11.

⁹ Epist. Conc. Antioch. ap. Euseb. lib. 7. c. 30. Ἄποστασὶς τοῦ κανόνος.

¹⁰ Socrat. lib. 2. c. 39 et 40. lib. 5. c. 4.

¹¹ Theodoret. Hist. lib. 1. c. 7. ¹² Iren. lib. 1. c. 19.

lian,¹³ Novatian,¹⁴ and St. Jerom,¹⁵ where they speak of heretics, and their deviations from the common articles of the Christian faith contained in the creeds of the church.

Another ordinary appellation of the creed in the ancient Greek writers is μάθημα, the lesson, so called from the obligation the catechumens were under to learn it. This may easily be mistaken by an unwary reader for a lesson in the Bible, unless where some note of distinction is added to it. Therefore when we read in the council of Constantinople, under Mennas, that after the reading of the Gospel, in time of the communion service, the holy lesson¹⁶ was read according to custom, we are not to understand it of any other lesson out of the Bible, but of the creed, which was then made part of the communion service. And so Socrates¹⁷ sometimes uses the word: and Valesius¹⁸ has observed, that in two manuscripts of that author, where the Nicene Creed is recited, the title of mathema is set before it. But Leontius Byzantinus¹⁹ speaks more explicitly, and calls it by way of distinction, the decree or lesson of faith, speaking of the creed which the fathers of the council of Chalcedon were about to make.

Valesius²⁰ has also observed out of Socrates, that it is sometimes styled simply and absolutely γραφή and γράμμα which words, though they are usually taken to signify the Holy Scripture, yet here they must have another meaning; for the creed, properly speaking, is not an inspired writing, unless in that sense as it may be said to be collected out of the inspired writings: but here those words signify only, in a common sense, letters or learning, and so are used, as the foregoing word, mathema, with a peculiar reference to the learning of the catechumens. Some also allege Cyprian for another name, as if he called the creed peculiarly the sacrament of faith.²¹ But I am not satisfied that Cyprian's meaning is so to be restrained. For he is rather speaking in general against profaning the mysteries of religion, which include the sacraments, or any other religious rites, as well as the creed; applying that text of Scripture to his purpose, "Give not that which is holy unto dogs, neither cast ye your pearls before swine, lest they tread them under their feet, and turn again and rend you." Or if it be limited to any particular mystery, it should rather signify baptism than the creed: for baptism is sometimes called the sacrament of faith by St. Austin,²² and the sacrament of faith and repentance, by Fulgentius²³ and others, as I shall more particularly show, when I come to treat of baptism. For which reason, I do not take this to be any particular name given to the creed by any ancient writer; but the creed is the faith itself, (the credulitas, as some middle-age writers²⁴ call it,) and the sacrament of faith is baptism.

The next inquiry is into the original and nature of the ancient creeds; which will admit of three questions: I. Whether that which is commonly called the Apostles' Creed, was composed by the apostles in the same form of words as now it is used in the church? 2. Whether the apostles made or used any creeds at all for the institution of catechumens, or the administration of baptism? 3. If they did, what articles were contained in them? The first question is now generally resolved in the negative by learned men, though many both of the ancients and moderns have been of a different opinion. Some have thought that the twelve apostles in a full meeting composed the creed in the very same form of words as now it is used in the church; and others have gone so far as to pretend to tell what article was composed by every particular apostle. Dr. Comber is so positive in the matter, as to say, "We have no better medium to prove the books²⁵ were written by those authors whose names they bear, than the unanimous testimony of antiquity; and by that we can abundantly prove the apostles were the authors of this creed." For this he cites Clemens Romanus, Irenæus, Origen, Tertullian, Ruffinus, Ambrose, Austin, Jerom, Pope Leo, Maximus Taurinensis, Cassian, and Isidore. But none of these writers, except Ruffinus,

Sect. 4.
Why called γράμμα and γραφή.

Sect. 5.
Whether that which is commonly called the Apostles' Creed, was composed by the apostles in the present form of words?

¹³ Tertul. de Præscript. c. 13. Regula est autem fidei, qua creditur unum omnino Deum esse, &c. It. de Veland. Virgin. c. 1. Regula autem fidei unum omnino est, sola immobilis et irreformabilis, credendi scilicet in unicum Deum omnipotentem, &c.

¹⁴ Novatian. de Trinit. c. 1 et 9. Regula veritatis.

¹⁵ Hieron. Ep. 54. ad Marcellam, cont. Errores Montani. Primum in fidei regula discrepamus, &c.

¹⁶ Conc. C. P. sub Menna, Act. 5. t. 5. p. 181. Τοῦ ἁγίου μαθήματος κατὰ τὸ σύνθηρες λεχθέντος.

¹⁷ Socrat. Hist. lib. 3. c. 25. Τὰ λοιπὰ τοῦ μαθήματος. Usser. de Symbolis, p. 20, shows the same out of Justinian, Maxentius, and Photius.

¹⁸ Vales. Not. in Socrat. lib. 1. c. 8.

¹⁹ Leont. de Sectis. Act. 6. p. 515. Ἐδοξεν αὐτοῖς ὡστε ὄρον πίστεως καὶ μάθημα ποιῆσαι.

²⁰ Vales. Not. in Theodor. Hist. lib. 1. c. 8.

²¹ Cypr. Testim. ad Quirin. lib. 3. c. 50. Sacramentum fidei non esse prophanandum.—Ne dederitis sanctum canibus, &c.

²² Aug. Ep. 23. ad Bonifac. Sicut secundum quandam modum sacramentum corporis Christi corpus Christi est, sacramentum sanguinis Christi sanguis Christi est, ita sacramentum fidei fides est.

²³ Fulgent. de Fide ad Petrum, c. 30. Per sacramentum fidei et pœnitentiæ, id est, per baptismum liberatus.

²⁴ Vid. Herardi Turonensis Capitul. 140. ap. Wharton. Auctarium Historiæ Dogmaticæ Usseerij, p. 368. Gloria Patri, ac sanctus, atque credulitas, et Kyrie Eleison a cunctis reverenter canatur. It. Edictum Reccaredi Regis ad calceum Concilii Toletani tertij.

²⁵ Comber's Companion to the Temple, p. 132.

speak home to his purpose; but only say, the creeds in general are of apostolical institution: which, for the substance, no one denies; for they speak of several forms, and yet ascribe them all to the apostles; which is an argument they did not mean this particular form any more than others. For the Nicene Creed is often called the Apostles' Creed; and yet no one believes that that Creed was composed totidem verbis by the apostles. Ruffinus indeed seems to say, there was an ancient tradition, that the apostles, being about to depart from Jerusalem,²⁸ first settled a rule for their future preaching; lest, after they were separated from one another, they should expound different doctrines to those whom they invited to the Christian faith. Wherefore being all assembled together, and filled with the Holy Ghost, they composed this short rule of their preaching, each one contributing his sentence, and left it as a rule to be given to all believers. And for this reason, he thinks, it might be called the symbol, because that word in Greek signifies both a test and a collation of opinions together. The author²⁷ under the name of St. Austin is a little more particular in the story; for he pretends to tell us what article was put in by each particular apostle: Peter said, "I believe in God, the Father Almighty." John, "Maker of heaven and earth." James, "and in Jesus Christ, his only Son, our Lord." Andrew added, "who was conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary." Philip said, "suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, dead, and buried." Thomas, "He descended into hell; the third day he rose again from the dead." Bartholomew, "He ascended into heaven, and sitteth at the right hand of God the Father Almighty." Matthew, "From thence he shall come to judge the quick and the dead." James, the son of Alphæus, added, "I believe in the Holy Ghost, the holy catholic church." Simon Zelotes, "the communion of saints, the forgiveness of sins." Jude, the brother of James, "the resurrection of the body." Matthias, "life everlasting."

But now there is an insuperable difficulty lies against this tradition, which is this, that there are two or three articles here mentioned, which are known not to have been in this Creed for three or four ages at least. For Ruffinus himself tells us, The descent into hell was neither in the Roman²⁸ Creed, which is that we call the Apostles' Creed, nor yet in any creed of the Eastern churches; only the sense of it might be said to be couched in that other expression, he was buried. Bishop Usher and Bishop Pearson have demonstrated the truth of this observation by a particular induction from all the ancient creeds, and showed this article to be wanting in them all for four hundred years, except the Creed of Aquileia, which Ruffinus expounds, and the Creed of the council of Ariminum, mentioned in Socrates.²⁹ Others have made the same observation upon the article concerning the communion of saints, which is not to be found either in the Creed of Aquileia, or any ancient Greek or Latin creed for above the space of four hundred years. Nor is the article of "the life everlasting" expressly mentioned in many creeds, but only inclusively contained in "the resurrection of the body;" which is the concluding article in many ancient creeds. These are plain demonstrations, without any other argument, that the creed, as it stands in the present form, could not be composed in the manner as is pretended by the apostles. The silence of The Acts of the Apostles about any such composition, is a collateral evidence against it. The silence of ecclesiastical writers for above three whole centuries, is a further confirmation. The variety of creeds, in so many different forms, used by the ancients, yet extant in their writings, some with omissions, others with additions, and all in a different phrase, are no less evident proofs, that one universal form had not been pitched upon and prescribed to the whole church by the apostles. For then it is scarce to be imagined, that any church should have received any other form in the least tittle varying from it. These reasons do now generally satisfy learned men, that no such precise form was composed, according to that pretended tradition, by all the apostles. The reader may find dissertations in Vossius,³⁰ Bishop Usher,³¹ Hammond L'Estrange,³² Basnagius,³³ Suicerus,³⁴ and the learned author of the late Critical History of the Creed,³⁵ to this purpose. And it is much to be ²⁸ Ruffin. Expos. Symboli, ad calcem Cypriani, p. 17. Discessuri itaque ab invicem, normam prius futuræ sibi prædicationis in commune constituunt: ne forte alius ab alio abducti, diversum aliquid his qui ad fidem Christi invitabantur, exponerent. Omnes ergo in uno positi, et Spiritu Sancto repleti, breve istud futuræ sibi, ut diximus, prædicationis indicium, conferendo in unum quod sentiebat unusquisque, componunt; atque hanc credentibus dandam esse regulam statuunt. Symbolum autem hoc multis et justissimis causis appellare voluerunt. Symbolum enim Græce et indicium dici potest, et collatio, hoc est, quod plures in unum conferunt.

²⁷ Aug. de Tempore, Ser. 115. al. 92. in Append. t. 10. p. 675.

²⁸ Ruffin. Expos. Symboli, p. 22. Sciendum sane est, quod in ecclesiæ Romanæ symbolo non habetur additum, Descendit ad inferna, sed neque in Orientis ecclesiis habetur hic sermo; vis tamen verbi eadem videtur esse in eo quod sepultus dicitur.

²⁹ Socrat. lib. 2. c. 37. ³⁰ Voss. de tribus Symbolis.

³¹ Usser. de Symbolo Romano.

³² L'Estrange, Alliance of Divin. Offic. chap. 3. p. 80.

³³ Basnag. Critic. in Baron. p. 471.

³⁴ Suicer. Thesaur. Eccles. voce Σύμβολον. t. 2. p. 1092.

³⁵ Critical Hist. of the Creed, chap. 1. p. 27. See also Bishop Bull's Judicium Ecclesiæ Cathol. &c. cap. 5. n. 3, where he refers to Vossius as having abundantly proved this thesis.

wondered at, that any knowing person, against such convincing evidence, should labour to maintain the contrary, upon no better grounds than only this, that the ancients agree in calling the creed apostolical. For they do not always intend this particular form, but call all other forms apostolical, the Nicene Creed, the Constantinopolitan Creed, the Eastern Creeds, the Western Creeds, and all others which agree with this in substance, though not in method or expression, and are all equally apostolical, as being all derived from the apostles' preaching, and for substance composed by them, and some of them perhaps left in the churches where they preached, as the first rudiments of this creed seem to have been in the Roman church. So far all the ancient catholic creeds may be said to be apostolical, as being in substance the same with the creeds used in baptism by the apostles.

Sect. 6.
That probably the apostles used several creeds differing in form, not in substance.

By all, then, that has hitherto been said, I intend not to insinuate, that the apostles used no creeds at all, but rather that they used many, differing in form, but not in substance, from one another. All that I contend for, is only this, that none of the present forms are exactly the same in expression with those of the apostles, which is demonstrated from the variety of creeds used in several churches, and from the addition of some words to that creed which pretends most to be apostolical. But though the apostles composed no one creed to be of perpetual and universal use for the whole church, yet it is not to be doubted but that they used some forms in admitting catechumens to baptism. There are many expressions in Scripture that favour this, particularly Philip's questions to the eunuch before he baptized him, and St. Peter's interrogatories, or the answer of a good conscience towards God, which was used in baptism: and the constant practice of the church, in imitation of the apostles, admitting none to baptism but by answer to such interrogatories, is a sufficient demonstration of the apostolical practice. But then, as the church used a liberty of expression in her several creeds, so it is not improbable the apostles did the same, without tying themselves to any one form, who had less need to do it, being all guided by inspiration. And hence it came to pass, that there being no one certain form of a creed prescribed universally to all churches, every church had liberty to frame their own creeds, as they did their own liturgies, without being tied precisely to any one form of words, so long as they kept to the analogy of faith and doctrine at first delivered by the apostles: which seems to be the true reason of so many ancient forms, differing in words, not in substance.

But now the grand question still remains, concerning the nature, substance, and extent of the apostolical creeds, that is, what articles were contained in them? Some there are who would confine these to very narrow bounds, making them at first to be no more than what is contained expressly in the form of baptism, "I believe in God the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost." So Episcopus³⁶ and his followers, who would persuade the world, that for the three first ages, the doctrine of our Saviour's Divinity was no necessary article of the Christian faith. But the learned Bishop Bull,³⁷ and Dr. Grabe,³⁸ have judiciously refuted these pretences; the one, by showing from all the ancient creeds, that this doctrine was a necessary article before the Nicene council; and the other, by evincing from Scripture, that the lineaments of the Apostles' Creed used in the administration of baptism, were at the first much larger than what Episcopus pretended; and that in the apostles' age, either by their authority or permission, the creed consisted of all the present articles, except only those two, of the descent into hell, and the communion of saints, which are owned to be of later admission. Mr. Basnage³⁹ indeed has a peculiar opinion, that the creed was composed and the chief articles inserted only in the second century, in opposition to several heresies, which then began to infest the church. The Gnostics brought in the doctrine of a two-fold deity, the one good, the other evil: against this pestilent heresy, the church put that article into her creed, "I believe in God," or, in one God. Menander, the disciple of Simon Magus, asserted, that the world was not created by God, but by angels: this occasioned the church to insert those words, "Maker of heaven and earth." Carpocrates taught, that Jesus was a mere man, and begotten of both sexes, as other men: in opposition to whom, it was inserted, that Christ was "conceived by the Holy Ghost." The Basilidians did not believe Jesus was crucified by the Jews, but only Simon of Cyrene: to confute whom, they put in those words, "He was dead and buried." Carpocrates rejected the resurrection of the flesh: and upon that, "I believe the resurrection of the flesh," was added to the creed. Thus, if we will hearken to this learned person, there was no creed at all made by the apostles, but it was composed entirely by the church, and gradually augmented, only as the rise of sects and heresies required some opposition to be made to them. The learned author of the late Critical History of the Creed goes the same way, only with this difference, that he supposes (what Mr. Basnage does not) that some articles were inserted by the apostles themselves, and others su-

Sect. 7.
What articles were contained in the apostolical creeds.

³⁶ Episcop. Institut. lib. 4. sect. 2. cap. 31.

³⁷ Bull. Judic. Eccles. Cathol. &c. cap. 6.

³⁸ Grabe, Annotata ad cap. 5, 6, et 7. ejusd. p. 61.

³⁹ Basnage, Exercit. in Baron. p. 476.

peradded by the church, as the occasion of heresies required. But when he speaks of the particular articles, he falls in with Mr. Basnage's notion about the chiefest; for he supposes the first article, "I believe in one God," not to be made against the polytheism of the Gentiles by the apostles, but only by the church, upon the rise of the heresies of the Valentianians, Cerdonians, Marcionites, and others in after ages. Which in effect is to say, the creed was made, and not made by the apostles; for if the principal articles were not composed by them, I see not what else can entitle them to have been the authors of it. And therefore I much more readily subscribe to the opinion of the learned Dr. Grabe, which he maintains against this learned person, that the article of "one God the Father, Maker of heaven and earth," was originally inserted into the creed by the apostles, against the capital error of the Gentiles, who made one god to have power over heaven, another over the earth, another over the sea, &c., and divided the divine honour among them. For so the vulgar among the heathen practised their idolatry; however, the philosophers among them might be a little more refined in their theology, and have more agreeable notions of the unity of the supreme God. Therefore it is reasonable to believe this first article was inserted, to make men renounce in their baptism this erroneous opinion of the Gentiles.

The opinion of Episcopius, that nothing more was originally in the creed about our Saviour, but only the bare title of the Son, is solidly refuted by Dr. Grabe, who proves from Scripture, that he had always this title with the addition of his being the Son of God: and that those other articles, "He was crucified, dead, and buried; that he rose again, and ascended into heaven, and sat at the right hand of God, and from thence should come to judge the quick and dead," were all original articles of the creed; being such doctrines as the apostles chiefly taught their catechumens, and such as the Jews and Gentiles either denied or ridiculed: and therefore it was proper to make all new converts, at their entrance on Christianity, make a particular profession of such articles, in opposition to their former errors, whether they came over from the Jews or Gentiles. Upon this account he also rejects the opinion of the author of the Critical History, who supposes the article of the ascension of Christ into heaven, to have been added to the creed only in the second century, and that in opposition to Apelles, one of Marcion's disciples, who denied the ascension of Christ's flesh into heaven. But if it had been designed against him, it would no doubt have been more particularly expressed, that his flesh ascended into heaven, as Dr. Grabe observes it is in Irenæus, and not barely that Christ ascended into heaven. For the same reason he concludes, that the following articles, of his session at God's right hand, and his coming to judge the quick and the dead, could not be inserted into the creed in opposition to the Marcionites and Gnostics, as the forementioned author supposes; for then they would have been more precisely worded against their reigning tenets, which were, that Christ's flesh was void of sense in heaven, and that Christ was not the Son of that God who is the Judge of the world: wherefore it is more reasonable to suppose those articles were originally inserted by the apostles, to correct the ignorance and errors of the Jews and Gentiles.

As to those two articles, "He was conceived by the Holy Ghost, and born of the Virgin Mary," Dr. Grabe makes some question whether they were as ancient as the former, because they do not appear in the common catechetical discourses of the apostles, but he thinks, before St. John's death they were inserted against the heresies of Carpocrates, Ebion, and Cerinthus, who denied both articles, and asserted, that Christ was born of Joseph and Mary, after the common way of mankind.

The article of the Holy Ghost was always a part of the Apostles' Creed, by the confession of Episcopius himself. And therefore the opinion of those who maintain, that nothing more was required of catechumens before baptism, but only the profession of their faith in Jesus Christ as the Son of God, is wholly to be rejected.

The article of "remission of sins" was also originally in the apostolical creeds, because it always appears to have been one principal point of their catechetical institutions. And therefore the opinion of the learned author of the Critical History, that it was only in some creeds, but not in all, till the rise of the Novatian heresy, is also to be rejected; because it appears from Cyprian, that it was in the creed which the Novatians themselves made use of in baptism.

The articles of "the resurrection of the dead, and life everlasting," are also concluded to have been in the Apostles' Creed, if not from the very first, yet at least when St. Paul wrote his Epistle to the Hebrews, because he there mentions "the resurrection of the dead," and "eternal judgment," among the fundamental doctrines of the Christian faith, Heb. vi. 2.

The article of "the church," Dr. Grabe thinks, was not originally in the creed, but added in the latter end of the first century, or beginning of the second, upon occasion of heretics and schismatics separating from the church. At least it appears from Tertullian's book De Baptismo,⁴⁰ that the profession of it was required in his time, of catechumens at their baptism. For he says, after they had testified their faith in the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, they also added the church, because where those three were, there was the church, and it was the body of the three.

⁴⁰ Tertul. de Bapt. cap. 6. Cum sub tribus et testatio fidei et sponsio salutis pignorentur necessariò adjicitur ecclesiæ mentio; quoniam ubi tres, id est, Pater, Filius, et Spiritus Sanctus, ibi ecclesia, quæ trium corpus est.

The article of "the communion of saints," he readily acknowledges, was never in any creed before the fourth century. And that concerning the descent into hell, was not originally in the creed, but added upon occasion of heretics in after ages. But the precise time of its addition is not exactly agreed upon between the author of the Critical History and Dr. Grabe. The former (who is allowed to have explained the genuine sense of this article with as great exactness as the most consummate divine) supposes it to have been added against the Arians and Apollinarians, (who denied the soul or spirit of Christ,) because the fathers argued thus against them: Christ descended into hell either in his Divinity, or his soul, or his body: but it is absurd to ascribe the descent into hell either to his Divinity or his body; and therefore it must be his soul that descended; which proves the reality of his soul. But Dr. Grabe thinks this article was of earlier date, because it is to be found in some of the Arian creeds themselves, and others, more ancient than the Apollinarians: and that if it had been inserted against the Apollinarian doctrine, it would not have been barely said, "he descended into hell;" but rather, he descended by his soul into hell; which had been directly against that heresy. Therefore he rather supposes it to have been added to the creed in opposition to the Valentinians and Marcionites, who, according to the account given by Irenæus⁴¹ and Tertullian,⁴² pretended, that the souls of all that died of their sects went immediately to heaven; when yet Christ himself went into the state and place of separate souls for three days before his resurrection and ascension.

Upon the whole matter, Dr. Grabe concludes, that all the articles of the creed, except these three, the communion of saints, the church, and the descent of Christ into hell, were solemnly professed by the first Christians, in their confessions of faith in the apostles' days, by their authority, or at least, their approbation; for which reason, the creed, as to those parts of it, may properly be called apostolical. And it could hardly be, that all churches in the world should so unanimously agree in the common confession of so many articles of it, unless it had proceeded from some such authority as they all acknowledged. But the reason why the confessions of particular churches differed in words and phrases, he thinks was from hence, that the creed which the apostles delivered, was not written with paper and ink, but in the fleshy tables of the heart, as St. Jerom words it.⁴³ Whence every church was at liberty to express their sense in their own terms. But he will not undertake to vindicate the common tradition of Ruffinus, that it was made by joint consent of all the apostles, when they were about to separate from one another; and much less, that every one of the twelve apostles cast in his symbol to complete the number of twelve articles, as the other story is told by the author under the name of St. Austin, which he thinks is not in the least to be regarded. I have been a little more particular in representing the sense of this great man upon this point, both because his account of the original of the several articles of the creed seems to be most exact, and because the discourse where he delivers his opinion may not yet be fallen into the hands of every ordinary reader.

CHAPTER IV.

A COLLECTION OF SEVERAL ANCIENT FORMS OF THE CREED OUT OF THE PRIMITIVE RECORDS OF THE CHURCH.

I SHALL NOW in the next place present the reader with several of the ancient forms of the creed, as we find them preserved in the most ancient writers, and the most authentic primitive records of the church. The use of these will be, not only to illustrate and confirm what has been said in the last chapter, but also to declare what was the ancient faith of the church, and show the vanity of modern heretics, especially the Arians, who pretend that the doctrine of our Saviour's Divinity was no necessary article of faith before the council of Nice. Bishop Usher, in his curious tract De Symbolo Romano, has already collected a great many of these ancient forms; but because that piece is written in Latin, and become very scarce, and some things more may be added to it, I will here oblige the English reader with a new account of them, beginning with the fragments of the creed which we have in Irenæus, Origen, Cyprian, Tertullian, and other private writers, which Bishop Usher gives no account of. Some fancy the creed may be found in the writings of Ignatius, Clemens Romanus, Polycarp, and Justin Martyr: but Bishop Pearson¹ has rightly observed, That these writers, however they may incidentally mention some articles of faith, do not formally deliver any rule of faith used in their own times. The

Sect. 1.
The fragments of the creed in Irenæus.

⁴¹ Irenæus, lib. 5. c. 31.

⁴² Tertul. de Anima, cap. 55.

⁴³ Hieron. Ep. 61. ad Pammach. c. 9.

¹ Pearson's Exposition of the Creed, Article 5. Initio.

first that speaks of this is Irenæus, who calls it the unalterable canon² or rule of truth, which every man received at his baptism. And he immediately declares what it was in these words: The church, though it be dispersed over all the world,³ from one end of the earth to the other, received from the apostles and their disciples the belief in one God, the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven, and earth, and sea, and all things in them; and in one Christ Jesus, the Son of God, who was incarnate for our salvation; and in the Holy Ghost, who preached by the prophets the dispensations [of God], and the advent, and nativity of a virgin, and passion, and resurrection from the dead, and bodily ascension of the flesh of his beloved Son Christ Jesus our Lord into heaven, and his coming again from heaven in the glory of the Father, to recapitulate all things, and raise the flesh of all mankind; that, according to the will of the invisible Father, every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in the earth, and things under the earth, to Jesus Christ, our Lord, and God, and Saviour, and King, and that every tongue should confess to him; and that he may exercise just judgment upon all, and send spiritual wickednesses, and the transgressing and apostate angels, with all ungodly, unrighteous, lawless, and blaspheming men, into everlasting fire; but grant life to all righteous and holy men, that keep his commandments and persevere in his love, some from the beginning, others after repentance, on whom he confers immortality, and invests them with eternal glory. This faith, he says, was the same in all the world; men professed it with one heart and one soul: for though there were different dialects in the world, yet the power of the faith was one⁴ and the same. The churches in Germany had no other faith or tradition than those in Iberia or Spain, or those among the Celtæ, that is, France, or in the East, or in Egypt, or in Libya, or in the middle parts of the world, by which he means Jerusalem and the adjacent churches, which were reckoned to be in the midst of the earth. But as one and the same sun enlightened all the world; so the preaching of this truth shined all over, and enlightened all men that were willing to come to the knowledge of truth. Nor did the most eloquent ruler of the church say any more than this, [for no one was above his Master,] nor the weakest diminish any thing of this tradition. For the faith being one and the same, he that said most of it, could not enlarge it, nor he that said least, take any thing from it.

The reader will easily perceive, that Irenæus, by this one faith, did not mean the express form of words now used in the Apostles' Creed; for his words differ much in expression from that, though in sense and substance it be the same faith, and that which was then preached and taught over all the churches.

There is another such form of apostolical doctrine collected by Origen in Sect. 2. The creed of Origen. his books of Christian Principles,⁵ where he thus delivers the rule of faith: The things which are manifestly handed down by the apostolical preaching, are these: first, That there is one God, who created and made all things, and caused the whole universe to exist out of nothing; the God of all the just that ever were from the first creation and foundation of all; the God of Adam, Abel, Seth, Enos, Enoch, Noe, Sem, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, the twelve patriarchs, Moses and the prophets: and that this God, in the last days, as he had promised before by his prophets, sent our Lord Jesus Christ, first to call Israel, and then the Gentiles, after the infidelity of his people Israel. This just and good God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, gave both the law and the prophets, and the Gospels, being the God of the apostles, and of the Old and New Testament. The next article is, That Jesus Christ, who came into the world, was begotten of the Father before every creature, who, ministering to his Father in the creation of all things, ["for by him all things were made,"] in the last times made himself of no reputation, and became man: he who was God, was made flesh; and when he was man, he continued the same God that he was before. He assumed a body in all things like ours, save only that it was born of a virgin by the Holy Ghost.

² Iren. lib. 1. c. 1. p. 41.

³ Ibid. cap. 2. p. 45.

⁴ Ibid. c. 3.

⁵ Origen. περὶ ἀρχῶν, in Præfat. t. 1. p. 665. Species vero eorum, quæ per prædicationem apostolicam manifeste traduntur, istæ sunt. Primo quod unus Deus est, qui omnia creavit atque composuit, quique ex nullis fecit esse universa; Deus a prima creatura et conditione mundi omnium justorum, Deus Adam, Abel, Seth, Enos, Enoch, Noe, Sem, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, 12 patriarcharum, Moysi et prophetarum: et quod hic Deus in novissimis diebus, sicut per prophetas suos ante promiserat, visit Dominum nostrum Jesum Christum, primo quidem vocaturum Israel, secundo etiam Gentes post perditionem populi Israel. Hic Deus justus et bonus, Pater Domini nostri Jesu Christi, legem et prophetas et Evangelia dedit, qui et apostolorum Deus est, et Veteris et Novi Testamenti. Tum deinde quia Jesus Christus ipse qui venit, ante omnem creaturam natus ex Patre est. Qui cum in omnium conditione Patri ministrasset (per ipsum enim omnia facta sunt) novissimis temporibus seipsum exinaniens homo factus est: incarnatus est cum Deus esset, et homo mansit quod Deus erat. Corpus assumpsit nostro corpori simile, eo solo differens quod natum ex Virgine de Spiritu Sancto est. Et quoniam hic Jesus Christus natus, et passus est in veritate et non per imaginem communem hanc mortem, vere mortuus est; vere enim a mortuis resurrexit, et post resurrectionem conversatus cum discipulis suis, assumptus est. Tum deinde honore ac dignitate Patri et Filio sociatum tradiderunt Spiritum Sanctum, &c.

And because this Jesus Christ was born, and suffered death, common to all, in truth, and not only in appearance, he was truly dead; for he rose again truly from the dead, and after his resurrection conversed with his disciples, and was taken up into heaven. They also delivered unto us, that the Holy Ghost was joined in the same honour and dignity with the Father and the Son.

Thus far Origen speaks of the principal articles of the Christian faith, as handed down by the church from the preaching of the apostles. And there goes another book under his name, written by way of dialogue against the Marcionites, where he more succinctly delivers the catholic faith, in opposition to the false principles of those heretics: "I believe there is one God,⁶ the Creator and Maker of all things; and one that is from him, God the Word, who is consubstantial with him and co-eternal, who in the last times took human nature upon him of the [Virgin] Mary, and was crucified, and raised again from the dead. I believe also the Holy Ghost, who exists to all eternity." It is true, learned men are not certainly agreed who was the true author of those dialogues: Westenius, who first published them in Greek, ascribes them to Origen; but Huetius makes one Maximus the author, who lived, as he conjectures, in the time of Constantine. But whoever was the author, they contain a form of a very orthodox creed, for which reason I have given it a place in this collection.

Next after Origen, we find some parts of the ancient creed in Tertulian, who speaks of it as the rule of faith common to all Christians. There is, says he, one rule⁷ of faith only, which admits of no change or alteration; that which teaches us to believe in one God Almighty, the Maker of the world, and in Jesus Christ his Son, who was born of the Virgin Mary, crucified under Pontius Pilate, the third day

⁶ Origen, Cont. Marc. Dial. 1. p. 815. t. 2. Edit. Latin. Basil. 1571.

⁷ Tertul. de Veland. Virgin. cap. 1. Regula quidem fidei una omnino est, sola immobilis et irreformabilis, credendi scilicet in unicum Deum Omnipotentem, mundi Conditorem, et Filium ejus Jesum Christum, natum ex Virgine Maria, crucifixum sub Pontio Pilato, tertia die resuscitatum a mortuis, receptum in cœlis, sedentem nunc ad dexteram Patris, venturum judicare vivos et mortuos, per carnis etiam resurrectionem.

⁸ Id. de Præscript. advers. Hæreticos, cap. 13. Regula est autem fidei, illa scilicet qua creditur, unum omnino Deum esse, nec alium præter mundi conditorem, qui universa de nihilo produxerit, per Verbum suum primo omnium emissum. Id Verbum Filium ejus appellatum, in nomine Dei varie visum patriarchis, in prophetis semper auditum, postremo delatum ex Spiritu Dei Patris et virtute in Virginem Mariam, carnem factum in utero ejus, et ex ea natum hominem et esse Jesum Christum: exinde prædicasse novam legem, et novam promissionem regni cœlorum, virtutes fecisse: fixum cruci: tertia die resurrexisse: in cœlos ereptum sedere ad dexteram Patris: misisse vicariam vim arose again from the dead, received into heaven, and sitteth now at the right hand of God, who shall come again to judge both the quick and the dead, by the resurrection of the flesh.

In his book of Prescriptions⁸ against Heretics he has another form not much unlike this: The rule of faith is that whereby we believe one God only, and no other beside, the Maker of the world, who produced all things out of nothing, by his Word which he sent forth before all things. This Word was called his Son, who at sundry times appeared to the patriarchs, and always spake by the prophets, and at last descended into the Virgin Mary by the power and Spirit of God the Father, and was made flesh in her womb, and born of her a man, Jesus Christ; who preached a new law, and a new promise of the kingdom of heaven; who wrought miracles, and was crucified, and the third day arose again, and was taken into heaven, and sitteth at the right hand of the Father; whence he sent the power of the Holy Ghost in his stead, to guide them that believe: who shall come again with glory, to take the saints into the possession and fruition of eternal life and the heavenly promises, and to condemn the profane to everlasting fire, having first raised both the one and the other by the resurrection of the flesh. This rule, he says, was instituted by Christ himself,⁹ and there were no disputes in the church about it, but such as heresies brought in, or such as made heretics. To know nothing beyond this, was to know all things.

In his book against Praxeas he repeats the same creed, with a little variation of expression: We believe in one God,¹⁰ yet under this dispensation, which we call the economy, That that one God hath a Son, which is his Word, who proceeded from him, by whom all things were made, and without whom nothing was made. We believe that he was Spiritus Sancti, qui credentes agat: venturum cum claritate ad sumendos sanctos in vitæ æternæ et promissorum cœlestium fructum, et ad prophanos judicandos igni perpetuo, utriusque partis resuscitatione cum carnis resurrectione.

⁹ Ibid. cap. 14. Hæc regula a Christo instituta, nullas habet apud nos quæstiones, nisi quas hæreses inferunt et quæ hæreticos faciunt.—Nihil ultra scire, omnia scire est.

¹⁰ Tertul. advers. Prax. cap. 2. Unicum quidem Deum credimus, sub hac tamen dispensatione, quam οἰκονομίαν dicimus, ut unci Dei sit et Filius Sermo ipsius, qui ex ipso processerit, per quem omnia facta sunt, et sine quo factum est nihil. Hunc missum a Patre in virginem, et ex ea natum hominem et Deum, Filium hominis et Filium Dei, et cognominatum Jesum Christum. Hunc passum, hunc mortuum, et sepultum secundum Scripturas, resuscitatum a Patre, et in cœlos resumptum, sedere ad dexteram Patris, venturum judicare vivos et mortuos. Qui exinde miserit secundum promissionem suam a Patre Spiritum Sanctum Paracletum, sanctificatorem fidei eorum qui credunt in Patrem et Filium et Spiritum Sanctum. Hanc regulam ab initio evangelii decucurrisse, &c. Confer. Tertul. de Bapt. cap. 6 et 11.

sent by the Father to be born of a virgin, both man and God, the Son of man and the Son of God, and that he was called Jesus Christ. That he suffered, and was dead and buried according to the Scriptures; that he was raised again by the Father, and taken up again into heaven, where he sits at the right hand of the Father, and shall come again to judge the quick and dead. From whence also he sent from his Father, according to his promise, the Holy Ghost the Comforter, who sanctifies the faith of those that believe in the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. This faith, he says, was the rule of believing from the beginning of the gospel, and the antiquity of it was sufficiently demonstrated from the novelty of heresies, which were but of yesterday's standing in comparison of it.

Now, it is easy to observe, that Tertullian here speaks not of any certain form of words, but of the substance of the faith: for some articles, as the descent into hell, and the communion of saints, are not here expressly mentioned, though they may be implied; but the articles of the Trinity, the incarnation, &c., are both expressed and carefully explained in such a manner, as shows the necessity of an explicit faith in those points, and how the doctrine of our Saviour's Divinity was a prime article of the creed from the very foundation of the church.

Next after Tertullian we have some Sect. 4. The fragments of the creed in Cyprian. remains of the use of the creed in Cyprian: he says, Both the catholics and Novatians agreed in the same form of interrogatories, which they always proposed to catechumens at their baptism; some of which were these questions in particular, Whether they believed in God¹¹ the Father, and in Christ his Son, and in the Holy Ghost? And, whether they believed the remission of sins and life eternal was to be obtained by the holy church? For though, as he observes, the Novatians did but falsify and prevaricate, as it were, in these questions; there being no true church among them to grant remission of sins; yet, however, they observed the same form of words as the church did in her creed, and put the same questions to all that came to them for baptism. Cyprian repeats this in another epistle, which is written in the name of the council of Carthage¹² to the bishops of Numidia, where mention is made of the same interrogatories, as generally used in the administration of baptism. From whence it appears, that not only the articles of the Trinity, but those other which relate to the church, and remission of sins, and eternal life, were parts of the creed used in Cyprian's time in all the African churches. And except the descent into hell, and the communion of saints, (which are of later date in the creed than the times of Cyprian or Tertullian,) all the other articles are taken notice of by these two primitive writers.

¹¹ Cypr. Ep. 69. al. 76. ad Magnum, p. 183. Quod si aliquis illud opponat, ut dicat, eandem Novatianum legem tenere, quam catholica ecclesia teneat, eodem symbolo quo et nos baptizare; eundem nôsse Deum Patrem, eundem Filium Christum, eundem Spiritum Sanctum, ac propter hoc usurpare eum potestatem baptizandi posse, quod videatur in interrogatione baptismi a nobis non discrepare: sciat quisquis hoc opponendum putat, primum non esse unam nobis et schismaticis symboli legem, neque eandem interrogationem: nam cum dicunt, Credis remissionem peccatorum et vitam æternam per sanctam ecclesiam, mentiuntur

Not long after Cyprian lived Gregory, bishop of Neocæsarea, commonly Sect. 5. The creed of Gregory Thaumaturgus. called Thaumaturgus. Among his works, published by Gerhard Vossius of Tongres, we have a creed which he composed for the use of his own church, or rather, as Gregory Nyssen reports in his Life, a creed which he received in the entrance on his ministry by a vision from heaven. The form is in these¹³ words: "There is one God, the Father of the living Word, the subsisting Wisdom and Power, the eternal express image of God, who is a perfect begetter of a perfect, a Father of an only begotten Son. And one Lord, One of One, God of God, the character and image of the Godhead, the Word of power, the Wisdom that comprehends the whole system of the world, the Power that made every creature. The true Son of the true Father, invisible of invisible, incorruptible of incorruptible, immortal of immortal, eternal of eternal. And one Holy Ghost, who has his existence from God, who was manifested to men by the Son, the perfect image of the perfect Son, the living Cause of all living, the Fountain of holiness, essential sanctity, who is the Author of holiness in all others. In whom God the Father is manifested, who is above all and in all, and God the Son, whose power runs through all things. A perfect Trinity, whose glory, eternity, and dominion is no way divided or separated from each other. In this Trinity, therefore, there is nothing created or servile, nothing adventitious or extraneous, that did not exist before, but afterward came into it. The Father was never without the Son, nor the Son without the Spirit, but the Trinity abides the same, unchangeable and invariable for ever."

This creed is not a complete summary of the faith, but only so far as relates to the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, of which it is one of the most convincing in interrogatione, quando non habeant ecclesiam.

¹² Cypr. Ep. 70. ad Episc. Numid. p. 190. Sed et ipsa interrogatio quæ fit in baptismo, testis est veritatis. Nam cum dicimus, Credis in vitam æternam, et remissionem peccatorum per sanctam ecclesiam? Intelligimus remissionem peccatorum non nisi in ecclesia dari, &c.

¹³ Gregor. Neocæsar. Oper. p. 1. et ap. Greg. Nyss. t. 3. p. 546. Εἰς Θεός, Πατήρ Λόγου ζῶντος, σοφίας ὑπεράσσης, καὶ δυνάμεως καὶ χαρακτήρος αἰδίου, τέλειος τελείου γεννήτωρ, Πατήρ Ἰου̅ μονογενοῦς· εἰς Κύριος, μόνος ἐκ μόνου, Θεός ἐκ Θεοῦ, &c.

testimonies that is to be met with in any of the ante-Nicene fathers; it being particularly designed against the two opposite heresies of the Samosatensians and Sabellians, the one of which denied the Divinity of our Saviour, and the other his personal subsistence. Some modern Arians, following Sandius, have objected against it, as not genuine; but the learned Bishop Bull has abundantly vindicated the credit of it¹⁴ from the undeniable evidences of Gregory Nyssen and St. Basil, to whose excellent Dissertation I refer the reader.

In the same age with Gregory Thaumaturgus lived Lucian the martyr, who suffered in the last persecution under Diocletian. He was presbyter of the church of Antioch, where he wrote a confession of faith in opposition to the Sabellians. The form is recorded both by Athanasius,¹⁵ and Socrates,¹⁶ and Hilary, who comments upon it, and vindicates it from the objections which some made against it, because it was produced by the Arians, in the council of Antioch, under Constantius, anno 341, as if it had favoured their opinion, which Hilary shows it did not, though there were some expressions in it against the Sabellians, that might be wrested to an heretical sense, [as any catholic words may be,] contrary to the mind of the author. The form, as delivered by St. Hilary, runs thus: "We believe,¹⁷ according to the tradition of the Gospels and apostles, in one God the Father Almighty, Creator, and Maker, and Governor of all things, of whom are all things: and in one Lord Jesus Christ, his only begotten Son, who is God, by whom are all things, who was begotten of the Father, God of God, Whole of Whole, One of One, Perfect of Perfect, King of King, Lord of Lord, the Word, the Wisdom, the Life, the true Light, the true Way, the Resurrection, the Shepherd, the Gate, the incommutable and unchangeable image of the Divine essence, power, and glory, the First-born of every creature, who was always from the beginning God the Word with God, according to what is said in the Gospel, 'And the Word was God, by whom all things were made, and in whom all things subsist;' who, in the last days, descended from on high, and was born of a virgin, according to the Scriptures, and being the Lamb of God, he was made the Mediator between God and men, being fore-ordained to be the Author of our faith and life: for he said, 'I come not from heaven to do my own will, but the will of him that sent me.' Who suffered and rose again for us the third day, and ascended into heaven, and sitteth on the right hand of the Father, and he shall come again with glory to judge the quick and the dead. And we believe in the Holy Ghost, which is given to believers for their consolation, and sanctification, and consummation, according to what our Lord Jesus Christ appointed his disciples, saying, 'Go, teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.' Whence the properties of the Father are manifest, denoting him to be truly a Father, and the properties of the Son, denoting him to be truly a Son, and the properties of the Holy Spirit, denoting him to be truly the Holy Ghost: these names not being simply put and to no purpose, but to express the particular subsistence, or hypostatic substance, as the Greeks term it, of each person named, so as to denote them to be three in hypostasis, and one by consonance."

This creed was anciently suspected by some as an Arian creed, because of the term three hypostases, or three substances, in Hilary's translation. But Hilary abundantly clears it from this suspicion, by showing, that these terms were only used to oppose the Sabellians, who made the three persons no more than three names; and that all other expressions in it are very full and significant against the Arian heresy. And therefore neither does he censure the council of Antioch as Arians, who only repeated and adopted this creed from Lucian, but he calls them a synod of ninety-five holy bishops, ¹⁴ Bull. Defens. Fid. Nic. sect. 2. cap. 12. n. 2.

¹⁵ Athan. de Synod. Arimin. et Seleuc. t. I. p. 892.

¹⁶ Socrat. lib. 2. c. 10.

¹⁷ Hilar. de Synodis, p. 107. Consequenter evangelicæ et apostolicæ traditioni credimus in unum Deum Patrem Omnipotentem, cunctorum quæ sunt edificatorem et factorem et provisorem, ex quo omnia: et in unum Dominum Jesum Christum, Filium ipsius unigenitum, Deum per quem omnia, qui generatus est ex Patre, Deum ex Deo, Totum ex Toto, Unum ex Uno, Perfectum de Perfecto, Regem de Rege, Dominum de Domino, Verbum, Sapientiam, Vitam, Lumen verum, Viam veram, Resurrectionem, Pastorem, Januam, inconvertibilem et incommutabilem, Divinitatis essentialique et virtutis et gloria incommutabilem imaginem, primum editum totius creaturæ, qui semper fuit in principio apud Deum Verbum Deus, juxta quod dictum est in evangelio: et Deus erat Verbum, per quem omnia facta sunt, et in quo omnia constant, qui in novissimis diebus descendit de summis, et natus est ex virgine secundum Scripturas, et Agnus factus est Mediator Dei et hominum, prædestinatus fidei nostræ et dux vitæ; dixit quippe, Non enim descendi de cælo, ut facerem voluntatem meam, sed voluntatem ejus qui me misit. Qui passus est, et resurrexit pro nobis tertia die, et ascendit in cælos, et sedet in dextera Patris, et iterum venturus cum gloria judicare vivos et mortuos. Et in Sanctum Spiritum, qui in paraclesin et sanctificationem et consummationem credentibus datus est, juxta quod et Dominus Jesus Christus ordinavit discipulis, dicens, Pergite et docete universas gentes, baptizantes eas in nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti. Manifesta utique Patris, vere Patris, certaque Filii, vere Filii, notaque Spiritus Sancti, vere Spiritus Sancti; hisque nominibus non simpliciter, neque otiose propositis, sed significantibus diligenter propriam uniuscujusque nominatorum substantiam et ordinem et gloriam, ut sint quidem per substantiam tria, per consonantiam vero unum. Τῇ ὑποστάσει τρία, τῇ δὲ συμφωνίᾳ ἓν. So the Greek in Socrates and Athanasius.

who intended thereby to establish the catholic faith against the Sabellians chiefly, though not without a sufficient guard against the Anomœans, or Arians. His words are these:¹⁸ The holy synod intending to destroy the impiety of those heretics, who eluded the true faith of a Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, by the equivocation of three names only, that by a triple appellation, without any real subsistence belonging to each name, they might, under the false shadow of three names, introduce such a unity, as that the Father alone, though but one and the same, should have the name of the Holy Spirit and of the Son also: therefore the synod used the term, three substances or hypostases, meaning by substances, subsisting persons, and not intending to introduce such a division of substance in the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, as implies a dissimilitude and diversity of essence: [which was the heresy of the Arians, who made the Father only God, and the other two persons only creatures, so dividing the substance by a diversity of nature or essence: which this council did not:] and therefore Hilary says, They were not to be blamed, though they spake of the Divine persons as of three substances or hypostases, and one by consent, because they meant no more than real subsisting persons, in opposition to the Sabellians. Yet notwithstanding this just defence and apology made by St. Hilary for this council, it is condemned by Baronius, Binnius, Hermantius, and many other modern writers, as an Arian council. But the learned Schelstrate has written an accurate dissertation in favour of this council, wherein he answers¹⁹ all the objections made by Baronius and his followers, either against this council or the creed of Lucian the martyr; which is also done by our learned Bishop Bull,²⁰ to whose Dissertations I refer the curious reader.

About the time of Lucian the martyr, in the latter end of the third century, Cotelarius supposes the author or compiler of the book called, The Apostolical Constitutions, to have lived; which I think more probable than either the opinion of those, who thrust him down to the fifth century, or the opinion of Mr. Whiston, who will needs have this book not only to be the genuine work of Clemens Romanus, but the work of a Divine and inspired writer. For this reason I speak of him in this place next after

Sect. 7.
The creed of the Apostolical Constitutions.

Lucian, as one that has left us the form of an ancient creed, then most probably used in some of the Eastern or Greek churches. For he brings in the catechumen making his profession in these words: "I believe²¹ and am baptized in one Unbegotten, the only true God Almighty, the Father of Christ, the Creator and Maker of all things, of whom are all things: and in one Lord Jesus Christ, his only begotten Son, the First-born of every creature, who before all ages was begotten, not made, by the good will of the Father, by whom all things were made in heaven and in earth, visible and invisible, who in the last times came down from heaven, and taking flesh upon him, was born of the holy Virgin Mary, and lived a holy life according to the laws of God his Father, and was crucified under Pontius Pilate, and died for us, and the third day after he had suffered, rose again from the dead and ascended into heaven, and sitteth on the right hand of the Father, and shall come again with glory in the end of the world, to judge both the quick and dead, of whose kingdom there shall be no end. And I am baptized into the Holy Ghost, that is to say, the Comforter, which wrought effectually in all the saints from the beginning of the world, and was afterward sent to the apostles by the Father, according to the promise of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and after the apostles to all others, who, in the holy catholic church, believe the resurrection of the flesh, the remission of sins, the kingdom of heaven, and the life of the world to come."

Some have suspected this author of Arianism, but there is nothing of it appears in this creed: for though he gives the title of ἀγέννητον only to the Father, yet that is no more than what Alexander and Athanasius, and all the opposers of Arius, always did, who never asserted δύο ἀγέννητα, as those words signify, two absolute, co-ordinate, unbegotten principles, which is the proper notion of two Gods; but always reserved the title of ἀγέννητον, unbegotten, to the Father only, as the eternal principle and fountain of the Deity, and styled the Son μονογενῆ Θεόν, the only begotten God, which is the proper notion of the Son of God, who is neither created nor unbegotten, but eternally begotten of the substance of the Father, and this title of μονογενῆς Θεός, the only begotten God, is the same as this very author of the Constitutions elsewhere ascribes to vero unum, non habet calumniam, &c.

¹⁸ Hilar. de Synodis, p. 108. Volens igitur congregata sanctorum synodus impietatem eam perimere, quæ veritatem Patris, Filii, et Spiritus Sancti nominum numero eluderet, ut non subsistente causa uniuscujusque nominis, triplex nuncupatio obtineret sub falsitate nominum unionem, ut Pater solus atque unus idem atque ipse haberet et Spiritus Sancti nomen et Filii: ideo tres substantias esse dixerunt, subsistentium personas per substantias edocentes, non substantiam Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti diversitate dissimilis essentia separantes. Quod autem dictum est, ut sint quidem per substantiam tria, per consonantiam

¹⁹ Schelstrat. Sacrum Concilium Antiochenum restitutum, Dissert. 3. c. 2. p. 109.

²⁰ Bull. Defens. Fid. Nic. sect. 2. c. 13. n. 6.

²¹ Constit. Apost. lib. 7. c. 41. Πιστεύω καὶ βαπτίζομαι εἰς ἓνα ἀγέννητον, μόνου ἀληθινῶν Θεῶν παντοκράτορα, τὸν Πατέρα τοῦ Χριστοῦ, κτιστὴν καὶ δημιουργὸν τῶν πάντων, ἐξ οὗ τὰ πάντα, καὶ εἰς τὸν Κύριον Ἰησοῦν τὸν Χριστόν, τὸν μονογενῆ αὐτοῦ Υἱόν, τὸν πρωτότοκον πάσης κτίσεως, τὸν πρὸ αἰῶνων εὐδοκία τοῦ Πατρὸς γεννηθέντα, οὐ κτισθέντα, &c.

the Son,²² whom he makes to be no creature, but God, in this only differing from the Father, that he is not unbegotten; which is necessary to the notion of a Son; for it were a contradiction to say, he is the Son of God, and yet unbegotten also. I observe this, to show how little advantage the modern Arians have from this author, if we allow him but that favourable interpretation, which in justice ought to be allowed to all ancient catholic writers.

We may further observe, that though this creed be the same in substance with the Roman Creed, which is commonly called the Apostles' Creed, yet it differs from it very much in phrase and expression, and comes nearer the creeds of the Eastern church; and though it be as perfect as any of that age, yet it has neither the article of the descent into hell, nor the communion of saints, expressly mentioned in it; which shows that these articles were not totidem verbis inserted into the first creeds of the church.

Thus far I have collected the scattered remains of the ancient creeds, which were composed before the Nicene Creed, for the use of several churches, as they are still upon record in private writers. But we have some more perfect forms also remaining, as those of Jerusalem, Cæsarea, Antioch, Alexandria, and Rome, by comparing which together, the reader may easily perceive, how the unity of the faith was exactly agreed upon, and preserved, with some variety of expression. The Creed of the church of Jerusalem we have imperfectly in St. James's Liturgy, and more perfect in the Catechetical Discourses of Cyril, bishop of Jerusalem, which are an exposition upon it. In St. James's Liturgy we have only the beginning of the creed: "I believe in one God the Father Almighty,²³ Maker of heaven and earth, and in one Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God." But the remaining articles are not inserted, as being vulgarly known without reciting. However, in Cyril's catechisms the articles are rehearsed at full length, and when collected together they run in this form:

"I believe in one God²⁴ the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth, and of all things visible and invisible: and in one Lord Jesus Christ, the only begotten Son of God, begotten of the Father before all ages, the true God, by whom all things were made, who was incarnate and made man, who was crucified and buried, and the third day he rose again from the dead, and ascended into heaven, and sitteth on the right hand of the Father, and shall come to judge the quick and dead, of whose kingdom there shall be no end. And in the Holy Ghost the Comforter, who spake by the prophets. In one baptism of repentance, in the remission of sins, in one catholic church, in the resurrection of the flesh, and in life everlasting."

That this creed was neither the Nicene Creed, nor the Constantinopolitan, is evident, because it wants the word consubstantial, and other titles, which are given to the Son in the Nicene Creed: nor has it the full explication of the character of the Holy Ghost, which was afterward made in the Constantinopolitan Creed: which is not to be wondered at, because Cyril's catechisms were written some years before the council of Constantinople was held. Therefore it must be the ancient Creed of Jerusalem, as learned men²⁵ have rightly concluded, and hence also observed, that the Oriental creeds had originally the articles that follow the Holy Ghost, viz. the catholic church, the remission of sins, the resurrection of the flesh, and eternal life. Only the communion of saints, and descent into hell, are wanting in it.

And so we find in the Creed of Cæsarea in Palestine, in the profession of which Eusebius says he was baptized, and catechised; the descent into hell is not mentioned in it. But it differs in expression from the Jerusalem Creed, and comes up the nearest to the Nicene Creed of any other. The form, as it was proposed by Eusebius himself to the council of Nice, is in these words: "We believe in one God the Father²⁶ Almighty, Maker of all things visible and invisible: and in one Lord Jesus Christ, the Word of God, God of God, Light of Light, Life of Life, his only begotten Son, the First-born of every creature, begotten of the Father before all ages, by whom all things were made; who for our salvation was incarnate, and conversed among men, and suffered, and rose again the third day, and ascended unto the Father, and shall come again to judge the quick and the dead. We believe also in one Holy Spirit. Every one of these we believe to be and exist; we confess the Father to be truly a Father, the Son truly a Son, the Holy Ghost truly a Holy Ghost, according to what our Lord, when he sent his disciples to preach, said, 'Go teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.'"

The articles that follow the Holy Ghost, are here omitted only for the same reason, as I shall show hereafter, they were omitted in the Nicene Creed, because then no dispute was made about them, and only so much of the Creed was now produced as was necessary to be mentioned in opposition to the Arian heresy.

The Creed of Alexandria was somewhat shorter than this, and is supposed by learned men to be that which

Sect. 8.
The Creed of Jerusalem.

Sect. 9.
The Creed of Cæsarea in Palestine.

Sect. 10.
The Creed of Alexandria.

²² Constit. Apost. lib. 7. cap. 43. lib. 8. c. 7, 11, 12, 17.

²³ Jacobi Liturg. in Bibl. Patr. Gr. Lat. t. 2. p. 7.

²⁴ Cyril. Cateches. 6, &c.

²⁵ Bull. Judic. Eccles. Cathol. &c. cap. 6. n. 5.

²⁶ Euseb. Epist. ad Ecclesiam Cæsar. ap. Socrat. lib. 1. cap. 8.

Arius and Euzoius delivered in to Constantine, when they made a sort of feigned recantation before him. The form is recorded in Socrates²⁷ in these words: "We believe in one God the Father Almighty, and in Jesus Christ his Son our Lord, God the Word begotten of him before all ages, by whom all things were made that are in heaven and in earth; who came down from heaven, and was incarnate, and suffered and rose again, and ascended into heaven, and shall come again to judge the quick and the dead. And in the Holy Ghost, and in the resurrection of the flesh, and in the life of the world to come, and in the kingdom of heaven, and in one catholic church of God extended from one end of the earth to the other."

Sect. 11.
The Creed of Antioch.

The Creed of the church of Antioch seems to be that which is recorded in Cassian, who delivers it as it was probably received in that church from the time of the apostles, only with the addition of the word consubstantial, inserted from the time of the council of Nice. "The text and faith of the Creed of Antioch," says he, "is this: I believe in one only true God the Father Almighty, Maker of all creatures visible and invisible: and in Jesus Christ our Lord, his only begotten Son, the First-born of every creature, born of him before all ages, and not made, very God of very God, consubstantial with the Father, by whom the world was framed and all things made. Who for our sakes came and was born of the Virgin Mary, and was crucified under Pontius Pilate, and buried, and the third day rose again according to the Scriptures, and ascended into heaven, and shall come again to judge the quick and the dead."

Cassian here repeats not the whole creed, but only those articles that were proper to be urged against Nestorius, who had been baptized into this faith, and by this creed, at Antioch, from which he shows his prevarications, and how he had started from the profession which he himself had made in the words of this creed both at his baptism and ordination, leaving the remaining articles unrecited.

The reader may easily perceive, by comparing the forementioned creeds, that the articles of the communion of saints, and the descent into hell, are not expressly

Sect. 12.
The Roman Creed,
commonly called the Apostles' Creed.

²⁷ Socrat. lib. 1. c. 26.

²⁸ Cassian. de Incarnat. lib. 6. p. 1272. Textus ergo et fides Antiocheni Symboli hæc est: Credo in unum et solum verum Deum Patrem Omnipotentem, Creatorem omnium visibilium et invisibilium creaturarum. Et in Dominum nostrum Jesum Christum, Filium ejus unigenitum, et primogenitum totius creaturæ, ex eo natum ante omnia sæcula, et non factum, Deum verum ex Deo vero, homousion Patri, per quem et sæcula compaginata sunt et omnia facta. Qui propter nos venit et natus est ex Maria Virgine, et crucifixus sub Pontio Pilato, et sepultus, et tertia die resurrexit secundum Scripturas, et in cælos ascendit, et iterum veniet judicare vivos et mortuos. Et reliqua.

mentioned in any of them. Nor were they originally in the Roman Creed, which is commonly called the Apostles' Creed, as appears not only from the testimony of Ruffin, but from some ancient copies of this creed still remaining. Bishop Usher²⁹ met with two copies here in England, which wanted these additions, and also that of life everlasting. The one was in Greek, though written in Saxon characters, at the end of King Athelstan's Psalter, about the year 703; and the other in Latin; but both exactly in the same form of words: "I believe in God the Father Almighty; and in Jesus Christ his only begotten Son our Lord, who was born of the Holy Ghost and the Virgin Mary, and was crucified under Pontius Pilate, and was buried, and the third day rose again from the dead, ascended into heaven, sitteth on the right hand of the Father, whence he shall come to judge the quick and the dead. And in the Holy Ghost, the holy church, the remission of sins, and the resurrection of the flesh. Amen."

The variations of these ancient forms from the present form of the Apostles' Creed, in the want of several words that have since been added, are noted by Bishop Usher, who also observes, that this creed is delivered by several ancient authors with some variety of expression. For in some authors, which use this creed, life everlasting is added after the resurrection of the flesh. As in the homilies of Petrus Chrysologus,³⁰ bishop of Ravenna, where he expounds this creed. And in the author of the book de Symbolo ad Catechumenos, in the ninth tome of St. Austin's works. And in the creed which Marcellus, bishop of Ancyra, presented to Pope Julius, which is recorded in Epiphanius.³¹ But others conclude this creed with the resurrection of the flesh, and make no express mention of life everlasting; not that they supposed it to be no article of faith, but because it was included in the other article of the resurrection, as they rightly expound it. St. Jerom says plainly,³² that the creed was concluded with the resurrection of the flesh. And Maximus Taurinensis,³³ who expounds every article of it distinctly, says the same. And St. Austin also³⁴ concludes the creed with the resurrection of the flesh, but then he includes eternal life in the exposition

²⁹ Usser. de Symbolis, p. 6.

³⁰ Petrus Chrysol. Homil. 57, &c.

³¹ Epiph. Hær. 72. Marcel. n. 3.

³² Hieron. Ep. 61. ad Pammach. In symbolo fidei—post confessionem Trinitatis et unitatem ecclesiæ, omne Christiani dogmatis sacramentum carnis resurrectione concluditur.

³³ Maxim. Taurin. Hom. 1. de Diversis, p. 239. Hic religionis nostræ finis, hæc summa credendi est.

³⁴ Aug. de Fide et Symbolo, t. 3. p. 66. Qua corporis resurrectione facta, a temporis conditione liberati, æterna vita ineffabili charitate et stabilitate sine corruptione perfruemur.

of it. For, says he, when the resurrection of the body is effected, we shall be freed from the conditions of time, and enjoy eternal life with ineffable charity and stability without corruption. And so the author of the sermons *De Tempore*³⁵ under his name: The resurrection of the flesh is the end of all, but it is an end without end. For there is no death after that. Therefore they made it the conclusion of the creed, because it was the conclusion of all things in this world.

And thus it was in the Creed of the church of Aquileia, which differed in other points both from the Roman and Oriental creeds. For Rufinus, who wrote an exposition upon it, concludes it with the article of the resurrection, and neither mentions nor expounds the article of eternal life, but only tacitly, as it is implied in the resurrection. In other articles some additions were made to this creed, which were not in the Roman: for here the descent into hell is particularly mentioned; and not only the resurrection of the flesh in general, but the resurrection of this flesh in particular; and in the first article, after the word Almighty, were added, impassible and invisible, as peculiar appellations of God the Father. For it was thus conceived: "I believe in God the Father Almighty, invisible and impassible;³⁶ and in Jesus Christ his only Son our Lord, who was born by the Holy Ghost of the Virgin Mary, was crucified under Pontius Pilate, and buried; he descended into hell, and the third day rose again from the dead, and ascended into heaven, and sitteth on the right hand of the Father, whence he shall come to judge the quick and the dead. And in the Holy Ghost, the holy catholic church, the remission of sins, and the resurrection of this flesh."

The reason of adding the words "invisible and impassible" to this creed, which were not in the Roman, was to obviate the Sabellian or Patripassian heresy, which asserted that God the Father was born of the virgin, and so made visible and passible in the flesh. In opposition to which impiety, Rufinus says,³⁷ their forefathers seem to have added those words, professing the Father to be invisible and impassible, that is, that he never was incarnate, as the Son only was, and not the Father. The descent into hell is also almost peculiar to this creed: for excepting this and the creed of the council of Sirmium or Ariminum, mentioned by Socrates,³⁸ this article was not expressly mentioned in any other creed of this age; though Rufinus thinks it was always implied in the word "buried," which he reckons of the same importance. When it first came into the Roman Creed, the reader may find a particular account in Bishop Pearson, who speaks of it as done about the year 600.

I have hitherto given an account of all such creeds as might be reckoned of use in the church before the time of the Nicene council. I shall now give the like account of the first forming of the Nicene Creed, and how it was afterward completed, and put into a new form, by the council of Constantinople. The Creed, as first published by the council of Nice, was in these words: "We believe in one God Almighty,³⁹ Maker of all things visible and invisible: and in one Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, begotten of the Father, the only begotten, that is, of the substance of the Father, God of God, Light of Light, very God of very God, begotten not made, of one substance with the Father, by whom all things both in heaven and earth were made. Who for us men and our salvation came down from heaven, and was incarnate and made man, and suffered, and the third day rose again, and ascended into heaven, and shall come again to judge the quick and the dead. And in the Holy Ghost. And those who say, there was a time when the Son of God was not, or that he did not exist before he was made, because he was made out of nothing, or of another substance or essence, or that he was created or mutable, the catholic and apostolic church anathematizes them."

This Creed often occurs in the writings of the ancient fathers and councils in this very form; as in Athanasius, Epist. ad Jovian. t. 1. p. 247; Hilar. de Synodis, p. 114; Leo, Ep. 95, ad Leonem Imperat.; the Council of Rome, under Julius, an. 337; the Council of Ephesus, Epist. ad Nestor.; the Council of Chalcedon, Act. 2; the Council of Hippo; the sixth Council of Carthage; the Preface to the African Code; the third Council of Bracara; the third and thirteenth of Toledo; the fifth General Council of Constantinople, Act. 17; and many others.

Now, some learned persons have been of opinion, that the ancient creeds before the council of Nice, had none of the articles which follow after the Holy ³⁵ Aug. Serm. 119. De Tempore, t. 10. p. 306. Iste jam finis est. Sed finis erit sine fine resurrectio carnis, &c.

³⁶ Rufin. Expos. Symboli ad calcem Cypriani, p. 19. Credo in Deum Patrem Omnipotentem, invisibilem et impassibilem. Et in Christum Jesum unicum Filium ejus, Dominum nostrum, qui natus est de Spiritu Sancto ex Maria Virgine, crucifixus sub Pontio Pilato, et sepultus, descendit ad inferna: tertia die resurrexit a mortuis, ascendit in coelos, sedet ad dexteram Patris; inde venturus est judicare vivos et mortuos. Et in Spiritum Sanctum, sanctam ecclesiam catholicam, remissionem peccatorum, hujus carnis resurrectionem.

³⁷ Rufin. ibid. p. 19. Sciendum quod duo isti sermones in ecclesie Romanæ symbolo non habentur: consuet autem apud nos additos hæreseos causa Sabellii, illius profecto quæ a nostris Patripassiana appellatur; id est, quæ Patrem ipsum vel ex virgine natum dicit, et visibilem factum, vel passum affirmat in carne.

³⁸ Socrat. lib. 2. cap. 37.

³⁹ Ap. Socrat. lib. 1. c. 8.

Sect. 14.
The Nicene Creed,
as first published by the council of Nice.

Ghost, but all ended as that does, with those words, "and in the Holy Ghost." This was the opinion of Vossius and Erasmus; and Bishop Usher says, he was once inclined to think so himself, but upon better consideration, he professes⁴⁰ he found it necessary to alter his judgment. For it plainly appears from most of the forms before recited, that several of the articles which follow after the Holy Ghost, were always a part of the creed: and the reason why the council of Nice repeated them not, was only because there was then no dispute about them, and they only rehearsed so much of the former creeds as there was then occasion for, to oppose the heresy of the Arians, leaving the rest to be supplied from the former creeds, then generally received in the church. This is evident, both from the creeds used by the Arians, and those that were used by the church, before the council of Constantinople had settled and new-modelled the form of the Nicene Creed that was afterwards generally received in the church. Thus in the creed of the separating bishops in the council of Sardica, related by St. Hilary⁴¹ and others, after the article of the Holy Ghost there follows, "We believe in the holy church, and in remission of sins, and eternal life;" or, as it is more perfectly in his Fragments,⁴² "the holy church, the remission of sins, the resurrection of the flesh, and eternal life." So again, the Eusebians in their first creed, which they published in the council of Antioch, mentioned both by Athanasius and Socrates,⁴³ after the article of the Holy Ghost, add, "We believe the resurrection of the flesh, and eternal life." Now, it were absurd to think the Arians should retain these articles in their creeds, and in the mean time the church reject or neglect them. Therefore it is plain the Nicene Creed was only one part of the ancient creed, that was used at full length in baptism, though not here so recited. And what has been observed before out of Cyril's catechisms, is a manifest proof of it.

This is further evident from the two creeds, a shorter and a longer, recited in Epiphanius, who wrote his Anchorate some years before the council of Constantinople. The shorter creed, which he says every catechumen repeated at his baptism from the time of the council of Nice to the tenth year of Valentinian and Valens, anno 373, was in these words: "We believe⁴⁴ in one God the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth, and of all things visible and invisible. And in one Lord Jesus Christ, the only begotten Son of God, begotten of the Father before all ages, that is, of the substance of his Father, Light of Light, very God of very God, begotten not made, of one substance with the Father, by whom all things were made which are in heaven and in earth. Who for us men and our salvation came down from heaven, and was incarnate of the Holy Ghost and the Virgin Mary, and was made man, and was crucified for us under Pontius Pilate, and suffered and was buried, and the third day rose again according to the Scriptures, and ascended into heaven, and sitteth on the right hand of the Father. And shall come again with glory to judge both the quick and the dead, of whose kingdom there shall be no end. And in the Holy Ghost, the Lord and Giver of life, who proceedeth from the Father, who with the Father and the Son together is worshipped and glorified, who spake by the prophets. And in one catholic and apostolic church. We confess one baptism for the remission of sins, and we look for the resurrection of the dead, and the life of the world to come. But they who say, there was a time when the Son of God was not, or that he was not before he was begotten, or that he was made out of nothing, or of any other substance or essence, or that he is mutable or changeable, those the catholic and apostolic church anathematizes."

This, says Epiphanius, is the faith which was delivered by the holy apostles, and received by the church in the council of Nice, where three hundred and eighteen fathers were present. By which he does not mean that these articles were delivered in this very form either by the apostles or the council of Nice, but that the church agreed upon this form to be used at baptism, in pursuance of the doctrine delivered by the apostles and the Nicene fathers. And afterwards, upon occasion of the Apollinarians and other heretics, which infested the church about the tenth year of Valentinian and Valens, and the sixth of Gratian, and the ninetieth year of the Diocletian account, that is, anno 373, she enlarged her creed with a more particular explication of some certain articles in opposition to those heresies. And then the form appointed to be used in baptism was in these terms, as he informs us in the same place:

"We believe in one God the Father Almighty, Maker of all things visible and invisible; and in one Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, begotten of God the Father, the only begotten, that is, of the substance of the Father, God of God, Light of Light, very God of very God, begotten not made, being of one substance with the Father, by whom all things were made, as well in heaven as in earth, visible and invisible. Who for us men and for our salvation came down from heaven, and was incarnate, that is, was born in perfect manner of the holy Virgin Mary, by the Holy Ghost, and was made man, that is, took upon him perfect man, soul and body and mind, and whatsoever is in man, sin only ⁴⁰ Usser. de Symbolis, p. 17.

⁴¹ Hilar. de Synodis, p. 108.

⁴² Hilar. Fragmenta, p. 140.

⁴³ Socrat. lib. 2. c. 10. Athanas. De Synod. Arim. et Seleuc. t. I. p. 892.

⁴⁴ Epiphani. Anchorat. n. 120. t. 2. p. 122.

excepted; not by the seed of man, nor merely by existing in man, but by framing flesh to himself into one holy unity; not after the manner as he inspired the prophets, and spake and wrought in them, but by being perfectly made man. For the Word was made flesh, not by undergoing any change, or transforming the Godhead into manhood, but by making one perfect and Divine union. For there is but one Lord Jesus Christ, not two, the same God, the same Lord, the same King. Who suffered in the flesh and rose again, and ascended with his body into heaven, and sitteth in glory at the right hand of the Father; whence he shall come with glory in the same body to judge the quick and dead, of whose kingdom there shall be no end. We believe in the Holy Ghost, who spake in the law, and preached by the prophets, and descended at Jordan; who spake by the apostles, and dwells in the saints: and thus we believe of him, that he is the Holy Spirit, the Spirit of God, the perfect Spirit, the Comforter, uncreated, proceeding from the Father, receiving from the Son, in whom we believe. We believe in one catholic and apostolic church, in one baptism of repentance, in the resurrection of the dead, in the just judgment of body and soul, in the kingdom of heaven, and life everlasting. And those that say, there was a time when the Son or the Holy Ghost was not, or that they were made out of nothing, or of another substance or essence; that say, the Son of God, or the Holy Ghost, are mutable or changeable; those the catholic and apostolic church, the mother of us and you, anathematizes. And again, we anathematize those that confess not the resurrection of the dead, and all heresies which accord not to this holy faith."

Now, if these creeds were in use in the church at the time which Epiphanius mentions, then it is certain the Nicene Creed was completed by the church for the use of her catechumens long before the general council of Constantinople: and what was done by that council, was rather to contract the form, than to augment or lengthen it, as any one may easily perceive, that will compare the Constantinopolitan Creed with either of those that have now been recited out of Epiphanius.

For the creed that was drawn up in the second general council of Constantinople, is no other but the Nicene Creed, with the addition of such articles as were always used by the church in the interrogatories of baptism, though not inserted in the particular form used by the Nicene council. I need not here repeat the form, because it is the same with that which is commonly called the Nicene Creed in our liturgy. Only the word Filioque, expressing the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father and Son together, was added afterward by the Latin church. For the first copies of this Creed in the council of Constantinople,⁴⁵ and the councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon,⁴⁶ have it only, proceeding from the Father, ἐκ τοῦ Πατρὸς ἐκπορεύμενον, without any mention of the Son: but in the Latin councils, the word Filioque is commonly added, as in the first council of Bracara, anno 411, and the third council of Toledo,⁴⁷ anno 589, where the Constantinopolitan Creed is recited.

As to the use of the Nicene Creed, it is certain, it was used in the Greek church much after the same manner as the Apostolical and other creeds were used in the Latin church; first in the office of baptism; afterward it was taken in to be a part of the liturgy in the communion service. Some learned persons, I know, are of opinion, that the Nicene Creed was never used in the administration of baptism, but only the Apostolical Creed still throughout the whole church. But this is a very plain mistake. 1. Because it does not appear, that the Apostolical Creed, which is the Roman Creed, was ever used in the Greek church, even before the Nicene Creed was made: for they had several creeds of their own, agreeing indeed with the Roman Creed in substance, but differing from it in words and expression; and those creeds were used by the Greek or Eastern church in the administration of baptism. 2. When the Nicene Creed was formed, it is very evident, that very form was used by many churches in the East as the creed of baptism. For the fathers of the council of Constantinople under Mennas, anno 536, do frequently call it the creed in which both they themselves were baptized,⁴⁸ and also baptized others. And so it is said in the synodical epistles of the councils of Tyre and Jerusalem, which are related⁴⁹ in the acts of the same council. As also in the acts of the general councils of Ephesus⁵⁰ and Chalcedon,⁵¹ in the former of which an order was made that catechumens should be taught the Nicene Creed, and no other. The like may be observed in the edict of the emperor Basiliscus mentioned by Evagrius,⁵² who, speaking of the Nicene Creed, calls it the creed in which both he and all his ancestors were baptized. And it is remarked by Epiphanius,⁵³ of the two creeds which he recites, that they were the creeds which every catechumen repeated at his baptism; which were nothing but the Nicene

Sect. 17.
Of the use of the Nicene Creed in the ancient service of the church. And when first it was taken in to be a part of the liturgy in the communion office.

Sect. 16.
The Nicene Creed, as completed by the council of Constantinople, anno 381.

⁴⁵ Conc. Constantin. Conc. t. 2. p. 953.

⁴⁶ Conc. Chalcedon. Act. 2. t. 4. p. 341.

⁴⁷ Conc. t. 5. p. 1001.

⁴⁸ Vid. Con. C. P. sub Menna, Act. 5. Con. t. 5. p. 166, 171, 179.

⁴⁹ Ibid. p. 190 et 199.

⁵⁰ Conc. Ephes. Act. 6. t. 3. p. 690.

⁵¹ Conc. Chalced. Act. 2. t. 4. p. 341.

⁵² Evagr. lib. 3. c. 4 et 7.

⁵³ Epiphani. Anchorat. n. 120. t. 2. p. 120.

Creed, with the addition of such articles as the church supplied, to make it a complete summary of the faith. So that nothing can be more evident, than that the Nicene Creed was the creed then generally made use of in all the Eastern churches for the instruction of catechumens at their baptism.

But as yet it was not made a part of the common liturgy of the church, to be repeated daily in Divine service. St. Ambrose⁵⁴ indeed speaks of it as used in private devotion, and gives directions to the holy virgins so to use it in their morning retirements, and upon other proper occasions. And Habertus⁵⁵ thinks it was also required of bishops at their ordination; which is not improbable, because they were obliged to make a profession of their faith. But all this did not yet make it a part of the daily liturgy of the church. For it is agreed among learned men, both of the Romish and protestant communion, that the creed was not used to be repeated in the daily service till about the middle of the fifth century in the Greek church, and not till some time after in the Latin church. So Valesius,⁵⁶ Cardinal Bona,⁵⁷ Schelstrate,⁵⁸ Pagi,⁵⁹ Christianus Lupus,⁶⁰ Hamond L'Estrange,⁶¹ and Vossius.⁶² Theodorus Lector⁶³ observes, that Peter Fullo, who was bishop of Antioch about the year 471, was the first that ordered the creed to be repeated in that church, ἐν πάσῃ συνάξει, in every church assembly. And the same author reports,⁶⁴ that Timotheus, bishop of Constantinople, anno 511, was the first that brought in this custom into that church; which he did in hatred to his predecessor Macedonius, and with an intent to represent him as disaffected to the Nicene Creed, which before that time was used to be rehearsed in the church only once a year, on the parascene, or great day of preparation before the passover, now called Maundy Thursday, when the bishop was wont to catechise such as were to be baptized at Easter. From the Oriental churches, the custom was brought into the West, first in Spain and Galicia, at the petition of King Recareus, by the order of the third council⁶⁵ of Toledo, about the year 589, when those churches were newly recovered from the inundation of the Arian heresy, this practice was then thought a proper antidote to preserve them from relapsing into their ancient error. Lupus and Pagi say, it was not brought into the French churches till the time of Charles the Great, and then Pope Leo III. advised them to lay it aside again, because it was not yet the custom of the Roman church. They concluded yet further, that in the time of Pope John VIII., anno 870, it was not yet the practice of the Roman church. But at last, in the days of Benedict VIII., anno 1014, as is collected from Berno Augiensis, the custom was admitted into the Roman church; for this reason, to give it in the words of Lupus, since the Roman church could not bring over the French and Spanish churches to her own way, she resolved at last to comply with their custom, that there might be no disagreement among them; and so the Nicene Creed came to be universally read throughout the whole church.

There is but one creed more, which I need to stand to give any account of, and that is the creed which is commonly received under the name of the Athanasian Creed. Baronius⁶⁶ is of opinion, that it was composed by Athanasius when he was at Rome, and offered to Pope Julius as a confession of his faith. Which circumstance is not at all likely, for Julius never questioned the faith of Athanasius. However, a great many learned men have so far embraced the opinion of Baronius, as to believe this creed to be of Athanasius's composing; as Cardinal Bona,⁶⁷ and Petavius,⁶⁸ and Bellarmine,⁶⁹ and Rivet,⁷⁰ with many others of both communions. Scultetus leaves the matter in doubt. But the best and latest critics, who have examined the thing most exactly, make no question, but that it is to be ascribed to a Latin author, Vigilus Tapsensis, an African bishop, who lived in the latter end of the fifth century, in the time of the Vandalic Arian persecution. The learned Vossius⁷¹ and Quesnel⁷² have written particular dissertations upon this subject. Their arguments are, 1. Because this creed is wanting in almost all the manuscripts of Athanasius's works. 2. Because the style and contexture of it does not bespeak a Greek, but a Latin author. 3. Because neither Cyril of Alexandria, nor the council of Ephesus, nor Pope Leo, nor the council of Chalcedon, have ever so much as mentioned it

Sect. 18.
Of the Athanasian Creed.

⁵⁴ Ambros. de Virgin. lib. 3. p. 115. Symbolum quoque specialiter debemus, tanquam nostri signaculum cordis, antelucanis horis quotidie recensere. Quod etiam, cum horremus aliquid, animo recurrendum est.

⁵⁵ Habert. Archiepiscop. p. 499.

⁵⁶ Vales. Not. in Theodor. Lector. lib. 2. p. 566.

⁵⁷ Bona, Rer. Liturgic. lib. 2. c. 8. n. 2.

⁵⁸ Schelstrat. Concil. Antiochen. cap. 6. p. 210.

⁵⁹ Pagi, Critic. in Baron. an. 325. n. 18.

⁶⁰ Lupus, Scholia in Concil. t. 1. cap. 4. p. 13.

⁶¹ Alliance of Divine Offices, chap. 3. p. 79. chap. 6. p. 170.

⁶² Vossius de Symbolis.

⁶³ Theodor. Lector. Hist. lib. 2. p. 566.

⁶⁴ Ibid. p. 563.

⁶⁵ Conc. Tolet. 3. c. 2. Petitione Reccaredi regis constituit synodus, ut per omnes ecclesias Hispaniæ et Galliciæ, secundum formam Orientalium ecclesiarum, concilii Constantinopolitani symbolum fidei recitetur: et priusquam Dominica dicatur oratio, voce clara populo prædicetur, &c.

⁶⁶ Baron. an. 310. n. 11. ⁶⁷ Bona de Psalmodia.

⁶⁸ Petav. Not. in Epiphani. Hær. 72.

⁶⁹ Bellarmin. de Scriptor. Eccles. p. 81.

⁷⁰ Rivet, Critic. Sacr. lib. 3. c. 4. p. 240.

⁷¹ Voss. de Symbolis, Dissert. 2.

⁷² Quesnel. Dissert. de variis Fidei Symbolis in antiquo codice Romano.

in all that they say against the Nestorian or Eutychian heresies. 4. Because this Vigilus Tapsensis is known to have published several others of his writings under the borrowed name of Athanasius, with which this creed is commonly joined. These reasons have persuaded such men as Bishop Pearson,⁷³ Archbishop Usher,⁷⁴ Hamond L'Estrange,⁷⁵ Dr. Cave,⁷⁶ Schelstrate,⁷⁷ Pagi,⁷⁸ and Du Pin, critics of the best rank, to come in to this opinion, that this creed was not composed by Athanasius, but by a later and a Latin writer. Dr. Cave thinks, the first that mentions it under the name of Athanasius, is Theodulphus Aurelianensis, who lived about the year 794, in the reign of Charles the Great: but in this he is a little mistaken; for the council of Autun, which was held above a hundred years before, anno 670, not only mentioned it under that name, but ordered every presbyter, deacon, subdeacon, &c., to read it together with the Apostles' Creed,⁷⁹ or be liable to the bishop's censure for his omission; which implies, that it was then esteemed the genuine work of Athanasius, and as such had for some time been received in the church. But whoever was the author of it, there never was any question made of its orthodoxy, except by the Samosatians and Arians in these later ages of the church. Only, as Bishop Usher and others have observed, the modern Greeks now use it with some additions and alterations. For, whereas it is said in the Latin copies, that the Holy Ghost proceedeth from the Father and the Son; the Greeks now read it, from the Father, or the Father only; as Paræus⁸⁰ has remarked in his exposition of this creed. And in the Greek copy lately brought out of the East, and published by Bishop Usher, there is a long interpolation by way of addition and explication of those words, "He was man of the substance of his mother, perfect God and perfect man, of a reasonable soul and human flesh subsisting." With some other additions of lesser note, which the curious reader may find marked out in the fore-mentioned tract⁸¹ of that learned author.

To all the creeds that have been related in this chapter, I think it not improper to add the short account which Eusebius gives of the first preaching of St. Thaddæus to King Agbarus and the people of Edessa, which I had from the information of my learned and judicious friend Mr. Lowth, to whose useful conversation I owe many other curious remarks and observations, that lie scattered throughout the Antiquities of the Church. This is not indeed properly a creed, but a summary of his first sermon, or the heads of his first catechetical institution to the people. "Concerning the coming of Jesus into the world, after what manner it was; and concerning his mission, for what reason he was sent by the Father; concerning his power, and the mysteries which he spake in the world, and by what power he did these; then, of his new way of preaching; of his meanness and abject estate, and the humility of his outward appearance as a man; after what manner he humbled himself, and submitted to death, and made a diminutive⁸² appearance of his Divine nature; what things he suffered of the Jews, and how he was crucified, and descended into hell, and brake down the partition that had been kept up in former ages; how he arose from the dead, and raised with himself those that slept in preceding generations; how he descended [from heaven] alone, but ascended with a mighty company to his Father; how he sits at the right hand of God the Father, and shall come again with glory and power to judge both the quick and the dead." Here are two things very remarkable in this ancient account of the first principles of Christian doctrine, viz. the Divinity of our Saviour, and the descent into hell, both which are here expressed in terms, for which reason I thought it might deserve a place among the creeds of the church. Eusebius says, he had the account in the Syriac tongue, as it was preserved in the archives of the church of Edessa, signed in the year 340, which (according to the computation of time then used by the Syrians of Edessa, reckoning from the first year that Seleucus began to reign in Asia) falls in with the same year that Christ suffered and arose from the dead, as Valesius, and Pagi⁸³ after him, have rightly computed in their observations upon this passage of Eusebius.

⁷³ Pearson. in Symbol. Artic. 8. p. 570. Edit. Lat.

⁷⁴ Usser. de Symbol. Rom. p. 1.

⁷⁵ L'Estrange's Alliance of Divine Offices, chap. 4. p. 99.

⁷⁶ Cave, Hist. Literar. vol. 1. p. 146.

⁷⁷ Schelstrat. Conc. Antioch. Dissert. 3. c. 2. p. 109.

⁷⁸ Pagi, Critic. in Baron. an. 310. n. 6. Du Pin, vol. 2. p. 35.

⁷⁹ Conc. Augustodun. Can. ult. Con. t. 6. p. 536. Si quis presbyter, diaconus, subdiaconus, vel clericus, symbolum, quod inspirante Sancto Spiritu apostoli tradiderunt, vel fidem sancti Athanasii presulis irreprensibiliter non recensuerit, ab episcopo condemnatur.

⁸⁰ Paræus, Not. in Symbol. Athanas. ad calcem Ursin.

Catech. p. 124.

⁸¹ Usser. de Symbolis, p. 29.

⁸² Euseb. lib. 1. cap. 13, Ἐσμίκρυνεν αὐτὴ τὴν θεότητα. — Κατέβη εἰς τὸν ᾄδην, καὶ διέσχισε φραγμὸν, &c. It is worth our observation to compare the apostle's expression, Phil. ii. 7, ἐαυτὸν ἐκένωσε, "He made himself of no reputation," or, he emptied himself, with this expression of Thaddæus, ἐσμίκρυνεν αὐτὴ τὴν θεότητα, He lessened, or made a diminutive show and appearance of his Godhead. For these places mutually explain one another, and are a solid proof that the divinity of Christ in the apostolical age was one of the principal articles of the Christian faith.

⁸³ Pagi, Critic. in Baron. an. 41. n. 3.

CHAPTER V.

OF THE ORIGINAL, NATURE, AND REASONS OF THE ANCIENT DISCIPLINE, IN CONCEALING THE SACRED MYSTERIES OF THE CHURCH FROM THE CATECHUMENS.

Sect. 1.
The errors and pretences of the Romanists upon this point.

THAT which makes this inquiry a little more necessary, is the several vain pretences of the Romanists concerning the original and reasons of this discipline. Bellarmine and others urge it as a mighty argument for transubstantiation in particular, as if the concealing the mystery of the eucharist from the catechumens, was an indication of the belief of the church concerning the real presence of Christ's body and blood, which they were so studiously careful to hide from the knowledge of the catechumens. But this is abundantly refuted by a more accurate observation of Albspinæus, a learned bishop of the same communion, who in his book of the Ancient Polity of the Church relating to the Eucharist,¹ as I find him cited by others,² rejects this as an incompetent proof of the Romish doctrine of the real presence. For he rightly observes, that the ancients concealed not only the mystery of the eucharist, but also the sacrament of baptism from the catechumens; yea, and almost all other their sacred rites and ceremonies, which in a large sense are called sacraments, as the oil of chrism or confirmation, and the ordination of priests, which were as studiously concealed from the knowledge or inspection of the uninitiated, as the elements of the holy eucharist were. So that the bare concealing that mystery from the catechumens, could no more be an argument of transubstantiation in the bread and wine in the eucharist, than it was in the waters of baptism, or any other ceremony where the same silence and caution was used.

The learned Schelstrate, with a subtle invention, has made a more general use of this ancient practice, to palliate and excuse all the novel doctrines and practices of his own church. He wrote a book which he entitled Disciplina Arcani, a book highly magnified by Pagi and others of his own communion,³ as stopping the mouths of the protestants, when they ask the Romanists, why no footsteps of their modern doctrines and practices appear in the earliest writers of the church; the answer is ready upon all occasions, from this Disciplina Arcani, that it was because these doctrines and practices were kept secret, and only handed down by tradition, not committed to writing, lest they should come to the knowledge of the uninitiated Jews and Gentiles, and the catechumens of the church. This is the reason, he tells us, why there is no account of the seven sacraments, nor of the worship of saints or images, in the first writers of the church. The things were really believed and practised from the days of the apostles, as he will have it, but kept secret, as the hidden mysteries of religion, which were not to be divulged to any but such as were initiated and prepared to know them.

This is an artifice that would justify as many errors and vanities as any church could be guilty of: it is but working a little with this admirable instrument and tool, called disciplina arcani, and then all the seeming contradictions between the ancient doctrines and practices of the church universal, and the novel corruptions of the modern church of Rome, will presently vanish and disappear. So that we need not wonder, why men, whose interest it serves so much, should magnify this as a noble invention. When yet in truth it is only a veil and a mist cast before the reader's eyes, which may be easily dispelled by giving a true account of that ancient piece of discipline and practice, first in its original, and then in the nature, use, and reasons of it.

As to its original, the learned Albspinæus has rightly observed, That in the apostolical age, and some time after, they were not so very strict in this discipline of concealing their sacred mysteries from the knowledge of the catechumens. For he thus argues against the antiquity of the book called the Apostolical Constitutions: The last words, says he,⁴ which forbid the publication of those eight books, do plainly show, that they were not written in the first age; for the Christians of the first age did never make any scruple of publishing their mysteries, as appears from the writings of Justin Martyr. Mr. Aubertine observes⁵ the same out of Athenagoras and Tatian. And Daille⁶ joins in opinion with Albspinæus, and cites his authority with approbation. And Basnage is⁷ so far from thinking, that the apostles concealed their mysteries from the catechumens, that he rather supposes they administered the sacraments in their presence. Upon which supposition, the whole

Sect. 2.
This discipline not strictly observed in the very first ages of the church.

¹ Albspin. Police de l'ancienne Eglise, &c. lib. 1. c. 2. p. 47.

² Albertin. de Eucharist. lib. 2. p. 703.

³ Pagi, Critic. in Baron. an. 118. n. 4.

⁴ Albspin. Observat. lib. 1. c. 13. p. 38. Postrema verba, quibus cavetur, ne octo libri Constitutionum Apostolicarum publicentur, aperte indicant, eas primis sæculis factas non esse, cum primi sæculi Christiani sua lubentes mysteria, ut vel ex Justino constat, enuntiant.

⁵ Albertin. de Eucharist. lib. 2. p. 709.

⁶ Dallæus de Scriptis Ignatii, lib. 1. c. 22. p. 142.

⁷ Basnage. Exercitat. in Baron. p. 419. Alta de mysteriis silentia non agebant apostoli, nec catechumenos arcebant a sacramentorum conspectu.

fabric which Schelstrate builds upon the disciplina arcani, is ruined at once. For then it is certain, the apostles had no such fear or caution upon them, lest the catechumens should come to the knowledge of the Christian rites or doctrines, as is pretended. And indeed any one that looks into the writings of the apostles, may perceive with half an eye, that they were far enough from concealing their opinion about the worship of angels, saints, and images; for they expressly write against it. And when they speak of the mysteries of baptism and the eucharist, they do it with the greatest freedom, without any fear or apprehension of giving offence to the catechumens.

Nay, and when this discipline was first introduced into the Christian church, it is very evident, it was done for different reasons than those which the Romanists pretend. The first beginning of it seems to have been about the time of Tertullian; for he is the first writer that makes any mention of it. He says,⁸ There was a secrecy and silence observed in all mysteries. And he blames the heretics of his own times for not regarding something of this discipline. They made no distinction, he says,⁹ between believers and catechumens; they all met together, they all heard together, they all prayed together. And if heathens chanced to come in upon them, they gave that which was holy to dogs, and cast their pearls, such as they were, before swine. Here it is plain, the church now made several distinctions between catechumens and believers, which heretics did not. The place of the catechumens was now in a separate part of the church; they heard sermons, but not all that believers were allowed to hear; they had prayers for themselves, but were not admitted to hear the prayers of the faithful, which were peculiar to the celebration of the eucharist, from which catechumens were excluded. But all this was, and might be done, without favouring in the least the vain pretences of the modern Arcanists; for in all this there was no design to conceal such mysteries as the worship of saints, and angels, and images, from the knowledge of the catechumens; but on the contrary, Tertullian speaks openly of these kinds of worship, and with indignation condemns them as superstitious practices, belonging only to heathens or heretics, and not to the mysteries of the church.

⁸ Tertul. Apol. c. 7. Ex forma omnibus mysteriis silentii fides adhibetur.

⁹ Tertul. de Præscript. advers. Hæretic. cap. 41. In primis quis catechumenus, quis fidelis, incertum est: pariter adeunt, pariter audiunt, pariter orant: etiam ethnici si supervenerint, sanctum canibus, et porcis margaritas, licet non veras, jactabunt.

¹⁰ Conc. Arausican. can. 19. Ad baptisterium catechumeni nunquam admittendi.

And in the following ages, no writer that mentions this discipline, among all those that give us a more particular account of what things were concealed from the knowledge or inspection of the catechumens, ever so much as intimates, that the worship of saints and images was in the number of the mysteries of the church which they concealed from them. But the mysteries which they were so careful in some measure to hide from them, were, 1. The manner of administering baptism. 2. The unction of chrism or confirmation. 3. The ordination of priests. 4. The manner of celebrating the eucharist. 5. The liturgy or Divine service of the church. 6. And for some time, the mystery of the Trinity, the creed, and the Lord's prayer, till they became greater proficients, and were ready for baptism. In the first place, that they were careful to conceal from them the manner of administering baptism, appears from this, that catechumens were never so much as suffered to enter¹⁰ or look into the baptistery, or place where baptism was administered, according to the order of the first council of Orange. St. Basil therefore says,¹¹ Baptism, the eucharist, and the oil of chrism, were things that the uninitiated were not allowed to look upon. And St. Austin,¹² putting the question, What things were kept secret, and not made public in the church? answers, The sacrament of baptism, and the sacrament of the eucharist. For even pagans may see our good works, but the sacraments are kept hidden from them. And as they did not admit catechumens to see baptism administered, so neither did they ordinarily discourse of it before them in plain terms, but in a mystical way, or else wholly excluded them from such discourses, as incompetent hearers. We do not speak openly, says St. Cyril,¹³ of the sacraments before the catechumens, but deliver many things covertly, that the faithful who know them, may understand us, and they who know them not, may receive no harm. So Theodoret,¹⁴ We discourse of mysteries obscurely because of the unbaptized; but when they are gone, we speak plainly before the initiated. In like manner Nazianzen,¹⁵ speaking of baptism, You have heard, says he, so much of the mystery as we are allowed to speak publicly in the ears of all, and the rest you shall hear privately, which you must retain secret within yourself, and keep under the seal of baptism. A great many other passages may be read

Sect. 4.
This proved from a particular account of the things which they concealed from the catechumens. Which were, 1. The manner of administering baptism.

¹¹ Basil. de Spiritu Sancto, c. 27. "Α οὐδὲ ἐποπτεύειν ἔξεστι τοῖς ἀμύητοις, t. 2. p. 352.

¹² Aug. Com. in Psal. ciii. Concio. 1. t. 8. p. 484. Quid est quod occultum est, et non publicum in ecclesia? Sacramentum baptismi, sacramentum eucharistiæ. Opera nostra bona vident et pagani, sacramenta vero occultantur illis.

¹³ Cyril. Catech. 6. n. 16.

¹⁴ Theodor. Quæst. 15. in Numer. t. 1. p. 149.

¹⁵ Naz. Orat. 40. de Bapt. t. 1. p. 672.

in Chrysostom,¹⁶ Theodoret,¹⁷ Cyril of Alexandria,¹⁸ the author under the name of Dionysius the Areopagite,¹⁹ and the Apostolical Canons,²⁰ with many others to the same purpose. From all which we learn, that though the ancients acquainted the catechumens with the doctrine of baptism so far as to make them understand the spiritual nature and design of it, yet they never admitted them to the sight of the outward ceremony, nor so much as to hear any plain discourse about the manner of its administration, till they were fitted and prepared for the actual reception of it.

And they observed the same discipline in reference to the holy unction or chrism, which the Latins call imposition of hands, or confirmation. St. Basil,²¹ speaking of the oil which was used to be consecrated and used in this ceremony, says, It was one of those things which the uninitiated were not allowed to look upon. And Pope Innocent I., writing to another bishop about confirmation, and the form of words used in the administration of it, says, He could²² not repeat the words, lest he should seem to disclose the mystery, rather than answer the question proposed.

A third thing which they concealed from the catechumens, was the ordination of priests. The council of Laodicea²³ has a canon to this purpose, That ordinations shall not be performed in the presence of the hearers, that is, the catechumens. And Chrysostom, speaking of this office, and the solemn prayers used at the consecration, delivers himself in an obscure and covert way, because of the catechumens. He that ordains, says he, requires the prayers of the church,²⁴ and they then join their suffrage, and echo forth those words which the initiated know. For we may not speak them openly before the uninitiated catechumens.

A fourth thing which they concealed from the catechumens, was the public liturgy or solemn prayers of the church. For one rank of the catechumens, the audientes or hearers, were only permitted to stay and hear the sermon, but not any prayers of the church. Another sort, called kneelers or prostrators, had the prayers of the church particularly for themselves, but no others. And the competentes stayed only to hear the prayers offered up for themselves and the energumens, and then were dismissed. They might not stay to hear so much as the prayers for the penitents, much less the prayers for the church militant, or any others preceding the communion. But before all these, the usual word of command was given by the deacons, or sacred heralds of the church, Nemo quis audientium, or, Ite, missa est, Catechumens, depart. From whence it is easy to collect further, that the solemn office of the absolution of penitents was never performed in the presence of the catechumens. For the time of absolution was not till all others were dismissed, except the penitents themselves who were to be absolved, which was immediately before their going to the altar to begin the communion service. As seems to be clear from those words of Optatus, where he speaks of it as the common custom, both in the church and among the Donatists,²⁵ to give imposition of hands for absolution, immediately before their going to say the Lord's prayer at the altar. All these things therefore were kept secret from the catechumens; for they were never suffered to be hearers or spectators of any part of them.

But as the eucharist was the highest mystery in the Christian service, so they were most careful to conceal the manner of its celebration from the catechumens. And in this they made a difference between one sort of penitents and the catechumens. For the highest class of penitents, called consistentes or co-standers, were allowed to be present at the communion prayers, and see the oblation offered and received by the faithful, though they might not partake with them. But catechumens of all ranks were wholly excluded from all this. They were always dismissed before these prayers began, and the doors of the church were locked and guarded by proper officers, to the intent that no uninitiated person should indiscreetly rush in upon them. We shut the doors, says Chrysostom,²⁶ when we celebrate the holy mysteries, and drive away all uninitiated persons. This was one of the secrets of the church, as we heard St. Austin before²⁷ speak of it; one of the things which a catechumen might not look upon, according to St. Basil.²⁸ Therefore the author of the Apostolical Constitutions²⁹ makes it part of the deacon's office, not only to command their absence, but also to keep Sect. 5. Secondly, The manner of administering the holy unction or confirmation.

Sect. 6. Thirdly, The ordination of priests.

Sect. 7. Fourthly, The liturgy or public prayers of the church, such as the prayers for the energumens, penitents, and the faithful.

Sect. 8. Fifthly, The manner of celebrating the eucharist.

¹⁶ Chrys. Hom. 40. in 1 Cor. p. 688. Hom. 46. in Act. p. 868. t. 4. Ed. Savil.

¹⁷ Theodor. Hæret. Fabul. lib. 5. c. 18.

¹⁸ Cyril. adv. Julian. lib. 7. t. 6. p. 247. ¹⁹ Dionys. Eccles. Hierar. c. 2. p. 251. ²⁰ Canon. Apost. c. 85.

²¹ Basil. de Spiritu Sancto. c. 27.

²² Innocent. Ep. 1. ad Decentium Eugubin. c. 3. Verba vero dicere non possum, ne magis prodere videar, quam ad consultationem respondere.

²³ Conc. Laodic. can. 5. Μη δέιν τὰς χειροτονίας ἐπι παρουσία ἀκροωμένων γίνεσθαι.

²⁴ Chrysost. Hom. 18. in 2 Cor. p. 872. Ὁ μέλλων χειροτονεῖν, τὰς ἐκείνων εὐχὰς καλεῖ τότε, καὶ αὐτοὶ ἐπιμνησίζονται, καὶ ἐπιβοῶσιν, ἀπερ ἴσισιν οἱ μεμνημένοι· οὐ γὰρ δὴ ζέμεις ἐπὶ τῶν ἀμνητῶν ἐκκαλόπτειν ἅπαντα.

²⁵ Optat. cont. Parmen. lib. 2. p. 57. Inter vicina momenta, dum manus imponitis et delicta donatis, mox ad altare conversi, Dominicam orationem prætermittere non potestis. Vid. Constitut. Apost. lib. 8. cap. 6—9.

²⁶ Chrys. Hom. 23. in Mat. p. 236.

²⁷ Aug. in Psal. ciii. ²⁸ Basil. de Spir. Sanct. c. 27.

²⁹ Constitut. Apost. lib. 2. c. 57. lib. 8. c. 11.

the doors, that none might come in, during the time of the oblation. Epiphanius³⁰ and St. Jerom³¹ bring it as a charge against the Marcionites, that they despised this discipline, and admitted catechumens indiscriminately with the faithful to all their mysteries. And Palladius³² forms a like charge against the enemies of Chrysostom, that in the tumult they raised against him, they gave occasion to the uninitiated to break into the church, and see those things which it was not lawful for them to set their eyes upon. Nay, so strict was the church then in the observation of this discipline, that Athanasius convicted the Meletians of false witness against him, when they pretended to prove, by the testimony of some catechumens, that Macarius, one of his presbyters, had overturned the communion table in the time of the oblation: he argued, that this could not be so, because,³³ if the catechumens were present, there could then be no oblation.

Nor did they only exclude catechumens from the sight of these mysteries, but also from all discourses which treated plainly about them. They made a distinction between moral and mysterious subjects, and admitted the catechumens to the one, but not to the other, as I have had occasion formerly to show³⁴ from the testimonies of Theodoret,³⁵ St. Austin,³⁶ and St. Ambrose.³⁷ To which we may here add that of St. Cyril of Jerusalem: You was once, says he, a catechumen, and then we³⁸ did not discourse of mysteries to you: and now that you have attained by experience to the height of those things which we teach, you will easily perceive that catechumens are not worthy to be hearers of such things. And that of Gaudentius, bishop of Brixia, who in his sermon to the neophytes,³⁹ or persons newly baptized, tells them, he would now open to them those mysteries, which could not be explained in the presence of the catechumens. Sometimes indeed they spake of the eucharist before the catechumens in their popular discourses; but then they did it in such obscure and figurative terms as were understood only by communicants, and not by the catechumens: according to that of St. Chrysostom;⁴⁰ I would speak plainly, but I dare not because of the unbaptized. For they make our expositions to be more difficult, they compel us to speak obscurely, or else we must reveal what is not to be revealed unto them. Upon this account Epiphanius, speaking of the words of institution before the catechumens, would not say, This bread is my body, this wine is my blood; but Hoc meum est hoc et hoc, This is my that and that,⁴¹ to let the initiated know his meaning, and not the catechumens. And hence it was they so often used that phrase, "Ἰσασον οἱ μεμνημένοι, Et nōrunt fideles, The initiated know what we say; which phrase Casaubon⁴² has observed to occur no less than fifty times in the writings of St. Chrysostom. Casaubon makes another good observation upon this matter, which the learned Albertinus takes from him,⁴³ and strenuously defends: That whereas there are three things in the eucharist; 1. The symbols, or sacred elements of bread and wine; 2. The things signified by them; and, 3. The rites of celebration; that which the ancients laboured chiefly to conceal from the catechumens, was not the things signified, but only the symbols or outward signs, and the rites and manner of celebration. For they made no scruple to call the eucharist by the name of Christ's body and blood before the catechumens, at the same time that they would not call it bread and wine, or speak particularly of the form and manner of administering it, as Albertinus proves out of Theodoret and many others. Which shows, that the reason of concealing the mystery from the catechumens was not the belief of transubstantiation, as the Romanists pretend; for then they would have chosen rather to conceal the names of Christ's body and blood, than the names of the outward symbols, and the mystical rites of celebration, the latter of which they studiously concealed, but not the former. He that would see more of this, may consult the elaborate discourse of that most acute and learned writer, where he answers all the objections of Cof-fetellus against the present assertion.

The last sort of things which they for some time concealed from the more imperfect catechumens, were the sublimer doctrines of Christianity, such as the mystery of the Trinity, and hypostatic union, together with the creed itself and the Lord's prayer, which the catechumens did not learn till immediately before their baptism. For so Theodoret tells us,⁴⁴ that they did not teach this prayer to the uninitiated, but to the baptized, or immediate candidates of baptism. For no one that was not baptized could presume to say, "Our Father which art in heaven;" not having yet received the

Sect. 9.
Sixthly, The mystery of the Trinity, the creed, and the Lord's prayer, from the first sort of catechumens.

³⁰ Epiphanius, Hæres. 42. n. 3.

³¹ Hieron. Com. in Galat. vi. t. 9. p. 199.

³² Palladius, Vit. Chrysostom. c. 9. The same complaint is made by Chrysostom himself in his first epistle to Pope Innocent, t. 4. p. 681. Edit. Front. Ducæi.

³³ Athanasius, Apol. 2. t. 1. p. 747.

³⁴ Book I. chap. 4. sect. 8.

³⁵ Theodoret. Quæst. 15. in Numer.

³⁶ Aug. Serm. 1. ad Neophytos, in Append. t. 10. p. 845.

³⁷ Ambrosius, de Initiatis, c. 1. ³⁸ Cyril. Catech. Præf. n. 7.

³⁹ Gaudentius, Serm. 2. ad Neophytos, Bibl. Patr. t. 2. p. 14. Ea solum aperienda neophytis, quæ præsentibus catechumenis explanari non possunt.

⁴⁰ Chrysostomus, Hom. 40. in 1 Cor. p. 688.

⁴¹ Epiphanius, Anchorat. n. 57.

⁴² Casaubon, Exercit. 16. in Baron. p. 490.

⁴³ Albertinus, de Euchar. lib. 2. p. 708.

⁴⁴ Theodoretus, Epitom. Divin. Decret. lib. 5. Hæret. Fabul. c. 28. Ταῦτην τὴν προσευχὴν οὐ τοῖς ἀμνήτοις, ἀλλὰ τοῖς μυσταγωγουμένοις διδάσκωμεν.

gift of adoption. But he that was made partaker of baptism might call God his Father, as being adopted among the sons of grace. St. Chrysostom⁴⁵ speaks after the same manner: This prayer belongs only to the faithful, as both the rule of the church and the beginning of the prayer itself teach. For an unbaptized person cannot yet call God his Father. This prayer was then peculiar to the communion service, and never used in the church, but only at the altar, where none of the catechumens could be present, but only the faithful. Whence it was called, ἐχθὴ πτωχῶν, the prayer of the faithful. And one petition in it was thought to refer more particularly to the eucharist, "Give us this day our daily bread," ἄρον ἐπιούσιον, our super-substantial or super-celestial bread, as many of the ancients render it. For these reasons they never taught the Lord's prayer to any of the catechumens but the highest rank of them, the competentes, a few days before their baptism. As we learn from those words of St. Austin,⁴⁶ Now learn the Lord's prayer, which ye must repeat eight days hence, when ye are to be baptized. So they received it only on Saturday before Palm Sunday, in order to repeat it on Saturday before Easter, which was the day of their baptism.

They observed the same discipline in reference to the creed, which they taught to the catechumens at the same time only as they did the Lord's prayer, a little before their baptism. This they did not always commit to writing, but kept it, as St. Jerom⁴⁷ words it, in tables of the heart, and delivered it by word of mouth, that it might not come to the knowledge of the uninitiated and unbelievers. Which is the reason that Sozomen gives,⁴⁸ why he did not insert the words of the Nicene Creed into his history, because probably many uninitiated persons might read his book, who ought not to read or hear the creed. They were as careful not to communicate to new beginners the profound mysteries of the Trinity and incarnation, till they had first prepared them by proper preceding instructions for the reception of them. Therefore, as St. Jerom observes,⁴⁹ it was the custom of the church to put off this part of the instruction of catechumens to the last, and not acquaint them with these doctrines till about forty days before they were to be baptized, though the catechetical instruction had continued perhaps for two or three years before.

This was the whole of that discipline we read so much of among the ancients, of concealing the sacred mysteries from the catechumens. Among all which we have never the least intimation given, that the practice of image-worship, or the adoration of saints and angels, or the doctrine of seven sacraments, were the mysteries they intended to conceal from them. For in those days there were no such mysteries in the Christian church. And therefore the late invention of Schelstrate is a mere fiction and sophism, to cover the nakedness of the present Roman church. And the pretence of Bona,⁵⁰ concerning the prohibition of images in churches made by the council of Eliberis, that it was only to conceal the secrets of religion from the knowledge of the heathen, is an absurd supposition, which neither Albaspinæus nor Petavius could digest, as I have showed more fully in another place,⁵¹ where I speak of the ornaments of the ancient churches.

As to those things which they really concealed from the catechumens, the true reasons were, first, That the plainness and simplicity of the Christian rites might not be contemned by them, or give any occasion of scandal or offence to them, before they were thoroughly instructed about the nature of the mysteries. For both Jews and Gentiles, out of whom Christian converts were made catechumens, were apt to deride the nakedness and simplicity of the Christian religion, as void of those pompous ceremonies and sacrifices, with which those other religions abounded. The Christian religion prescribed but one washing in water, and one oblation of bread and wine, instead of that multitude of bloody sacrifices which the other religions commanded. Therefore, lest the plainness of these few ceremonies should offend the prejudiced minds of catechumens, before they were well instructed about them, the Christian teachers usually adorned these mysteries with great and magnificent titles, such as would convey noble ideas to the minds of men concerning their spiritual effects, but concealing their other names, lest the simplicity of the things should offend them. When they spake of the eucharist, they never mentioned bread and wine, but the sacrifice of the body and blood of Christ; and styled baptism, illumination and life, the sacrament of faith and remission of sins, saying little in the mean time of the outward element of water. This was one plain reason, why they denied catechumens the sight of their sacraments, and always spake in mystical terms be-

Sect. 10.
Reasons for concealing these things from the catechumens. First, That the plainness and simplicity of them might not be contemned.

⁴⁵ Chrysos. Hom. 20. al. 19. in Matt. p. 200. Hom. 2. in 2 Cor. p. 740.

⁴⁶ Aug. Hom. 42. ex 50. t. 10. p. 195. Tenete ergo hanc orationem, quam reddituri estis ad octo dies.—Ad octo dies ab hodierno die reddituri estis hanc orationem, quam hodie accepistis.

⁴⁷ Hieron. Ep. 61. ad Pammach. c. 9. p. 173. Symbolum fidei et spei nostræ, quod ab apostolis traditum, non scribitur in charta et atramento, sed in tabulis cordis carnalibus.

⁴⁸ Sozomen. lib. 1. c. 20.

⁴⁹ Hieron. Epist. 61. ad Pammach. c. 4. p. 167. Consuetudo apud nos istiusmodi est, ut his qui baptizandi sunt, per quadraginta dies publice tradamus sanctam et adorandam Trinitatem.

⁵⁰ Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. 1. cap. 16. n. 2.

⁵¹ Book VIII. chap. 8. sect. 6.

fore them. We shut the doors, says Chrysostom,⁵² when we celebrate our mysteries, and keep off all uninitiated persons from them, not because we acknowledge any imperfection in the things themselves, but because many are weakly affected toward them. And so St. Cyril,⁵³ in the place mentioned above, We speak not openly of our mysteries before the catechumens, but say many things mystically and obscurely, that they who know them may understand us, and they who know them not may receive no harm. In like manner the synod of Alexandria,⁵⁴ charging the Meletians for publishing the mystery of the eucharist before the catechumens, and what was worse, before the heathens, contrary to those rules of Scripture, "It is good to conceal the secrets of a king;" and, "Give not that which is holy unto dogs, neither cast ye your pearls before swine;" they add, that it is not lawful to bring mysteries upon the open stage before the uninitiated, lest the heathen, through their ignorance, should deride them, or the catechumens, by their curiosity, should be offended. Therefore there was an ancient rule in the church, That if any uninitiated person had by any mistake been admitted to partake of the eucharist, he should be immediately instructed and baptized, that he might not go forth a contemner or despiser, as the author of the Apostolical Constitutions⁵⁵ words it. And the fourth council of Toledo gives a like reason⁵⁶ why such Jews as had been baptized by force, should continue in the Christian profession, lest the name of God should be blasphemed, and the faith which they had received should be reputed vile and contemptible; though they made a severe decree against obliging any Jews to be baptized by force or compulsion for the future.

Another reason assigned for this discipline of silence, was to conciliate a reverence in the minds of men for the mysteries which they kept so concealed from them. For, as St. Basil observes,⁵⁷ the veneration of mysteries is preserved by silence. And as things that are trite and obvious are easily contemned, so those that are uncommon and reserved are naturally adapted to beget in men an esteem and veneration.

And therefore he thinks, the apostles and fathers of the church, who made laws about these matters, prescribed secrecy and silence, to preserve the dignity of the mysteries. St. Austin⁵⁸ gives the same reason for this practice, when he says, it was the honour that was due to the mysteries, which made him pass them over in silence, and not explain them.

St. Austin adds to this a third reason, which is, that the mysteries of baptism and the eucharist were therefore chiefly concealed from the catechumens, to excite their curiosity, and inflame their zeal, and make them more earnest and solicitous in hastening to partake of them, that they might come to an experimental knowledge of them. Though the sacraments, says he, are not disclosed⁵⁹ to the catechumens, it is not always because they cannot bear them, but that they may so much the more ardently desire them, by how much they are the more honourably hidden from them. And again, The Jews' acknowledge not the priesthood⁶⁰ according to the order of Melchisedeck. I speak to the faithful; if the catechumens understand it not, let them cast away their slowness and hasten to the knowledge of it. They that do not yet eat of this⁶¹ banquet, let them hasten upon invitation. The feast of Easter is at hand. Give in your name to baptism. If the festival does not excite you, let curiosity draw you, that you may know that which is said, "He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me, and I in him."

These were the reasons which engaged the ancients to conceal their mysteries from the catechumens: which, we plainly see, have no relation to such doctrines as that of transubstantiation, or the number of seven sacraments, or such superstitious practices as the worship of images, or saints and angels, which are mere novelties, and the modern inventions of the Romish church.

I have now gone through all things relating to the discipline of the catechumens in their preparation for baptism. We are next to take a view of baptism itself, and inquire into the manner how the church administered it, and what rites and customs were observed in the celebration of it.

⁵² Chrys. Hom. 23. in Mat. p. 236.

⁵³ Cyril. Catech. 6. n. 16.

⁵⁴ Apud Athanas. Apol. 2. t. 1. p. 731.

⁵⁵ Constit. Apost. lib. 7. c. 25.

⁵⁶ Conc. Tolet. 4. can. 56. Oportet ut fidem etiam, quam vi vel necessitate susceperunt, tenere cogantur, ne nomen Domini blasphemetur, et fides, quam susceperunt, vilis ac contemptibilis habeatur.

⁵⁷ Basil. de Spir. Sancto, c. 27.

⁵⁸ Aug. Serm. 1. inter 40. Edit. a Sirmondo, t. 10. Non mirari debetis, fratres charissimi, quod inter ipsa mysteria de mysteriis nihil diximus, quod non statim ea quæ tradidimus interpretati sumus. Adhibuimus enim tam sanctis rebus atque divinis honorem silentii.

⁵⁹ Aug. Hom. 96. in Joh. Et si catechumenis sacramenta fidelium non produntur, non ideo fit quod ea ferre non possint, sed ut tanto ardentius ab eis concupiscantur, quanto eis honorabilius occultantur.

⁶⁰ Aug. Hom. in Psal. cix. Judæi non agnoscunt sacerdotium secundum ordinem Melchisedek. Fidelibus loquor, si quid non intelligunt catechumeni, auferant pigritiam, festinent ad notitiam.

⁶¹ Id. de Verbis Domini, Hom. 46. Qui nondum manducant, ad tales epulas invitati festinent.—Ecce Pascha est, da nomen ad baptismum. Si non te excitat festivitas, ducat ipsa curiositas, ut scias quid dictum sit, Qui manducat carnem meam et bibit sanguinem meum, manet in me, et ego in eo.

Sect. 12.
Thirdly, To make the catechumens more desirous to know them.

BOOK XI.

OF THE RITES AND CUSTOMS OBSERVED IN THE ADMINISTRATION OF BAPTISM IN THE PRIMITIVE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

OF THE SEVERAL NAMES AND APPELLATIONS OF BAPTISM IN THE PRIMITIVE CHURCH.

Sect. 1.
The names of baptism most commonly taken from the spiritual effects of it.

THERE are a great many questions relating to the doctrine of baptism, which I intend not to make any part of the subject of this Book, because they may be found in any didactical and polemical writers upon this head, and especially in Vossius his elaborate discourse De Baptismo, where he accurately canvasses all questions of this nature, and learnedly determines them from the doctrine of the ancients. Here the reader may find a satisfactory account of all questions relating to the mystical signification and spiritual effects of baptism; such as are, 1. Regeneration; 2. Adoption; 3. Reception into the covenant of grace. In which also is contained remission of sins, renovation of the spirit, and eternal life, which are the noble effects conferred on all those that rightly receive it. Here also he determines the questions, How it comes to pass, that though sins are forgiven in baptism, yet concupiscence, the fuel or incentive of sin, remains still in the regenerate? And whence it is, that after baptism, we are still afflicted with diseases, and that as well infants as adult persons? How it comes to pass, that the magistrate has power to punish those sins which are committed before baptism, even after they are purged away and forgiven in baptism? With many other questions of the like nature, which are not necessary to come into this discourse. I shall also omit the question about the indelible character of baptism, which is pretended to be impressed upon the soul; and the questions about the administrator of baptism, and lay baptism, and heretical baptism, because I have lately considered these distinctly and fully in a first and second part of the Scholastical History of Lay Baptism. What remains therefore to be considered in this place, is only such other matters in the practice of the ancient church relating to the administration of baptism, as have not yet been spoken to. And here, first of all, it will be proper to say something of the ancient names of baptism; some of which were taken from the internal and spiritual effects of it; others, from the nature and substance of the action; others, from the conditions required in the receivers; others, from the external circumstances and rites observed in the administration.

From one of its noble effects, it was sometimes styled indulgentia, indulgence, or absolution and remission of sins. Thus, in the African council under Cyprian,¹ Privatianus a Suffetula terms it, the Divine indulgence. And in the Roman council mentioned by Cotelerius,² it is said, That at the Easter festival, remission of sins, meaning baptism, may be administered by either presbyter or deacon, in the presence of the bishop in the parish churches. But, forasmuch as absolution or remission of sins may not always necessarily accompany baptism, through some default in the administrator or the receiver, though the baptism be otherwise a true baptism; therefore St. Austin, in disputing with the Donatists, chooses rather to call it³ the sacrament of grace, and the sacrament of absolution, rather than grace or absolution itself; because wicked men may receive the sacrament of baptism, but they cannot receive the grace of baptism, which is absolution, or remission of sins; for God grants that to none but those that turn to him with a sincere faith and true repentance. Whenever therefore the ancients call baptism by the name of abso-

Sect. 2.
Hence baptism called indulgentia, indulgence, or absolution.

¹ Conc. Carthag. ap. Cypr. n. 19. p. 231. Si hæresis a Deo est, habere et indulgentiam Divinam potest.

² Conc. Rom. can. 7. ap. Coteler. Not. in Const. Apost. lib. 3. c. 9. Paschæ tempore presbyter et diaconus per parochias dare remissionem peccatorum et ministerium implere consueverunt, etiam præsentem episcopo.

³ Aug. de Bapt. lib. 5. c. 21. Sacramentum gratiæ dat Deus etiam per malos: ipsam vero gratiam non nisi per seipsum vel per sanctos suos.—Baptismum vero, quod est sacramentum remissionis peccatorum, nulli dubium est habere etiam homicidas posse, &c.

lution or indulgence, they are to be understood with this limitation, that it is so only to those who are worthy receivers of it. And hence we may observe, that the true ancient proper notion of an absolution, or indulgence, is God's pardoning sin by the ministerial application of his sacraments, which are the seals of his covenant, granting remission of sins: whence baptism, entering men into that covenant of grace, was dignified with the name of the sacrament of absolution and indulgence.

Another noble effect of baptism, was regeneration, or a new birth from the death of sin to the life of righteousness. For every Christian was supposed to be born again by the waters of baptism, according to that of Tertullian,⁴ Nos pisciculi secundum ichthum nostrum Jesum Christum in aqua nascimur, We fishes are born in water, conformable to the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, ichthos; which, as I have observed⁵ in another place, was an acrostic, or technical name, made of the initial letters of our Saviour's several titles in Greek, Ἰησοῦς Χριστός, Θεοῦ Ἰυός, Σωτήρ, which put together, make up the name ΙΧΘΥΣ, which signifies a fish, and is alluded to not only by Tertullian, but by Prosper⁶ and Optatus.⁷ Hence baptism had the name of παλιγγενεσία ψυχῆς,⁸ in Cyril's Catechism, The regeneration of the soul; and ἕδωρ ζωῆς, the water of life, in Justin Martyr;⁹ and fons Divinus, in Cassiodore,¹⁰ the Divine fountain, whence comes our English name, font; with many other titles of the same importance. And because this new birth was wrought by the power and influence of the Spirit, therefore it was called the spiritual birth, whereby those who were born carnally to the world before, were now born spiritually to God. And so, as Optatus words it,¹¹ God was hereby made Father of men, and the holy church their mother. For till men were baptized, they were not perfect members of Christ's body, the church, nor properly adopted into God's family, and consequently had as yet no right to call God their Father, or the church their mother. And because the Divine operations of the Holy Spirit in sanctifying grace, are sometimes in Scripture called the unction or anointing of the Spirit, therefore baptism had also the name of chrisom or unction, from this noble effect attending it. Gregory Nazianzen takes notice of this among many other titles of honour: We call it, says he, the gift,¹² and grace, and baptism, and unction, and illumination, and garment of immortality, and laver of regeneration, and seal or character, and whatever else is precious or honourable. And in explaining these terms, he particularly notes, that it had the name of unction, because it was a sacred and a royal thing, as those things usually were that were anointed. Whence every man was in some sense made a king and a priest to God by Christ in his baptism, upon which account St. Jerom¹³ styles baptism, sacerdotium laici, the layman's priesthood, in contradistinction to the clerical priesthood, which was only conferred by ordination.

Another effect of baptism, was the enlightening men's understandings with Divine knowledge. Hence baptism had the name of φωτισμός, illumination, as it frequently occurs in Chrysostom,¹⁴ Nazianzen,¹⁵ Dionysius the Areopagite,¹⁶ the council of Laodicea,¹⁷ and many others. The reason of which name seems to be partly from the preceding instruction of the catechumens in their preparation for baptism, according to that of Justin Martyr, This laver¹⁸ is called illumination, because the minds of those who learn these things are enlightened. Then again, because it was the entrance on an enlightened state, and the introduction to Divine knowledge, which grew by degrees to greater perfection: for Justin's words may be understood of the knowledge consequent to baptism. And so the reason is given by Clemens Alexandrinus,¹⁹ and the author under the name of Dionysius,²⁰ because it confers the first light, and is the introduction to all other Divine illuminating mysteries, therefore, from the effect, it was dignified with the name of illumination. Perhaps it might be so called in regard also that the baptized were now admitted to all the mysterious parts and recondite knowledge of religion, which by the discipline of the church were kept secret from them whilst they were catechumens. And perhaps some regard might be had to the plentiful effusion of the Spirit in the gift of tongues, knowledge, and prophecy, which in the apostolical age

⁴ Tertul. de Bapt. cap. 1. ⁵ Book I. chap. 1. sect. 2.

⁶ Prosper. de Prædict. et Promissis, par. 2. cap. 39.

⁷ Optat. lib. 3. p. 62. ⁸ Cyril. Catech. Præfat. n. 10.

⁹ Justin. Dial. p. 231.

¹⁰ Cassiodor. in Cantic. cap. 7.

¹¹ Optat. lib. 2. p. 52. Dum Trinitas cum fide concordat, qui natus fuerat sæculo, renascitur spiritualiter Deo. Sic fit hominum Pater Deus, sancta sic fit mater ecclesia.

¹² Naz. Orat. 40. de Bapt. p. 638. Δῶρον καλεῖμεν, χάρισμα, βάπτισμα, χρίσμα, φῶτισμα, ἀφ' ἧρασίας ἐνδύμα, λετρον παλιγγενεσίας, σφραγίδια, πῦν ὅτι τίμιον.

¹³ Hieron. Dialog. advers. Lucifer. cap. 2. Sacerdotium laici, id est, baptismum. Scriptum est enim, Regnum quippe nos et sacerdotes Deo et Patri suo fecit. Et iterum, Gentem sanctam, regale sacerdotium, &c.

¹⁴ Chrysost. Hom. 13. in Heb. p. 1848.

¹⁵ Naz. Orat. 40. de Bapt. p. 638.

¹⁶ Dionys. Hierar. Eccl. cap. 3. ¹⁷ Conc. Laod. can. 47.

¹⁸ Justin. Apol. 2. p. 91. Καλεῖται δὲ τὸ λετρον φωτισμός, ὡς φωτιζομένων τὴν διάνοιαν τῶν ταῦτα μαθησανόντων.

¹⁹ Clem. Alex. Pædagog. lib. 1. c. 6. p. 93.

²⁰ Dionys. Eccl. Hier. cap. 3. p. 283. Ἐπειδὴν πρῶτε φωτὸς μεταδίδωσι, καὶ πασῶν ἐστὶν ἀρχὴ τῶν θεῶν φωταγωγίων, ἐκ τῆς τελεμένης τὴν ἀληθῆ τῆ φωτισματος ἐπιωννμίαν ὑμῶν.

was immediately conferred at baptism, by the imposition of the hands of the apostles.

Another effect of baptism was eternal salvation, as it was the ordinary means, not only of obtaining remission of sins, but of bringing men by the grace and blood of Christ to the glory of the kingdom of heaven. Whence, as St. Austin observes,²¹ it was very common among the Punic or African Christians to call baptism by the name of salus, salvation, as they did the sacrament of the body of Christ by the name of life, because these two sacraments were reputed necessary to the obtaining of salvation or eternal life. And upon this account Gregory Nazianzen, introducing a person pleading for liberty to delay his baptism, makes him speak after this manner: I stay only for my father, or mother, or brother, or wife, or children, or friends, or some near relations, and then I will be saved, τηνικαῦτα σωθήσομαι;²² the meaning of which must needs be, that then he would be baptized, in order to obtain salvation. Such honourable titles and appellations did the ancients give to this sacrament of baptism, taken from the noble effects which it was supposed to confer on all those who were worthy partakers of it.

Next, from the nature and substance of it, it had the names of mysterium, sacramentum, and σφραγίς. The two first of which are so common, and so well known to every reader, that I need not here spend time to explain them. Only I shall note, that the terms, mystery and sacrament, are sometimes taken in a larger sense, to signify any sacred ceremony, or any part of religion that had any thing of spiritual or mystical signification in it. Of which there will be a more proper place to discourse, when we come to treat of confirmation. The name σφραγίς, and signaculum, the seal of the Lord, is a little more uncommon, as applied to baptism, and therefore has occasioned some errors among learned men, who often mistake it either for the sign of the cross, or the consignation and unction that was used in confirmation. Thus in that famous discourse of Clemens Alexandrinus, entitled, Quis Dives salvetur, part of which is recorded in Eusebius,²³ and the whole published by Combefis,²⁴ it is said, that the bishop, to whose care St. John had committed a certain young convert, first instructed or catechised him, and then gave him the perfect phylactery or preservative against sin, namely, the seal of the Lord, τὴν σφραγίδα τοῦ Κυρίου. Now, by the seal of the Lord, Christopherson, and Bellarmine, and others from him, understand confirmation: Mr. Seller,²⁵ and some others, will have it to be the sign of the cross; but Valesius,²⁶ and Daille,²⁷ more truly expound it of baptism, which was called the seal of the Lord, because in the very nature of it there is contained a covenant made between God and man; and baptism being the seal of this covenant, it was with the greatest propriety of speech styled, the seal of the Lord. In this sense the ancient author of the Acts of Paul and Thecla uses the name σφραγίς for baptism. Give me, says Thecla to St. Paul, the seal of Christ,²⁸ and no temptation shall touch me. And Hermas Pastor, in like manner, speaking of some that were baptized and gone to heaven, uses the same dialect: They that are now dead, were sealed²⁹ with the seal of the Son of God, and are entered into the kingdom of God. For before a man receives the name of the son of God, he is consigned over to death; but when he receives that seal, he is freed from death, and consigned over to life. Now, that seal is water, into which men descend bound over to death, but rise out of it marked out or sealed unto life. This seal therefore was preached unto them, and they made use of it, that they might enter into the kingdom of God. In all this passage, there is no express mention made of baptism, but it is called the seal and name of Christ, because it sets the mark and name of Christians on us, and distinguishes us from Jews and Gentiles, and shows that we belong to the dominion and possession of Christ. Hence Tertullian frequently calls it signaculum fidei,³⁰ the signature of our faith; and says, We are distinguished from Jews by this signature in our bodies,³¹ because their signature was circumcision, but ours baptism. In like manner, Gregory Nazianzen, accounting for the reason of this name, says, It was called the seal of the Lord, because it was an indication to whose dominion³² we belong, and because it was the consignation of us to eternal ²¹ Aug. de Pec. Merit. lib. I. c. 24. t. 7. p. 294. Optime Punic Christiani baptismum ipsum nihil aliud quam salutem et sacramentum corporis Christi, nihil aliud quam vitam vocant, &c.

²² Naz. Orat. 40. de Bapt. p. 655. ²³ Euseb. lib. 3. c. 23.

²⁴ Combefis, Auctarium Novissimum, p. 185.

²⁵ Seller, Life of Just. Martyr. p. 102.

²⁶ Vales. Not. in Euseb. lib. 3. c. 23.

²⁷ Dallæus de Confirmat. lib. 2. c. 1. p. 110.

²⁸ Acta Theclæ, ap. Grabe, Spicilieg. t. I. p. 106. Δός μοι τὴν ἐν Χριστῷ σφραγίδα, καὶ ἐχ' ἄψεται μὲ πειρασμός.

²⁹ Hermas Past. lib. 3. Simil. 9. n. 16. Illi igitur defuncti sigillo Filii Dei signati sunt, et intraverunt in regnum Dei. Antequam enim accipiat homo nomen Filii Dei, morti destinatus est: at ubi accipit illud sigillum, liberatur a morte, et traditur vite. Illud autem sigillum aqua est, in quam descendunt homines morti obligati, ascendunt verò vitæ assignati. Et illis igitur prædicatum est illud sigillum, et usi sunt eo ut intrarent in regnum Dei.

³⁰ Tertul. de Spectac. c. 4. Ad principalem auctoritatem convertar, ipsius signaculi nomen. It. c. 24. Hoc erit pompa diaboli, adversus quam in signaculo fidei egeramus.

³¹ Tertul. Apol. c. 21. Neque de ipso signaculo corporis, neque de consortio nominis cum Judæis agimus.

³² Naz. Orat. 40. de Bapt. p. 639.

life. In which respect, Constantine, at the hour of death, desiring the benefit of baptism from the bishops that were about him, is said by Eusebius³³ to ask it in these words: "Now is the time for me to enjoy the seal of immortality; now is the time for me to obtain the seal of salvation." Whence it was also called, the seal of the Spirit, because every worthy receiver was supposed, together with the outward element, to receive the earnest of the Spirit in baptism: according to that of Chrysostom, As a mark is set upon³⁴ soldiers, so the Spirit is put upon true believers; and as the Jews had circumcision for their character, so we have the earnest of the Spirit. And this distinction between the internal and external seal of baptism was necessary to be made, because many men received the external seal of baptism, or the outward form of it, who by their own default could not receive the internal seal of the Spirit. Thus the author of the Apostolical Constitutions³⁵ observes, that even Simon Magus himself received the seal of the Lord, meaning the outward form of baptism; but neither he nor any other author ever said, that he received the internal seal or grace of the Holy Spirit. In like manner Optatus tells the Donatists,³⁶ that both they and the catholics were sealed with one and the same seal, which he explains to be the outward form of baptism, in which they both agreed and were both alike baptized. But both Optatus, and St. Austin, and all other ancient writers are agreed, that heretical and schismatical baptism, such as was that of the Donatists, could not confer the internal seal, or sanctifying graces of the Holy Spirit, because these were only conferred by the ministry of the holy catholic church, of which I have given a more ample account in another place.³⁷ So that in this respect it was always thought necessary to distinguish between the internal and external seal of baptism, because though they are commonly joined together, as in all true believers, yet they are sometimes separated, as in such hypocritical or unworthy receivers, as Simon Magus, and others of the like complexion.

St. Austin commonly uses the names, character regius, and character Dominicus, the royal mark or character, and the character of the Lord. By

Sect. 7.
And character Dominicus, the mark or character of the Lord.

which he does not mean any internal quality, or spiritual power, distinct from baptism, imprinted on the soul, as the modern school-men now love to word it; but only the external form of baptism, which is common to all receivers both good and bad, who are duly baptized in the name of the Holy Trinity; they are so far signed by the mark or character of the Lord, as thereby to be distinguished from unbaptized Jews and Gentiles, who never made any formal profession of Christianity, nor ever received so much as the external character or indication of it. And this character is allowed by St. Austin to be so far indelible also, as that an apostatizing Christian, though he turn Jew or pagan in profession, can never need a second baptism, but only repentance and absolution, to reinstate him in all the privileges of the Christian church. Of which, because I have spoken largely in a former Book, I need say no more in this place.³⁸

Another sort of names given to baptism, were taken from the conditions Sect. 8.
Why called the sacrament of faith and repentance. required of all those that received it, which were, the profession of a true faith and a sincere repentance. Upon which account baptism is sometimes called the sacrament of faith, and the sacrament of repentance. St. Austin uses this name to explain how³⁹ children may be said to have faith, though they are not capable of making any formal profession by themselves: As the sacrament of the body of Christ is in some sort the body of Christ, and the sacrament of the blood of Christ is the blood of Christ, so the sacrament of faith is faith. And upon this account, when the answer is made, that an infant believes, who has not yet the habit of faith, the meaning is, that he has faith because of the sacrament of faith, and that he turns to God because of the sacrament of conversion. Fulgentius uses the same terms in speaking of the necessity of baptism: Firmly believe, and doubt not,⁴⁰ that excepting such as are baptized in their own blood for the name of Christ, no man shall have eternal life, who is not here first turned from his sins by repentance and faith, and set at liberty by the sacrament of faith and repentance, that is, by baptism. Whence we may observe, what the ancients mean, when they speak of penance

³³ Euseb. de Vita Constant. lib. 4. c. 62. "Ὁρα καὶ ἡμᾶς ἀπολαῦσαι τῆς ἀθανάτοιοῦ σφραγίδος· ὅρα τὸ σωτηρίου σφραγίσματος μετασχέιν."

³⁴ Chrysost. Hom. 3. in 2 Cor. in fine. Καθάπερ τραπιώταις σφραγίς, ἴτω καὶ τοῖς πιστοῖς τὸ πνεῦμα ἐπιτίθεται, &c.

³⁵ Constit. Apost. lib. 2. c. 14. Σίμων ὁ μάγος τὴν ἐν Κυριῷ σφραγίδα ἔλαβε. Vid. Aug. de Bapt. lib. 6. c. 12.

³⁶ Optat. lib. 3. p. 72. Pares credimus, et uno sigillo signati sumus: nec aliter baptizati quam vos.

³⁷ Scholast. Hist. of Lay Baptism, part I. chap. 1. n. 21.

³⁸ Ibid. part II. chap. 6.

³⁹ Aug. Ep. 23. ad Bonifac. Sicut secundum quendam modum sacramentum corporis Christi corpus Christi est, et sacramentum sanguinis Christi sanguis Christi est, ita sacramentum fidei fides est.—Ac per hoc cum responderetur parvulus credere, qui nondum fidei habet affectum, responderetur fidem habere propter fidei sacramentum, et convertere se ad Deum propter conversionis sacramentum, &c.

⁴⁰ Fulgent. de Fide ad Petrum, cap. 30. Firmissime tene et nullatenus dubites, exceptis illis, qui pro nomine Christi suo sanguine baptizantur, nullum hominem accepturum vitam eternam, qui non hic a malis suis fuerit per penitentiam fidemque conversus, et per sacramentum fidei et penitentiae, id est, per baptismum, liberatus, &c.

and absolution, or remission of sins, as a sacrament: for they themselves explain their own meaning to be baptism, which is a sacrament requiring repentance as a condition, and granting absolution as an effect and privilege to all worthy receivers.

Lastly, From the ceremonies used in the act of administration it took the peculiar names of baptism, tinction, and laver of regeneration, which properly denote either an immersion in water, or such a washing or sprinkling, as was used among the Jews in some cases, and among Christians when they had occasion to baptize sick persons upon a death-bed. For then baptism was administered by sprinkling only, and not by dipping or immersion, as we shall see when we come to speak more particularly of clinic baptism. So that it must be noted, that baptism in the ancient style of the church, does not absolutely and necessarily import dipping or immersion, though that was the more usual ceremony practised heretofore as well upon infants as adult persons, but an exception was made for the time of sickness, and such other cases of necessity, as could not admit of a total immersion. In which cases, the substance of baptism was still supposed to be preserved, though some minuter circumstances were less regarded.

Besides these names, which were taken from things that more immediately related to the administration of baptism, there were some others alluding to circumcision, and others respecting the great Author and Institutor of it, our Saviour Christ, and others taken from the more remote and distant effects of it, which, because we shall have no further occasion to speak of them, it will not be improper just to mention in this place. Because baptism succeeds in the room of circumcision, and is the seal of the Christian covenant, as that was the seal of the covenant made with Abraham, therefore it is, by way of analogy, sometimes styled the great circumcision. As when Epiphanius, comparing them both together, says, The carnal circumcision⁴¹ served for a time, till the great circumcision came, that is, baptism; which circumcises us from our sins, and seals us in the name of God. So in regard that baptism had Christ for its author, and not man, it was anciently known by the name of δῶρον, and χάρισμα Κυρίου, the gift of the Lord. As in the ancient Acts of Paul and Thecla; when Thecla desired the seal of the Lord, Paul bids her wait with patience, and she should receive δωριάν τοῦ Χριστοῦ, the gift of Christ, which, as the learned editor observes,⁴² is but another way of denoting baptism. Sometimes it was simply called δῶρον, without any other addition, by way of eminence, because it was both a gratuitous and a singular gift of Christ. We call it the gift, says Gregory Nazianzen,⁴³ because it is given to those who offer nothing for it. And St. Basil, δέον ἐπιτρέχειν τῷ δώρῳ, We ought to run to the gift,⁴⁴ meaning baptism. And Casaubon has also further observed,⁴⁵ that because the Spirit was likewise given in baptism, therefore the Holy Ghost had sometimes the name of Mimus, The gift. And the eucharist also, or the sacramental oblation of the body and blood of Christ, both before and after consecration, commonly went by this name, δῶρα and μύστικα δῶρα, of which there are various instances collected out of the ancient rituals by that learned writer, which are not proper to be inserted in this place. Baptism had also the name of ἐφόδιον, or viaticum, as well as the eucharist, which denotes properly the preparation of all things necessary for a journey: in which respect both the sacraments were called viatica, because they were equally esteemed men's necessary provision, and proper armour, both to sustain and conduct them safe on their way in their passage through this world to eternal life. St. Basil, exhorting men of all ages and conditions to receive baptism, makes his address to them in these words:⁴⁶ Art thou a young man? Then secure thy youth by the bridle of baptism. Art thou past the flower of thy age? Then beware thou lose not thy viaticum, thy phylactery, which should keep and preserve thee in thy way to eternal life. In allusion to which name, Gregory Nazianzen,⁴⁷ speaking of the minister's act in baptizing, terms it ἐφοδιάζειν, giving to men their viaticum, or provision for their journey to another world. In reference to the making men complete members of Christ's body, the church, it had the name of τελείωσις and τελετή, the consecration and consummation; because it gave men the perfection of Christians, and a right to partake of the τὸ τέλειον, which was the eucharist, or Lord's supper. It had the name of μύησις, and μυσταγωγία, the initiation, because it was the admittance of men to all the sacred rites and mysteries of the Christian religion. And as the eucharist, from its representing the death of Christ by the outward elements of bread and wine, was called the sacred symbols, so baptism sometimes had the same name, as we find in Isidore of Pelusium, and the author of the Dispute with Arius in the Council of Nice, under the name of Athanasius. Though the priest⁴⁸ be an

Sect. 9.
The notation of the names, baptism, tinction, laver, &c. That they do not universally denote immersion.

Sect. 10.
Of some other names given to baptism.

⁴¹ Epiphan. Hær. 8. al. 28. Cerinth. n. 4. Vid. Just. Mart. Dial. c. Tryph. p. 261.

⁴² Grabe, Spicileg. Patrum, t. 1. p. 106.

⁴³ Naz. Orat. 40. de Bapt. p. 638.

⁴⁴ Basil. Homil. 13. de Bapt. p. 411.

⁴⁵ Casaubon, Exercit. 16. in Baron. n. 51.

⁴⁶ Basil. Homil. 13. de Bapt. p. 413. Μὴ ζημιωθῆς τὰ ἐφόδια, μὴ ἀπολέσῃς τὸ φυλακτήριον.

⁴⁷ Naz. Orat. 40. de Bapt. p. 644.

⁴⁸ Isidor. lib. 2. Ep. 37. Ὁ τελοῦμενος οὐδὲν παραβλάπτεται εἰς τὰ σωτηριώδη σύμβολα, εἰ ὁ ἱερεὺς μὴ εὐ βίουσ ἐῖη, ἀλλ' αὐτὸς μὲν πάντως.

ill liver, says Isidore, the person initiated receives no harm by the symbols of salvation, but only the priest himself. And the other⁴⁹ thus argues for the Divinity of the Holy Ghost: If the Holy Spirit be not of the substance of the Father and the Son, why then did the Son of God join him together with them in the symbol of sanctification, when he said to his disciples, "Go teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost?" In both which places, it is plain, the symbols of sanctification and salvation can mean no other than baptism. And hence it appears, that the same honourable titles were given to the waters of baptism, as to the elements of bread and wine in the Lord's supper; and whatever change was supposed to be wrought in the one by the invocation of the Holy Spirit, was equally ascribed to the other also; and as noble effects derived from the font as the Lord's table, whilst the death of Christ was equally represented, and the benefits of it alike communicated to all worthy receivers in baptism and the Lord's supper. For which reason I have been a little the more curious in examining and explaining the several titles of honour which the ancients gave to baptism, that under these eminent characters we might see what apprehensions and ideas the church of Christ always had of this venerable mystery, which some now by way of contempt call water-baptism, as if the Spirit had no concern in it; whose doctrines may easily be perceived not to proceed from the general sense of the ancient catholic church, but from particular sects and heresies broken off from it, of which it may not be amiss to give a short account in the following chapter.

CHAPTER II.

OF THE MATTER OF BAPTISM, WITH AN ACCOUNT OF SUCH HERETICS AS REJECTED OR CORRUPTED BAPTISM BY WATER.

Sect. 1.
Baptism who rejected by the heretics called Ascodrutæ, and Marcossians, and Valentinians, and Quintillians.

THOUGH the church always maintained an honourable opinion of baptism, as a Divine and heavenly institution, yet there wanted not sects and heresies, who in the earliest ages spake very diminutively and contemptibly of it; and either in whole or in part upon various reasons rejected or corrupted it. The Ascodrutæ, who were a sort of Gnostics, placed all religion in knowledge, and under pretence of spiritual worship, would admit of no external or corporeal symbols whatsoever. They asserted, as Theodoret¹ describes them, that Divine mysteries, being the images of invisible things, were not to be performed by visible things; nor incorporeal things by sensible and corporeal things. Therefore they never baptized any that were of their sect, nor celebrated any part of the mystery of baptism among them. For they said, the knowledge of all things was their redemption. Irenæus² and Epiphanius observe the same thing to be practised, upon the same principle of spiritual redemption by knowledge alone, among some of those who were called Marcossian heretics, whilst others of them, who retained a sort of baptism, invented strange forms of their own to corrupt it, of which I shall give an account in the following chapter, sect. 8. Irenæus³ gives a like account of the Valentinians, some of which wholly rejected baptism, and others corrupted it with strange forms of their own inventing, as the Marcossians did, who seem to have been branches of the same heresy under different leaders. Tertullian⁴ brings a like charge against one Quintilla, a woman preacher at Carthage a little before his time, who set up to deery water-baptism as useless, pleading, that faith alone was sufficient to save men, as it did Abraham, who pleased God without any other sacrament but the sacrament of faith. Against this heresy Tertullian wrote his book of Baptism, to establish the necessity of it from our Saviour's institution, and to answer the little sophisms whereby the libertines of this new sect pretended to destroy it.

The Archontici rejected baptism for another reason, as Epiphanius⁵ and Theodoret⁶ inform us. They had entertained a very monstrous and blasphemous opinion, that the world was not created by the supreme God of all things, but by certain powers, whom they called ἀρχοντες, rulers, whence they themselves had the denomination of Archontici; these rulers, seven or eight in number, they imagined to be in so many several orbs of the heavens one above another, with orders of angels and ministries under them: and to the chief of these they gave the name of Sabaoth. Now, they also pretended that baptism was only administered in the name of Sabaoth, and not in the name of the supreme God, and therefore they rejected both it and the eucharist as foreign institutions, given by Sabaoth, the God of the Jews

Sect. 2.
And by the Archontici.

⁴⁹ Athanas. Disp. contra Arium in Conc. Nic. t. 1. p. 141. Τίτος ἔνεκεν συνήριθμησεν αὐτὸ ὁ Ὑιὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐν τῷ συμβόλῳ τοῦ ἁγιασμοῦ, &c.

¹ Theodor. Hæret. Fabul. lib. 1. c. 10.

² Iren. lib. 1. c. 18.

³ Iren. lib. 3. c. 2.

⁴ Tertul. de Bapt. cap. I. Nuper conversata istic quædam de Caiana hæresi vipera venenatissima, doctrina sua plerosque rapuit, imprimis baptismum destruens, &c. It. cap. 13. Adeo dicunt, Baptismus non est necessarius, quibus fides satis est, &c.

⁵ Epiphanius. Hæret. 40. de Archonticis, n. 2.

⁶ Theodor. Hæret. Fab. lib. 1. c. 11.

and the giver of the law, whom they blasphemously distinguished from the supreme God.

The Seleucians and Hermians refused the use of baptism by water, as St. Austin⁷ describes them. And the ground of their refusal was a pretence, that baptism by water was not the baptism instituted by Christ, because St. John Baptist, comparing his own baptism with the baptism of Christ, says, "I baptize you with water, but he that cometh after me, shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire,"⁸ they thought the souls of men consisted of fire and spirit, and therefore a baptism of fire was more suitable to their nature. But what kind of baptism that was, none of the ancients have told us; unless perhaps we may conjecture from what Clemens Alexandrinus⁹ tells us out of Heracleon, of some, who, when they had baptized men in water, also made a mark upon their ears with fire; so joining water-baptism and, as they imagined, baptism by fire, together. Though this was far enough from the fiery baptism St. John speaks of, which some of the ancients understand of the ordinary operations of the Spirit, which consume our sins; and others, of that extraordinary effusion of the Spirit in the form of fiery tongues upon the apostles at the day of Pentecost; and others, of the fire of the last judgment. A particular account of which interpretations, the reader that is curious may find in Suicerus upon this subject.¹⁰ I only note further out of the anonymous writer about heretical baptism, published by Rigaltius and Bishop Fell at the end of St. Cyprian, that there were a sort of heretics, who pretended, that baptism by water alone was of itself imperfect, because St. John had said, we were to be baptized with the Holy Ghost and with fire. Therefore they boasted,¹¹ that theirs was the only complete and perfect baptism, and all others curtailed and given only by halves, because when they went down into the water to baptize, either by some curious art in philosophy, like that of Anaxilaus, or by some magical art, they made fire to appear upon the surface of the water, and this they called baptism by fire.

Which they confirmed from an apocryphal writing of their own inventing, called, The Preaching of Peter or Paul, wherein it was said, that when Christ was baptized, fire so appeared upon the water. The censure which this author passes upon this kind of baptism, is, that it is adulterate, pernicious, and wholly evacuating the true baptism of Christ.

Another sect which rejected water-baptism, were the Manichees, who, among many other prodigious errors, maintained, that baptizing in water was of no efficacy to salvation, and therefore they despised it, and never baptized¹² any that entered into their society, as St. Austin and the author of the Prædestinatus,¹³ published by Sirmondus, inform us. But whether they admitted any other kind of baptism, or upon what ground they rejected this, we are not told: only we may probably conjecture, that it was upon that general vile principle of theirs, that material things were the work of an evil god, and therefore to be abhorred as polluted and profane. One branch of this heresy were afterward called Paulicians, from one Paulus and Johannes, the first founders of it. Euthymius, out of Photius, gives a large account of them, where he tells us,¹⁴ that though they really rejected and despised baptism, yet they pretended to receive it: but that was only with a deceitful equivocation; for they maintained that the word of the Gospel was baptism, because our Lord said, "I am the living water." The learned Vossius is of opinion,¹⁵ that those words, Ego sum aqua viva, "I am the living water," was the form which these Paulicians used in baptism instead of the form of the church: but he plainly mistakes Euthymius, who does not say, that they used this as a form of words in their baptism; for they had no baptism at all, nor consequently any form of words for baptizing; but their opinion was, that believing in Christ, or the word or the truth of the Gospel, was all the baptism that was required of men, and that because Christ had said, "I am the living water." Yet sometimes, as Euthymius relates in the same place,¹⁶ they would bring their ⁷ Aug. de Hæres. c. 59. Seleuciani et Hermiani baptismum in aqua non accipiunt.

⁸ Philastr. de Hæres. n. 8. Seleucus et Hermius hæretici animas hominum de igne et Spiritu esse existimantes, isto baptismo non utuntur, propter verbum hoc quod dixit Johannes Baptista: Ipse vos baptizabit in Spiritu et igne.

⁹ Clem. Alex. Electa ex Scriptura, ap. Combefis Auctarium, t. 1. p. 202. "Ἐμοὶ δὲ, ὡς φησὶν Ἡρακλείων, πυρὶ τὰ ὄστα τῶν σφραγιζομένων κατεσημνησαντο. Irenæus, lib. 1. c. 24, has something like this, of the Carpocratians.

¹⁰ Suicer. Thesaur. Eccles. t. 1. p. 630.

¹¹ Anonym. de Baptismo Hæreticorum, ad calcem Cypriani, p. 30. Tentant nonnulli iterum tractare se solos integrum atque perfectum, non sicuti nos, mutilatum et decurtatum baptisma tradere. Quod taliter dicantur adsignare, ut quam mox in aquam descenderunt, statim super aquam ignis appareat, &c.

¹² Aug. de Hæres. cap. 46. Baptismum in aqua nihil cuiquam perhibent salutis adferre: Nec quenquam eorum quos decipiunt, baptizandum putant.

¹³ Prædestinatorum Hæresis, c. 46.

¹⁴ Euthym. Panoplia. Par. 2. Titul. 21. p. 48. Quin etiam cum baptismum aspernentur, illud tamen se fingunt suscipere: Nam Evangelii verba baptismum existimant, quoniam Dominus, Ego sum, inquit, aqua viva.

¹⁵ Voss. de Baptismo, Disp. 1. Thes. 2. p. 28.

¹⁶ Euthym. ibid. Liberos etiam suos ab ecclesie presbyteris salutari baptismo volunt aliquando lustrari; existimant enim crucem et baptismum corpori prodesse. Horum tamen vim ad animæ purgationem pervenire non putant, nec ullam aliam adferre utilitatem.

children to the presbyters of the church to be baptized after the catholic way, because they had an opinion that both baptism and the cross were of some advantage to the body for the cure of diseases, but of no other efficacy, benefit, or virtue to purge the soul. And such an opinion possessed the minds of many others, who had no further regard for baptism, but only as it was of use to free the body of some distemper or uncleanness. St. Austin¹⁷ puts the question once or twice concerning some such persons, who desired to be baptized with no other view but this. And Matthew Blastares¹⁸ mentions a famous case of the Agarenes, who compelled the Christian clergy that were under their dominion, to baptize their children before they would circumcise them, because they conceived this would contribute toward the prevention of those distempers and noisomenesses, which are occasioned by circumcision. Upon this case a question was made in the council of Constantinople under Lucas Chrysoberges, whether such persons, when they came over to the Christian faith, were to be rebaptized, or only anointed with chrism? And it was resolved, that they ought without controversy to be rebaptized, since the baptism with which they were washed, was not received with any pious intent, but only as an amulet or a charm. These instances make the account which Euthymius gives of the Paulicians seem very probable, that though they had no regard for baptism as a Christian sacrament, yet they might sometimes make use of it, as the Saracens did, as an enchantment, or a sort of magical spell; which appears to be the only use they ever made of it, and that not in their own assemblies, (where they had no sacraments at all, neither baptism nor the eucharist,) but fraudulently receiving it in the church at the hands of the Christian catholic priests. The reader may observe by the way, that these Paulicians were not the followers of Paulus Samosatensis, bishop of Antioch, who are commonly called Paulianists and Samosatenians [though Balsamon confounds them together]; but they had their denomination from another Paulus Samosatensis and one Johannes, who revived and enlarged the heresy of the Manichees, as appears plainly from Euthymius. And Justellus¹⁹ and Vossius²⁰ have observed the same out of Cedrenus, Theophanes, Matthew Blastares, Nicephorus, and other modern Greeks, with which it would be needless in this place to trouble the reader.

Some add to the forementioned sects, who rejected baptism, the heresy of the Messalians, or Euchites, who were so called from the Greek word εὐχή, prayer, and Messalians, from the Syriac word Metsalah, which is much of the same signification, because they resolved all religion into prayer. But it does not appear that they wholly rejected the sacrament of baptism: for then the church would have ordered them upon their return to have been baptized, as Jews or pagans; which she never did, but only obliged them to anathematize their errors in order to be admitted to communion, as may be collected from the decree of the general council of Ephesus,²¹ made with relation to such of the clergy or laity as returned from them. But their error was in denying the principal part of the spiritual efficacy of baptism: they said, indeed, it granted remission of sins that were past, but added no strength or ability from the Spirit to withstand sin for the future. This we learn from Theodoret, who comparing the doctrine of the catholic church and that of the Messalians upon this point together, delivers himself²² to this purpose: Baptism, says he, is not like a razor only, as the Messalian enthusiasts call it, which takes away sins that are past; though it has this effect among many others: for if this were the only work of baptism, for what reason should we baptize infants, who have never yet tasted of sin? For the sacrament does not only promise this effect, but greater and more perfect things than that. It is the earnest of future good, the type of the resurrection to come hereafter, the communication of our Lord's passion, the participation of our Lord's resurrection, the garment of salvation, the clothing of joy, and the robe of light, or rather, light itself. So that we must allow Theodoret to be his own interpreter, when he seems to give a more harsh account of these Messalians in another place, describing them as men who taught, that no manner²³ of advantage accrued from Divine baptism to those who received it, but that it was only fervent prayer that expelled the indwelling devil out of men's minds. For this is to be understood with the forementioned exception, that they allowed baptism so far to be useful, as to wash away all former sins, but not to grant any further perfection. And so Harmenopulus²⁴ represents their doctrine, as teaching, that neither baptism nor participation of the eucharist could give a man the perfection of

Sect. 5.
What opinion the Messalians or Euchites had of baptism.

¹⁷ Aug. Ep. 23. ad Bonifacium.

¹⁸ Blastar. Syntagm. Can. Litera B. cap. 3. ap. Bevereg. Pandect. t. 2. p. 42. Vid. Balsamon in Photii Nomocanon, Tit. 13. de Laicis, cap. 2. et Baron. an. 1148. p. 358. t. 12. It. an. 1145. p. 314.

¹⁹ Justel. Not. in can. 19. Codicis Eccl. Universæ.

²⁰ Voss. de Baptismo, Disp. 20. p. 241.

²¹ Conc. Ephes. Act. 7. t. 3. p. 809.

²² Theod. Epitom. Divin. Decret. sive de Fabul. Hæret.

lib. 5. cap. 18.

²³ Theod. Hæret. Fab. lib. 4. cap. 10. Μηδεμίαν ἐκ τοῦ θείου βαπτίσματος ὠφέλειαν τοῖς ἀξιουμένοις γίνεσθαι μόνην δὲ τὴν σπουδαίαν εὐχὴν τὸν δαίμονα τὸν ἔνοικον ἐξελαύνει.

²⁴ Harmenop. de Sectis, c. 18. Bibl. Patr. Gr. Lat. t. 1. p. 536. Τὸ βάπτισμα μὴ τελειοῦν τὸν ἀνθρώπου, μηδὲ τὴν μετὰ τὸν βῆμα, ἀλλὰ μόνην τὴν παρ' αὐτοῖς εὐχὴν.

a Christian, but only such prayer as they pretended to. In like manner Euthymius²⁵ describes them, as maintaining, that baptism did not eradicate sin. They did not deny that it purged away former sins, but they would not allow any efficacy of the Spirit to be joined with it to resist or overcome sin for the future. Against which doctrine Euthymius thus argues: Our Lord Jesus Christ said, "Except a man be born of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." Now, the Holy Ghost is a Divine fire; for he descended in the form of fiery tongues upon the disciples, and the forerunner of Christ spake of this to the multitude, when he testified of the excellency of Christ, "He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire." As therefore material fire, when it catches a wood, burns all things upon the surface of the earth, dries up the roots, and purges the place from filth; so the Holy Spirit does, and much more. For it is a fire consuming the iniquity of those who are baptized. And it not only purges and obliterates the spots, and scars, and filth of the soul, but also illuminates and endows it with many gifts, as the apostles, and especially St. Paul, teach us, where they speak of the distribution of the graces of the Holy Spirit, which are conferred on those who are baptized. From this account of the Messalians it appears, that they were neither Anabaptists nor Quakers; they neither rejected the baptism of adult persons nor infants: for the true state of the controversy between them and the church, was not about the use of the outward element of water in baptism, but about the internal and spiritual effects of it, which the Messalians confined to remission of sins, but the church extended to many other noble benefits, which were the gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit. Upon which account the church never rebaptized the Messalians, that we read of, as she did the Manichees, and such other heretics, who rejected the use of water, which was the outward element which Christ had appointed. If this was either neglected, or any other element used instead of it, the baptism was esteemed not only irregular, but null, as wanting one necessary and essential part, which could not be supplied but by a new baptism. And therefore when a certain Jew had been baptized in sand, for want of water, in the wilderness, Dionysius, bishop of Ascalon, ordered him to be rebaptized, as Johannes Moschus²⁶ tells the story. And this was done, not because he was baptized by a layman in extreme necessity, but, as Archbishop Whitgift,²⁷ after the Centuriators,²⁸ has observed, because the baptism wanted water. Such was the church's opinion of the necessity of water-baptism, that, where it might be had, she never thought fit to dispense with the neglect or contempt of it; and therefore she urged the necessity of it against those ancient heretics who despised it, even whilst she judged favourably of such catechumens as died without baptism, not through contempt, but unavoidable necessity: of which I have given a particular account in the last Book, chap. 2. sect. 20, &c.

Indeed there is one exception against this in some collections of the canon law. For there we have a decree under the name of Pope Siricius,²⁹ which says, That if an infant is baptized in wine instead of water, in case of necessity, it is no crime, and the baptism shall stand good. But, as Antonius Augustinus and Baluzius have observed, this was no decree of Siricius, but of Stephen II., about the middle of the eighth century. So that it cannot be pleaded as a competent authority to show what was the ancient practice of the church. Antonius Augustinus is very positive, that the primitive church had never any such custom. And it seems pretty evident from that saying of St. Ambrose,³⁰ That if we take away water, the sacrament of baptism cannot stand. But among the moderns, Beza,³¹ and some of the schoolmen, Tolet and Valentia, determine otherwise: against whose resolution I am not concerned to dispute, but only to declare what I take to have been the more current and received opinion of the primitive writers of the church.

CHAPTER III.

OF THE ANCIENT FORM OF BAPTISM, AND OF SUCH HERETICS AS ALTERED OR CORRUPTED IT.

NEXT to the matter of baptism, it will be proper to consider the form of words in which it was anciently administered. And this was generally such a form of words as made express mention of every person of the blessed Trinity, according as our Saviour did at the first institution, when he command-

Sec. 1.
The usual form of baptizing in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.

adscribatur. Si vero aqua aderat, et necessitas talis non urgebat, hic communione privetur. Infans vero ille, si in Sancta Trinitate baptizatus est, in eo baptismo permaneat. Vid. Anton. August. de Emendat. Gratiani, p. 200. et Baluz. Not. in Anton. p. 431.

³⁰ Ambros. de iis qui initiuntur, cap. 4. Nec iterum sine aqua regenerationis mysterium est.

³¹ Beza, Ep. 2. ad Tillium.

²⁵ Euthym. Panopl. Par. II. Tit. 22. p. 55. Negant divinum baptismum posse radices evellere peccatorum, &c.

²⁶ Moschus, Pratum Spirituale, cap. 176.

²⁷ Whitgift's Defence, Tract. IX. p. 519.

²⁸ Centur. Magdeburg, Cent. II. cap. 6. p. 82.

²⁹ Antonius Augustinus cites it out of a Spanish Collection of Canons, and Baluzius from one in France, under the name of Siricius. Presbyter qui in vino baptizatus proxima necessitate, ut æger non periclitetur, pro tali re nulla ei culpa ed his disciples to baptize in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. This the ancient author of the Recognitions¹ means, when he says, Men were baptized under the appellation of the triple mystery. And again,² By invoking the name of the blessed Trinity. Tertullian³ refers this to the institution of Christ: The law of baptizing was imposed, and the form prescribed, "Go, teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." In another place⁴ he says, Christ appointed baptism to be administered not in the name of one, but three, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Therefore we are dipped not once, but thrice, unto every person at the mention of each name. Cyprian derives this practice⁵ likewise from the institution, saying, The Lord, after his resurrection, taught his disciples after what manner they should baptize, when he said, "Go, teach all nations," &c.; where he delivered the doctrine of the Trinity, unto which mystery or sacrament the nations were to be baptized. And he argues⁶ further, against such heretics as baptized only in the name of Jesus Christ, from the same principle, that Christ commanded the nations to be baptized, not into one person, but a complete and united Trinity. Hence Optatus⁷ calls baptism, the laver which Christ commanded to be celebrated in the name of the Trinity, and that holy water which flowed from the fountain of those three names. And to mention no more authorities, (which are innumerable,) St. Austin⁸ observes, that this was not only the general practice of the catholic church, but of most heresies also. For one might more easily find heretics that did not baptize at all, than such as retained baptism without using those evangelical words, of which the creed consists, and without which baptism cannot be consecrated.

And hence it appears, that St. Austin and these other writers thought this precise form of words necessary to be used in the administration of baptism, by virtue of the original appointment and institution. And this may be further evidenced to have been the general sense of the ancients, some one or two only excepted. The Apostolical Canons⁹ order every bishop and presbyter, that shall presume to baptize any other way than according to the command of the Lord, in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, to be deposed. And Athanasius¹⁰ speaks of such baptism as null, that is any otherwise delivered: He that takes away any one person from the Trinity, and is baptized only in the name of the Father, or only in the name of the Son, or only in the Father and the Son, without the Spirit, receives nothing, but remains void and uninitiated; for in the Trinity alone initiation is given. He says in another place,¹¹ that baptism, which is as it were the compendium of our whole faith, is not given in the name of the Word, but of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Didymus of Alexandria¹² treads in the steps of Athanasius: I cannot suppose any one, says he, so mad and void of understanding, as to think that to be perfect baptism, which is given in the name of the Father and Son, without the assumption of the Holy Spirit; or in the name of the Father and Holy Ghost, omitting the name of the Son; or in the name of the Son and Holy Ghost, without first mentioning the name of the Father. For though any man should be of such a stony heart, as I may say, or so much beside himself, as to leave out one of the appointed names

¹ Clem. Rom. Recognit. lib. 6. cap. 9. Baptizantur sub appellatione triplicis sacramenti.

² Id. lib. 3. cap. 67. Baptizabitur unusquisque vestrum in aquis perennibus, nomine Trinæ Beatitudinis invocato super se.

³ Tertul. de Bapt. cap. 13. Lex tingendi imposita est, et forma præscripta, Ite, inquit, docete nationes, tingentes eas in nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritûs Sancti.

⁴ Id. cont. Praxeam, cap. 26. Novissime mandans, ut tingerent in Patrem et Filium et Spiritum Sanctum. Nam nec semel, sed ter, ad singula nomina in singulas personas tingimur.

⁵ Cyprian. Ep. 73. ad Jubaian. p. 200. Dominus post resurrectionem discipulos suos mittens, quemadmodum baptizare deberent, instituit et docuit, dicens—Ite et docete gentes omnes, baptizantes eas in nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritûs Sancti. Insinuat Trinitatem, cujus sacramento baptizarentur.

⁶ Ibid. p. 206. Quomodo quidam dicunt, foris extra ecclesiam, imo et contra ecclesiam, modo in nomine Jesu Christi ubicunque et quomodocunque Gentilem baptizatum, remissionem peccatorum consequi posse; quando ipse Christus gentes baptizari jubeat in plena et adunata Trinitate?

⁷ Optat. lib. 5. p. 85. Lavacrum quod de Trinitate celebrandum esse mandaverat—aqua sancta que de trium nominum fontibus inundat.

⁸ Aug. de Bapt. lib. 6. c. 25. Quis nesciat, non esse baptismum Christi, si verba evangelica quibus symbolum constat, illic defuerint? sed facilius inveniuntur hæretici, qui omnino non baptizent, quam qui non illis verbis baptizent.

⁹ Canon. Apost. c. 49.

¹⁰ Athan. Epist. ad Serapion. t. l. p. 204. 'Ο ὕφαιρούμενός τι τῆς τριάδος, καὶ ἐν μόνῳ τῷ τοῦ Πατρὸς ὀνόματι βαπτιζόμενος, ἢ ἐν μόνῳ τῷ ὀνόματι Ἰησοῦ, ἢ χωρὶς τοῦ Πνεύματος ἐν Πατρὶ καὶ Ἰησῷ, οὐδὲν λαμβάνει, ἀλλὰ κενός καὶ ἀτελής διαμένει, &c.

¹¹ Id. Orat. 5. cont. Arian. p. 535. Οὐκ εἰς Ἀδρόγον, ἀλλ' εἰς Πατέρα καὶ Ἰὼν καὶ Ἄγιον Πνεῦμα δίδονται.

¹² Didymus de Spir. Sancto, lib. 2. Bibl. Patr. t. 9. p. 37. Non arbitror quenquam tam vecordem atque insanum futurum, ut perfectum baptismum putet, quod datur in nomine Patris et Filii, sine assumptione Spiritûs Sancti: aut rursus in nomine Patris et Spiritûs Sancti, Filii vocabulo prætermissio: aut certe in nomine Filii et Spiritûs Sancti, non præposito vocabulo Patris. Licet enim quis posset esse saxeus, ut ita dicam, cordis, et penitus mentis alienæ, qui ita baptizare conetur, ut unum de præceptis nominibus prætermittat, videlicet contrarius legislator Christo; tamen sine perfectione baptizabit; imo penitus a peccatis liberare non poterit, quos a se baptizatos existimaverit.

in baptism, setting up himself a lawgiver in opposition to Christ, his baptism will be imperfect, and altogether insufficient to grant remission of sins to those whom he esteems baptized by him. Idacius Clarus¹³ asserts the same, arguing thus against Varimundus the Arian, for the Divinity of the Holy Ghost: If the Holy Ghost be not equal to the Father and Son in the substance of the Deity, why then is that sacrament of baptism imperfect, which is given without him? St. Basil¹⁴ has a whole chapter to the same purpose. The very title of it is against those, who asserted that it was sufficient to give baptism only in the name of the Lord. And whereas they urged, that in several passages of Scripture baptism was said to be given only in the name of Christ; he answers, that in all those places, though the name of Christ was only mentioned, yet the whole Trinity was understood. Which he confirms from the like expressions concerning the Holy Ghost, 1 Cor. xii. 13, "By one Spirit we are all baptized into one body;" and Acts i. 5, "Ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost not many days hence;" where the apostles seem only to make mention of the Holy Ghost in baptism. But, says he, no one may from hence conclude, that that baptism is perfect, wherein the Holy Ghost alone is named. For the tradition ought to remain inviolable, which was given by the quickening grace. He means the form of baptizing, given by the command of Christ, Matt. xxviii. Upon which he concludes, that as we believe in the Father, and in the Son, and in the Holy Ghost, so we are baptized in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Therefore both Vossius¹⁵ and Petavius¹⁶ are greatly mistaken to allege St. Basil as one of those who asserted, that baptism in the name of Christ alone was allowable, when he so plainly and directly writes against it. Many other testimonies might here be inserted out of Theodoret,¹⁷ Gregory Nazianzen¹⁸ and Nyssen,¹⁹ Theophylact,²⁰ and others, but I shall only add further the decree of Pope Vigilius, which shows both the practice of the church, and the severity of her censures against any one that should pretend to transgress this settled rule of baptizing. If any bishop or presbyter, says he, baptize not according²¹ to the command of the Lord, "in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," but in one person of the Trinity, or in two, or in three Fathers, or in three Sons, or in three Comforters, let him be cast out of the church of God.

Indeed, among all the writings of the ancients, I have never yet met with any but two, that plainly and directly allow or approve of any other form of baptism, save that which was appointed by Christ at the institution. Gennadius mentions one Ursinus, an African monk, who, he says, wrote a book [which is now lost] wherein he asserted, against such as were for rebaptizing all heretics, that it was not lawful to rebaptize those, who were baptized either simply²² in the name of Christ, or in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost: but it was sufficient for both sorts of them, upon confession of the Trinity, to receive the bishop's confirmation in order to obtain eternal life. This author plainly distinguishes betwixt the two forms of baptizing, one with explicit mention of the three persons of the Trinity, and the other in the name of Christ alone; both which he makes to be lawful, and equivalent in sense, though differing in words from one another. And St. Ambrose, I confess, seems to have been of the same opinion. For he takes all those expressions of Scripture, which speak of being baptized in the name of Christ, to mean, the using such a form as this, I baptize thee in the name of Christ, without any express mention of the three persons, though the whole Trinity was implied in it. He that is blessed in Christ, says he,²³

Sect. 3.
Whether baptism
in the name of Christ alone was ever allowed in the church?

¹³ Idacius, lib. 3. contra Varimundum, Bibl. Patr. t. 4. p. 300. Si Spiritus Sanctus Deitatis substantia Patri et Filio non coæquatur, cur in sacramento sacri baptismatis nihil absque illo completur?

¹⁴ Basil. de Spir. Sancto, cap. 12. Οὐ τέλειον ἂν τις εἶπη τὸ βάπτισμα, ὃ μόνου τοῦ Πνεύματος ὄνομα ἐπεκλήθη· χρὴ γὰρ ἀπαράβατον μένει τὴν ἐν τῇ ζωοποιῷ χάριτι δεδομένην παράβασι, &c.

¹⁵ Voss, de Bapt. Disp. 2. Thes. 5. p. 51.

¹⁶ Petav. de Trin. lib. 2. cap. 14. n. 6.

¹⁷ Theodor. Ep. 146. ad Johan. Œconom. t. 3. p. 1038.

¹⁸ Naz. Orat. 24. p. 431.

¹⁹ Nyssen. de Bapt. Christi, t. 3. p. 372.

²⁰ Theophylact. in Luc. xxiv. Fulgent. de Incarnat. c. 11. Cyril. Dial. 7. de Trin. t. 5. p. 633.

²¹ Vigil. Ep. 2. ad Eutherium, cap. 6. Si quis episcopus aut presbyter juxta præceptum Domini non baptizaverit in nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti, sed in una Persona Trinitatis, aut in duabus, aut in tribus Patribus, aut in tribus Filiis, aut in tribus Paracletis, projiciatur de ecclesia Dei.

²² Gennad. de Scriptor. Eccles. cap. 27. Ursinus monachus scripsit adversus eos, qui rebaptizandos hæreticos de-cernunt, docens, nec legitimum, nec Deo dignum rebaptizari illos, qui in nomine vel simpliciter Christi, vel in nomine Patris, Filii, et Spiritus Sancti, quamvis pravo sensu, baptizentur: Iis autem, post Sanctæ Trinitatis et Christi simplicem confessionem, sufficere ad salutem manus impositionem catholici sacerdotis.

²³ Ambros. de Spir. Sancto, lib. 1. cap. 3. Qui benedicitur in Christo, benedicitur in nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti, quia unum nomen, potestas una.—Denique et Æthiops eunuchus Candaces reginæ, baptizatus in Christo plenum mysterium consecutus est.—Quemadmodum si unum in sermone comprehendas, aut Patrem, aut Filium, aut Spiritum Sanctum, fide autem nec Patrem nec Filium nec Spiritum abneges, plenum est fidei sacramentum: ita etiam quamvis et Patrem et Filium et Spiritum dicas, et aut Patris aut Filii aut Spiritus Sancti minuas potestatem, vacuum est omne sacramentum.—Qui unum dixerit, Trinitatem signavit. Si Christum dicas, et Deum Patrem a quo unctus est Filius, et ipsum qui unctus est Filium, et Spiritum quo unctus est, designasti. Et si Patrem dicas; et Filium ejus, et Spiritum oris ejus pariter indicasti; si tamen id etiam corde comprehendas.

is blessed in the name of the Father, and Son, and Holy Ghost; because the name is one, and the power one. The Ethiopian eunuch, who was baptized in Christ, had the sacrament complete. If a man names only a single person expressly in words, either Father, Son, or Holy Ghost, so long as he does not deny in his faith either Father, Son, or Holy Ghost, the sacrament of faith is complete: as, on the other hand, if a man in words express all the three persons, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, but in his faith diminishes the power either of the Father, or Son, or Holy Ghost, the sacrament of faith is void. He says further, He that names but one person, designs thereby the whole Trinity. He that names Christ only, intends both the Father by whom the Son is anointed, and the Son himself who is anointed, and the Spirit with which he is anointed. And he that names only the Father, does in like manner intend both his Son and the Spirit of his mouth, if he truly believe them in his heart. So that, according to St. Ambrose, it was a sufficient baptism, though only one person, Father, Son, or Holy Ghost, was expressly mentioned, because in one name by an orthodox believer all the rest were implied. But this appears to have been a singular opinion in St. Ambrose, contrary to the general stream and current of the ancient writers. For though Petavius joins St. Basil with him; and Vossius after Soto makes Cyprian and Athanasius, and the author of the Opus Imperfectum under the name of St. Chrysostom, to be abettors of the same assertion; yet it is clear from what has been alleged before out of Cyprian, Athanasius, and Basil, that they were of the contrary opinion, and esteemed it an error and transgression against the first institution, to give baptism only in the name of Christ. Whence it is also further evident, that they did not understand those passages of Scripture, which speak of baptizing in the name of Jesus, or the Lord, or Christ, as new forms of baptizing, different from the original form delivered by Christ; but as Eulogius in Photius²¹ has explained them: To be baptized into Christ Jesus, signifies to be baptized according to the command and tradition of Jesus Christ; that is, "in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." According to which sense, it follows, that the form of baptizing delivered by Christ, was not changed, as some imagine, but precisely observed even by the apostles, and after them by the general consent and practice of the catholic church.

It is true, indeed, as sects grew up and increased in the church, some innovations were made in this matter among them. For though, as St. Austin observes, the greatest part of heretics who retained any baptism at all, retained also the old form of the church; yet some there were who varied from it, and brought in new forms of their own, according as their fancies or the genius of their heresies led them. There were some very early that turned the doctrine of the Trinity into Tritheism, and, instead of three Divine persons under the economy of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, brought in three collateral, co-ordinate, and self-originated beings, making them three absolute and independent principles, without any relation of Father or Son, which is the most proper notion of three Gods. And having made this change in the doctrine of the holy Trinity, they made another change answerable to it in the form of baptism. For instead of baptizing in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, they brought in an unheard-of form of baptizing in the name of three unoriginated principles, as we learn from one of those called the Apostolical Canons, which is directly levelled against them in these words: If any bishop²⁵ or presbyter baptize not according to the command of Christ, in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; but in three unoriginated principles, or in three Sons, or in three Paracletes, or Holy Ghosts, let him be deposed. This canon does not describe these heretics by any name, but we may conjecture from another canon of the first council of Bracara, that they were the Gnostics who first introduced this kind of Tritheism, or doctrine of three Gods, into the world, which was afterwards taken up by the Priscillianists, and both of them condemned together in that council. For so the canon words it: If any one shall introduce any strange names²⁶ of the Divinity beside the Holy Trinity, saying, that in the Godhead there is a Trinity of Trinities, as the Gnostics and Priscillianists maintain, let him be anathema. This was the consequence of asserting three unbegotten principles: for hereby they made three Fathers, and three Sons, and three Holy Ghosts, which was a Trinity of Trinities, as the council charges them. And in compliance with this grand error, they sometimes baptized in the name of three Fathers, or three Sons, or three Holy Ghosts. As seems pretty evident from that decree of Pope Vigilius made against all such heterodox innovations: If any bishop or presbyter²⁷ baptize not according to the command of the Lord, in the name of the Father, Son, and baptism. 1st. By the Tritheists and Priscillianists.

Sect. 4.
Of alterations made in the form of

²¹ Eulog. ap. Phot. Cod. 280. p. 1608. Τὸ εἰς Χριστὸν Ἰησοῦν βαπτισθῆναι σημαίνει ἂν τὸ κατὰ τὴν ἐντολήν καὶ παράδοσιν τοῦ Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ βαπτισθῆναι, τουτέστιν, εἰς Πατέρα, καὶ Ἰὸν, καὶ Ἅγιον Πνεῦμα. Vid. Aug. Cont. Maximin. lib. 3. cap. 17.

²⁵ Canon. Apost. c. 49. Εἰ τις ἐπίσκοπος ἢ πρεσβύτερος κατὰ τὴν τοῦ Κυρίου διάταξιν μὴ βαπτίσῃ εἰς Πατέρα, καὶ Ἰὸν, καὶ Ἅγιον Πνεῦμα, ἀλλ' εἰς τρεῖς ἀνάρχους, ἢ εἰς τρεῖς υἱοὺς, ἢ εἰς τρεῖς παρακλήτους, καθαιρεῖσθω.

²⁶ Conc. Bracar. l. can. 2. Si quis extra Sanctam Trinitatem alia nescio quæ Divinitatis nomina introducit, dicens, quod in ipsa Divinitate sit Trinitas Trinitatis, sicut Gnostici et Priscilliani dixerunt, anathema sit.

²⁷ Vigil. Ep. 2. ad Euther. cap. 6. Cited before, sect. 2.

Holy Ghost;" but in one person of the Trinity, or in two, or in three Fathers, or in three Sons, or in three Paracletes or Holy Ghosts, let him be cast out of the church.

Another corruption of the form of baptism was introduced by Menander, who was a disciple of Simon Magus, and to all his master's heresies added this of his own, That no one could be saved, except he was baptized in his name, as Tertullian informs us.²⁸ The reason of this innovation is assigned by Irenæus²⁹ and Epiphanius,³⁰ who tell us, that he took upon him to be the Messias: for he taught, that he was the person sent for the salvation of men; and to gather a church by mysteries of his own appointing, to deliver men from the dominion of the angels and principalities and powers that made the world. And Theodoret³¹ gives the same account of him; for he says, He called himself the Saviour of the world, and taught that men were saved by being baptized in his name, by which means also they got power over the powers that made the world. But this was so absurd a heresy, that, as Epiphanius observes, it never prevailed much in the church. Menander had promised his proselytes, as Tertullian says,³² That all who would be baptized in his name, should be immortal and incorruptible, and have the benefit of an immediate resurrection: but experience in a little time confuted this foolery; for in a hundred years' time none of his immortal apostles appeared, to convince any doubting Thomas of the truth of such a pretended resurrection. And so this vain attempt upon the baptism of Christ quickly sunk by its own absurdity.

A no less absurd innovation was made by the Elcesians, so called from their founder, one Elcesai, who taught them enchantments and invocation of demons, and to use baptisms³³ in the name or confession of the elements, or letters, as Theodoret represents them. Though what sort of baptism this was, is not very easy to conjecture, there being scarce any one besides Sect. 6. Thirdly, By the Elcesians.

²⁸ Tertul. de Præscript. c. 46. Quicquid se Simon dixerat, hoc se Menander esse dicebat, negans habere posse quenquam salutem, nisi in nomine suo baptizatus fuisset.

²⁹ Iren. lib. 1. cap. 21.

³⁰ Epiphani. Hæret. 22. "Ἐλεγεν ἑαυτὸν πεπεμφθῆναι εἰς σωτηρίαν δῆθεν, καὶ εἰς τὸ συνάγειν τινὰς εἰς τὸ ἑαυτοῦ μυστήριον, &c.

³¹ Theod. Hæret. Fab. lib. 1. cap. 2. Σωτήρα ἑαυτὸν προσηγόρευσε.—Σώζεσθαι δὲ τοὺς εἰς αὐτὸν βαπτίζομενους.

³² Tertul. de Anima, cap. 50. In hoc scilicet se a superna et arcana potestate legatum, ut immortales et incorruptibiles et statim resurrectionis compotes fiant, qui baptisma ejus induerint.—At ubi sunt illi quos Menander ipse perfudit, quos in Stygem suam mersit? Apostoli perennes veniant, assistant; videat illos meus Thomas, audiat, contrectet, et credat.

³³ Theod. Hæret. Fab. lib. 2. c. 7. Κίχρηται βαπτισμασιν ἐπὶ τῇ τῶν στοιχείων ὁμολογίᾳ.

Theodoret that gives any account of this heresy. But they were great admirers of astrology and magic, and upon that account perhaps might bring the elements into their baptism, by composition of certain letters and numbers used by them in their magical operations.

The Montanists also, or Cataphrygians, introduced a new form of baptism. For Montanus, their founder, took upon him to be the Holy Ghost, and made himself two prophetesses, Priscilla and Maximilla, who pretended to write books by inspiration. Therefore their followers, having them in great esteem, corrupted the old form of baptism, and administered it in the name of Father, Son, and Montanus, or Priscilla, as St. Basil acquaints us, who therefore judges their baptism to be null, and necessary to be repeated³⁴ when they came over to the catholic church. Theophylact³⁵ gives the same account of them, telling us, that their foul and stinking tongues baptized in the name of Montanus, and Priscilla, and Maximilla. By which he does not mean, that they used those three names instead of the Trinity, but that they added the name of Montanus, or Priscilla, or Maximilla, to the Father and Son, instead of the Holy Ghost. For which reason, most probably, the council of Laodicea³⁶ orders them to be rebaptized, notwithstanding that some of them had received a pretended ordination, and were advanced not only to the dignity of bishops, but to the title of patriarchs and maximi among them, as the council of Laodicea words it. And the same decree was made against them in the first general council of Constantinople,³⁷ and some others also. St. Jerom seems further to intimate, that these Montanists were, as to the doctrine of the Trinity, really Sabellians. For though they pretended to believe a Trinity of Divine persons, yet it was but equivocally, in the same way as Sabellius had done before, whose three persons were no more but three names, or different appearances of one and the same person. Therefore St. Jerom³⁸

Sect. 7. Fourthly, By the Montanists and Sabellians.

³⁴ Basil. Epist. can. 1. cap. 1.

³⁵ Theoph. in Luc. xxiv. p. 546.

³⁶ Conc. Laodic. can. 8.

³⁷ Conc. 1. Constant. can. 7.

³⁸ Hieron. Ep. 54. ad Marcellam adv. Montanum. Primum in fidei regula discrepamus. Nos Patrem et Filium et Spiritum Sanctum in sua unumquemque persona ponimus, licet substantia copulemus: illi Sabellii dogma sectantes, Trinitatem in unius personæ angustias cogunt.—Aperta est convincenda blasphemia dicentium, Deum primum voluisse in Veteri Testamento per Moysen et prophetas salvare mundum: sed quia non potuerit explere, corpus sumpsisse de Virgine, et in Christo sub specie Filii prædicantem, mortem obiisse pro nobis. Et quia per duos gradus mundum salvare non quiverit, ad extremum per Spiritum Sanctum in Montanum, Priscillam et Maximillam insanas fœminas descendisse: et plenitudinem quam Paulus non habuerit—absissum et semivirum habuisse Montanum.

says, The Montanists differed from the catholics in the very rule of faith. For we assert Father, and Son, and Holy Ghost, every one distinct in his own person, though united in substance; but they, following the opinion of Sabellius, bring the Trinity to the narrow restraints of one person. That is, as he explains it a little after, they said, That God at first intended to save the world by Moses and the prophets; but because he could not effect his design that way, he assumed a body of the virgin, and preached in Christ under the species of a Son, and suffered death for our sakes. And because by these two degrees he could not save the world, at last he descended by the Holy Ghost into Montanus, Priscilla, and Maximilla; and made Montanus, who was a eunuch, and but half a man, have that plenitude of prophecy, which Paul himself could not pretend to have. From this account of St. Jerom, it is evident the Montanists in point of doctrine were really Sabellians, and believed but one person in the Godhead under different appearances, or manifestations of himself, which they called πρόσωπα, persons, in an equivocal sense, whereby they imposed upon many catholics, and among the rest upon Theodoret,³⁹ to make them believe them sound and orthodox men, when yet they asserted three persons in no other sense, than Simon Magus, and Praxeas, and Noetus, and Sabellius, and all the Patripassians had done before them. Now, it is very probable the Sabellians had introduced a new form of baptism, correspondent to their principles, for which reason all the councils that mention them order them to be rebaptized:⁴⁰ and the Montanists, following the doctrine of Sabellius, were liable to the same censure. So that upon all accounts it must be concluded, they had made innovations upon the form of baptism received in the catholic church.

Another very strange form was conceived by the Marcosians, or Marcites, so called from one Marcus, a sorcerer, who taught his disciples to baptize in the name of the unknown Father of all things;⁴¹ in the name of truth, the mother of all things; and in Jesus, who descended (or, as Eusebius reads it,⁴² in him who descended into Jesus) for the union, and redemption, and communion of the principalities or powers; or, in the union, and redemption, and communion of these powers. For it may be so understood, as if the names of these powers were taken into their form of baptism. But Irenæus, and Epiphanius from him, tell us, they had several forms of baptism, and some of them added certain hard Hebrew names to astonish their catechumens and converts, which the inquisitive reader may find in those writers. And some of them wholly rejected baptism as useless, because the mysteries of the ineffable and invisible power were not to be performed by visible and corruptible creatures, nor intellectual and incorporeal things by those that are sensible and corporeal: but the knowledge of the ineffable greatness was a perfect redemption. And in this they agreed with the Ascodrutæ, of whom we have spoken in the last chapter.

The Paulianists, or followers of Paulus Samosatensis, bishop of Antioch, who denied the Divinity of Christ, seem also to have been guilty of introducing a new form of baptism, though I do not remember any ancient writer, that tells us particularly what it was. But St. Austin concludes it must be so, because the council of Nice⁴³ made an order to receive them only by a new baptism into the church: which he takes to be an argument, that the Paulianists had not kept to the form or rule of baptism, which many other heretics, when they left the church, took along with them, and continued still to observe. Pope Innocent likewise⁴⁴ assigns this for the reason, why the council of Nice allowed the baptism of the Novatians, but not the Paulianists; because the Paulianists did not baptize in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, but the Novatians in their baptism always made use of those venerable names, as being, in point of the Divine power of the Holy Trinity, always asserters of the catholic faith.

Another sort of heretics there were, who instead of "Father, Son, and Holy Ghost," used this form, "I baptize thee into the death of Christ."⁴⁵ Among the Apostolical Canons, there is one that particularly reflects upon this as an unlawful practice:⁴⁵ If any bishop or presbyter use not three immersions in the celebration of baptism, but one only given in the death of Christ, let him be deposed.

³⁹ Theod. Hæret. Fab. lib. 3. cap. 2.
⁴⁰ Vid. Concil. Constantinop. 1. can. 7. Concil. Trull. can. 95.

⁴¹ Theodor. Hæret. Fab. lib. 1. cap. 9. Εἰς ὄνομα ἀγνώστου Πατρὸς πάντων ὄλων, εἰς ἀλήθειαν μητέρα πάντων, εἰς τὸν κατελθόντα Ἰησοῦν, εἰς ἔνωσην καὶ ἀπολύτρωσιν καὶ κοινωνίαν τῶν ὀνύμενων. So also in Irenæus, lib. 1. cap. 18. and in Epiphanius, Hæres. 31.

⁴² Euseb. lib. 4. cap. 11, has it, εἰς τὸν κατελθόντα εἰς τὸν Ἰησοῦν.

⁴³ Aug. de Hæres. cap. 44. Istos sane Paulianos baptizandos esse in ecclesia catholica Nicæno concilio consti- tutum est. Unde credendum est, eos regulam baptismatis non tenere, quam secum multi heretici, cum de catholica discederent, abstulerunt, eamque custodiunt.

⁴⁴ Innocent. Ep. 22. ad Episcopos Macedon. cap. 5. Idcirco distinctum esse ipsius duabus hæresibus ratio manifesta declarat: quia Paulianistæ in nomine Patris, Filii, et Spiritus Sancti, minime baptizant: et Novatiani iisdem tremendis venerandisque nominibus baptizant, &c.

⁴⁵ Canon. Apost. c. 50. Εἴ τις ἐπίσκοπος ἢ πρεσβύτερος μὴ τρία βαπτίσματα μᾶς μῆσεως ἐπιτελέσῃ, ἀλλὰ ἐν βάπτισμα, τὸ εἰς τὸν θάνατον τοῦ Κυρίου δίδόμενον, καθαιρέσθω, &c.

Sect. 9.
Sixthly, by the Paulianists.

Sect. 10.
Seventhly, The Eunomians and others who baptized into the death of Christ.

For our Lord did not say, Baptize into my death; but, "Go, teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost." St. Paul indeed sometimes speaks of being baptized into the death of Christ; but then, as Origen has rightly observed, this does not denote any new form of baptism; for no other form of baptism was ever thought lawful,⁴⁶ beside that which was given in the name of the Trinity, according to the command of Christ: and the apostle is not speaking of the manner of baptizing, but of Christ's death, and our conforming to it, as signified in baptism. Where it would not have been convenient to have said, As many of us as have been baptized in the name of the Father, or of the Holy Ghost, have been baptized into his death: and therefore the apostle in prudence omitted them in that place, because it was not proper to mention either Father or Holy Ghost, where he was speaking of death, which did not belong to them, but only to Christ incarnate. Notwithstanding this just observation of Origen's, Eunomius the Arian revived this irregular practice of those ancient heretics, and cast off the old form of baptism, to make way for others more agreeable to his damnable errors and opinions. For because he denied the Divinity of the Son and Holy Ghost, he would no longer use the trine immersion, nor baptize in the name of the Trinity, but only into the death of Christ, as Socrates⁴⁷ gives an account of his practice. Epiphanius⁴⁸ observes of the Anomæans, who were the peculiar followers of Eunomius, that they baptized also in another form, in the name of the uncreated God, and the name of the created God, and the name of the sanctifying Spirit, created by the created Son. And so stiff were they to this form of their own inventing, that they baptized not only the catholics, but all other sects, and even the Arians themselves who had been otherwise baptized before them. And Gregory Nyssen tells us from Eunomius his own books, that he perverted the law of Christ, the law or tradition of the Divine institution; and taught, that baptism was not to be given in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, as Christ commanded his disciples when he first delivered the mystery, but⁴⁹ in the name of the Creator and Maker, and not Father only, but God of the only begotten. Upon which he charges him with adding to the word of God, and corrupting it, because no such words as Creator or Maker of the only begotten, or the Son's being a creature, or the servant of God, were to be found in the words of the first institution.

But now this innovation was peculiar to the disciples of Eunomius, though Baronius⁵⁰ and some other learned men bring the charge against the Arians in general, upon the mistaken authority of Athanasius and St. Jerom. Athanasius says they baptized⁵¹ in a Creator and a creature; and St. Jerom, that they believed in the Father, the only true God, in Jesus Christ, the Saviour⁵² and a creature, and in the Holy Ghost, the servant of them both. But they do not say that the Arians used this form of baptism; but only that their baptism, though it was given in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, was, in effect, no more than if it had been given in the name of a creature, because they believed the Son and Holy Ghost to be no more than creatures. The Arians corrupted the faith, but they still retained the catholic form of baptism, till Eunomius brought in another form among them. And that is the true reason why both the first general council of Constantinople,⁵³ and the council of Trullo,⁵⁴ ordered the Eunomians to be rebaptized, at the same time that they appointed the other Arians to be received by imposition of hands only, without a new baptism. And the second council of Arles made a like decree concerning the Bonosiaci, or followers of Bonosus, bishop of Sardica, who were a branch of the Arians, that because they retained baptism in the catholic form, as they there say the other Arians did,⁵⁵ therefore it should be sufficient, after the confession of a true faith, to receive them with chrism and imposition of hands, without a new baptism. Which is a demonstration, that neither the ancient Arians before Eunomius, nor the Bonosians after him, had made any alteration in this matter; but though they had corrupted the faith, yet they retained the ancient form of baptizing used in the catholic church. For had it been otherwise, there is no question to be made, but that (as Suicerus⁵⁶ out of Vossius⁵⁷ has rightly observed) the ancient councils would have rejected their baptism, as they did the Eunomians,

Sect. II.
Whether all the Arians were guilty of the same innovation.

⁴⁶ Orig. Com. in Rom. vi. p. 540. Cum utique non habeatur legitimum baptismum nisi sub nomine Trinitatis, &c.

⁴⁷ Socrat. lib. 5. c. 24.

⁴⁸ Epiiph. Hær. 76. Anomæan. p. 992.

⁴⁹ Nyssen. cont. Eunom. lib. 11. t. 2. p. 706. Μη εις Πατέρα τε και Υιον και Αγιον Πνευμα καθ'ος ενετείλατο τοις μαθηταις παραδιδὸς τὸ μυστήριον, ἀλλ' εις δημιουργόν και κτίστην, και ἑ μόνον Πατέρα τὸ μονογενῆς, ἀλλά τὸν Θεόν.

⁵⁰ Baron. an. 325. n. 88.

⁵¹ Athanas. Orat. 3. cont. Arian. t. 1. p. 413. Eις κτίστην και κτίσμα, και εις ποιῆμα και ποιητήν.

⁵² Hieron. Dial. adv. Lucifer. c. 4. Arrianus cum nihil aliud crediderit—nisi in Patre solo vero Deo, et in Jesu Christo salvatore creatura, et in Spiritu Sancto utriusque servum: quomodo Spiritum Sanctum ab ecclesia recipit, qui necdum peccatorum remissionem consecutus est?

⁵³ Conc. Const. 1. can. 7.

⁵⁴ Conc. Trull. can. 95.

⁵⁵ Conc. Arelat. 2. can. 17. Bonosiacos autem ex eodem errore venientes (quos, sicut Arianos, baptizari in Trinitate manifestum est) dum interrogati fidem nostram ex toto corde confessi fuerint, chrismate et manûs impositione in ecclesia recipi sufficit.

⁵⁶ Suicer. Thesaur. Eccles. t. 1. p. 638.

⁵⁷ Voss. de Bapt. Disp. 2. p. 51.

and ordered them to have been rebaptized upon their return to the catholic church. For the observation of the form of baptism was always esteemed so necessary a part of the institution, and so essential to the sacrament, that where it was wanting, the baptism was reputed an imperfect and void baptism, and to be repeated, by all the rules made against heretics in the catholic church.

There is one question more relating to the form of baptism, which it may not be improper to resolve in this place: that is, whether any additions were ever allowed to be made to the form of baptism in the catholic church? Some learned persons are of opinion, that such additions, when they were only by way of explication, and greater illustration, to confirm the truth against heretics, were used in the form of baptism, as well as in the creed. But I think Vossius, upon better grounds of reason and authority, more judiciously determines the contrary. Two authors are commonly alleged in favour of their assertion, viz. Justin Martyr and the author of the Constitutions, but neither of them comes fully up to the thing intended. For Justin Martyr, as Vossius observes,⁵⁸ is only giving a paraphrastic explication of the words used in baptism for the instruction of the heathens, to whom he is writing, when he tells them how the Christians baptized in the name of the Father of all things, who was Lord and God, and in the name of Jesus Christ our Lord, and of the Holy Ghost. And the author of the Constitutions is yet more plain: for first of all, he tells every bishop and presbyter, that they ought to baptize⁵⁹ precisely in that form of words which our Lord enjoined us, when he said, "Go, teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, teaching them to observe all things which I have commanded you." And then he goes on to explain the several names of the three persons concerned, viz. That the Father is the person who sent, Christ the person who came, and the Paraclete or Comforter the person who bears witness. So that this was plainly an explication or paraphrase of the form of baptism only, and not the very form that was then in use. Nor can it be made appear, that ever the catholic church varied from the form delivered by our Saviour, though Vossius thinks a form with such an orthodox addition would not destroy the essence of baptism, as those heretical forms certainly do which corrupt the truth of the catholic faith.

⁵⁸ Justin, Apol. 2. p. 107. Ἐν ὀνόματι τοῦ Πατρὸς τῶν ἄλων καὶ δεσπότου Θεοῦ, καὶ τοῦ Σωτῆρος ἡμῶν Χριστοῦ τοῦ Ἰησοῦ, καὶ Πνεύματος Ἁγίου, τὸ ἐν ὕδατι τότε λουτρῶν ποιῦνται.

⁵⁹ Constit. Apost. lib. 7. c. 22. Οὕτω βαπτίσεις, ὡς ὁ Κύριος διετάξατο ἡμῖν, λέγων, πορευθέντες μαθητεύσατε

CHAPTER IV.

OF THE SUBJECTS OF BAPTISM, OR AN ACCOUNT OF WHAT PERSONS WERE ANCIENTLY ALLOWED TO BE BAPTIZED. WHERE PARTICULARLY OF INFANT BAPTISM.

HAVING spoken of the matter and form of baptism, I should now have considered the persons by whom this sacrament was anciently administered:

but because I have lately had occasion to handle this subject fully in a scholastical way, in two distinct discourses,¹ it will be sufficient in this place to give this summary account of the matter. There I have showed, that bishops, as the apostles' successors, were the persons chiefly intrusted with this power; that they granted power to presbyters to baptize in ordinary cases; to deacons, sometimes in ordinary, and sometimes only in extraordinary cases; to laymen, only in extraordinary cases of extreme necessity: that the usurped baptism of laymen was allowed to be valid, so far as not to need repeating, though given irregularly; that the baptism of women was wholly prohibited; that the baptism of Jews and infidels was never allowed, though now accepted in the church of Rome; that the baptism of heretics and schismatics was disannulled by the Cyprianists, and some few others, who required a true faith, as well as a true form, to make a complete baptism; but that this opinion was rejected by the great body of the catholic church, who thought the defects of heretical baptism might be supplied by imposition of hands without rebaptizing; that yet it was agreed, both by the Cyprianists and all others whatsoever, that heretics and schismatics had not the power of priests, because some of them, as the Novatians, never had a just and legal call to the priesthood; and others were deprived of their power by the lawful authority of the church, which first committed that power to them; that thenceforward they were reputed, not true Christian priests, but wolves and antichrists, instead of true shepherds and governors of the flock of Christ; that the church had power, not only to suspend the execution of their office, but to cancel their commission, and wholly take away the power and authority of the priesthood from them, and then they were reduced to the state and condition of laymen; and sometimes they were not only degraded from the priesthood, but thrust down one degree below layπάντα τὰ ἔθνη, βαπτίσαντες αὐτοὺς εἰς τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ Πατρὸς, καὶ τοῦ Ἰησοῦ, καὶ τοῦ Ἁγίου Πνεύματος—τοῦ ἀποστείλαντος Πατρὸς, τοῦ ἐλθόντος Χριστοῦ, τοῦ μαρτυρήσαντος Παρακλήτου.

¹ Scholastical History of Lay Baptism, 1st and 2nd part, 1712, and 1714.

Sect. I. Why the question about the administrators of baptism is here omitted.

men, by being anathematized and cast out of the communion of the church: and yet, notwithstanding all this, the church did not think fit to cancel or wholly disannul the baptisms given by such men, though given by usurpation and without any authority of the priesthood, so long as it appeared they were given in due form, in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. All which things being abundantly proved in the two foresaid discourses, I think it not proper to repeat or insist any longer upon them; but shall now proceed, as the order of the discourse requires, to consider the persons on whom baptism was anciently conferred.

And here, first of all, it is certain, that none but living persons, whether adult or infants, and that in their own personal capacity, were ever reckoned subjects capable of baptism in the primitive church. The ancients knew nothing of that profane custom of giving baptism to inanimate things, as bells and the like, by a superstitious consecration of them. The first notice we have of this is in the Capitulars of Charles the Great,² where it is only mentioned to be censured. But afterward it crept into the Roman offices by degrees, (as I have noted in another place³ out of Baronius, Cardinal Bona, and Menardus,) till at last it grew to that superstitious height, as to be thought proper to be complained of in the Centum Gravamina of the German nation, drawn up in the public diet of the empire held at Norimberg, anno 1518, where (after having described the ceremony of baptizing a bell with godfathers, who make responses, as in baptism, and give it a name, and clothe it with a new garment, as Christians were used to be clothed, and all this to make it capable of driving away tempests and devils) they conclude⁴ against it, as not only a superstitious practice, but contrary to the Christian religion, and a mere seduction of the simple people, and an exaction upon them. For which reason they declare, so wicked and unlawful a custom ought to be abolished. He that would see more of this, may consult Hospinian,⁵ or Wolfius,⁶ or Sleidan,⁷ who describe the ceremony at large out of the old Romish Pontifical. For I must return to the primitive church.

And here we meet with a practice a little more ancient, but not less superstitious, than the former; which

Sect. 3.
Baptism not to be given to the dead.

² Capitular. Caroli Magni, cited by Durantus de Ritib. Eccl. lib. 1. c. 22. n. 2. Ut clocas non baptizent.

³ See Book VIII. chap. 7. sect. 15.

⁴ Centum Gravam. n. 51. in Fasciculo Rer. expetend. t. 1. p. 366. Quæ res non solum superstitiosa, sed etiam Christianæ religioni contraria, ac simpliciorum seductio, et mera est exactio.—Res igitur tam nefanda et illicita merito aboleri debet.

⁵ Hospin. de Templis, lib. 4. cap. 9. p. 113.

⁶ Wolfius, Lection. Memorabil. Centur. 16. an. 1550.

was a custom that began to prevail among some weak people in Africa, of giving baptism to the dead. The third council of Carthage⁸ speaks of it as a thing that ignorant Christians were a little fond of, and therefore gives a seasonable caution against it, to discourage the practice. And this is again repeated in the African Code.⁹ Gregory Nazianzen¹⁰ also takes notice of the same superstitious opinion prevailing among some who delayed to be baptized. In his address to this kind of men, he asks them whether they stayed to be baptized after death? And doubts upon this account whether to esteem them greater objects of pity or contempt. Philastrius also¹¹ notes it as the general error of the Montanists or Cataphrygians, that they baptized men after death. The practice seems to be grounded upon a vain opinion, that when men had neglected to receive baptism in their life-time, some compensation might be made for this default by receiving it after death. And for the same reason, they gave the eucharist also to the dead in the like circumstances, which is equally condemned in the forementioned African Canons, as proceeding from gross ignorance in some presbyters, and want of a due understanding of the true intent and meaning of those holy institutions; for whose information they order provincial councils to be held twice a year, that they might be better instructed.

Another absurd practice prevailing among some of the ancient heretics, was a sort of vicarious baptism, which was, that when any one died without baptism, another was baptized in his stead. St. Chrysostom tells us¹² this was practised among the Marcionites with a great deal of ridiculous ceremony, which he thus describes: After any catechumen was dead, they hid a living man under the bed of the deceased; then coming to the dead man, they spake to him, and asked him whether he would receive baptism? And he making no answer, the other answered for him, and said, he would be baptized in his stead; and so they baptized the living for the dead, as if they were acting a comedy upon the stage, so great was the power of Satan in the minds of these vain men. Afterward, when any one challenged them upon this practice, they had the confidence to plead the apostle's authority for it, "Why are they then baptized for the dead?" Against which St. Chrysostom urges very well, That if this

Sect. 4.
Nor to the living for the dead. Where of the apostle's meaning of being baptized for the dead, 1 Cor. xv. 29.

⁷ Sleidan, Commentar. lib. 21. p. 388.

⁸ Conc. Carth. 3. can. 6. Cavendum, ne mortuos baptizari posse fratrum infirmitas credat.

⁹ Cod. Eccles. Afr. can. 18. Μη τὸν ἥδη τελευτῶντα βαπτισθῆναι ποιήσῃ ἢ τῶν πρεσβυτέρων ἀγνοία.

¹⁰ Naz. Orat. 40. de Bapt. p. 648. Ἡ καὶ σὺ μένεις νεκροῦ λουθῆναι; οὐ μᾶλλον ἐλευόμενος ἢ μισούμενος.

¹¹ Philastr. de Hæres. cap. 2. de Cataphry. Hi mortuos baptizant, &c.

¹² Chrys. Hom. 40. in 1 Cor. p. 688.

were allowed, in vain had God threatened those that died unbaptized. For by this means, any Jew or Gentile might easily be made a Christian, by having another after his death baptized for him. Tertullian brings the same charge against the Marcionites,¹³ comparing their practice to the heathen lustrations for the dead upon the kalends of February. But he tells them, they did but in vain allege the apostle's authority for this practice, as if he had argued from it for the truth and confirmation of the resurrection; for the apostle speaks but of one baptism, and that was of the living for themselves. He reflects upon the same practice in another place,¹⁴ where he calls it the vicarious baptism, which some used in hopes of the resurrection. Suicerus thinks the Cerinthians were the first authors of this kind of baptism, and that indeed would carry it up to the apostles' time. But Epiphanius, on whose authority he depends, says no such thing, as from any certain proof, or his own judgment, but only that there was an uncertain tradition handed down to them, concerning some heretics in Asia in the apostles' days,¹⁵ who, when any one died without baptism, substituted another in his room to be baptized for him, lest in the resurrection he should be punished for want of baptism, and be subjected to the powers which made the world. And the same tradition asserted, that the apostle hence took occasion to say, "If the dead rise not, why are they then baptized for the dead?" But Epiphanius wholly rejects this opinion, nor do we find any of the ancients so interpreting this passage of the apostle, except only the author under the name of St. Ambrose, who is clearly of opinion, that the apostle had respect to such a custom then in being, and thence drew an argument from the example¹⁶ of those, who were so firmly persuaded of the truth of the future resurrection, that when any one among them was prevented by sudden death, they had another to be baptized in his name, fearing lest he should either not rise at all, or rise to condemnation. But St. Chrysostom gives a much more rational account of the apostle's argument; for he supposes him to refer to the catholic custom of making every catechumen at his baptism with his own mouth declare his belief of the resurrection of the dead, by repeating the creed, of which that was a part, and so being baptized into that faith, or hope of the resurrection of the dead. And therefore he puts them in mind of this, saying, If there be¹⁷ no resurrection of the dead, why art thou then baptized for the dead, that is, the body? For therefore thou art baptized for the dead, believing the resurrection of the dead, that the body may not remain dead, but revive again. So that baptizing for the dead is an elliptical expression, for being baptized into the faith or belief of the resurrection of the dead. And so I think Tertullian¹⁸ is to be understood, when he says, in opposition to the error of the Marcionites, that to be baptized for the dead is to be baptized for the body, which is declared to be dead by baptism: that is, we are baptized into the belief of the resurrection of the body, both whose death and resurrection are represented in baptism. And the interpretation of Epiphanius comes pretty near these, when he says¹⁹ it refers to those who were baptized upon the approach of death in hopes of the resurrection from the dead; for they showed thereby that the dead should rise again, and that therefore they had need of the remission of sins, which is obtained in baptism. The same sense is given by Theodoret,²⁰ and Theophylact,²¹ and Balsamon and Zonaras,²² and Matthew Blastares,²³ among the Greeks; and it is embraced by Bishop Patrick,²⁴ and Dr. Hammond,²⁵ as the most natural and genuine exposition of this difficult passage of the apostle. Some indeed think it may refer to another custom, of baptizing over the monuments of the martyrs, who died for the faith in hopes of a future resurrection. But that custom was hardly ancient enough to be alluded to in the time of the apostles, though Vossius²⁶ and some other learned men incline to this opinion. However it be, it is not likely the apostle would draw an argument from the absurd practice of the worst of heretics: therefore whatever interpretation be

¹³ Tertul. cont. Marcion. lib. 5. cap. 10. Viderit institutio ista, kalendæ si forte Februariæ respondebunt illi pro mortuis petere. Noli ergo apostolum novum statim auctorem aut confirmatorem eum denotare, ut tanto magis sisteret carnis resurrectionem, quanto illi qui vane pro mortuis baptizarentur, fide resurrectionis hoc facerent. Habemus illum allicubi unius baptismi definitorem.

¹⁴ Tertul. de Resur. Carnis. cap. 48. Si autem et baptizantur quidam pro mortuis, videbimus an ratione. Certe illa præsumptionem hoc eos instituisse contendit, qua alii etiam carni vicarium baptismum profuturum existimarent ad spem resurrectionis.

¹⁵ Epiphanius. Hæres. 28. Cerinthian. n. 6.

¹⁶ Ambrosius. Com. in 1 Cor. xv. Exemplum eorum subjicit, qui tam securi erant de futura resurrectione, ut etiam pro mortuis baptizarentur. Si quem forte mors prævenisset, timentes, ne aut male, aut non resurgeret, qui baptizatus non fuerat, vivus nomine mortui tingebatur.

¹⁷ Chrys. Hom. 40. in 1 Cor. p. 689. Ἐὶ μὴ ἔστω ἀνάστασις, τί καὶ βαπτίζῃ ὑπὲρ τῶν νεκρῶν τούτων, τῶν σωματίων; καὶ γὰρ ἐπὶ τούτῳ βαπτίζῃ, τὸ νεκρὸν σώματος ἀνάστασιν πιστεύων, ὅτι ἔκετι μένει νεκρῶν.

¹⁸ Tertul. cont. Marcion. lib. 5. cap. 10. Igitur et pro mortuis tingui, est pro corporibus tingui; mortuum enim corpus ostendimus.

¹⁹ Epiphanius. Hæres. 28. n. 6.

²⁰ Theodor. Com. in 1 Cor. xv. 29.

²¹ Theophyl. in eundem loc.

²² Balsamon. in Can. 18. Conc. Carthag. ap. Bevereg. Pandect. t. 1. p. 541.

²³ Blastar. Syntag. Canon. ibid. t. 2. p. 41.

²⁴ Patrick, Aqua Genitalis, p. 453.

²⁵ Hammond in 1 Cor. xv. 29.

²⁶ Voss. Thes. Theol. Disp. 15. p. 225.

thought most proper and worthy to be received, that is certainly to be rejected, together with the error of the Marcionites, who founded their vicarious baptism upon the authority of this apostolical passage, contrary to the sense and practice of the whole catholic church, which never allowed of baptism given to the living for the dead, or of any baptism but such as was given to men in their own persons.

Now, of persons who were reckoned capable of receiving baptism, there were two sorts, infants and adult persons. And infants were of two sorts, either such as were born of Christian parents, or such as were born of heathens, but by some providential means became the possession and property, as I may call it, of the Christian church; neither of which sort were excluded from baptism, when sufficient sponsors could be provided for them. This is so evident from the ancient records of the church, that it is to be wondered, how some learned persons could run into the contrary opinion, and offer reasons from antiquity, in prejudice of the church's constant practice. Mr. Wall, in his elaborate discourse²⁷ of Infant Baptism, has justly reflected upon abundance of these men, who, by their unwary concessions, have given too great advantage to the Anabaptists of this age. There are some others also, which he had not seen, who advance as unworthy notions of the ancient practice; for Salmasius, and Suicerus²⁸ out of him, deliver it as authentic history, that for the two first ages no one received baptism who was not first instructed in the faith and doctrine of Christ, so as to be able to answer for himself, that he believed, because of those words, "He that believeth and is baptized." Which, in effect, is to say, that no infant, for the two first ages, was ever admitted to Christian baptism. But afterwards they own pædo-baptism came in, upon the opinion, that baptism was necessary to salvation. Now, I shall not think myself obliged to be very prolix in refuting this opinion, together with the false supposition which is made the foundation of it, since that has so often and so substantially been done by Vossius,²⁹ Dr. Forbes,³⁰ Dr. Hammond,³¹ Mr. Walker,³² and especially Mr.

Wall,³³ who has exactly considered the testimony and authority of almost every ancient writer that has said any thing upon this subject. But that no one who reads these collections may be wholly at a loss for want of other authors, I shall here subjoin a brief account of the most pertinent authorities that occur in the three first ages.

The most ancient writer that we have is Clemens Romanus, who lived in the time of the apostles. And he, though he does not directly mention infant baptism, yet says a thing that by consequence proves it. For he makes infants liable to original sin, which in effect is to say, that they have need of baptism to purge them from it. For speaking of Job, he says, Though he was a just man, yet he³⁴ condemns himself, saying, There is none free from pollution, though his life be but of the length of one day. Now, if children be born in sin, they have need of a regeneration to make them capable of the kingdom of heaven. Hermas Pastor lived about the same time with Clemens, and has several passages to show the general necessity of water, that is, baptism, to save men. In one place he represents the church as a tower built on the waters, and says,³⁵ Hear, therefore, why the tower is built on the waters; because your life is saved, and shall be saved, by water. In another place, he makes water-baptism so necessary to all, that in a vision he represents the apostles as going after death³⁶ to baptize the holy spirits who lived under the Old Testament, that they might be translated into the kingdom of God. It was necessary, says he, for them to ascend by water, that they might be at rest; for they could not otherwise enter into the kingdom of God, than by putting off the mortality of their former life. They therefore, after they were dead, were sealed with the seal of the Son of God, and so entered into the kingdom of God. For before any one receives the name of the Son of God, he is liable to death; but when he receives that seal, he is delivered from death and is assigned to life. Now, that seal is water, into which men descend bound over unto death, but ascend out of it assigned unto life. For this reason the seal was also preached

Sect. 6.
From Clemens
Romanus and Hermas Pastor.

Sect. 5.
Proofs of infant
baptism from the ancient records of the church.

²⁷ Wall, Hist. of Infant Baptism, part 2. chap. 2.
²⁸ Suicer. Thesaur. Eccles. t. 2. p. 1136. Primis duobus seculis nemo baptismum accipiebat, nisi qui in fide instructus, et doctrina Christi imbutus, testari posset, se credere, propter illa verba, Qui crediderit et baptizatus fuerit.— Postea opinio invaluit, Neminem salvari posse, nisi qui baptizatus fuisset.
²⁹ Voss, de Bapt. Disp. 14.
³⁰ Forbes, Instruct. Hist. Theol. lib. 10. cap. 5.
³¹ Hammond, Def. of Infant. Bapt. chap. 4.
³² Walker, Plea for Infant Baptism, chap. 27, &c.
³³ Wall, Hist. of Infant Baptism, part 1. chap. 1, &c.
³⁴ Clem. Rom. Ep. 1. ad Corinth. n. 17. Αὐτὸς ἑαυτοῦ κατηγοροῦν λέγει, οὐδὲις καθαρὸς ἀπὸ ῥύπου, οὐδὲ εἰ μιᾶς ἡμέρας ἢ ζωῆ αὐτοῦ ³⁵ Hermas Pastor, lib. 1. Vision 3. cap. 3. Quare igitur super aquas ædificatur turris, audi. Quoniam vita vestra per aquam salva facta est et fiet.

³⁶ Id. lib. 3. Simil. 9. n. 16. Necessè est ut per aquam habeant ascendere, ut requiescant: non poterant enim aliter in regnum Dei intrare, quam ut deponerent mortalitatem prioris vitæ. Illi igitur defuncti sigillo Filii Dei signati sunt, et intraverunt in regnum Dei. Antequam enim accipiat homo nomen Filii Dei, mortì destinatus est: at ubi accipit illud sigillum, liberatur a morte, et traditur vitæ. Illud autem sigillum aqua est, in quam descendunt homines mortì obligati, ascendunt vero vitæ assignati. Et illis igitur prædicatum est illud sigillum, et usi sunt eo, ut intrarent in regnum Dei.

unto them, and they made use of it, that they might enter into the kingdom of God. The plain design of this place, is to represent the necessity of baptism, without which none can ordinarily enter into the kingdom of God. And it cannot be doubted, that he who thought it so necessary even for the patriarchs, who died before the coming of Christ, must think it equally necessary to all those who lived under the dispensation of the gospel. Though whether the baptism here mentioned be to be understood in a literal and corporeal sense, or only in a metaphorical or mystical way, as a vision or a parable may require, is what may admit of some dispute. And therefore Cotelerius³⁷ gives his opinion for the latter sense, concluding, that forasmuch as washing in water properly belongs to bodies, and not to spirits, our author is necessarily to be understood of metaphorical and mystical baptism, that is, the spiritual effects of it, the good things which are conferred by God in baptism, the chief of which is a title to eternal life, which the patriarchs after death are supposed to be made partakers of, by believing the word of the gospel then preached to them. This was that spiritual water, in which departed souls were baptized, as the bodies of the living are baptized in common water; from the analogy of which we must needs conclude the necessity of water-baptism for all those who are in a capacity to receive it, that is, for all those who are yet in the body, in order to be made partakers of eternal life. God indeed may, if he pleases, give the baptism of the Spirit, and the baptism of faith, which is the baptism of the word, without it: and so some of the ancients suppose the apostles to be baptized without water, from that saying of our Saviour, "Now ye are clean, through the word which I have spoken unto you;" so Tertullian³⁸ and others: (though the more general opinion³⁹ is, that they were baptized by Christ himself:) in like manner God might dispense with the want of water-baptism in cases extraordinary, and supply this want either by martyrdom, or faith and repentance, in such cases where it could not be had; as I have showed (in the last Book) the general consent of the ancients⁴⁰ upon this matter to be; but yet in all ordinary cases where water-baptism might be had, they concluded as generally for the necessity of it, from that assertion of our Saviour, "Except one be born of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." This was not only a doctrine of the third or fourth ages, as Salmasius and Suicerus represent, but the doctrine of the very first ages immediately succeeding the apostles; for, we see, Hermes Pastor, who lived in the apostolical age, finds the general necessity of baptism upon that very saying of our Saviour. And therefore they who represent this doctrine of the necessity of baptism as a novelty or an error, first introduced into the church in the age of St. Austin against the Pelagian heretics, do manifest wrong both to the doctrine itself, and to St. Austin, and to the ancients, who embraced and delivered the same before him. And it gives an unnecessary advantage to the anti-pædobaptists, which a right understanding of this matter absolutely takes from them. I thought it therefore of some use to observe this against Salmasius and Suicerus, and to add it to the observations which Mr. Wall has made upon Hermes Pastor.

Another ancient writer, who lived within the compass of the second cen- From Sect. 7. Justin Martyr. tury, was Justin Martyr, who very plainly speaks of infant baptism as used from the time of the apostles. For in one of his Apologies he takes occasion to say,⁴¹ There were among Christians in his time many persons of both sexes, some sixty, and some seventy years old, who had been made disciples to Christ from their infancy, and continued virgins or uncorrupted all their lives. Now, Justin wrote this Apology about the year 148, in the middle of the second century, and therefore those whom he speaks of as baptized sixty or seventy years before in their infancy, must be persons baptized in the first age, while some of the apostles were living. In another place of the same Apology⁴² he urges these words of our Saviour, John iii. 35, "Except ye be" regenerated, or "born again, ye cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven," to prove the necessity of baptism. And in his Dialogue with Trypho the Jew, he speaks of the whole progeny of Adam as liable to death⁴³ and the deception of the serpent by reason of Adam's sin, beside the particular guilt which each man contracts by actual sin in his own person. Now, if all mankind be born with original sin, this extends to infants, who have need of regeneration or baptism to free them from it. And this assertion in Justin by consequence proves the necessity of baptism for infants, as well as others, that they may have redemption from original sin. In another place of the same Dialogue he makes baptism parallel to circum-

³⁷ Coteler. in loc. p. 117. Quandoquidem lavatio corporibus competit, non animis, noster necessario intelligit baptismum metaphoricum et mysticum, bona videlicet quæ in baptisate a Deo conceduntur.

³⁸ Tertul. de Bapt. cap. 12.

³⁹ Vid. Augustin. Ep. 108. Anonymus auctor de non iterando Baptismo, ad calcem Cypriani, p. 23. Edit. Oxon. It. Clem. Alex. Hypotypos. lib. 5. ap. Johan. Moschum Prat. Spiritual. cap. 176.

⁴⁰ See Book X. chap. 2. sect. 20.

⁴¹ Justin. Apol. 2. p. 62. Καὶ πολλοὶ τινες καὶ πολλὰ ἔξηκοντούται καὶ ἑβδομηκοντούται, οἱ ἐκ παίδων ἐμαθητεύθησαν τῷ Χριστῷ, ἀφθόροι διαμένονσι.

⁴² Ibid. p. 91.

⁴³ Justin. Dial. c. Tryph. p. 315. Τὸ γένος τῶν ἀνθρώπων ἀπὸ τοῦ Ἀδάμ ὑπὸ θάνατον καὶ πλάνην τοῦ Ὁφείως ἐπεπτώκει, παρὰ τὴν ἰδίαν αἰτίαν ἐκάστου αὐτῶν πονηρευσαμένου.

cision, saying,⁴⁴ We have not received that carnal circumcision, but the spiritual circumcision, which Enoch and those like him observed. And we have received it by baptism, through the mercy of God, because we were sinners; and it is incumbent on all persons to receive it in the same way. Now, if baptism be answerable to circumcision, and succeed in its room, and be necessary to be received as the means to obtain the true circumcision of the Spirit; then as infants were admitted to circumcision, so they were to be admitted to baptism, that being the ordinary means of applying the mercy of the gospel to them, and cleansing them from the guilt of original sin.

Next after Justin Martyr, I subjoin the ancient author of the book called, The Recognitions, or Travels of St. Peter; because, though it be not the genuine work of Clemens Romanus, whose name it borrowed, yet it is an ancient writing of the same age with Justin Martyr, mentioned by Origen in his Philocalia, and by some ascribed to Bardesanes Syrus, who lived about the middle of the second century. This author speaks of the necessity of baptism in the very same style as Justin Martyr did, making it universally necessary to purge away original sin, and to qualify men for the kingdom of heaven. For putting an objection by way of question, What does baptism by water⁴⁵ contribute toward the worship of God? He answers, 1st, That it is fulfilling that which is the will and pleasure of God. Then, 2ndly, The man that is regenerated by water, and born again to God, is thereby freed from the weakness of his first nativity, which comes to him by man: and so he is made capable of salvation, which he could not otherwise obtain. For so the true Prophet (meaning Christ) has testified with an oath, saying, "Verily, I say unto you, except one be born again of water, he shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven." This author indeed does not speak particularly of the baptism of infants, but his reasons are such, as show his discourse to extend to them. For if baptism be necessary upon these two accounts, first to cut off concupiscence, or original sin, which is the infirmity of our first birth; and then to qualify us to enter into the kingdom of God; these are general reasons for baptism, which make it necessary for infants as well as any other, since, according to this author, they are born in original sin, and cannot enter into the kingdom of God, till that sin be purged away by the waters of baptism. Here, then, we have another author within the compass of the two first ages, directly confronting that assertion of Salmasius and Suicerus, that the doctrine of the necessity of baptism to salvation, was not the doctrine of the two first ages, but only an opinion taken up afterwards, upon which foundation the practice of infant baptism was introduced into the church. For no one can, or ever did, declare himself plainer for the necessity of baptism to salvation, than this author does, from the words of our Saviour Christ, which he interprets as all the ancients both before and after him did, of the ordinary necessity of water-baptism to salvation. So that if infant baptism was founded, as Salmasius pleads, upon the opinion of the necessity of baptism to salvation; this author must be an asserter of infant baptism, because he was undeniably an asserter of the general necessity of baptism to salvation. I have the rather insisted a little upon this author's meaning, because I know not whether his testimony has been produced before in this cause by any other.

Not long after the time of Justin Martyr and the author last mentioned, lived Irenæus, bishop of Lyons, who, as Mr. Dodwell evidently shows,⁴⁶ and Dr. Cave from him,⁴⁷ was born in the latter end of the first century, about the year 97, and was a disciple of Polycarp, who was a disciple of St. John. About the year 176, he wrote his book against heresies, being then near eighty years old, and died not many years after. So that he must needs be a competent witness of the church's sense and practice upon this point during the second century. Now, there are three things relating to this matter, which appear very evident from him. 1. That the church then believed the doctrine of original sin. 2. That the ordinary means of purging away this sin, was baptism. 3. That children, as well as others, were then actually baptized to obtain remission of sins, and apply the redemption of Christ to them. For the doctrine of original sin; he sometimes calls it the sin⁴⁸ of our first parents, which was done away in Christ, by his loosing the bonds wherein we were held and bound over unto death: the sin whereby we offended God⁴⁹ in the ⁴⁴ Just. Dial. p. 261. Οὐ ταύτην τὴν κατὰ σάρκα περιλάβομεν περιτομήν, ἀλλὰ πνευματικὴν, ἣν Ἐνὼχ καὶ οἱ ὄμοιοι ἐφόλαξαν ἡμεῖς δὲ διὰ τοῦ βαπτίσματος αὐτήν, ἐπειδὴ ἀμαρτωλοὶ ἐγεγόνημεν, διὰ τὸ ἔλθωσ τὸ παρὰ τοῦ Θεοῦ, ἐλάβομεν, καὶ πᾶσιν ἰφετὸν ὁμοίως λαμβάνειν.

⁴⁵ Recognition. lib. 6. n. 9. p. 551. ap. Coteler. t. 1. Quid confert aquæ baptismus ad Dei cultum? Primo quidem, quia quod Deo placuit impletur; secundo, quia regenerato ex aquis, et Deo renato, fragilitas prioris nativitatis, quæ tibi per hominem facta est, amputatur; et ita demum pervenire poteris ad salutem: aliter vero impossibile est. Sic enim nobis cum sacramento verus propheta testatus est, dicens: Amen dico vobis, nisi quis denuo renatus fuerit ex aqua, non intrabit in regnum cælorum. This is repeated in the Greek Clementines, Hom. 11. n. 26. p. 698.

⁴⁶ Dodw. Dissert. in Iren. ⁴⁷ Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 41. ⁴⁸ Irenæ. lib. 5. c. 19. Protoplasti peccatum per correptionem primogeniti emendationem accipiens.—Vinculis illis resolutis, per quæ alligati eramus morti.

⁴⁹ Id. lib. 5. cap. 16. Deum in primo quidem Adam offendimus, non facientes ejus præceptum, in secundo autem Adam reconciliati sumus, obedientes usque ad mortem facti.

first Adam, by disobeying his command; but were reconciled to God in the second Adam, by obedience unto death. So that infants, as well as others, were under the guilt of this sin, and had need of a Redeemer with the rest of mankind, to deliver them from it. Now, the ordinary way of being freed from this original guilt, he says, is baptism, which is our regeneration,⁵⁰ or new birth unto God. And this he expressly affirms to be administered to children as well as adult persons. For, says he, Christ⁵¹ came to save all persons by himself; all, I say, who by him are regenerated unto God; infants, and little ones, and children, and youths, and elder persons. Therefore he went through the several ages, being made an infant for infants, that he might sanctify infants; and for little ones he was made a little one, to sanctify them of that age also. No art can elude this passage, so long as it is owned that regeneration means baptism. And for this we have the explication of Irenæus himself, who calls baptism by the name of regeneration; and so all the ancients commonly do, as Suicerus (against whom I am now disputing) scruples not to own, alleging Justin Martyr,⁵² Chrysostom, and Gregory Nyssen, to this purpose. Which fully evinces infant baptism in the age of Irenæus, that is, in the second century, to have been the common practice of the church.

In the latter end of the second century, and beginning of the third, lived Tertullian, presbyter of the church of Carthage, who, though he had some singular notions about this matter, yet he sufficiently testifies the church's practice. In his own private opinion he was for deferring the baptism of infants, especially where there was no danger of death, till they came to years of discretion: but he so argues for this, as to show us that the practice of the church was otherwise. For, says he, according to every one's condition and disposition,⁵³ and also their age, the delaying of baptism is more advantageous, especially in the case of little children. For what need is there that the godfathers should be brought into danger? Because they may either fail of their promises by death, or they may be deceived by a child's proving of wicked disposition. Our Lord says, indeed, "Do not forbid them to come unto me." Let them come therefore when they are grown up: let them come when they can learn; when they can be taught whither it is they come: let them be made Christians when they can know Christ. What need their innocent age make such haste to the forgiveness of sins? Men proceed more cautiously in worldly things: and he that is not trusted with earthly goods, shall he be trusted with Divine? Let them know how to ask salvation, that you may appear to give it to one that asketh. For no less reason unmarried persons ought to be delayed, because they are exposed to temptations, as well virgins that are come to maturity, as those that are in widowhood by the loss of a consort, until they either marry or be confirmed in continence. The way of Tertullian's arguing upon this point, shows plainly that he was for introducing a new practice; that therefore it was the custom of the church in his time to give baptism to infants, as well as adult persons: and his arguments tend not only to exclude infants, but all persons that are unmarried or in widowhood, for fear of temptation. Which are rules that no one beside himself ever thought of, much less were they confirmed by any church's practice. But even this advice of Tertullian, as singular as it was, seems only calculated for cases where there was no danger or apprehensions of death: for otherwise he pleads as much for the necessity of baptism as any other, both from those words of our Saviour,⁵⁴ "Except one be born again of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven;" as also from the general corruption of original sin, which renders every son of Adam unclean till he be made a Christian: which is only done in baptism; for men are not born Christians, but made so. And therefore, in case of necessity, he thought every Christian had power to give baptism, rather than any person should die without it. Which seems to imply, that his opinion for delaying baptism, whether of infants or others, respected only such cases where there was no danger of death: but even in those cases the practice of the church was otherwise, for she baptized infants as soon as they were born, though without any imminent danger of death, as appears from Tertullian's discourse itself, who laboured to make ⁵⁰ Irenæ. lib. 1. cap. 18. Τοῦ βαπτίσματος τῆς εἰς Θεοῦ ἀναγεννήσεως, &c.

⁵¹ Id. lib. 2. cap. 39. Omnes venit per semetipsum salvare: omnes inquam, qui per eum renascuntur in Deum; infantes, et parvulos, et pueros, et juvenes, et seniores. Ideo per omnem venit ætatem, et infantibus infans factus, sanctificans infantes: in parvulis parvulus, sanctificans hanc ipsam habentes ætatem, &c.

⁵² Suicer. Thesaur. Eccles. voce Ἀναγέννησις, t. 1. p. 243.

⁵³ Tertul. de Baptismo, c. 18. Pro cuiusque personæ conditione ac dispositione, etiam ætate, cunctatio baptismi utilior est, præcipue tamen circa parvulos. Quid enim necesse est sponsos etiam periculo ingeri? Quia et ipsi per mortalitatem destituere promissiones suas possint, et preventu male indolis falli. Ait quidem Dominus, Nolite illos prohibere ad me venire. Veniant ergo dum adolescent, veniant dum discunt, dum quo veniunt doceantur: fiant Christiani, dum Christum nosse potuerint. Quid festinat innocens ætas ad remissionem peccatorum? Cautius agetur in sæcularibus; ut cui substantia terrena non creditur, Divina credatur. Nōrint petere salutem, ut petenti dedisse videaris. Non minori de causa inuupti quoque procrastinandi, in quibus tentatio præparata est: tam virginibus per maturitatem, quam viduis per vacationem, donec aut nubant, aut continentia corroborentur.

⁵⁴ Tertul. de Anima, cap. 40. De Bapt. cap. 13.

an innovation, but without any success; for the same practice continued in the church in the following ages.

Sect. 11.
And Origen. Origen lived in the beginning of the third century, and nothing can be plainer than the testimonies alleged from him. In one place he says, Every one is born in original sin; which he thus proves from the words of David, saying, "I was conceived in iniquity, and in sin⁵³ did my mother bear me;" showing, that every soul that is born in the flesh, is polluted with the filth of sin and iniquity: and that therefore it was said, as we mentioned before, that none is clean from pollution, though his life be but of the length of one day. Besides all this, it may be inquired, what is the reason, why the baptism of the church, which is given for remission of sins, is by the custom of the church given to infants also? Whereas if there were nothing in infants that wanted remission and indulgence, the grace of baptism might seem needless to them. In another place⁵⁴ he says, Infants are baptized for the forgiveness of sins. Of what sins? or when did they commit them? Or how can any reason be given for baptizing them, but only according to that sense which we mentioned a little before; None is free from pollution, though his life be but the length of one day upon the earth? And for that reason infants are baptized, because by the sacrament of baptism the pollution of our birth is taken away; and, "Except one be born of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven." Where he not only makes infant baptism the practice of the church, but derives it from Divine institution. As he does in another place⁵⁵ from apostolical tradition; for he affirms, that the church received the order of baptizing infants from the apostles. For they to whom the Divine mysteries were committed, knew that there is in all persons the natural pollution of sin, which must be washed away by water and the Spirit: by reason of which the body itself is also called the body of sin.

In the middle of this age lived St. Cyprian, in whose time there was a Sect. 12.
And Cyprian, with the council of Carthage under him. question moved concerning the day on which infants ought to be baptized. For one Fidus an African bishop had sent a query to him upon this case, whether infants were to be baptized, if need required, as soon as they were born, or not till the eighth day, according to the rule given in the case of circumcision? To this question St. Cyprian and a council of sixty-six bishops returned this synodical answer: As to the case of infants, whereas you judge⁵⁶ that they ought not to be baptized within two or three days after they are born; and that the rule of circumcision should be observed, so that none should be baptized and sanctified before the eighth day after he is born; we were all in our council of the contrary opinion. It was our unanimous resolution and judgment, that the mercy and grace of God is to be denied to none as soon as he is born. For if the greatest offenders, and they that have sinned most grievously against God before, have afterward, when they come to believe, forgiveness of their sins; and no person is kept off from baptism and grace; how much less reason is there to prohibit an infant, who being newly born has no other sin, save that, being descended from Adam according to the flesh, he has from his birth contracted the contagion of the death anciently threatened! Who comes for that reason more easily to receive forgiveness of sins, because they are not his own, but other men's sins, that are forgiven him. Here we have both the practice of the church, and the reason of it together; infants were baptized, because they were born in original sin, and needed ⁵³ Orig. Hom. 8. in Levit. t. 1. p. 145. Audi David dicentem, In iniquitatibus, inquit, conceptus sum, et in peccatis peperit me mater mea: ostendens, quod quæcunque anima in carne nascatur, iniquitatis et peccati sorde pollutur: et propterea dictum esse illud, quod jam superius memoravimus; quia nemo mundus a sorde, nec si unius diei fuerit vita ejus. Addi his etiam illud potest, ut requiratur quid causæ sit, cum baptisma ecclesiæ in remissionem peccatorum detur, secundum ecclesiæ observantiam etiam parvulis baptismum dari? Cum utique si nihil esset in parvulis quod ad remissionem deberet et indulgentiam pertinere, gratia baptismi superflua videretur.

⁵⁴ Orig. in Luc. Hom. 14. t. 2. p. 223. Parvuli baptizantur in remissionem peccatorum. Quorum peccatorum? Vel quo tempore peccaverunt? Aut quomodo potest ulla lavacri in parvulis ratio subsistere, nisi juxta illum sensum de quo paulo ante diximus, Nullus mundus a sorde, nec si unius diei quidem fuerit vita ejus super terram. Et quia per baptismi sacramentum natiuitatis sordes deponuntur, propterea baptizantur et parvuli. Nisi enim quis renatus fuerit ex aqua et Spiritu, non potest intrare in regnum cælorum.

⁵⁵ Id. in Rom. lib. 5. cap. 6. p. 543. Ecclesia ab apos-tolis traditionem suscepit etiam parvulis baptismum dare. Sciebant enim illi quibus mysteriorum secreta commissa sunt Divinorum, quia essent in omnibus genuinæ sordes peccati, quæ per aquam et Spiritum ablui deberent: propter quas etiam corpus ipsum corpus peccati nominatur.

⁵⁶ Cypr. Ep. 59. al. 64. ad Fidum, p. 158. Quantum vero ad causam infantium pertinet, quos dixisti intra secundum vel tertium diem, quo nati sunt, constitutos, baptizari non oportere, et considerandam esse legem circumcisionis antiquæ, ut intra octavum diem eum qui natus est baptizandum et sanctificandum non putares: longe aliud in concilio nostro omnibus visum est.—Universi potius judicavimus, nulli hominum nato misericordiam Dei et gratiam denegandam.—Porro autem si etiam gravissimis delictoribus et in Deum multum ante peccantibus, cum postea crediderint, remissa peccatorum datur; et a baptismo atque a gratia nemo prohibetur; quanto magis prohiberi non debet infans, qui recens natus nihil peccavit, nisi quod secundum Adam carnaliter natus, contagium mortis antiquæ prima natiuitate contraxit? Qui ad remissionem peccatorum accipiendam hoc ipso facilius accedit, quod illi remittuntur non propria, sed aliena peccata.

baptism to cleanse them from the guilt and pollution of it. To this we may add another place of Cyprian, where describing the great wickedness of those that lapsed in time of persecution, he thus aggravates their crime: That nothing might be wanting⁵⁷ to fill up the measure of their wickedness, their little infants were either led or carried in their parents' arms, and lost that which they had obtained at their first coming into the world, meaning the benefits of their baptism. And therefore he brings them in thus pleading against their parents in an elegant strain at the day of judgment: This was no fault of ours, we did not of our own accord forsake the meat and cup of the Lord, to run and partake of those profane pollutions: it was the unfaithfulness of others that ruined us, we had our parents for our murderers; they denied us God for our Father, and the church for our mother; for whilst we were little, and unable to take care of ourselves, and ignorant of so great a wickedness, we were insnared by the treachery of others, and by them drawn into a partnership of their impieties. Here we may observe, that children were made partakers of the eucharist (which Cyprian calls the meat and drink of the Lord); and this is evident from other passages in the same author: which is a further evidence for the practice of infant baptism; for it is certain that none but baptized persons were ordinarily allowed to partake of the eucharist at the Lord's table. I think it needless to clog this discourse with any more authorities from the council of Eliberis, Optatus, Gregory Nazianzen, Basil, Ambrose, Chrysostom, Paulinus, the councils of Carthage, St. Austin, or St. Jerom, or other writers of the fourth age, which the reader may find collected together by Mr. Wall, with suitable observations on them. It is sufficient to my design, against Salmasius and Suicerus, to have proved that infant baptism was not owing to any new doctrine begun in the third century, but was derived from more ancient principles, and handed down through the two first ages from apostolical practice.

I shall now proceed to remark a few other things relating to the baptism of infants, among those who allowed them to be capable of it from their birth. Some there were in the African church, as we have heard out of the last-mentioned citations from Cyprian, who were strictly for confining baptism to the eighth day, because such was the rule in the case of circumcision. But Cyprian and the council of Carthage answer all the arguments that were brought in favour of this novelty, which seems only to have been a question in theory, and scarce ever reduced to practice. The abettors of it pleaded, that an infant in the first days after its birth is unclean, so that any one of us abhors to kiss it. To which Cyprian answers, We judge not⁵⁸ this to be any reason to hinder the giving to it the heavenly grace; for it is written, "To the clean all things are clean:" nor ought any of us to abhor that which God has vouchsafed to make. To the other pretence, that the eighth day was observed in the Jewish circumcision, he answers, That this was only a type going before, a shadow and resemblance, but upon Christ's coming it was fulfilled in the substance; for, because the eighth day, that is, the next to the sabbath day, was to be the day on which the Lord was to rise from the dead, and quicken us, and give us the spiritual circumcision; this eighth day, that is, the next day to the sabbath, or Lord's day, was signified in the type before, which type ceased when the substance came, and the spiritual circumcision was given to us. So that we judge that no person is to be hindered from obtaining the grace, by the law that is now appointed; and that the spiritual circumcision ought not to be restrained by the circumcision that was according to the flesh: but that all are to be admitted to the grace of Christ; forasmuch as Peter says in the Acts of the Apostles, "The Lord hath showed me, that no person is to be called common or unclean." This is the only place where ever we read that this question was made; and after the resolution here given, we never find that it was proposed again. So that this circumstance of time seems never to have prevailed in the practice of the church. Gregory Nazianzen had also a singular opinion in relation to the time of baptizing children when there was no danger of death. For in that case, he thought it better to defer it till they were about three years old; but in case of danger, to give it immediately after they were born, for fear they should die unbaptized. His words are these: What say you⁵⁹ to those that are as yet infants, and are not in a capacity to be sensible either of the grace, or of the loss of it? Shall we baptize them too? Yes, by all means, if any danger so require it. For it is better that they should be sanctified without their own sense of it, than that they should die unsealed and uninitiated. And the ground of this is circumcision, which was given on the eighth day, and was a typical seal, and was given to those who had not the use of reason: as also the anointing of the door-posts, which preserved the firstborn by things that have no sense. As for others, I give my opinion, that they should stay three years, or thereabouts, till they can hear the mystical words, and make answers to them; and though they do not perfectly understand them, yet they can then

Sect. 13.
Infant baptism not to be delayed to the eighth day, after the example of circumcision; nor till three years, as Gregory Nazianzen would have had it.

⁵⁷ Cypr. de Lapsis, p. 125. Ac nequid deesset ad criminis cumulum, infantes quoque parentum manibus vel impositi vel attracti, amiserunt parvuli, quod in primo statim nativitatis exordio fuerant consecuti, &c.

⁵⁸ Cypr. Ep. 59. al. 64. ad Fidum, p. 160.

⁵⁹ Naz. Orat. 40. de Baptismo, t. 1. p. 658.

frame to speak them: and then you may sanctify them in soul and body with the great sacrament of initiation. But this was a singular opinion of Nazianzen, taken up upon some particular reasons, which the church never assented to: and therefore I join this with that other of Fidus the African, as peculiar fancies of private men, which never gained any esteem or credit in the public and avowed practice of the church.

Yet in some churches a custom had prevailed to defer the baptism of infants, as well as adult persons, where there was no apparent danger of death, to the time of some of the more eminent and noted festivals, which were more peculiarly designed and set apart for the solemn administration of baptism. Socrates says,⁶⁰ in Thessaly they only baptized at Easter: upon which account a great many in those parts died without baptism. He does not say expressly, that this was the case of children; but there are some reasons to incline one to believe, that it related to them as well as others. For both in the French and Spanish councils there are canons which order the baptism of children to be administered only at Easter, except in case of necessity and imminent danger of death. In the council of Auxerre⁶¹ it was decreed for the French churches, That no children should be baptized at any other time save on the solemn festival of Easter, except such as were near death, whom they called grabatarii, because they were baptized on a sick bed. And if any one contumaciously in contempt of this decree offered their children to baptism in any of their churches, they should not be received. And if any presbyter presumed to receive them against this order, he should be suspended three months from the communion of the church. The second council of Bracara⁶² also speaks of the like practice in the Spanish churches, ordering that in the middle of Lent, such infants as were to be baptized at Easter, should be presented twenty days before to undergo the purgation, or preparation of exorcism. St. Austin also speaks of children, infants,⁶³ little ones, sucklings hanging on their mothers' breasts, coming at Easter to be baptized among adult persons; whence Palm-Sunday, or the Sunday before Easter, had the name of Octava Infantium, the Octave of Infants, upon their account. St. Ambrose also⁶⁴ speaks of great numbers of infants coming at Easter to be baptized: This, says he, is the Paschal gift: pious fathers and holy mothers bring their newborn progeny in great multitudes by faith to the holy font, from whose womb being regenerated under the tree of faith, they shine with the innocent ornament of lights and tapers. These are abundant proofs, that though in cases of extremity children might receive baptism at any time, yet in other cases, where there was no visible appearance or danger of death, their baptism in many places was deferred till the Easter festival, as well as that of adult persons.

Whilst I am upon the subject of infant baptism, it will not be improper to resolve certain cases and questions, that may be put concerning it, so far as they are capable of being resolved from the practice of the church, or judgment of the ancient writers. One is concerning such children who had only one parent Christian, and the other a Jew or a heathen: these were reckoned capable of baptism upon the right of one parent being Christian. For so it was resolved in the fourth council of Toledo,⁶⁵ in the case of such women as had Jews for their husbands, that the children that were born of them should follow the faith and condition of the mother: and so on the other hand, they who had unbelieving mothers, and believing fathers, should follow the Christian religion, and not the Jewish superstition.

Another case was concerning the children whose parents were under excommunication and the church's censures. St. Austin had occasion to consider this case upon the account of one Auxilius, a young bishop, who in a fit of ungoverned zeal had rashly excommunicated one Classicianus, and together with him, laid his whole family under an anathema and interdict. Which was a practice that, however some later popes have dealt much in, the ancients were not acquainted with. He also

Sect. 14.
Yet in some churches it was deferred to the time of an approaching festival.

Sect. 15.
A resolution of some questions. Whether children might be baptized, when only one parent was Christian?

Sect. 16.
Whether the children of excommunicated parents might be baptized.

⁶⁰ Socrat. lib. 5. cap. 22. 'Εν ταῖς ἡμέραις τῆ Πάσχα μόνον βαπτίζουσι διὸ σφόδρα πλὴν ὀλίγων οἱ λοιποὶ μὴ βαπτισθέντες ἀποθνήσκουσι.

⁶¹ Conc. Antissiodor. can. 18. Non licet absque Paschæ solennitate ullo tempore baptizare, nisi illos quibus mors vicina est, quos grabatarios dicunt. Quod si quis in alio pago, contumacia faciente, post interdictum hoc infantes suos ad baptismum detulerit in ecclesias nostras, non recipiantur. Et quicumque presbyter ipsos extra nostrum præceptum recipere præsumperit, tribus mensibus a communione ecclesiæ sequestratus sit.

⁶² Conc. Bracar. 2. can. 9. Mediante Quadragesima, ex viginti diebus baptizandos infantes, ad exorcismi purgationem offerre præcipiant. Vid. Conc. Matiscon. 2. can. 3.

⁶³ Aug. Serm. 160. de Tempore, t. 10. p. 331. Hodie octavæ dicuntur infantium.—Illi pueri, infantes, parvuli, lactantes, materuis uberibus inhaerentes, et quantum in eos gratiæ referatur nescientes, ut ipsi videtis, quia infantes vocantur, et ipsi habent octavas hodie. Et isti senes, juvenes, adolescentuli, omnes infantes, &c.

⁶⁴ Ambros. de Mysterio Paschæ, cap. 5. Hoc Paschæ donum.—Hinc casti patres, pudicæ etiam matres, novellam per fidem stirpem prosequuntur innumeram. Hinc sub fidei arbore ab utero fontis innocui cereorum splendet ornatus, &c.

⁶⁵ Conc. Tolet. 4. can. 63. Filii autem qui ex talibus (Judæis) nati existunt, fidem atque conditionem matris sequantur. Similiter et hi qui procreati sunt de infidelibus mulieribus, et fidelibus viris, Christianam religionem sequantur, non Judaicam superstitionem.

seems to have forbidden any children to be baptized, who were born in the family during this interdict. Upon which St. Austin took occasion to write to him, and expostulate with him upon the reasons of these proceedings, desiring to be informed⁶⁶ upon what grounds and authority of reason or testimony of Scripture he could confirm his opinion; by what right a son was to be anathematized for the father's crime, or a wife for her husband's, or a servant for his master's; or a child not yet born, if he happened to be born in the house whilst it lay under such an interdict, why it should not have the benefit of the laver of regeneration in danger of death. In corporal punishments, he owns, sometimes it was otherwise: for God thought fit to punish some despisers, with their whole families, though they were not accessory to the contemner's crimes, that by the death of mortal bodies, which must otherwise have shortly died, he might strike terror into the living: but he never dealt thus in spiritual punishments, which affect the soul; but "the soul that sinneth, it shall die." And therefore St. Austin for his own part declares, he never durst use excommunication to this purpose, though he was never so highly provoked by the most villainous actions of any men against the church; because if any one should ask him a reason of such his practice, and oblige him to show the justice of his proceeding, he freely owns, he could find nothing to answer him. Whence, I think, we may fairly conclude, that the excommunication of a parent did not deprive the child of his right to baptism: and though there were some who made a stretch upon church power in this case, yet their actions were so far from being generally approved, or authorized by any rule, that they were rather thought to deserve a censure. The reader that would know how the Reformed churches have resolved this same case, about the admission of the children of excommunicated persons to baptism, may consult another discourse⁶⁷ which I have formerly had occasion to write in defence of the church, where this case is more particularly considered and resolved upon the principles and practice of some of the most eminent churches of the Reformation.

Another question, sometimes agitated in the primitive church, was concerning such children who were either exposed, or redeemed from the barbarians, whose parents were unknown, and consequently it was utterly uncertain whether they were ever baptized or not. This was a case that often happened in Africa, where the Christians bordered upon several barbarous nations; and it was thus resolved upon a consultation in one of the councils of Carthage: That all such infants⁶⁸ as had no certain witnesses to testify that they were baptized, neither could they testify for themselves, by reason of their age, that the sacrament had been given them; that such should, without any scruple, be baptized, lest a hesitation, in that case, should deprive them of the purgation of the sacrament. And this resolution was made at the instance of the legates of the churches of Mauritania, who informed the council, that many such children were redeemed by them from the barbarians; in which case it was uncertain whether their parents were heathens or Christians.

But (as in some cases) if it plainly appeared, that the parents of infants, who by some providential means fell into the hands of Christians, were mere Jews or pagans; yet, in such cases, baptism was not denied to the infants, because they were now become the possession of Christians, who undertook to be their sponsors, and answer for their education. This is evident from St. Austin,⁶⁹ who says it in express terms: This grace is sometimes vouchsafed to the children of infidels, that they are baptized, when by some means, through the secret providence of God, they happen to come into the hands of pious Christians. Sometimes they were bought or redeemed with money, sometimes made lawful captives in war, and sometimes taken up by any charitable persons⁷⁰ when they were exposed

Sect. 17.
Whether exposed children, whose parents were unknown, might be baptized.

Sect. 18.
Whether the children of Jews or heathens might be baptized in any case whatsoever.

⁶⁶ Aug. Ep. 75. ad Auxilium. Apud charitatem tuam tacere non potui, ut si habes de hac re sententiam, certis rationibus vel Scripturarum testimoniis exploratam, nos quoque docere digneris: quomodo recte anathematizetur pro patris peccato filius, aut pro mariti uxor, aut pro domini servus, aut quisquam etiam in domo nondum natus, si eodem tempore quo universa domus est anathemate obligata, nascatur, nec ei possit per lavacrum regenerationis in mortis periculo subveniri.—Ego autem, si quis ex me quaerat, utrum recte fiat, quid ei respondeam non invenio. Nunquam hoc facere ausus sum, cum de quorundam facinoribus immaniter adversus ecclesiam perpetratis gravissimè permoverer.

⁶⁷ French Churches' Apology for the Church of England, Book III. chap. 19.

⁶⁸ Conc. Carthag. 5. can. 6. Placuit, de infantibus, quoties non inveniuntur certissimi testes, qui eos baptizatos esse sine dubitatione testentur, neque ipsi sunt per ætatem idonei de traditis sibi sacramentis respondere, absque ullo scrupulo eos esse baptizandos, ne ista trepidatio eos faciat sacramentorum purgatione privari. Hinc enim legati Maurorum fratres nostri consulerunt, quia multos tales a barbaris redimunt. Vid. Cod. Can. African. c. 72.

⁶⁹ Aug. de Gratia et Libero Arbitrio, cap. 22. t. 7. p. 527. Aliquando filiis infidelium præstatur hæc gratia, ut baptizentur, cum occultâ Dei providentiâ in manus piorum quomodocumque perveniunt.

⁷⁰ Aug. Ep. 23. ad Bonifac. Videas multos non offerri a parentibus, sed etiam a quibuslibet extraneis, sicut a dominis servuli aliquando offeruntur. Et nonnunquam mortuis parentibus suis, parvuli baptizantur ab eis oblati, qui illis hujusmodi misericordiam præbere potuerunt. Aliquando etiam quos crudeliter parentes exposuerunt, nutriendos a quibuslibet, nonnunquam a sacris virginibus colliguntur, et ab eis offeruntur ad baptismum.

by their parents: in all which cases, either the faith and promises of the sponsors, or the faith of the church in general, who was their common mother, and whose children they were now supposed to be, was sufficient to give them a title to Christian baptism. The holy virgins of the church did many times in such exigencies become their sureties, and take care of their religious education. And so it happened, as is observed by St. Ambrose, or whoever was the author of the excellent book⁷¹ De Vocatione Gentium, that many who were deserted by the impiety of their kindred, were taken care of by the good offices of others, and brought to be baptized by strangers, when they were neglected by their nearest relations. Which was so general and charitable a practice among the ancients, that some learned modern writers⁷² speak of it with great commendation upon that account, and tell us such children have a right to baptism, after the same manner that Abraham's servants bought with his money had to circumcision, as well as those that were born in his house. And they concur so far in asserting it to be the common practice, beyond all controversy, in the primitive church, as to say, that St. Austin made use of it as an uncontested argument to prove free grace and election against the Pelagians. Which I note only here by the way, for the sake of some mistaken persons, who impute the encouragement of the same practice in the English church, not to her charity, but rather to a fault and error in her constitution.

⁷¹ Sect. 19. Whether children born while their parents were heathens might be baptized.

There is one question more, concerning such infants as were born while their parents were heathens: but of these there was no doubt ever made; for as soon as the parents were baptized themselves, they were obliged to take care that their wives and children and whole families should be baptized likewise. To which purpose there is a law in the Justinian Code,⁷³ inflicting a severe penalty upon them in case of neglect or pervarication in this matter. For it is there enacted, that such pagans as were yet unbaptized, should present themselves, with their wives and children, and all that appertained to them, in the church, and there they should cause their little ones immediately to be baptized, and the rest as soon as they were taught the Scriptures according to the canons. But if any persons, for the sake of a public office or dignity, or to get an estate, received a fallacious baptism themselves, but in the mean time left their wives, or children, or servants, or any that were retainers, or near relations to them, in their ancient error, their goods in that case are ordered to be confiscated, and their persons punished, by a competent judge, and excluded from bearing any office in the commonwealth. Photius repeats this law in his Nomocanon, and adds to it another of the same nature, concerning the Samaritans, That though they themselves were not to be baptized till they had been two years catechumens, yet their little ones, who were not capable of instruction, might be admitted to baptism without any such delay or prorogation: which law is now extant among Justinian's Novels.⁷⁴ From all which it appears, that as soon as any Jews or heathens were either baptized themselves, or had only taken upon them the state of catechumens, their children were made capable of baptism, and, accordingly, by law required to be baptized. Thus much of infants, and the several cases I have met with in the writings of the ancients, relating to their baptism.

CHAPTER V.

OF THE BAPTISM OF ADULT PERSONS.

THE other sort of persons on whom baptism was conferred, were adult persons, who were grown up to years of understanding, and who, in those days, made up the main body of the baptized. These were usually converts from Judaism or Gentilism, who, before they could be admitted to baptism, were obliged to spend some time in the state of catechumens, to qualify them to make their professions of faith and a Christian life ⁷² Sect. 1. No adult persons to be baptized without previous instruction, to qualify them to answer for themselves.

⁷¹ Ambros. de Vocat. Gent. lib. 2. cap. 8. Multis sæpe, quos suorum impietas deseruit, alienorum cura servierit, et ad regenerationem venerint per extraneos, quæ eis non erat providenda per proximos.

⁷² Vid. Rivet, et Waleum in Synopsi Purioris Theologiæ, Disput. 44. n. 49.

⁷³ Cod. Justin. lib. 1. Tit. 11. de Paganis, Leg. 10. Qui nondum sunt baptizati, ipsi cum liberis et conjugibus et omnibus suis perducant se ad sanctas ecclesias: et suos parvulos liberos sine mora baptizari curent: majores vero prius Scripturas secundum canones doceantur. Si vero propter militiam, vel dignitatem, vel facultates habendas fingant baptizari: et liberos aut conjuges eorum, aut domesticos suos in errore reliquerint, et eos qui sibi attinent et necessitudine juncti sunt: publicantur et competenter plectuntur, et rempublicam non attingunt. This law is repeated by Balsamon, Constitut. Eccles. ap. Justell. Bibliothec. Juris Canon. t. 2. p. 1298. and in Photius Nomocanon. Tit. 4. cap. 4. p. 907. ibid.

⁷⁴ Phot. Nomocan. Tit. 4. cap. 4. p. 907. Justin. Novel. 144. cap. 2. Per duos primum annos in fide instituantur, et pro viribus Scripturas ediscant: tumque demum sacro redemptionis offerantur baptismati, tam longi temporis pœnitentia prorsus redemptionis fructum assecuti. Pueros autem admodum, qui per ætatem doctrinas intelligere nequeunt, etiam absque hac observatione sacro dignari baptismate admittimus.

in their own persons. For without such personal professions, there was ordinarily no admission of them to the privilege of baptism. The time of their instruction, and the substance and manner of it, has already been considered particularly in the last Book: all, therefore, I have further to observe concerning them here, is in relation to some special cases, which we find determined in the canons of the ancient councils, when, because great multitudes were baptized at riper years, the church had occasion to consider many cases, which are scarce to be met with in the rules of later ages.

One of these doubtful cases was in reference to dumb persons, who were incapacitated at the time of baptism from answering for themselves. In this case, if persons had desired to be baptized before this infirmity came upon them, or if they could by sufficient signs signify their present desire, the church favourably accepted their request, and admitted them to the privilege of baptism. The first council of Orange¹ has a canon in favour of such persons, both with respect to baptism and penance; for it decrees, That a person who is suddenly struck speechless, may either be baptized, or admitted to penance, if it appears by the testimony of others, that he had any such will or desire before he became dumb; or if in the time of this misfortune he could make signs to express his present desire and intention. In the African Code, there is a canon to the same purpose, That men² so sick that they cannot answer for themselves, may be baptized, if their friends who attended them in danger, do testify their desire of baptism. And among the canonical answers of Timotheus of Alexandria, there is one of the like nature. For the question is put,³ Whether if a catechumen be so disordered in his mind that he cannot make profession of his faith, he may be baptized, notwithstanding this infirmity? And the answer is, He may if he be not possessed. We have an instance of this case actually verified in the baptism of an African negro slave at Carthage, whom his master had caused to be instructed among the catechumens, and prepared him among the competentes for baptism. He had made his profession of faith and the usual renunciations publicly in the church, as was customary for the candidates of baptism to do before they came to the baptistery to consummate the mystery. But just before the time of baptism he fell sick of a fever, which made him speechless. However, he was baptized; others answering in his name, as if it had been for an infant. Ferrandus, who tells the story, had some doubts concerning this baptism, which he communicated to Fulgentius, bishop of Ruspa, who gave him a consolatory answer to this effect: That this man⁴ had all the conditions required by our Saviour for adult persons, which were, that they should believe and be baptized. Faith and the profession of it is the act of the man: the baptizing him is only the act of the minister. And though this man had not his senses when the minister performed his act, yet he had when he himself performed his own. We believe, indeed, that none but infants are saved by the faith of those that bring them, and that at the age of reason a man's own confession is required: but this man made his profession whilst he had his senses, and was baptized whilst he was yet alive. From whence he concludes, that there was no reason to doubt of his salvation, because he had done all that was necessary on his part, and was baptized in the manner that in this case the canons had appointed. Let me add to all this, how it is that Albaspinæus and many others understand that canon of the council of Eliberis,⁵ which speaks of catechumens deserting their station, and forsaking the church for a long time, yet at last desiring to be baptized: in this case, though they were speechless, they might be baptized, if either any of the clergy, or other faithful witnesses, could testify that they desired to be made Christians, because their crimes were committed whilst they were in the old man: or, as other copies read it, because they seemed to have relinquished and bid adieu to the old man; that is, in their former state of sin and natural corruption. And this was but the very same privilege as was allowed men in the business of penance, mentioned in the forecited council of Orange, and also the fourth council of Carthage, where it is said,⁶ That if a lapses desires to be admitted to

¹ Conc. Arausican. 1. can. 12. Subito obmutescens, prout statutum est, baptizari aut pœnitentiam accipere potest, si voluntatis præteritæ testimonium aliorum verbis habet, aut presentis in suo nutu.

² Conc. Carthag. 3. can. 31. Ut ægrotantes, si pro se respondere non possunt, cum voluntatis eorum testimonium sui dixerint, baptizentur. Similiter et de pœnitentibus agendum est. This canon is repeated in the Codex Canon. Eccles. Afric. can. 48. and in the later editions of the Councils it is read with a little variation, thus, Cum voluntatis eorum testimonium hi, qui suis periculo proprio affuere, dixerint, baptizentur, &c.

³ Timoth. Respons. Canon. cap. 4. ap. Bevereg. Pandect. t. 2. p. 166.

⁴ Fulgent. de Baptismo Æthiopsis, cap. 8. See a like case in St. Austin's Confessions, lib. 4. cap. 4.

⁵ Conc. Eliber. can. 45. Qui aliquando fuerit catechumenus, et per infinita tempora nunquam ad ecclesiam accesserit, si eum de clero quisquam agnoverit voluisse esse Christianum, aut testes aliqui fideles extiterint, placuit ei baptismum non negari, eo quod in veterem hominem deliquisse videatur, al. eo quod veterem hominem dereliquisse videatur.

⁶ Conc. Carthag. 4. can. 76. Qui pœnitentiam in infirmitate petit, si casu, dum ad eum sacerdos invitatus venit, oppressus infirmitate obmutuerit, vel in frenesim versus fuerit, dent testimonium qui eum audierunt, et accipiat pœnitentiam; et si continuo creditur moriturus, reconcilietur per penance in time of sickness, and unfortunately becomes speechless, or falls into a frenzy, while the priest who is sent for is coming to him, they who heard his desire shall testify for him, and he shall be admitted to penance: and if he seems to be at the point of death, he shall be reconciled by the imposition of hands, and have the eucharist poured into his mouth. But if he recovers, the witnesses shall acquaint him that his petition was granted, and then he shall submit himself to the ordinary rules of penance, so long as the priest who admitted him to penance shall think fit in his discretion. Now, it is probable that, after the same manner, persons who were baptized in such a condition, when they recovered, were obliged to make their professions, as was usual in baptism, when afterwards they received the imposition of hands in confirmation. But as I cannot affirm this upon the certain evidence of any rule or canon, as in the other case of penance, but only judge by parity of reason, I will not be positive, but leave every one to enjoy his own opinion.

Another question was sometimes raised about the energumens, or persons possessed by evil spirits, whether during the time of their possession it was proper to give them baptism. The council of Eliberis orders them to be deferred, till they were set free and cured; but yet in case of extremity, and visible appearance of death,⁷ appoints them to be baptized. The first council⁸ of Orange seems to have allowed it not only in absolute necessity, but in the remissions and intervals of their distemper; for it orders, That such catechumens as were possessed, should be baptized, according as their necessity required, or opportunity permitted. In the canons of Timothy, bishop of Alexandria, the same question is put, but resolved a little differently: If baptism be desired for a catechumen that is possessed, what shall be done? To which the answer is, Let him be baptized at the hour of death, and not otherwise.⁹ So likewise in the Constitutions¹⁰ under the name of the Apostles: If any one is possessed with a devil, let him be taught the principles of piety, but not be received to communion till he is cleansed: yet if he be under the pressure of imminent death, let him be received. Some understand this of being received to the communion of the eucharist, but it is plain the author means it of being received to the communion of the church by baptism: for he is there giving rules concerning persons to be baptized, and describing their necessary qualifications; among which this is one, That energumens shall be cleansed before they be admitted to communion, except at the hour of death, where necessity gave them a dispensation. And this was the ancient rule in the time of Cyprian, who says, That they who were possessed with unclean spirits, were baptized in time of sickness: and many times this benefit followed from it, that though some of those for want of faith were still vexed¹¹ with unclean spirits; the true energy of baptism, which was to deliver men from the power of the devil, failing in some by their own default and weakness of faith: yet in others it was found true by experience, that they who were baptized in time of sickness and urgent necessity, were thereby delivered from the unclean spirit, with which they were before possessed, and thenceforward lived a very laudable and reputable life in the church, and made a daily proficiency and increase in heavenly grace by the augmentation of their faith. And, on the contrary, it oftentimes happened, that some of those who were baptized in health, when they afterward fell into sin, were tormented with the unclean spirit returning upon them: whence it was apparent, that the devil was excluded in baptism by the faith of the believer, but if afterward his faith failed, the devil returned to his old possession. From this discourse of Cyprian we learn, not only that energumens in time of extremity were admitted to baptism, but that baptism in such cases was many times a peculiar benefit to them, whilst it delivered them from the possession of unclean spirits, which could not before be cast out by any power of the exorcists, though in those days the power of exorcism was a miraculous gift of the Holy Ghost.

manus impositionem, et infundatur ori ejus eucharistia. Si supervixerit, admoneatur a supradictis testibus petitioni suæ satisfactum, et subdatur statutis pœnitentiæ legibus, quamdiu sacerdos qui pœnitentiam dedit, probaverit. Vid. Leo. Ep. 89. ad Theod. Forojulensem. al. 91.

⁷ Conc. Eliber. can. 37. Eos qui ab immundis spiritibus vexantur, si in fine mortis fuerint constituti, baptizari placet.

⁸ Conc. Arausican. can. 15. Energumenis catechumenis, in quantum vel necessitas exegerit, vel opportunitas permiserit, de baptisate consulendum.

⁹ Timoth. Respon. Canon. c. 2. Ἐάν δαιμονιζόμενος μή καθαρισθῆ, ἢ δύναται λαβεῖν τὸ ἅγιον βάπτισμα. περὶ δὲ τὴν ἕξοδον βαπτίζεται.

¹⁰ Constit. Apost. lib. 8. cap. 32. Ἐάν δὲ τις δαίμονα ἔχει, διδασκείτω μὲν τὴν εὐσέβειαν, μὴ προσδεχέστω δὲ εἰς κοινωνίαν, πρὶν ἄν καθαρισθῆ. εἰ δὲ θάνατος κατεπίγγοι, προσ-δεχέστω.

¹¹ Cypr. Ep. 76. al. 69. ad Magnum. p. 187. Si aliquis in illo movetur, quod quidam de iis qui ægri baptizantur, spiritibus adhuc immundis tentantur; sciat diaboli nequitiam pertinacem usque ad aquam salutarem valere, in baptismo vero omne nequitia suæ virus amittere.—Ibid. p. 188. Hoc denique et rebus ipsis experimur, ut necessitate urgente in ægritudine baptizati et gratiam consecuti, careant immundo spiritu, quo antea movebantur; et laudabiles ac probabiles in ecclesia vivant, plusque per dies singulos in augmentum cœlestis gratiæ per fidei incrementa proficiant. Et contra nonnulli sæpe de illis qui sani baptizantur, si postmodum peccare cœperint, spiritu immundo redeunte quantuntur; ut manifestum sit, diabolum in baptismo fide credentis excludi; si fides postmodum defecerit, regredi. See also Clemens. Recognit. lib. 4. cap. 32. to the same purpose.

Another observation to be made upon the baptism of adult persons, is in relation to such as were slaves to Christian masters. For we find by the author of the Constitutions under the name of the Apostles, that in the examination of the several qualifications of those that offered themselves to baptism, one part of the inquiry was, whether they were slaves or freemen. If they were slaves to a heathen, they were only taught their obligations to please their master, that the word of God might not be blasphemed; and the master had no further concern in their baptism, as being himself an infidel: but if the master were a Christian, then the testimony of the master was first to be required¹² concerning the life and conversation of his slave, before he could be admitted to the privilege of baptism. If he gave a laudable account of him, he was received; if otherwise, he was rejected, till he approved himself to his master. So far in those days it was thought necessary and serviceable to religion to grant Christian masters a power over their slaves, that without their testimony and approbation they could not be accepted as fit candidates of baptism: not that this was intended to countenance any tyrannical power in Christian masters to debar their slaves of baptism, and deny them the privilege and benefits of the Christian religion, (which is a piece of barbarous cruelty, and spiritual tyranny over men's souls, unknown to former ages,) but the design was to preserve the purity of religion, and keep back hypocritical and profane pretenders from the holy mysteries; the over-hasty admission of whom might prove a scandal and disgrace to the profession, if persons of a doubtful life were indiscriminately and indifferently admitted to the sacred rites of it. This caution wisely lodged a useful power in the hands of Christian masters, which prudence and charity directed them to use soberly, to edification, and not to destruction. And experience proved it to be a useful rule; for it both made the masters zealous for the salvation of their slaves, as we have seen in the instance of the African negro mentioned in Fulgentius, and also made the slaves sincere in their professions and pretences to religion, when they knew they could not be accepted as real converts, worthy of baptism, without the corroborating testimony of their masters. There were also laws of state obliging all masters to take care of their families, so far as to see that every individual person, slaves as well as children, were made Christians; and in default of this, some penalties were annexed, depriving the masters of certain privileges in the commonwealth, if they were found either remiss, or acting by collusion in this part of their duty.¹³ So that all imaginable obligation was laid upon masters, both in point of interest, duty, and charity, to take care of the instruction of their slaves, and bring them with their own testimonials to Christian baptism.

Yet, because baptism was to be a voluntary act in adult persons, some laws were made against compelling any one by force to receive it. In the fourth council of Toledo a canon was made to this purpose concerning the Jews, who had sometimes been drawn by force to be baptized against their will, and it was ordered by the synod, that thenceforth no one should be compelled by force to profess¹⁴ the Christian faith. "For God hath mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth." For such are not to be saved against their will, but of their own free consent, that the form or method of their justification may be perfect. For as man perished by his own free will, obeying the serpent, so every man is saved (when he is called by the grace of God) by his own voluntary act of faith, and conversion of his own mind. Therefore they are not to be compelled by force, but to be persuaded by their own free will to be converted. But as to those who have heretofore been forced to embrace Christianity, as was done in the time of the religious prince Sisebutus, or Sisenandus, forasmuch as they have been partakers of the sacraments, and have received the grace of baptism, and the unction of chrism, and the communion of the body and blood of the Lord, therefore they ought to be obliged to hold the faith, which they were compelled by force or necessity to receive, lest the name of the Lord should be blasphemed, and the faith which they have received be vilified and exposed to contempt. By this we learn, that baptism was always to be a voluntary act in adult persons, and none were to be compelled against their own wills to receive it: and though the church did not rescind such actions as were done against this rule, yet she

Sect. 4.
No slave to be baptized without the testimony of his master.

Sect. 5.
Yet baptism to be a voluntary act, and no one to be compelled by force to receive it.

¹² Constit. Apost. lib. 8. cap. 32. 'Εάν πιστοῦ δούλος ᾖ, ἔρωτάσθω ὁ κύριος αὐτοῦ, εἰ μαρτυρεῖ αὐτῷ· εἰ δὲ μή, ἀποβαλλέσθω, ἕως ἂν αὐτὸν ἄξιον ἐπιδείξῃ τῷ δεσπότῃ, εἰ δὲ μαρτυρεῖ αὐτῷ, προσδέχέσθω.

¹³ See chap. 4. sect. 19.

¹⁴ Conc. Tolet. 4. can. 56. De Judæis autem præceptum sancta synodus, nemini deinceps ad credendum vim inferre. Cui enim vult Deus miseretur, et quem vult indurat. Non enim tales inviti salvandi sunt, sed volentes, ut integra sit forma justitia: sicut enim homo propria arbitrii voluntate serpentis obediens perit, sic vocante se gratiâ Dei, propria mentis conversione homo quisque credendo salvatur. Ergo non vi, sed liberâ arbitrii voluntate, ut convertantur suadendi sunt, non potius impellendi. Qui autem jam pridem ad Christianitatem venire coacti sunt, sicut factum est temporibus religiosissimi principis Sisebuti, (al. Sisenandi,) quia jam constat eos sacramentis Divinis sociatos, et baptismi gratiam suscepisse, et chrismate unctos esse, et corporis Domini et sanguinis exstitisse participes, oportet etiam ut fidem, quam vi vel necessitate susceperunt, tenere cogantur, ne nomen Domini blasphemetur, et fides, quam susceperunt, vilis ac contemptibilis habeatur.

did not approve them, but thought them worthy of her censure, and unfit to be made a precedent for the future. That which looks most like force in this case allowed by law, was the orders of Justinian mentioned¹⁵ before, one of which appoints the heathens, and the other the Samaritans, to be baptized, with their wives, and children, and servants, under pain of confiscation. But even these laws did not compel them to be baptized against their wills, but allowed them two years' time to be catechumens, and admitted none but such as made a voluntary profession of their faith and repentance. For the penalties were only designed to prevent fraud and prevarications, in such as pretended to receive baptism themselves, but in the mean time took no care to have their families made Christian; against whom the wisdom of the state then thought no laws severe enough could be enacted. So that these laws were tempered with the greatest prudence, between the extremes of rigour and remissness, that men might be made sensible, on the one hand, of their obligations to become Christians, and yet none have reason to complain, on the other hand, that they were forced by violence to embrace a religion against their wills, which they could not approve and assent to. For the penalties, as I said, were only designed to chastise the hypocritical practices and fraudulent remissness of manifest prevaricators. And it were to be wished, that all civil governments and states in all ages would enact such laws, and put them duly in execution, against such sort of Christians, who, instead of encouraging their slaves to be baptized, are the only obstacles to hinder and deprive them of the benefit of Christian baptism.

I have one thing more to note concerning adult persons, who might or might not be admitted to baptism: and that is, that all such heathens as made their livelihood out of any scandalous trades or professions, which could not be allowed by the rules of Christianity, were rejected from baptism, till they solemnly promised to bid adieu, and actually forsook such vocations. The author of the Apostolical Constitutions specifies several of this nature. Such as the ποροβοσκοί, panders or procurers; πόρνοι, whores; εἰδωλοποιοί, makers of images or idols;¹⁶ against whom Tertullian has also a particular dissertation, where he censures this trade as inconsistent with the profession of Christianity, telling men, that by this art they made the devils their alumni, their pupils, to whom they were a sort of foster-fathers, whilst they furnished out materials to carry on their service. And with what confidence,¹⁷ says he, can any man exorcise his own alumni, those devils, whose service he makes his own house a shop or armoury to maintain? reflecting on this unlawful trade of making images for the idol temples. Next to these in the Constitutions follow οἱ ἐπὶ σκηνῆς, actors and stage-players, who could not stick to that profession, and be admitted to Christian baptism, because a great deal both of lewdness and idolatry was actually committed or encouraged by such as made a livelihood of that profession. The canons, therefore, forbade all such to be baptized, and excommunicated those that fell to the trade again after baptism. If a soothsayer or a stage-player, says the council of Eliberis,¹⁸ have a mind to become believers, that is, to be baptized, let them be received, on condition they first bid adieu to their arts, and return not to them again. Which if they attempt to do against this prohibition, they shall be cast out of the church. In like manner, the third council of Carthage¹⁹ appoints all such to be excommunicated, and not to be reconciled or received again to favour but upon their conversion. And in the time of Cyprian, not only public actors, but private teachers and masters of this scandalous art, were debarred the communion of the church: as appears from Cyprian's answer to Eucratius, who put this question to him, Whether²⁰ a stage-player might communicate, who continued to follow that dishonourable trade, by teaching children that pernicious art, which he was master of? To which Cyprian replies, That it was neither agreeable to the majesty of God, nor the discipline of the gospel, that the modesty and honour of the church should be defiled with so base and infamous a contagion. For if the law prohibited men to wear women's apparel, and laid a curse upon all that did it; how much greater was the crime, not only to wear their clothes, but to express their loose, and wanton, and effeminate gestures, by teaching this immodest art to others! Indeed, this kind of life was scandalous even among the wise and sober part of the very heathens. Tertullian observes, That they who pro-

¹⁵ See chap. 4. sect. 19.
¹⁶ Constit. Apost. lib. 8. cap. 32.
¹⁷ Tertul. de Idololat. c. 11. Quâ constantiâ exorcizabit alumnos suos, quibus domum suam cellariam præstat?
¹⁸ Conc. Eliber. can. 62. Si augur aut pantomimi credere voluerint, placuit, ut prius artibus suis renuncient, et tunc demum suscipiantur, ita ut ulterius non revertantur. Quod si facere contra interdictum tentaverint, projiciantur ab ecclesia.
¹⁹ Conc. Carthag. 3. can. 35. Ut scenicis atque histrionibus, cæterisque hujusmodi personis, vel apostaticis, confessed these arts were noted with infamy,²¹ degraded and denied many privileges, driven from court, from pleading, from the senate, from the order of knight-hood, and all other honours in the Roman city and commonwealth. Which is also confirmed by St. Austin,²² who says, No actor was ever allowed to enjoy the freedom, or any other honourable privilege of a citizen of Rome. Therefore, since this was so infamous and scandalous a trade even among the heathens, it is no wonder the church would admit none of this calling to baptism, without obliging them first to bid adieu to so ignominious a profession. To have done otherwise, had been to expose herself to reproach, and to have given occasion to the adversary to blaspheme, if men of such lewd and profligate practices had been admitted to the privileges of the church, who were excluded from the liberties of the city, and honours of the commonwealth.

versis vel reversis ad Dominum, gratia vel reconciliatio non negetur.
²⁰ Cypr. Ep. 61. al. 2. ad Eueratium, p. 3. Consulendum me existimasti, quid mihi videatur de histrione quodam, qui apud vos constitutus, in ejusdem adhuc artis suæ dedecore perseverat, et magister et doctor non erudiendorum, sed pendendorum puerorum, id quod male didicit, cæteris quoque insinuat; an talis debeat communicare nobiscum? Puto nec Majestati Divinæ, nec evangelicæ disciplinæ congruere, ut pudor et honor ecclesiæ tam turpi et infami contagione fœdetur, &c.

Sect. 7.
And gladiators,
charioteers, and other gamesters.

The next that are prohibited in the Constitutions, are charioteers, and gladiators,²³ and racers, and curators of the common games, practisers in the Olympic games, minstrels, harpers, dancers, vintners, and such like, who are commanded either to quit these callings, or to be rejected from baptism. It may seem a little strange, that some of these callings, which seem indifferent in their own nature, and are now commonly allowed, should then be thought just reasons to debar men from baptism. But it is to be supposed, that these arts in the time of heathenism were instrumental in carrying on idolatry, lewdness, and profaneness, and therefore by the ancients, whose discipline was exact, were thought improper to be allowed in the practice of a Christian. The Circensian games were in honour of the gods, and therefore to be concerned in them as a charioteer, was still to partake in idolatry. Upon which account, the first council of Arles²⁴ orders all such to be excommunicated as continued after baptism in this service. And there is a remarkable story told by St. Jerom²⁵ in the Life of Hilarion, concerning one of these charioteers, a heathen of the city of Gaza, who, being struck by the devil with a dead palsy, as he was driving his chariot, so that he could not move his hand, nor neck, but only his tongue to prayer; in this condition he was brought in a bed to Hilarion, who told him that he could not be healed, unless he believed in Jesus, and promised to bid adieu to his former trade. The man immediately upon this believed, renounced, and was healed, rejoicing more for the salvation of his soul than his body. This calling ministered to idolatry, and upon that score a renunciation of it was so precisely exacted of men at their baptism. The gladiator's art was infamous for its barbarity and cruelty, involving men in murder and bloodshed, and therefore utterly inconsistent with the rules of Christianity. The racers, and curators of the public games, and Olympic combatants, were all concerned in idolatrous practices; for these games also were held in the name and to the honour of some idol god; which calling was therefore to be renounced, as an appendage to idolatry, before men came to baptism. For the other trades, of minstrels, harpers, dancers, &c., besides their ministering to levity, vanity, and luxury, they were also employed in idol worship and other profaneness, which seems to have been the principal reason of making such a strict prohibition of them in the subsequent life of every Christian.

The next sort of persons mentioned in the Constitutions, as unworthy of baptism, are lascivious persons, with all practisers of curious arts,²⁶ as magicians, enchanters, astrologers, diviners, magical charmers, idle and wandering beggars, makers of amulets and phylacteries, and such as dealt in heathenish lustrations, soothsayers, and observers of signs and omens, interpreters of palpitations, observers of accidents in meeting others, making divination thereupon, as upon a blemish in the eye, or in the feet, observers of the motion of birds or weasels, observers of voices and symbolical sounds. All these are appointed to be examined and tried a considerable time, whether they would relinquish their arts or not. If they did, they might be received; if not, they were to be rejected from baptism. The names of these curious arts, which I have expressed in the margin, are some of them difficult to be understood. The λώταγες are explained by Chrysostom²⁷ to be idle wandering beggars, given to spend what they

Sect. 8.
Astrologers and practisers of other curious arts.

²¹ Tertul. de Spectac. cap. 22. Dammant ignominia et capitis minutione, arcentes curia, rostris, senatu, equite, ceterisque honoribus omnibus simul ac ornamentis.

²² Aug. de Civ. Dei, lib. 2. c. 14. Actores poeticarum fabularum remeovnt a societate civitatis—ab honoribus omnibus repellunt homines scenicos.

²³ Constit. Apost. lib. 8. c. 32. Ἠνίοχος, ἢ μονομάχος, ἢ ταδιοδρόμος, ἢ λουδεμπιστής, ἢ Ὀλυμπικός, ἢ χοραύλης, ἢ κίθαριστής, ἢ λυριστής, ἢ ὁ τὴν ὄρχησιν ἐπιδικεύμενος, ἢ κήτηλος, ἢ πανασθωσαν, ἢ ἀποβαλλέσθωσαν.

²⁴ Conc. Arelat. 1. can. 4. De agitatoribus, qui fideles sunt, placuit eos, quamdiu agitant, a communione separari.

²⁵ Hieron. Vit. Hilarion. cap. 13. Auriga Gazensis, in curru percussus a dæmone, totus obriguit, ita ut nec manus agitare, nec cervicem posset reflectere. Delatus ergo in lecto, cum solam linguam moveret ad preces, audivit non prius posse sanari, quam crederet in Jesum, et se sponderet arti pristinae renunciaturum. Credidit, spondidit, sanatus est, magisque de animæ quam de corporis salute exultavit.

²⁶ Constit. Apost. lib. 8. cap. 32. Μάγος, ἐπαισίδος, ἀστρολόγος, μάντις, Ξηρεπωδός, λώταξ, ὀχλαγωγός, περιάμματα ποιῶν, περικαθαίρων, οἰωνιστής, συμβολοδείκτης, παλμῶν ἑρμενεύς, φυλαττόμενος ἐν συναντήσῃ λώβας ὄψεως, ἢ ποδών, ἢ ὀρνίθων, ἢ γαλῶν, ἢ ἐπιφωνήσεων, ἢ παρακροσμάτων συμβολικῶν, χρόνῳ δοκιμαζέσθωσαν, &c.

²⁷ Chrysost. Hom. 13. in Ephes.

got in gaming and luxury. But others make them a sort of diviners, or fortune-tellers, like our gipsies, which is most agreeable to this place. The περιήματα were the same with the phylacteria, which were amulets made of ribands, with a text of Scripture, or some other charm of words, written in them, and hanged about the neck to cure diseases, and preserve men from danger, whence they had the name of phylacteries or preservatives. Now, this was a piece of heathenish superstition and idolatry, which stuck closest to new converts, and was most difficult to be cured. Therefore we find the ancient canons and fathers very severe in their censures and invectives against it. The council of Laodicea condemns clergymen that pretended to make such phylacteries, which were truly the bonds and fetters of their own souls, and orders all such as wore them to be cast out of the church.²⁸ The council of Trullo²⁹ decrees six years' penance for such offenders. St. Chrysostom³⁰ declaims against it as gross idolatry, whatever little pleas were brought in favour of it. The use of amulets to hang about the neck, says he, is idolatry, though they that gain by it offer a thousand philosophical arguments to defend it, saying, We only pray to God, and do nothing more; and, The old woman that made them was a Christian and a believer; with other such like excuses: notwithstanding all which, he threatens to excommunicate all such as were found to practise it. So that, as this was a crime deserving excommunication in all that were already baptized, it was thought also a just reason to prohibit any from coming to baptism, who would not first promise to renounce it.

Sect. 9.
Frequenters of the public games and theatre.

Another sort of persons whom the author of the Constitutions excludes from the privilege of baptism, are frequenters of the public games and theatre. If any man's mind³¹ be addicted to the madness of the theatre, or huntings, or horse-racings, or other gymnastical sports and exercises, let him either leave them off or be rejected from baptism. The learned Hieronymus Mercurialis³² has an observation, that will explain the reason of this prohibition. For in his curious discourse, De Arte Gymnastica, he observes, these several sorts of heathen games and plays were instituted upon a religious account, in honour of the gods, and men thought they were doing a grateful thing to them, whilst they were engaged in such exercises. Therefore a Christian could not be present at them as a spectator, without partaking, in some measure, in the idolatry of them. Besides, there was a great deal of barbarity and cruelty, as well as lewdness and profaneness, committed in many of them, which it did not become a Christian eye to behold with pleasure and approbation. The theatre was looked upon as the devil's propriety, and so he himself termed it, as we learn from that famous story in Tertullian,³³ where speaking of a Christian woman, who went to the theatre, and returned possessed with a devil, he says, The unclean spirit being asked by the exorcist, how he durst presume to make such an attempt upon a believer, replied confidently, that he had a right to her, because he found her upon his own ground. For these reasons the ancient canons and fathers are so frequently severe in their invectives against all theatrical exercises, not only in the actors, but also in the spectators, declaring them to be incompatible with the piety and purity of a Christian life. And upon this account men were obliged to renounce them before they could be admitted to baptism. But of this something more when we come to the form of renunciation.

The several sorts of persons hitherto mentioned were excluded from baptism without exception: but there are two other kinds or states of life, that must be considered with some distinction, that is, the military life, and the state of concubinage, as it is called sometimes in the civil law and ancient canons. Some learned persons³⁴ are of opinion, that the ancients had so much a dislike to the military life, as to excommunicate such as bore arms after baptism: which they affirm upon the authority of the Nicene fathers, to whom they impute it as an error, that they condemned absolutely the military life as unlawful, which St. John Baptist had approved. But this charge is grounded merely upon a mistake and misunderstanding of the meaning of those fathers, who had no intent to condemn the military life in general, but only as it might happen to be unlawful in some particular circumstances and cases. The words of the canon referred to are these: "If any, who at first by the grace of God

Sect. 10.
In what cases the military life might unqualify men for baptism.

²⁸ Conc. Laodic. can. 36. Οὐ δεῖ ἱερατικὸς ἢ κληρικὸς ποιεῖν τὰ λεγόμενα φυλακτήρια, ἅτινά ἐστι δεσμοτήρια τῶν ψυχῶν αὐτῶν τοὺς δὲ φορῶντας ῥίπτεισθαι ἐκ τῆς ἐκκλησίας ἐκελεύσαμεν.

²⁹ Conc. Trull. can. 61.

³⁰ Chrys. Hom. 8. in Colos. p. 1374. Τὰ περιήματα, κἄν μύρια φιλοσοφῶσιν οἱ ἐκ τῶν χρηματιζόμενοι, &c. εἰδωλοταρτεία τὸ πρῶτον ἐστίν. Vid. Chrys. in Psalm. ix. et Hom. 6. adversus Judæos. It. Basil. in Psalm. xvi. Chrys. Hom. 21. ad Pop. Antioch.

³¹ Constit. Apost. lib. 8. cap. 32. Θεατρομανίς ἐστὶς πρόσκειται, ἢ κυνηγίος, ἢ ἵπποδρομίος, ἢ ἀγῶσιν ἢ πανσάσσω, ἢ ἀποβαλλέσσω.

³² Mercurial. de Arte Gymnast. lib. 1. cap. 3. p. 12. Ludorum finis erat religio quædam, qua antiqui opinabantur sese diis rem gratam illis ludis tanquam promissam facturos.

³³ Tertul. de Spectac. cap. 26. Theatrum adiit, et inde cum dæmonio rediit. Itaque in exorcismo cum oneraretur immundus spiritus, quod ausus esset fidelem aggredi; constanter, et justissime, inquit, feci, in meo enim inveni.

³⁴ Scult. Discus. Quæst. de Concilio Nicæno, in Medulla Patr. par. 1. p. 477.

made confession of the faith,³⁵ and cast away the military girdle, afterward return to their vomit again, so as to give money and buy a place in the army, let them be ten years among the prostrators, after they have been three years among the hearers.³⁷ The generality of interpreters take this to refer peculiarly to the times of Licinius the persecutor, who by an edict had ordered all such Christian soldiers to be cashiered, as would not sacrifice to the gods; upon which many Christians in the army threw away their girdles, and quitted the military life. But afterward some of them returned again to it upon the conditions proposed, doing sacrifice and committing idolatry, and giving money to regain their places; against whose prevarication and revolt the discipline of this canon was intended. So Balsamon and Zonaras among the old expositors; and so Grotius³⁶ and Ziegler,³⁷ Sylvius and Coriolanus, Binnius, and Bishop Beverege, with many other modern writers. Albaspinæus thinks it peculiarly respected such penitents only, as vowed to renounce all secular business and employments, and to live in a state of perpetual penance, but afterward³⁸ returned to a secular life, and took upon them civil offices again, which in the imperial law and canons of the church are sometimes called by the name of militia palatina. And Salmasius advances³⁹ an opinion not much different from this. However, it is agreed on all hands, that the council of Nice made no general prohibition of the military life, but only in some such special cases. There is therefore no reason to conclude from hence, that they esteemed the vocation of a soldier simply unlawful. Especially considering that Constantine himself allowed the soldiers, who were cashiered by Licinius, to return to their ancient employment again, as is rightly observed by Ziegler out of Theodoret and Eusebius.⁴⁰ Nay, the first council of Arles excommunicated all such as threw away their arms in time of peace,⁴¹ on pretence that they were Christians. All which abundantly proves, that the ancient canons did not condemn the military life as a vocation simply unlawful or antichristian, nor consequently such as men were obliged to renounce at their baptism; but all that was required of them, was only what St. John Baptist had exacted before, when they came to his baptism, as appears from the rule in the Constitutions,⁴² providing in this case, That a soldier, when he desired baptism, should be taught to do violence to no man, to accuse no one falsely, and to be content with his wages: if he consented to these things, he was to be received; if otherwise, to be rejected. This was the standing rule of the church, and I believe there is no instance of any man being refused baptism merely because he was a soldier, unless some unlawful circumstance, as that of idolatry, or the like, made the vocation sinful.

The other case, which has been matter of doubt, is concerning the state of concubinage, which in the common acceptation is a matter of such ill fame, that it seems a wonder to many to hear of any allowance made to it in the civil law and ancient canons. But they made a distinction anciently in this matter, as the Jews and patriarchs of old did, among whom there was one sort of concubines which was permitted, as differing nothing from a wife, save only that she was not married with all the solemnities and usual forms that the other was. And this sort of concubines the ancient canons received both to baptism and the communion. The rule in the Constitutions⁴³ about this matter is given thus: A concubine that is a slave to an infidel, if she keep herself only to him, may be received to baptism; but if she commit fornication with others, she shall be rejected. A like decree was made in the council of Toledo⁴⁴ concerning the admission of persons to the communion: If any Christian who has a wife, have also a concubine, let him not communicate. But if he have no wife, but only a concubine instead of a wife, he may not be repelled from the communion, provided he be content to be joined to one woman only, whether wife or concubine, as he pleases. Now the difference betwixt such a concubine and a wife, as learned men have observed,⁴⁵ was, not that the one was truly married, and the other not; but in the different way of their being married. For she that was called a wife was married publicly, and with great solemnity, and instruments of dowry, and other ceremonies which the civil and canon law required; but she who was

Sect. 11.
Whether persons might be baptized,
who lived in the state of concubinage.

³⁵ Conc. Nic. can. 12. Οἱ προσκληθέντες μὲν ἀπὸ τῆς χάριτος, καὶ τὴν πρώτην ὁρμὴν ἐνδοιξάμενοι, καὶ ἀποθέμενοι τὰς ζώνας, μετὰ δὲ ταῦτα ἐπὶ τὸ οἰκεῖον ἔμετον ἀναδραμόντες, &c.

³⁶ Grot. de Jure Belli, lib. 2. c. 2. p. 36.

³⁷ Ziegler. Animadvers. in Grotium, lib. 1. c. 2. p. 105.

³⁸ Albaspin. Not. in Can. 12. Conc. Nic.

³⁹ Salmas. de Fenore Trapezitico, p. 782. cited by Ziegler.

⁴⁰ Euseb. de Vit. Constant. lib. 2. c. 33.

⁴¹ Conc. Arelat. 1. can. 3. De his qui arma projiciunt in pace, placuit abstinere eos a communione.

⁴² Constit. Apost. lib. 8. c. 32. Στρατιώτης προσίων διασκήσθω μὴ ἀδικεῖν, μὴ συκοφαντεῖν, ἀρκέσθαι δὲ δίδομέ-νοis ὀψωνίοις· πειθόμενος προσδέσθω, αὐτιλέγων ἀποβαλλέσθω.

⁴³ Constit. Apost. lib. 8. c. 32. Παλλακὴ τινος ἀπίστου δέλη, ἐκείνῳ μόνῳ σχολάζεσθαι, προσδέσθω· εἰ δὲ καὶ πρὸς ἄλλους ἀσελγαίνει, ἀποβαλλέσθω.

⁴⁴ Conc. Tolet. 1. can. 17. Si quis habens uxorem fidelis, concubinam habeat, non communicet. Cæterum is qui non habet uxorem, et pro uxore concubinam habeat, a communione non repellatur, tantum ut unius mulieris, aut uxoris, aut concubine, ut ei placuerit, sit conjunctio contentus.

⁴⁵ Vide Anton. Augustinum de Emendatione Gratiani, lib. 1. Dial. 15. p. 170. Pet. Martyr. Loc. Com. lib. 2. cap. 20. n. 3. p. 273.

called a concubine, was one married in a private way, without the solemnity which the law required: but they both agreed in these three things: 1. That they were unmarried persons before. 2. That they obliged themselves to their husbands to live in conjugal chastity, and in procreation of children, and be joined to no other. 3. And that they would continue faithful in this state all their lives. Now, this sort of concubines, being in the nature of wives married without the formalities required in the civil law, were not reputed guilty of fornication, though they wanted the privileges, rights, and honours that the law allowed to those who were called legal wives: and therefore they were admitted to baptism without any further obligation, in case the husband was a heathen. But if the husband was a Christian, the rule in the Constitutions made a little difference. For if he had a concubine, he was obliged to dismiss her, and marry a lawful wife,⁴⁶ if his concubine was a slave; and if she was a free woman, he must make her a lawful wife; otherwise he was to be cast out of the church. And so in the decrees of Pope Leo,⁴⁷ Christians who had only concubines, were obliged to dismiss them, if they were slaves, unless they would free them, and lawfully endow them, and give them a public marriage as the laws required. And in this these decrees seem to differ from that of the council of Toledo, which allows a concubine to cohabit in private wedlock without any ecclesiastical censure. St. Austin⁴⁸ reckons this case one of those dubious and difficult points which cannot easily be determined. But he inclines to think a concubine of this kind might be admitted to baptism, because her case differs much from that of a professed adulteress, who could never be admitted to baptism, whilst she lived in the practice of so flagrant a crime; but the other case, he thinks, is a matter which the Scripture has no where so positively condemned, but rather left in doubt, as many other such points and questions, which the church in her prudence must decide by the best skill she has to determine such difficult questions. I have represented the sense of the ancients upon this point as clearly as I could, because it has occasioned some ill-grounded censures of the ancients, and of Gratian's canon-law, (which is only copied from them,) in some modern authors; as if they had allowed such concubines as we commonly call harlots, to be baptized without giving signs of repentance; whereas, we see, this matter was not so crudely delivered by them, but considered and determined with several necessary cautions and distinctions. And I have been the more particular in making inquiries concerning these several kinds of adult persons, who might, or might not, be admitted to baptism, because these are questions which the reader will not easily find so distinctly examined in modern writers, who have professedly treated of the subject of baptism.

I only note one thing more, concerning a pretended rule of purity among the Marcionites, which was, that they would admit no married persons to their baptism; but they must be either virgins, or widows, or bachelors, or divorced persons: which, as Tertullian observes, came doubtless from their abhorrence and condemnation⁴⁹ of the married life; which error was common to them with many other ancient heretics: though I do not find this peculiarity, of denying baptism to such persons, ascribed to any others. However it was, we are sure there was no such rule ever made to discourage marriage in the catholic church. Her rule was always that of St. Paul, "Marriage is honourable in all, and the bed undefiled; but whoremongers and adulterers God will judge." The church took upon her to judge adulterers, and by the power of the keys to exclude them from baptism; but beyond this she pretended to no power or commission from God, to be exercised over any others, whom God had left at liberty to be married or unmarried, as they saw occasion.

Sect. 12.
A peculiar error of the Marcionites in rejecting all married persons from baptism.

CHAPTER VI.

OF THE TIME AND PLACE OF BAPTISM.

NEXT to the persons who were the subjects of baptism, it will be proper to consider the circumstances of time and place in the administration of it. As to infants, I have already showed, that no time was limited for their baptism; but they were to be regenerated as soon as they could with convenience after the time of their natural birth; being confined to no day, as circumcision was, by any rule of Scripture: though the church in some places deferred

Sect. 1.
Why adult persons sometimes delayed baptism by order of the church.

to conjugii, sed profectus est honestatis.
⁴⁶ Aug. de Fide et Operibus, cap. 19. t. 4. p. 33. De concubina quoque, si professa fuerit nullum se alium cognituram, etiamsi ab illo cui subdita est, dimittatur: merito dubitatur, utrum ad percipiendum baptismum non debeat admitti.
⁴⁷ Tertul. cont. Marcion. lib. 1. cap. 29. Non tinguatur apud illum caro nisi virgo, nisi vidua, nisi cœlebs, nisi divortio baptisma mercata.—Sine dubio ex damnatione conjugii institutio ista constabit.

⁴⁶ Constit. Apost. lib. 8. c. 32. Πιτος ἐάν ἔχη παλλακὴν, εἰ μὲν δάλην, πανσάσω, καὶ νόμῳ γαμεῖτω, εἰ δὲ ἔλευθεραν, ἐκγαμεῖτω αὐτὴν νόμῳ. εἰ δὲ μή, ἀποβαλλέσθω.
⁴⁷ Leo, Ep. 92. ad Rusticum, c. 4. Clericus, si filiam viro habenti concubinam in matrimonium dederit, non ita accipiendum est, quasi conjugato ei dederit, nisi forte illa mulier et ingenua facta, et dotata legitime, et publicis nuptiis honestata videatur.—Ibid. c. 5. Ancillam a toro abicere, et uxorem certæ ingenuitatis accipere, non duplicathem, when there was no danger of death, to the solemnity of some greater festival. But for adult persons, the case was something otherwise; for their baptism was generally deferred for two or three years, or a longer or shorter time, by order of the church, till they could be sufficiently instructed, and disciplined to the practice of a Christian life; of which I have given a full account in the last book. Others had their baptism put off a longer time by way of punishment, when they fell into gross and scandalous crimes, which were to be expiated by a longer course of discipline and repentance. This was sometimes five, or ten, or twenty years, or more, even all their lives to the hour of death, when their crimes were very flagrant and provoking. If a catechumen turned informer against his brethren in time of persecution, and any one was proscribed or slain by his means, then, by a canon¹ of the council of Eliberis, his baptism was to be deferred for five years. And so in case a woman-catechumen divorced herself from her husband, her punishment was five years² prorogation. But if she committed adultery, and after conception used any arts to destroy her infant in the womb, then she was to remain unbaptized all her life, and only be admitted³ to baptism at the hour of death. From whence it is plain, that the baptism of adult persons was sometimes deferred a considerable time by order of the church; but then this was always either by way of preparation or punishment, whilst catechumens were first learning the principles of religion, or were kept in a state of penance to make satisfaction to the church for some scandalous transgression.

Sect. 2.
Private reasons for deferring baptism, against the rules of the church. 1. Supineness and negligence of salvation.

But others deferred their baptism of their own accord, against the rules of the church; of which practice there are frequent complaints in the writings of the ancients, and severe invectives against it, answering the common pleas which men usually urged in their own behalf. Some did it out of a supine laziness and careless negligence of their salvation, which was a very common reason,⁴ but such a one as men were ashamed to own, because its own reproach was a sufficient answer to it.

Others deferred it out of a heathenish principle still remaining in them, because they were in love with the world and its pleasures, which they were unwilling to renounce, to take upon them the yoke of Christ, which they thought would lay greater restraints upon them, and deny them those liberties which they could now more freely indulge themselves in, and securely enjoy. They could spend their life in pleasure, and be baptized at last, and then they should gain as much as those that were baptized before; for the labourers who came into the vineyard at the last hour, had the same reward as those that had borne the burden and heat of the day. Thus Gregory Nazianzen⁵ brings them in, arguing for delaying their baptism, as men now usually do for delaying repentance. This reason was so very absurd and foolish, that many who were governed by it were ashamed to own it. But yet, as St. Basil⁶ observes, though they did not speak a word, their actions sufficiently proclaimed it. For it was the same as if they had said, Let me alone, I will abuse the flesh to the enjoyment of all that is filthy; I will wallow in the mire of pleasures; I will imbrue my hands in blood; I will take away other men's goods, live by deceit, forswear and lie; and then I will be baptized when I shall leave off sinning. Such men had the idol of infidelity still in their hearts, as the author⁷ of the Recognitions, under the name of Clemens Romanus, charges them; and that was the true reason why they put off their baptism; for had they believed baptism to be necessary to all, whether just or unjust, they would have made haste to receive it, because the end of every man's life is utterly uncertain.

Another sort of men put off their baptism to the end of their lives upon a sort of Novatian principle, because they pretended to be afraid of falling into sin after baptism; and there was no second baptism allowed to regenerate men again to the kingdom of heaven; whereas, if they were baptized at the hour of death, heaven would be immediately open to them, and they might go pure and undefiled into it. In the mean time, if they died before baptism, they hoped God would accept the will for the deed, and the desire of baptism for baptism itself. Now, as this pretence was founded on abundance of errors, so the ancients are copious in refuting them. St. Basil⁸ argues against their practice from the uncertainty of life. For who, says he, has fixed for thee the term of life? Who is it that can promise thee the enjoyment of old age? Who can undertake to be a sufficient sponsor for futurity? Do you not see both young and old suddenly snatched away?

Sect. 4.
3. A fear of falling after baptism.

¹ Conc. Eliber. can. 73. Si quis catechumenus delator fuerit, et per delationem ejus aliquis fuerit proscriptus vel interfectus, post quinquennii tempora admittatur ad baptismum.

² Ibid. can. 11.

³ Ibid. can. 68. Catechumena si per adulterium conceperit, et conceptum necaverit, placuit eam in fine baptizari.

⁴ Naz. Orat. 40. de Bapt. p. 654. Constit. Apost. lib. 6. cap. 15.

⁵ Naz. Orat. 40. de Bapt. p. 650 et 652.

⁶ Basil. Exhort. ad Bapt. Hom. 13. t. 1. p. 414.

⁷ Clem. Recognit. lib. 6. n. 9. ap. Cotelerium, t. 1. Qui moratur accedere ad aquas, constat in eo infidelitatis adhuc idolum permanere; et ab ipso prohiberi ad aquas, quæ salutem conferunt, proferare. Sive enim justus, baptismus tibi per omnia necessarius est, &c.

⁸ Basil. Exhort. ad Bapt. t. 1. p. 415.

And why do you stay to make baptism only the gift of a fever? Gregory Nazianzen⁹ calls it a riddle, for an unbaptized man to think he is baptized in the sight of God, whilst he depends upon his mercy in the neglect of baptism; or to imagine himself in the kingdom of heaven, without doing the things that belong to the kingdom of heaven. This is but a vain hope, says Gregory Nyssen,¹⁰ bewitching the soul with false appearances and pretensions. And as they thus exposed the groundless hopes of these men, so they as zealously demonstrated to them the vanity of their pretended fears. For though there was no second baptism for them that fell into sin after the first, yet it was not impossible for men to avoid falling into damnable sins after their first purgation; or if they did so fall, yet if they were not sins unto death, they might obtain a second cleansing by pardon upon repentance. So that it was plain madness and folly to neglect baptism upon such uncertain fears, because that was to run a much more dangerous risk, whilst they sought to avoid a lesser inconvenience, which was attended with much more safety, and had no such apprehended danger in it.

Some again there were, who deferred their baptism upon a principle of mere fancy and superstition, in reference to the time, or place, or ministers of baptism. Gregory Nazianzen¹¹ brings in some, making this excuse: I stay till Epiphany, the time when Christ was baptized, that I may be baptized with Christ; I rather choose Easter, that I may rise with Christ; I wait for Whitsuntide, that I may honour the descent of the Holy Ghost. And what then? In the mean time comes death suddenly, in a day thou didst not expect, and in an hour thou art not aware of. Others had a superstitious fancy to be baptized in some certain place, as at Jerusalem, or in the river Jordan, and therefore they deferred their baptism till they could have a convenience to come to the place intended. This seems tacitly to be reflected on by Tertullian,¹² when he says, There is no difference between those whom John baptized in Jordan, and those whom Peter baptized in the Tiber: and by St. Ambrose, in his discourse to the catechumens,¹³ where exhorting them to come with all possible speed to be baptized, he invites them to draw the blessing of consecration from the font of Jordan, and to drown their sins in that stream where Christ's sacred person was baptized: but then, that they might not mistake his meaning, he adds, that in order to their being baptized in the font of Jordan, it was not necessary they should go to the Eastern country, or to the river in the land of Judea; for wherever Christ was, there was Jordan; and the same consecration which blessed the rivers of the East, sanctified also the rivers of the West. Eusebius tells us,¹⁴ that Constantine had a design for many years to have been baptized in the river Jordan, after the example of Christ; and that perhaps might be the reason why he so long deferred his baptism: but God, who knew best what was fit for him, disappointed him in this design, and he was at last baptized at Nicomedia a little before his death. For as to that story, which is so pompously set forth by Baronius,¹⁵ concerning his being baptized by Pope Sylvester at Rome, and cured of his leprosy; it is a mere fable, refuted by the testimony of all the ancients, Eusebius, Socrates, Sozomen, Theodoret, Athanasius, St. Ambrose, St. Jerom, and the council of Ariminum, who all speak of his baptism immediately before his death: and the best critics since Baronius, Valesius,¹⁶ and Schelstrate,¹⁷ Lambecius,¹⁸ Papebrochius,¹⁹ and Pagi,²⁰ agree in their verdict with the ancients against the modern fiction. So that now it is agreed on all hands, that Constantine was one of those who deferred his baptism to the time of his death: and the most probable account that can be given of this, is the fancy which he had entertained of being baptized in Jordan, which the providence of God never suffered him to put in execution. Another sort of fanciful men would not be baptized, till they could have one to minister baptism to them, who had some extraordinary qualifications. Gregory Nazianzen takes notice of some such as these, and rebukes them after this manner: Say not thou,²¹ A bishop shall baptize me, and that a metropolitan, and also one of Jerusalem: for grace is not the gift of the place, but of the Spirit. Say not, I will be baptized by one that is of noble birth, and that it will be a reproach to thy noble descent to ⁹ Naz. Orat. 40. de Bapt. p. 647.

¹⁰ Nyssen de Bapt. t. 2. p. 216.

¹¹ Naz. Orat. 40. de Bapt. p. 654.

¹² Tertul. de Bapt. cap. 4. Nec quicquam refert inter eos quos Joannes in Jordane, et quos Petrus in Tiberi tinxit.

¹³ Ambros. Ser. 41. t. 3. p. 268. Debemus, fratres dilectissimi, vobis catechumenis loqui, gratiam baptismatis ejus omni festinatione suscipere, et de fonte Jordanis quem ille benedixit, benedictionem consecrationis haurire; ut in eum gurgitem in quem se illius sanctitas mersit, nostra peccata mergantur.—Sed ut eodem fonte mergamur, non nobis Orientalis petenda est regio, non fluvius terræ Judaicæ. Ubi enim nunc Christus, ibi quoque Jordanes est. Eadem consecratio, quæ Orientis flum. na benedixit, Occidentis fluentia sanctificat.

¹⁴ Euseb. de Vita Constant. lib. 4. c. 62.

¹⁵ Baron. an. 324. n. 17.

¹⁶ Vales. Not. in Socrat. lib. I. c. 39.

¹⁷ Schelstrat. Concil. Antiochen. Dissert. 2. c. 1. p. 43.

¹⁸ Lambec. Commentar. de Bibliotheca Vindobonensi, t. 5. ap. Pagi.

¹⁹ Papebroch. Acta Sanctor. Maii. t. 5. Vit. Constant. Maii 21. p. 15.

²⁰ Pagi, Critic. in Baron. an. 324. n. 4.

²¹ Naz. Orat. 40. de Bapt. p. 656.

be baptized by any other. Say not, If I am baptized by a presbyter, it shall be one that is unmarried, and one that is of the continent and angelic order, as if thy baptism were defiled by any other. Make not thyself judge of the fitness or qualification of the preacher or baptizer, for there is another that judgeth of these things. Every one is qualified to thee, for thy purgation, provided only he be one of those that are allowed, and not condemned, nor a foreigner, nor an enemy of the church. Judge not thy judges, thou that hast need of healing. Tell me not of the dignity of thy purgators; make no difference among thy spiritual fathers; one may be better or more humble than another, but each of them is in a higher rank than thee. By all this it appears, that a superstitious distinction of times and places and persons had an influence upon some, and was pleaded as a reason for deferring baptism.

Others pleaded for deferring their baptism till they were thirty years old, from the example of Christ, because he was of that age when he was baptized. Which pretence is copiously refuted by Gregory Nazianzen,²² showing in answer to it, that Christ, as God, was purity itself, and had no need of purgation, but what he did in that kind, was only for the sake of men; that there was no danger could befall him by delaying or protracting his baptism; that there were particular reasons for his doing so, which did not belong to other men; and that he did many things which we are not concerned to follow his example in, for all his actions were not designed to be copies and examples for our imitation.

He that would see more of these pleas, may consult the discourses of St. Basil, Nazianzen, and Nyssen upon this subject; or Mr. Walker's treatise of Infant Baptism, in the preface to which, he enumerates no less than nineteen such cases as these, which were the pretended occasions of men's deferring their baptism. Those I have already mentioned, are sufficient to our present purpose, to show, that when men made great delays in this matter, they commonly did it against the rules and orders of the church; and that the ancients with great severity and sharpness always declaimed and inveighed against it, as a dangerous and unchristian practice. Therefore, though there may be some particular instances of persons, who thus carelessly and wilfully, through ignorance or false conceits, neglected their own baptism, and perhaps the baptism of their children too; yet these men's actions are of no account to show us what were the standing measures and methods of proceeding in the church, since they are manifest transgressions of her rule, and deviations from her ordinary practice. The church had but two reasons at any time for deferring the baptism of adult persons year after year; the one was, to give sufficient time to the catechumens to prepare them for baptism; and the other, to reform their miscarriages, when they happened to turn lapsers or apostates before their baptism. Both these were grounded upon one and the same principle; which was, that men were obliged to give sufficient security and satisfaction to the church, that they intended to live by the rules of the gospel, before they were admitted to the mysteries of it: and the best security that could be given, was from the experiment and trial beforehand, and therefore this discipline was used to make them give testimony of their intentions by a reasonable prorogation of their baptism.

Upon this account, the church appointed certain stated seasons and solemn times of baptism in ordinary cases; allowing her ministers still the liberty to anticipate these times, if either catechumens were very great proficients, or in danger of death by any sudden accident or distemper. The most celebrated time among these, was Easter; and next to that, Pentecost or Whitsuntide; and Epiphany, or the day on which Christ was supposed to be baptized. These three are plainly referred to by Gregory Nazianzen,²³ where he brings in some giving this reason why they deferred their baptism: One said, he stayed till the Epiphany (for the ancients mean that by φῶρά and lumina, not Candlemas, as some mistake it, but Epiphany, the day on which Christ was baptized, and manifested to the world); another said, he had a greater respect for Easter; and a third, that he waited till the time of Pentecost. Which plainly implies, that these three festivals were then the most noted and solemn times of baptism. But Easter and Pentecost were the chief; for they are sometimes mentioned without the other, and sometimes with an express prohibition of it. St. Jerom speaks of the two former, as usual, but says nothing of the latter. He tells us, some referred that prophecy in Zechariah to baptism,²⁴ "Living waters shall go out from Jerusalem; in summer and in winter shall it be." The Septuagint reads it, "in summer and in the spring." And this they applied to the two solemn times of baptism, Pentecost and Easter, one of which was in summer and the other in the spring, when the living waters of baptism were distributed to all that thirsted after them. He mentions the same in his epistle to Pammachius,²⁵ against the errors of John of Jerusalem, where he speaks of forty that were bap-

²² Naz. Orat. 40. de Bapt. p. 658.

²³ Ibid. p. 654. Μένω τὰ φῶτα· τὸ Πάσχα μοι τιμώτερον, τὴν Πεντηκοστὴν ἐκδιξομαι, &c.

²⁴ Hieron. Com. in Zachar. xiv. 8. Aquas viventes multi ad baptismum referunt, quæ in vere et in æstate, hoc est, in Pascha et Pentecoste, sitientibus largiendæ sunt.

²⁵ Id. Ep. 61. ad Pammach. cap. 16. Circa dies Pentecostes, quadraginta diversæ ætatis et sextis presbyteris tuis

Sect. 7.
The solemn times appointed for baptism by the church were Easter, Pentecost, and Epiphany.

tized at Bethlehem upon Pentecost, and others that offered themselves at Easter, but were rejected by that humourous bishop, when they were ready for baptism. These two, and no other, are likewise spoken of by Tertullian.²⁶ He says, Easter was appointed as the time of Christ's sufferings, into which we are baptized. And after that, Pentecost is a very large space of time set aside for that purpose. In which time Christ manifested his resurrection to his disciples, and the grace of the Holy Spirit was first given, and the angels predicted his second advent at his ascension. Where it is very plain, that Tertullian, by the large space of Pentecost, does not mean a particular day, but the whole fifty days between Easter and Whitsuntide, which in his time was one continued festival, as he tells us in other places.²⁷ And therefore, though Vicecomes²⁸ reprehends Ludovicus Vives for asserting this, as if he had no authority for it; yet Habertus²⁹ defends him out of this place of Tertullian, and other learned men³⁰ are of the same opinion. Vicecomes thinks the time of baptizing at Easter was only one day, that is, the great sabbath, or Saturday, when our Saviour lay in the grave. But this is also a mistake: for though this day was the most famous for baptizing catechumens, and infants also, as we learn from Chrysostom³¹ and the author of the Constitutions,³² yet the whole time of fifty days was set apart for this purpose, and accounted but as one solemn season for baptism. Which, perhaps, is the true reason why some ancient canons allow no other time but that of Easter for baptism; including the whole fifty days from Easter till Pentecost, in the sense of Tertullian. Thus, in the second council of Mascon,³³ a decree was made, That whereas many Christians, not regarding the lawful time of baptism, were used to bring their children to be baptized upon any holyday or festival of a martyr, so that at Easter there were not above two or three to be baptized; they therefore enacted, that from thenceforward no one should be permitted so to do, excepting those whose children were in extremity of sickness and danger of death. A like decree was made in the council of Auxerre,³⁴ confining all children to the time of Easter, except in case of sickness, when they were allowed to have clinic baptism. And so Socrates says³⁵ it was the custom in Thessaly only to baptize at Easter. All which must either be understood to include the fifty days of Pentecost, or else it must be said these churches had a peculiar custom differing from the rest of the world. For in other rules and canons, express mention is made of Easter and Pentecost, though other festivals are excluded. In the council of Girone, in Spain,³⁶ all catechumens are ordered to come only at Easter, or Pentecost, because the greater the feast was, the greater ought the solemnity to be. But on all other festivals, none but sick people were to be baptized, who were not to be refused baptism at any time. Siricius, in his epistle to Himerius,³⁷ bishop of Tarraco, in Spain, intimates indeed, that abundance of people presumed to take greater liberties to be baptized on the nativity of Christ, and the Epiphany, and the festivals of the apostles and martyrs; but this was against the rule of the Roman church, and all others, which reserved this privilege peculiarly to Easter, with its Pentecost, or fifty days following, at which time baptism was generally administered to all that were qualified, but not at other times, except only to infants, and persons in a languishing condition and in danger of death. In the time of Pope Leo, the custom had prevailed in Sicily, to baptize as many on the festival of Epiphany as at Easter or Pentecost: but he calls³⁸ this an unreasonable novelty, and a confusion of the mysteries of each time, to think, that no difference was to be obtulimus baptizandos.—It. Præcepisti Bethlehem presbyteris tuis, ne competentibus nostris in Pascha baptismum traderent.

²⁶ Tertul. de Bapt. cap. 19. Diem baptismo solenniorem Pascha præstat, cum et passio Domini, in qua tingimur, adimpleta est.—Exinde Pentecoste ordinandis lavacris latissimum spatium est, quo et Domini resurrectio inter discipulos frequentata est, et gratia Spiritûs Sancti dedicata, &c.

²⁷ Vid. Tertul. de Idol. cap. 14. et de Coron. Mil. cap. 3.

²⁸ Vicecom. de Ritib. Bapt. lib. 1. c. 25.

²⁹ Habert. Archieratic. par. 8. Observ. 4. p. 134.

³⁰ Cave, Prim. Christ. par. 1. c. 10. p. 307.

³¹ Chrysost. Ep. 1. ad Innocent. p. 680.

³² Constit. Apost. lib. 5. c. 19.

³³ Conc. Matiscon. 2. can. 3. Comperimus Christianos, non observantes legitimum diem baptismi, pene per singulos dies ac natales martyrum filios suos baptizare, ut vix duo vel tres reperiantur in sancto Pascha, qui per aquam et Spiritum Sanctum regenerentur: ideoque censemus, ut ex hoc tempore nullus eorum permittatur talia perpetrare, præter illos, quos infirmitas nimia aut dies extremus compellit filiis suis baptismum suscipere.

³⁴ Conc. Antissiodor. can. 19. Non licet absque Pascha solennitate ullo tempore baptizare, nisi illos quibus mors vicina est, quos grabatarios dicunt, &c.

³⁵ Socrat. lib. 5. c. 22.

³⁶ Conc. Gerundens. can. 4. De catechumenis baptizandis id statutum est, ut in Paschæ solennitate, vel Pentecostes, quanto majoris celebritatis celebritas major est, tanto magis ad baptizandum veniant. Cæteris autem solennitatibus infirmi tantummodo debeant baptizari, quibus quocunque tempore convenit baptismum non negari.

³⁷ Siric. Ep. ad Himer. c. 2. Sola temeritate præsumitur, ut passim ac libere natalitiis Christi, seu apparitionis, nec non et apostolorum seu martyrum festivitatis, innumeræ, (ut adseris) plebes baptismi mysterium consequantur, cum hoc sibi privilegium, et apud nos, et apud omnes ecclesias, dominicum specialiter cum Pentecoste suâ Pascha defendat, quibus solis per annum diebus, ad fidem confluentibus generalia baptismatis tradi convenit sacramenta, &c.

³⁸ Leo, Ep. 4. ad Episc. Siculos, cap. 1. Miror vos tam irrationabilem novitatem usurpare potuisse, ut confuso temporis utriusque mysterio, nullam esse differentiam crederetis inter diem quo adoratus est Christus a Magis, et diem quo resurrexit a mortuis, &c.

made between the day on which Christ was adored by the wise men, and that whereon he arose from the dead. Therefore, since these two, Easter and Pentecost, were the only lawful³⁹ times of baptizing the elect catechumens in the church, he gives them an admonition, that they should mingle no other days in the like observance. He gives the same admonition to the bishops of Campania,⁴⁰ Samnium, and Picenum, in another epistle, against baptizing any, except in case of necessity, on the festivals of the martyrs. And after him Gelasius⁴¹ made another decree, directed to the bishops of Lucania, prohibiting baptism to be given at any other time, save Easter and Pentecost, except in case of dangerous sickness, when there might be reasonable fear of the parties dying without the remedy of salvation. So that in the Roman and Western churches this was the general rule, to baptize none of the adult in ordinary cases, save only upon these two great festivals, though the practice in some places was a little dissonant to the injunction of the canons. In the Eastern churches, and in Africa, Epiphany seems also to have been regarded. For, besides what has been already noted out of Nazianzen, Valesius⁴² has observed out of the ancient ritual, called Typicum Sabæ, that on this day they were wont to baptize in the church of Jerusalem. And Joannes Moschus⁴³ mentions the same custom in other parts of the East. And Victor Uticensis⁴⁴ plainly intimates, that it was a solemn time of baptizing at Carthage and in the African churches. For though he does not name it Epiphany, yet we may easily collect it was either that day or Christ's nativity; for he says, it was but a little before the kalends of February, that fatal day on which the African bishops were banished, and the church destroyed by the fury of the Arians, in the time of the Vandalic persecution.

It was also customary in some churches, to make the anniversary festival of the dedication of the church a solemn time of baptizing. Sozomen⁴⁵ observes it to have been so at Jerusalem, from the time that Constantine built that

Sect. 8.
And in some places the festivals of the apostles and martyrs, and anniversary days of the dedication of churches, prevailed also.

famous church over our Saviour's grave at Mount Calvary, called Anastasis, or the church of the resurrection. For every year after that time the church of Jerusalem held an anniversary festival of the dedication, which, to make the solemnity more august, lasted for eight days together, on which they held ecclesiastical meetings, and administered the sacrament of baptism; and many men came from all parts of the world to visit the sacred places upon this occasion. Valesius⁴⁶ takes some pains to prove out of several authors, the Chronicon Alexandrinum, Nicephorus, the Greek Menologium, and Typicum Sabæ, that this was on the thirteenth of September; that no one might think it fell in with the festivals of Easter or Pentecost, the other solemn times of baptism. Whether the same custom prevailed in any other churches, is not said; but it is not improbable that it might obtain, because Jerusalem was a leading pattern, and is sometimes styled the mother of all churches. The custom of baptizing on the festivals of the apostles and martyrs seems to have prevailed in many of the French and Spanish churches; but this was condemned and forbidden by many canons, and therefore cannot be spoken of as an authentic custom, because it was rather a transgression and encroachment upon the established rules of the church, which in this case might be observed without any detriment, whilst a liberty was granted to baptize at any time upon sudden emergencies and extraordinary cases.

Indeed, in the first plantation of the gospel there was no such obligation to observe any stated times of baptism, because the apostles made no law about it. They themselves baptized indifferently at any time, as occasion required, and they left this circumstance wholly to the judgment and prudence of their successors in the church, to act as reason and piety should direct them. This is very evident from the history of the Acts of the Apostles, and the subsequent history of the church compared together. The author of the Comments on St Paul's Epistles, under the name of St. Ambrose,⁴⁷ has diligently noted this difference in the church's discipline, be-

Sect. 9.
No such stated times in the apostles' days.

³⁹ Leo, Ep. 4. ad Episc. Siculos, cap. 5. Unde quia manifestissime patet, hæc duo tempora baptizandis in ecclesia electis esse legitima, monemus ut nullos alios dies huic observantiae misceatis.

⁴⁰ Leo, Ep. 80. ad Episc. Campan. cap. 1.

⁴¹ Gelas. Ep. 9. ad Episc. Lucan. cap. 10. Baptizandi sibi quispiam passim quocunque tempore nullam credat inesse fiduciam, præter Paschale festum et Pentecostes venerabile sacramentum, excepto duntaxat gravissimi languoris incursu, in quo verendum est, ne morbi crescente periculo, sine remedio salutari festinus ægrotans exitu præventus abscedat.

⁴² Vales. Not. in Theodoret. lib. 2. c. 27.

⁴³ Mosch. Prat. Spirit. cap. 214.

⁴⁴ Victor. de Persec. Vandal. lib. 2. Bibl. Patr. t. 7. p. 603.

⁴⁵ Sozom. lib. 2. cap. 26. Ὡς καὶ μνήσεις ἐν αὐτῇ ἑορτῇ τελεῖσθαι, καὶ ὅκτως ἡμέρας ἐφεξῆς ἐκκλησιάζειν.

⁴⁶ Vales. Dissert. de Anastasi et Martyrio Hierosolym. ad calcem Eusebii, p. 306.

⁴⁷ Ambros. Com. in Ephes. iv. Primum omnes docebant et omnes baptizabant, quibuscumque diebus vel temporibus fuisset occasio. Nec enim Philippus tempus quæsit, aut diem, quo eunuchum baptizaret; neque jejunium interposuit. Neque Paulus et Silas tempus distulerunt, quo optionem carceris baptizarent cum omnibus ejus. Neque Petrus diaconos habuit, aut diem quæsit, quando Cornelium cum omni domo ejus baptizavit.—Ubi autem omnia loca circumplexa est ecclesia, conventicula constituta sunt, et rectores et cætera officia in ecclesia ordinata sunt.—Hinc ergo est, unde nunc neque diaconi in populo prædicant, neque clerici vel laici baptizant; neque quocunque die credentes tinguntur, nisi ægri.

tween the first and the following ages. At first, says he, every one taught and baptized on all days and times, as occasion required. Philip stayed for no time, nor day, to baptize the eunuch, nor did he use any intermediate fast before it. Neither did Paul and Silas delay the time when they baptized the keeper of the prison with all his house. Neither did Peter use deacons, or stay for a solemn day, when he baptized Cornelius and his family. But when the church had spread itself into all parts, then oratories were built, and church-officers were appointed, and several orders made about the administration of baptism; whence it was, that now neither deacons preached, nor any of the inferior clergy, nor laymen baptized, nor was baptism administered at all times to believers, but only to those that were sick. That which seems to have made the difference in this matter, was the difference in the zeal and readiness of the first converts and those that came afterwards. For the church found it necessary in process of time to proceed a little more slowly with the candidates of baptism, both in the instruction and trial of them, because of their dulness, and negligence, and frequent relapses. And by this means it came to pass, that in some populous churches, often vast multitudes were baptized together. As Palladius observes in the Life of St. Chrysostom,⁴⁸ that at Constantinople three thousand persons were baptized at once upon one of these greater festivals. And this was the reason why deacons at Rome, who were not allowed to baptize upon any other occasion, no, not even in times of sickness, were admitted to do it at Easter, because of the vast numbers of people that came then to be baptized, as I have had occasion to show out of a canon of one of the Roman councils in another discourse.⁴⁹

But when these rules about stated times of baptism were in their strictest observation, there were still several cases, wherein it was thought proper to dispense with them, and discharge men of their obligation. The case of sickness and extremity pleaded a just exemption, as we have seen before, in all the canons of the universal church. And the promptness and proficiency of some catechumens above others, gave them an earlier title to baptism, if they desired it, without waiting for a more solemn season, especially in the Eastern churches; as may be collected from the exhortations of Chrysostom and Basil, inviting such as were duly prepared for baptism, to receive it the first opportunity, without staying for one of these greater festivals. You pretend to stay to the time of Lent, says Chrysostom:⁵⁰ but why so? Has that time any thing more than others? The apostles received not this grace at Easter; but at another time. Neither was it the time of Easter, when the three thousand and the five thousand were baptized, of whom we read in the Acts of the Apostles. Other things, says St. Basil,⁵¹ have their peculiar seasons; there is a time for sleep, and a time for watching; a time for war, and a time for peace: but the time of baptism is man's whole life; all times are reasonable to receive salvation thereby, whether day or night, every hour, every minute, every moment. And Nazianzen,⁵² in answering that plea which men used for delay, that they stayed only till Easter, Pentecost, or Epiphany, plainly shows, that he rather thought men ought not to defer their baptism, when once they were qualified for it, lest death should come suddenly upon them in a day they did not expect it, and in an hour they were not aware of. And in this respect it was true, what Tertullian said in the close of his discourse upon this subject, that every day⁵³ was the Lord's day, every hour, and every time was fit for baptism, if men were fit and prepared for it. One day might be more solemn than another, but the grace of baptism was the same at all times. So that these solemn times were set apart for prudent reasons by the church, and for as prudent reasons they might be dispensed with, when either the necessities of a languishing distemper, or the zeal and activity of forward proficients, made it advisable to anticipate the usual times of baptism, which, like all other parts of discipline, were designed for edification, and not for destruction.

The like observation may be made with respect to the place of baptism; with this varied also with the state and circumstances of the church. In the apostolical age, and some time after, before churches and baptisteries were generally erected, they baptized in any place where they had convenience, as John baptized in Jordan, and Philip baptized the eunuch in the wilderness, and Paul the jailer in his own house. So Tertullian observes, that Peter⁵⁴ baptized his converts in the Tiber at Rome, as John had done in Jordan; and that there was no difference whether a man was baptized in the sea, or in a lake, in a

^{Sect. 10.}
How far these rules were obliging in succeeding ages.

^{Sect. 11.}
Baptism not confined to any place in the apostolical ages.

⁴⁸ Pallad. Vit. Chrysost. cap. 9.

⁴⁹ Scholast. Hist. of Lay Baptism, part 1. chap. 1. p. 19.

⁵⁰ Chrys. Hom. 1. in Act. t. 4. p. 615. Edit. Savil.

⁵¹ Basil. Exhort. ad Bapt. Hom. 13. t. 1. p. 409.

⁵² Naz. Orat. 40. de Bapt. p. 654.

⁵³ Tertul. de Bapt. cap. 19. Ceterum omnis dies Domini est, omnis hora, omne tempus habile baptismo: si de solennitate interest, de gratia nihil refert.

⁵⁴ Tertul. de Bapt. c. 4. Nulla distinctio est, mari quis an stagno, flumine an fonte, lacu an alveo diluatur, nec quicquam refert inter eos quos Joannes in Jordane, et quos Petrus in Tiberi tinxit.—Omnes aquæ de pristina originis prærogativa sacramentum sanctificationis consequuntur, invocato Deo. Supervenit enim statim Spiritus de cœlis, et aquis superest, sanctificans eas de semetipso, et ita sanctificatæ vim sanctificandi combibunt.

river, or a fountain; for the same Spirit sanctified the waters in all places, and gave them the power of sanctification, when once they were consecrated by invocation and prayer. After this manner, the author of the Recognitions, under the name of Clemens Romanus,⁵⁵ represents Peter preaching to the people, and telling them, they might wash away their sins in the water of a river, or a fountain, or the sea, when they were baptized by invoking the name of the blessed Trinity upon them. And he describes his own baptism, and some others,⁵⁶ as given them by Peter, in certain fountains in Syria by the sea-shore. And so it seems to have continued to the time of Justin Martyr and Tertullian. For Tertullian speaks of their going from the church to the water, and then making⁵⁷ their renunciations there as they had done in the church before. And Justin Martyr, describing the ceremony of the action, says, They brought the person who was to be baptized⁵⁸ to a place where there was water, and there gave him the same regeneration which they had received before.

But in after ages baptisteries were built adjoining to the church, and then rules were made, that baptism should ordinarily be administered no where but in them. Justinian, in one of his Novels,⁵⁹ refers to ancient laws, appointing, that none of the sacred mysteries of the church should be celebrated in private houses. Men might have private oratories for prayer in their own houses, but they were not to administer baptism or the eucharist in them, unless by a particular licence from the bishop of the place. Such baptisms are frequently condemned in the ancient councils, under the name of παρὰ βαπτίσματα, baptisms in private conventicles. As in the council of Constantinople under Mennas,⁶⁰ complaint is made against Zoaras the monk, that though the emperor had forbidden all private baptisms by an edict, yet Zoaras, despising that order, had baptized many in a private house upon the Easter festival. The edict which that council re-

Sect. 12.
In succeeding ages confined to the baptisteries of the church.

⁵⁵ Clem. Recognit. lib. 4. c. 32. Ut in presenti quidem tempore diluantur peccata vestra per aquam fontis, aut fluminis, aut etiam maris, invocata super vos trino Beatitudinis nomine. Vid. Clementin. Hom. 9. n. 19.

⁵⁶ Ibid. lib. 6. n. 15. In fontibus, qui contigui habentur mari, perennis aquæ mihi baptismum dedit, &c.

⁵⁷ Aquam adituri, ibidem, sed et aliquanto prius in ecclesia sub antistitis manu contestamur nos renuciare diabolo, &c. Tertul. de Coron. c. 3.

⁵⁸ Justin. Apol. 2. p. 93. "Ἐπειτα ἀγοῦνται ὑφ' ἡμῶν ἔνθα ὑδωρ ἔστι, &c.

⁵⁹ Justin. Novel. 58. Priscis sancitum est legibus, nulli penitus esse licentiam, domi quæ sacratissima sunt agere.— Sed si quidem domos ita simpliciter aliqui habere putant oportere in sacris suis, orationis videlicet solius gratia, et nullo celebrando penitus horum quæ sacri sunt mysterii, hoc eis permitimus, &c.

⁶⁰ Conc. Constant. sub Menna, Act. 1. p. 70. Ed. Crab.

fers to, was another Novel of Justinian's,⁶¹ made against Severus and his accomplices, who, after they were expelled the church, held conventicles in private houses, and received, and baptized, and gave the communion to all that came to them. Which sort of parabaptizations are there condemned. So also in the petition of the monks presented to Mennas and the council under him, these baptisms and communions in private houses are reckoned⁶² to be an erecting of strange altars and baptisteries, in opposition to the true altar and baptistery, or laver of the church; under which name they are frequently condemned in the Acts⁶³ of that council. And in the council of Trullo the order was again renewed, That no persons⁶⁴ should receive baptism in oratories belonging to houses, but that they who desire illumination, should go to the catholic, that is, the public churches; and that on pain of deposition to the clergyman who was the administrator, and excommunication to the layman who was the receiver.

Now, all these laws and rules were intended for the preservation of decency and good order in the church, that baptism might be performed in the presence of the whole church, whereof men were then made members, and all the congregation might be spectators and witnesses of their admission. Upon which account it was improper to allow it to be done either in heretical conventicles, or in private houses. Yet, in cases of necessity, sickness, imprisonment, journeying, and the like, these rules could not bind; for they were only made for ordinary cases. Therefore we read of martyrs sometimes baptized in prison, and frequently of clinics, as they were called, who were baptized on a sick-bed, and others baptized at sea or in a journey, which were not interpreted transgressions of this rule, because the exigence and necessity of the case made them lawful. And sometimes baptism was allowed in private oratories by the bishop's licence, as both the law of Justinian

Sect. 13.
Except in case of sickness, or with the bishop's licence to the contrary upon some special occasions.

Quonquam piissimus imperator noster mandaverit non re-conventiculare, neque rebaptizare (leg. parabaptizare) Zoaras tamen tale præceptum desepxit, et parabaptizavit in die Paschæ non paucos.

⁶¹ Justin. Novel. 42. c. 3. Sancimus quemlibet talium silentium ducere, et non convocare aliquos ad se, neque accedentes recipere, aut parabaptizare audere, aut sacram unionem sordidare.

⁶² Libel. Monachor. in Act. 1. Conc. sub Menna. ap. Crab. t. 2. p. 28. Isti falsi sacerdotes et veri antichristi in domibus intrarunt, et aliena altaria erexerunt, et baptisteria ædificaverunt, in contrarium veri altaris et sancti lavacri.

⁶³ Epist. Monachor. 2. Syria in Act. 1. Ibid. p. 67.

⁶⁴ Conc. Trull. can. 59. Μηδαμῶς ἐν εὐκτηρίῳ οἴκῳ ἔνδον οἰκίας τυγχάνοντι βάπτισμα ἐπιτελείσθω· ἀλλ' οἱ μέλλοντες ἀξιοῦσθαι τῷ ἀχράντῳ φωτισματος, ταῖς καθολικαῖς προσερχέσθωσαν ἐκκλησίαις.

and the canons in some places had provided. For the council of Agde⁶⁵ in France allows the eucharist to be celebrated in country chapels at all times by the bishop's leave, not excepting the greater festivals: and it is reasonable to suppose, that where the eucharist was allowed, there baptism might be administered also, though they were not properly parochial or baptismal churches. The council of Eliberis⁶⁶ in Spain speaks of deacons presiding over a people, and baptizing in places where there was neither bishop nor presbyter, which we must reasonably suppose to have been country villages at some distance from the mother church, where yet for convenience baptism was allowed to be performed by the hands of a deacon. As St. Jerom⁶⁷ also testifies, who says, That in villages and castles, and places remote from the bishop's church, men were baptized both by presbyters and deacons. So that though the bishop's church was the ordinary place of baptism, as he himself was the chief minister of it, and the public baptistery was only at his church; yet upon proper reasons, by his authority and permission, baptism might be administered in other places, especially in those that were a sort of secondary churches; of which, and their several distinctions from the ecclesia matrix, the episcopal or principal church, I have given a more particular account before in the discourse of churches.

CHAPTER VII.

OF THE RENUNCIATIONS AND PROFESSIONS MADE BY ALL PERSONS IMMEDIATELY BEFORE THEIR BAPTISM.

HAVING thus far conducted the catechumens to the place of baptism, that is, to the baptistery of the church; we are next to consider, how the discipline of the church proceeded with them immediately before their baptism. And here we are to

Sect. 1.
Three things required of all persons at their baptism. 1. To renounce the devil.

⁶⁵ Conc. Agathen. can. 21. Si quis etiam extra parochias, in quibus legitimus est ordinariusque conventus, oratorium in agro habuerit, reliquis festivitatibus ut ibi missas teneat propter fatigationem familiæ, justa ordinatione permittimus, &c.

⁶⁶ Conc. Eliber. can. 77. Si quis diaconus regens plebem, sine episcopo vel presbytero aliquos baptizaverit, episcopus eos per benedictionem perficere debet.

⁶⁷ Hieron. Dial. cum Lucifer. cap. 4. In viculis et castellis et remotioribus locis per presbyteros et diaconos baptizati, &c.

¹ Tertul. de Coron. Mil. cap. 3. Aquam adituri, ibidem, sed et aliquanto prius in ecclesia, sub antistitis manu, contestamur nos renunciare diabolo et pompæ et angelis ejus.

² Const. Apost. lib. 7. cap. 41. Ἀποτάσσομαι τῷ observe in the first place, that three things were now indispensably required of them at this season, that is, a formal and solemn renunciation of the devil, a profession of faith made in the words of some received creed, and a promise or engagement to live in obedience to Christ, or by the laws and rules of the Christian religion. For though these things were in some measure required of them before, during the time of their institution, yet now they were to make a more solemn and public profession of them before the congregation. Tertullian seems¹ to intimate this twofold profession, when he says, That according to the discipline of the church in his time, catechumens first made their renunciation of the devil, and his pomp and his angels, in the church, when they received imposition of hands from the bishop in his prayers for them, and again when they came to the water to be baptized.

The form of this renunciation is more perfectly delivered by the author of the Constitutions in these words:

Sect. 2.
The form of this renunciation, and the import of it.

I renounce Satan, and his works, and his pomps,² and his service, and his angels, and his inventions, and all things that belong to him, or that are subject to him. Others express it more concisely; some calling it the renunciation of the world, as Cyprian,³ who sometimes joins the devil and the world together, as where he asks one of the lapsers, who had gone to offer sacrifice at the capitol, How a servant⁴ of God could stand there, and speak, and renounce Christ, who before had renounced the devil and the world? And so it is in St. Ambrose: Thou wentest into the baptistery; consider what questions were asked thee, and what answers thou gavest to them. Thou didst renounce the devil and his works, the world,⁵ and its luxury and pleasures. In like manner, St. Jerom⁶ joins the devil and the world together: I renounce thee, Satan, and thy pomp, and thy vices, and thy world which lieth in iniquity. Sometimes the games and shows, which were part of the devil's pomp, were expressly mentioned in this form of renunciation, as it is in Salvia: I renounce the devil, his pomps, his shows, and his works. For he thus addresses himself to Christians, who still gave themselves liberty to be Σατανᾶ, καὶ τοῖς ἔργοις αὐτοῦ, καὶ ταῖς πομπαῖς αὐτοῦ, καὶ ταῖς λατρείαις αὐτοῦ, καὶ τοῖς ἀγγέλοις αὐτοῦ, καὶ ταῖς ἐφευρέσειν αὐτοῦ, καὶ πᾶσι τοῖς ὑπ' αὐτόν.

³ Cyr. Ep. 7. al. 13. ad Rogat. p. 37. Seculo renunciamus, cum baptizati sumus.

⁴ Cyr. de Lapsis, p. 125. Stare illic potuit Dei servus, et loqui, et renunciare Christo, qui jam diabolo renunciárat et seculo.

⁵ Ambros. de Initiatis, cap. 2. Ingressus es regenerationis sacrarium, repete quid interrogatus sis, recognosce quid responderis. Renunciasti diabolo et operibus ejus, mundo et luxuriæ ejus ac voluptatibus.

⁶ Hieron. Com. in Mat. xxv. 26. Renuncio tibi diabole, et pompæ tuæ et vitis tuis, et mundo tuo, qui in maligno positus est.

spectators at the Roman shows: What is the first profession⁷ that Christians make at baptism? Is it not a protestation, that they renounce the devil, and his pomps, and his shows, and his works? Therefore these shows and pomps, even by our own profession, are the works of the devil. How then, O Christian, canst thou, after baptism, follow those shows, which thou confessest to be the work of the devil? Tertullian made use of the same argument before, to make Christians refrain from following the Roman theatres. But then he had also the charge of idolatry to throw into the scale against them. For, says he,⁸ what is the chief and principal thing to be understood by the devil, his pomps, and his angels, but idolatry? Therefore if all the preparation and furniture of the shows be made up of idolatry, there can be no dispute, but that the renunciation we make in baptism relates to those shows, and is a testimony against them. He argues after the same manner, against all such secular offices,⁹ and honours, and employments, as could not be held and discharged without partaking in some idolatrous rites and ceremonies; such as the offices of the flamens, and many others; in which, the very wearing of a crown or garland, or exhibiting some of the public shows to the people, as by such an office they were obliged to do, made them guilty of idolatry, though they abstained from the grosser act of it, that of offering incense and sacrifice to the idols. And so the council of Eliberis¹⁰ determined, That such flamens as only exhibited the public shows to the people, (which in their language is called Munus dare,) though they did not sacrifice to the idols, should be cast out of the church all their lives, and only be admitted to communion at the hour of death. Whence it is plain, that in the times of heathenism and idolatry, all such offices and employments as obliged men to exhibit those public games and shows to the people, were supposed to be included in the renunciation of the pomps and works of the devil, because of the idolatry that was interwoven with them. But in the time of Salvian, all this idolatry was abolished, and these pomps and shows were no longer exhibited to the honour of idol gods: yet they had still so much vanity, lewdness, and profaneness in them, that they were justly complained of as unchristian and diabolical, upon the account of their immorality, and therefore were reputed among those unlawful pomps which every Christian was supposed to renounce at his baptism. Cyril of Jerusalem, who wrote after idolatry was in a great measure destroyed, still continues the charge¹¹ against them for their lewdness and cruelty, and reckons them among the pomps of the devil, whilst he is explaining to his catechumens this part of their baptismal profession.

The antiquity of this renunciation is evidenced from all the writers that have said any thing of baptism. And by some it is derived from apostolical institution and practice. For so they interpret that passage of St. Paul to Timothy, 1 Tim. vi. 12, "Lay hold on eternal life, whereunto thou art called, and hast professed a good profession before many witnesses." The authors of the Comments under the names of St. Ambrose and St. Jerom, supposed to be Hilary the Roman deacon and Pelagius, give this interpretation of the place: Thou hast confessed a good confession¹² in baptism, by renouncing the world and its pomps, before many witnesses, before the priests and ministers and the heavenly powers. So Pelagius. And Hilary¹³ seems to say further, that this confession was also entered or enrolled in the monuments of the church. Others do not found it upon this or any other express text of Scripture, but yet derive it from ancient tradition. As Tertullian and St. Basil, the former of which reckons¹⁴ it among many other ecclesiastical rites and usages, which are not expressly determined in Scripture, but yet proceeded from tradition, and are confirmed by custom. And St. Basil¹⁵ ranks it among those mystical rites which were received in

Sect. 3.
The antiquity of this renunciation, by some derived from apostolical practice.

⁷ Salvian. de Provident. lib. 6. p. 197. Quæ est enim in baptismo salutari Christianorum prima confessio? Quæ scilicet, nisi ut renunciare se diabolo ac pompis ejus, atque spectaculis et operibus protestentur? Ergo spectacula et pompæ, etiam juxta nostram professionem opera sunt diaboli. Quomodo, O Christiane, spectacula post baptismum sequeris, quæ opus esse diaboli confiteris? Vid. Cyril. Catech. Myst. l. n. 4.

⁸ Tertul. de Spectac. cap. 4. Quid erit summum ac præcipuum in quo diabolus et pompæ et angeli ejus ceaseantur, quam idololatria?—Igitur si ex idololatria universam spectaculorum paraturam constare consterit, indubitate præjudicatum erit etiam ad spectacula pertinere renunciationis nostræ testimonium in lavaero.

⁹ Tertul. de Coron. Mil. cap. 13. Hæ erant pompæ diaboli et angelorum ejus, officia seculi, honores, solennitates postulatrices, falsa vota, humana servitia, laudes vanæ, gloriæ turpes: et in omnibus istis idololatria in solo quoque censu coronarum, quibus omnia ista redimita sunt.

¹⁰ Conc. Eliber. can. 3. Item flamines, qui non immolaverint, sed munus tantum dederint, eo quod se a funestis abstinerunt sacrificiis, placuit in fine eis præstari communionem, acta tamen legitima pœnitentia.

¹¹ Cyril. Catech. Mystag. l. n. 4. p. 280.

¹² Pelag. in 1 Tim. vi. 12. Confessus es bonam confessionem in baptismo, renunciando sæculo et pompis ejus, coram multis testibus, coram sacerdotibus, vel ministris, virtutibusque cœlestibus.

¹³ Ambros. in 1 Tim. vi. 12. Cujus confessio inter ipsa rudimenta fidei, teste interrogante et respondente, monumentis ecclesiasticis continetur.

¹⁴ Tertul. de Coron. Mil. c. 3. Hanc si nulla Scriptura determinavit, certe consuetudo corroboravit, quæ sine dubio de traditione manavit.

¹⁵ Basil. de Spir. Sancto. c. 27. Τῶν ἐν τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ πεφυλαγμένων δογμάτων καὶ κηρυγμάτων, τὰ μὲν ἐκ τῆς ἐγγράφου διδασκαλίας ἔχουμεν, τὰ δὲ ἐκ τῆς τῶν ἀποστόλων παραδόσεως, διαδοθέντα ἡμῖν ἐν μυστηρίῳ.

the church, not from any written word, but by private direction and tradition from the apostles. The conjecture of those learned men¹⁶ is not improbable, who think the form of renunciation, made by way of questions and answers, to have been so ancient in the church, as that the apostle St. Peter may be justly thought to refer to it, when he styles baptism, "The answer of a good conscience toward God," which can reasonably refer to nothing so well as that common custom of answering in baptism, Dost thou renounce the devil? &c. I renounce him. Dost thou believe in God? &c. I believe.

It is further to be observed concerning this renunciation, that as soon as baptisteries were built, there was a particular place in them assigned peculiarly to this service. For they commonly had two distinct apartments, as has been showed before,¹⁷ in the description of churches; first, their προαύλιον οίκον, their porch, or ante-room, where the catechumens made their renunciations of Satan, and confessions of faith; and then their ἑσώτερον οἶκον, their inner room, where the ceremony of baptism was performed. When the catechumens were brought into the former of these, they were placed with their faces to the west, and then commanded to renounce Satan with some gesture and rite expressing an indignation against him, as by stretching out their hands, or folding them, or striking them together; and sometimes by exsufflation and spitting at him, as if he were present: which were all of them so many indications of their abhorrence. Cyril of Jerusalem, in his mystical catechisms to the illuminated,¹⁸ thus describes this part of the action: Ye were first brought into the ante-room of the baptistery, and placed toward the west in a standing posture, and then commanded to renounce Satan, by stretching out your hands against him, as if he were present. A little after he explains the meaning of their doing this with their face toward the west. The west, says he, is the place of darkness, and Satan is darkness, and his strength is in darkness. For this reason ye symbolically look toward the west, when ye renounce that prince of darkness and horror. St. Jerom plainly alludes to this custom, when he says, In our mysteries, meaning the celebration of baptism, we first renounce him that is in¹⁹ the west, who dies to us with our sins: and then turning about to the east, we make a covenant with the Sun of righteousness, and promise to be his servants. In like manner, St. Ambrose, discoursing to some newly baptized persons;²⁰ When you entered into the baptistery, and had viewed your adversary whom you were to renounce, you then turned about to the east. For he that renounces the devil, is turned unto Christ. Whence, as Gregory Nazianzen²¹ observes, they did not only renounce the devil in words, but in their very habit and gesture; for they did it divested of their clothes, and with their body turned toward the west, and with hands stretched out against him; to this they added sometimes a collision, or striking of the hands together, and an exsufflation, or a spitting at their adversary, to express their abhorrence of him, as the author under the name of Dionysius²² describes it.

From whom we learn also, that this renunciation was repeated three times. Sect. 5. Why this renunciation was made three times. For, in another place, he thus describes the whole ceremony: The priest makes the person who is to be baptized²³ to stand with his hands stretched out toward the west, and striking them together; (the original is, τὰς χεῖρας ἀπωθούντα, which denotes collision, or striking of the hands together by way of abhorrence;) then he bids him ἐμφυσῆσαι τρίς τῷ Σατανᾷ, thrice exsufflate, or spit, in defiance of Satan: afterwards, thrice repeating the solemn words of renunciation, he bids him thrice renounce him in that form: then he turns him about to the east, and with hands and eyes lift up to heaven, bids him συντάξασθαι τῷ Χριστῷ, enter into covenant with Christ. Vicecomes²⁴ thinks this triple renunciation was made, either because there were three things which men renounced in their baptism, the devil, his pomps, and the world; or to signify the three persons of the Trinity, by whom they were adopted as sons upon their renouncing Satan; or because it was usual in civil adoptions and emancipation of slaves, for the master to yield up his right by a triple renunciation, which he shows from Aulus Gellius and Sigonius. But as the ancients are silent in this matter, I leave these reasons to the discretion of every judicious reader.

The next thing required of men at their baptism, was a vow or covenant Sect. 6. The second thing required of men at ¹⁶ See Dr. Cave, Prim. Christ. lib. 1. cap. 10. p. 315, and Estius and Grotius on 1 Pet. iii. 21.

¹⁷ Book VIII. chap. 7. sect. 1.

¹⁸ Cyril. Catech. Mystag. 1. n. 2. p. 278. Εισήειτε πρῶτον εἰς τὸν προαύλιον οἶκον τῷ βαπτιστηρίῳ, καὶ πρὸς τὰς δυσμὰς ἐσώτες, ἠκάσατε καὶ προσετάττεσθε ἐκτείνειν τὴν χεῖρα, καὶ ὡς παρόντι ἀπετάττεσθε τῷ Σατανᾷ.

¹⁹ Hieron. in Amos vi. 14. In mysteriis primum renunciamus ei qui in occidente est, nobisque moritur cum peccatis: et sic versi ad orientem, pactum inimicus cum sole justitiae, et ei servituros nos esse promittimus.

²⁰ Ambros. de Initiatis, cap. 2. Ingressus ut adversarium tuum cereres cui renunciamus mox putares, ad orientem converteris. Qui enim renunciat diabolo, ad Christum convertitur.

²¹ Naz. Orat. 40. de Bapt. p. 67. Γνώση καὶ τοῖς σχήμασι καὶ τοῖς ῥήμασιν, ὡς ὕλην ἀποπέμπη τὴν ἀθείαν, ἕως ὅλη θεότητι συντασσόμενος.

²² Dionys. de Hierarch. Eccl. cap. 3. p. 258. Γυμνὸν καὶ ἀνυπόδητον ἵστησι πρὸς δυσμὰς ἀφορώντα, &c.

²³ Ibid. p. 253.

²⁴ Vicecom. de Ritib. Bapt. lib. 2. cap. 20. p. 311.

their baptism, was a vow or covenant of obedience to Christ. of obedience to Christ, which the Greeks call, συντάσσεισθαι Χριστῷ, giving themselves up to the government and conduct of Christ. This was always an indispensable part of their obligation, before they could be admitted to the ceremony of regeneration. They first renounced the devil, and then immediately promised to live in obedience to the laws of Christ. Some indeed in St. Austin's time pleaded hard for an exemption in this particular. They were willing to make a profession of faith in Christ, but not of universal obedience; and yet would impudently pretend to demand baptism of the church, notwithstanding their incorrigible temper. Against whom he wrote that excellent book, De Fide et Operibus, to show the necessity of good works, as well as faith, to the being of a Christian; where he answers all the objections and arguments they pretended to bring from Scripture: for they pleaded Scripture for their practice. Amongst other things they urged that famous text of St. Paul, "Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ. Now if any man build upon this foundation gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble; every man's work shall be made manifest: for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work, of what sort it is. If any man's work abide which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward. If any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire." Upon which they made this perverse comment: That they who built upon this foundation²⁵ gold, silver, precious stones, were such as added good works to their faith in Christ; but they who built wood, hay, stubble, were they that held the same faith in unrighteousness and a wicked life. And they imagined, that even these men might be so purged by certain punishments of fire, as to obtain salvation by virtue of the foundation, which they retained. To which St. Austin replies, That if this was true,²⁶ it were a laudable charity indeed for them to endeavour that all men might indifferently be admitted to baptism, not only adulterers and adulteresses, who pretended false marriages contrary to the express command of Christ, but also public harlots continuing in the basest of all professions; which yet the most negligent church on earth never pretended to admit to baptism, till they had first forsaken that vile prostitution. They urged further, that to deny wicked men the privilege of baptism, was to root out the tares before the time. To which St. Austin²⁷ replies, That this rejection of them from baptism was not rooting out the tares, but rather not sowing them, as the devil did: they did not prohibit any that were willing to come to Christ, but only convinced them by their own confession, that they were unwilling to come to him. And therefore, though these men called it a novel doctrine and practice to reject harlots, and stage-players, and all that made open profession of such abominable arts, from baptism, yet he tells them this was grounded upon the rules²⁸ of ancient truth, which manifestly declared, that "they who do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God." And that this was the ancient rule, by which the church proceeded, is evident from all the writers that have spoken of baptism. Justin Martyr, who describes the ceremonies of baptism with the greatest simplicity, says, It was only given to those who, to their confession of faith, added also a promise or vow²⁹ that they would live according to the rules of Christianity. And hence came that usual form of words in their profession, Συντάσσομαι σοι Χριστέ, I give myself up to thee, O Christ, to be governed by thy laws: which immediately followed the ἀπόραξις, or renunciation of the devil, whose service they forsook to choose a new master; as we find it frequently in St. Chrysostom,³⁰ St. Basil,³¹ St. Cyril of Alexandria,³² the author of the Apostolical Constitutions,³³ and most of the Greek writers, whose words, as being but one and the same form, I think it needless to repeat upon this occasion. The Latins commonly call it promissum, pactum, and votum, a promise, a covenant, and vow, which names they apply indifferently to all parts of the Christian engagement, as well the renunciation of the devil, as the profession of faith, and obedience to Christ, which do mutually suppose, and are virtually included in one another. For he that renounces the ²⁷ Ibid. c. 17. Quando tales ad baptismum non admittimus, non ante tempus zizania evellere conamur, sed nolumus insuper sicut diabolus zizania seminare; nec ad Christum volentes venire prohibemus, sed eos ad Christum venire nolle, ipsa sua confessione convincimus.

²⁵ Aug. de Fide et Oper. c. 15. t. 4. p. 30. Quod quidam ita intelligendum putant, ut illi videantur ædificare super hoc fundamentum aurum, argentum, lapides pretiosos, qui fidei quæ in Christo est, bona opera adjiciunt: illi autem fœnum, ligna, stipulam, qui cum eandem fidem habeant, male operantur. Unde arbitrantur per quasdam pœnas ignis eos posse purgari ad salutem percipiendam merito fundamenti.

²⁶ Ibid. Hoc si ita est, fatemur istos laudabili charitate conari, ut omnes indiscrete admittantur ad baptismum, non solum adulteri et adulteræ, contra sententiam Domini falsas nuptias prætententes, verum etiam publicæ meretrices in turpissima professione perseverantes, quas certe nulla etiam negligentissima ecclesia consuevitmittere, nisi ab illa primitus prostitutione liberatas.

²⁸ Ibid. c. 18. Antiquum et robustum morem ecclesia retinet, ex illa scilicet liquidissima veritate venientem, quæ certum habet, quoniam qui talia agunt, regnum Dei non possidebunt.

²⁹ Justin. Apol. 2. p. 93. Καὶ βίβην οὕτως δύνασθαι ὑποσχώνται, &c.

³⁰ Chrys. Hom. 21. ad Popul. Antioch. p. 275. Hom. 6. in Colos. p. 1358.

³¹ Basil. Hom. 13. Exhort. ad Bapt.

³² Cyril. in John xi. 26. ³³ Constit. Apost. lib. 7. c. 41.

devil and the world, does thereby profess himself a soldier and servant devoted to Christ. Therefore St. Ambrose, speaking of the renunciation, calls it,³¹ a promise, a caution, a hand-writing or bond, given to God, and registered in the court of heaven; because this is a vow made before his ministers, and the angels, who are witnesses to it. Upon which account he says in another place,³² It is recorded, not in the monuments of the dead, but in the book of the living. St. Austin calls it, a profession³⁶ made in the court of angels, and the names of the professors are written in the book of life, not by any man, but by the heavenly powers. St. Jerom³⁷ styles it, a covenant made with the Sun of righteousness, and a promise of obedience to Christ. And he so speaks of this ceremony, as to show it to be a distinct act from the renunciation, (though they both tended to the same end,) because different rites were used in expressing them. For in renouncing the devil they had their faces to the west, for symbolical reasons which we have heard before; but in making their covenant with Christ they turned about to the east, as an emblem of that light which they received from the Sun of righteousness, by engaging themselves in his service.

This custom of turning about to the east, when they made their profession of obedience to Christ, is also mentioned by St. Ambrose, Gregory Nazianzen, Cyril of Jerusalem, and the author under the name of Dionysius. For which they assign two reasons: 1. Cyril³⁸ tells his disciples, that as soon as they had renounced the devil, the paradise of God, which was planted in the East, and whence our first parent for his transgression was driven into banishment, was now laid open to them: and their turning about from the west to the east, which is the region of light, was a symbol of this. For the same reason, St. Basil³⁹ and some others of the ancients tell us, they prayed toward the east, that they might have their faces toward paradise. The other reason for turning to the east in baptism, was because the east or rising sun was an emblem of the Sun of righteousness, to whom they now turned from Satan: Thou art turned about to the east, says St. Ambrose,⁴⁰ for he that renounces the devil, turns unto Christ. Where he plainly intimates with St. Jerom, that turning to the east was a symbol of their aversion from Satan, and conversion unto Christ, that is, from darkness to light, from serving idols to serve him who is the Sun of righteousness and Fountain of light.

Sect. 7.
This vow of obedience made by turning to the east. And why.

Together with this profession of obedience, there was also exacted a profession of faith of every person to be baptized. And this was always to be made in the same words of the creed, that every church used for the instruction of her catechumens. They were obliged to repeat it privately to the catechist, and then again publicly in the church, when they had given in their names to baptism; as I have showed⁴¹ before. But besides this, they were also obliged to make a more solemn profession of it at the time of baptism, and give distinct answers to the several questions, as the minister propounded them, with relation to the several parts of the creed, which contained the summary of Christian faith. There were some indeed in St. Austin's time, who, as they were for excluding the profession of obedience out of the baptismal vow, so were they for curtailing the profession of faith, and reducing it to one single article, I believe Jesus Christ to be the Son of God. In favour of this, they pleaded the example of Philip baptizing the eunuch upon this short confession,⁴² and that saying of St. Paul to the Corinthians, "I determined to know nothing among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified." Yet they durst never proceed so far as to put their designs in practice; for they still continued to make interrogatories about the other articles, as the church always did, concerning the Holy Ghost, the holy church, the remission of sins, the resurrection of the dead, the incarnation of Christ, his passion and death upon

Sect. 8.
The third thing required of the party to be baptized, was a profession of faith in the usual words of the creed.

³¹ Ambros. de Sacrament. lib. 1. c. 2. Respondisti, Abrenuncio: memor esto sermonis tui, et nunquam tibi excidat series cautionis tuæ.—Ubi promiseris considera, vel quibus promiseris: Levitam vidisti, sed minister est Christi. Vidisti illum ante altaria ministrare: ergo chirographum tuum tenetur, non in terra, sed in cælo.

³² Id. de Initiatis, cap. 2. Tenetur vox tua, non in tumultu mortuorum, sed in libro viventium.

³⁶ Aug. de Symbolo, lib. 2. c. 1. t. 9. Professi estis renunciare vos diabolo, pompis, et angelis ejus. Videte dilectissimi, quia hanc professionem vestram in curiam profertis angelicam: nomina profitentium in libro excipiuntur vitæ, non a quolibet homine, sed a superiore cælitus potestate.

³⁷ Hieron. Com. in Amos vi. 14. In mysteriis primum renunciamus ei qui in occidente est: et sic versi in orientem, pactum inimus cum sole justitiæ, et ei servituros nos esse promittimus.

³⁸ Cyril. Catech. Mystagog. 1. n. 6.

³⁹ Basil. de Spir. Sancto, cap. 27.

⁴⁰ Ambros. de Initiatis, c. 2. Ad orientem converteris. Qui enim renunciat diabolo, ad Christum convertitur.

⁴¹ Book X, chap. 2. sect. 10.

⁴² Aug. de Fide et Oper. cap. 9. Spado, inquit, ille quem Philippus baptizavit, nihil plus dixit, quam, Credo Filium Dei esse Jesum Christum. Num ergo placet, ut hoc solum homines respondeant, et continuo baptizentur? Nihil de Spiritu Sancto, nihil de sancta ecclesia, nihil de remissione peccatorum, nihil de resurrectione mortuorum? &c. Si enim spado cum respondisset, Credo Filium Dei esse Jesum Christum, hoc ei sufficere visum est, ut continuo baptizatus abscederet: Cur non id sequimur, atque auferimus cætera quæ necesse habemus etiam cum ad baptizandum temporis urget angustia exprimere, interrogando ut baptizandus ad cuncta respondeat, etiamsi ea memoriæ mandare non valuit?

the cross, his burial and resurrection on the third day, his ascension, and session on the right hand of the Father: all which were thought so necessary, that the church never omitted them even in clinic baptism, when men were baptized upon a sick-bed: for if they were able to speak, they answered for themselves, as St. Austin says, to every particular interrogation, though they were not able to commit them to memory; and if they were speechless, their sureties or sponsors answered for them, as they did for children, as will be showed in the next chapter. So that one way or other the whole creed was repeated, and every individual article assented to by men at their baptism. And this was always the practice of the church from the very days of the apostles, and in their time also: for though no other article be mentioned in the baptism of the eunuch, but only his believing Jesus Christ to be the Son of God, yet, as St. Austin observes in the same place,⁴³ the Scripture, in saying, Philip baptized him, is to be understood as meaning that all things were fulfilled, which use to be observed in baptism, though, for brevity's sake, they be not mentioned. And indeed in all the accounts we have of baptism in ancient writers, there is express mention of this profession, either to believe the doctrines of Christianity in general, as they are delivered in Scripture, or as they are briefly summed up in the articles of the creed. Justin Martyr⁴⁴ says, Before men were regenerated, they must both profess to believe the truth of those things which they had been taught, and also promise to live answerable to their knowledge. Cyprian particularly⁴⁵ mentions the use of the creed in baptism, and specifies in several of the interrogatories that were made in reference to the particular articles of it; as, Whether they believed eternal life, and remission of sins in the holy church? which were always the concluding articles of the creed. And in another place he speaks both of these, and the articles relating to the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, as interrogatories used in baptism both by the catholic church,⁴⁶ and the Novatians. For however they differed in the sense of some of the articles, yet they both agreed in the same form of interrogatories, and both baptized in the same creed. Tertullian also⁴⁷ specifies the articles relating to Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and the church, as part of the interrogatories of baptism. And Eusebius, reciting the words of the Creed of Cæsarea,⁴⁸ says, it was the Creed into which he was baptized. The same use was made of the Nicene Creed, as soon as it was composed, in most of the Eastern churches; or they ordinarily baptized in the profession of that faith, as I have showed in the last book.⁴⁹ It were easy here to shjoin many testimonies out of St. Ambrose, St. Jerom, Cyril of Alexandria and Jerusalem, Chrysostom, Nazianzen, Basil, Epiphanius, and Salvian, and the author of the Constitutions: but the matter is so incontestable, that the ancients did never baptize into the profession of any single article, but into a complete and perfect creed, that I think it needless to insist upon the proof of it, whilst there is not any pretence of an exception to be made against it in any public or private baptism whatsoever.

There were some circumstances and ceremonies of this confession, which because they added something to the solemnity of the action, it will not be improper to mention. As, first, that it was usually done in public before many witnesses. Which was a circumstance grounded upon apostolical practice, and very rarely dispensed with. Primasius⁵⁰ deduces it from the example of Timothy, who witnessed a good confession before many witnesses: which he interprets of his profession of faith made at baptism. Which is also the exposition given by Ephrem Syrus.⁵¹ And Pope Leo⁵² seems to refer to the same, when he exhorts men to stand firm in that faith, which they confessed before many witnesses; that faith in which they were born again of water and the Holy Ghost, and received the unction of salvation, and the seal of eternal life. It was usual at Rome, St. Austin⁵³ tells us, to make this

Sect. 9.
This confession made in the most solemn and public manner.

⁴³ Aug. de Fide et Oper. cap. 9. In eo quod ait, Baptizavit eum Philippus, intelligi voluit impleta esse omnia, quæ licet taceantur in Scripturis, gratia brevitatibus, tamen serie traditionis scimus implenda.

⁴⁴ Justin. Apol. 2. p. 93. "Ὅσοι ἂν πεισθῶσι καὶ πιτεύωσιν ἀληθῆ ταῦτα τὰ ὑφ' ἡμῶν διδασκόμενα καὶ λεγόμενα εἶναι, καὶ βίβην ἔστω δόνασθαι ὑπισχνῶνται—ἀναγεννῶνται.

⁴⁵ Cyr. Ep. 70. ad Episc. Numidas, p. 190. Sed et ipsa interrogatio quæ fit in baptismo, testis est veritatis. Nam cum dicimus, Credis in vitam æternam, et remissionem peccatorum per sanctam ecclesiam? Intelligimus remissionem peccatorum non nisi in ecclesia dari, &c.

⁴⁶ Cyr. Ep. 69. al. 76. ad Magnum, p. 183.

⁴⁷ Tertul. de Bapt. cap. 6. Quum sub tribus et testatio fidei et sponsio salutis pignorentur, necessario adjicitur ecclesiæ mentio: quoniam ubi tres, id est, Pater et Filius et Spiritus Sanctus, ibi ecclesia, quæ trium corpus est.

⁴⁸ Euseb. Epist. ad Cæsarienses, ap. Socrat. lib. 1. cap. 8.

⁴⁹ Book X. chap. 4. sect. 17.

⁵⁰ Primas. in 1 Tim. vi. 12. Confessus bonam confessionem, in baptismo: coram multis testibus, coram sacerdotibus et ministris, atque virtutibus cælestibus ac divinis.

⁵¹ Ephrem. de Pœnitent. cap. 5.

⁵² Leo, Serm. 4. de Nativ. Domini, p. 17. Permanete stabiles in fide, quam confessi estis coram multis testibus, et in qua renati per aquam et Spiritum Sanctum, accepistis chrisma salutis et signaculum vitæ æternæ.

⁵³ Aug. Confess. lib. 8. cap. 2. Ut ventum est ad horam profitendæ fidei, quæ verbis certis conceptisque memoriter de loco eminentiore in conspectu populi fidelis Romæ reddi solet ab eis qui accessuri sunt ad gratiam tuam, oblatum esse dicebat Victorino a presbyteris, ut secretius redderet, sicut nonnullis qui verecundia trepidaturi videbantur, offerri mos erat: illum autem maluisse salutem suam in conspectu confession publicly in the church, in some eminent place appointed for the purpose, that they might be seen and heard by all the congregation. But sometimes, to favour the modesty of some very bashful persons, who could not speak without trembling in such an awful assembly, the presbyters received their confession in private: and this they offered to Victorinus, a famous rhetorician, upon his conversion; but he chose rather to make his confession in public; saying, there was no salvation in rhetoric, and yet he had always taught that in public; and therefore it would not become him to be afraid of making a public confession of God's word before the meek flock of Christ, who had never been afraid to repeat his own words in the schools of the heathen, who in comparison of Christians were only to be reputed madmen.

Another circumstance which added to the solemnity of the action, was the posture of the body, not only looking toward the east, but with hands and eyes lift up to heaven, as if they were immediately fixed on Christ, with whom they were now entering into covenant, as their new Lord sitting on the throne of his glory. For as they renounced the devil with hands stretched out against him, or with collision or striking them together in defiance of him; so on the contrary, they made their confession and covenant, and addresses to Christ, in the posture of petition, with hands lift up to the Sun of righteousness, and ready to embrace him. So the author under the name of Dionysius⁵¹ describes it, saying, The priest bids the catechumen, after he has renounced Satan, to turn about to the east and make his covenant with Christ, with hands and eyes lift up to heaven.

This confession also, for greater solemnity, is thought to have been repeated three times, as we have heard before, that it was usual to do in the renunciation of Satan. Cyril of Alexandria⁵⁵ says, It was the custom of the church to require a triple confession of Christ, of all those that proposed to love him, and came to his holy baptism: and this after the example of St. Peter, to whom Christ said three times, "Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me?" and Peter answered thrice, "Lord, thou knowest that I love thee." St. Ambrose⁵⁶ says, That in the celebration of baptism, three interrogatories were made, and a triple answer was given to them; nor could any one be otherwise baptized. Whence also Peter was asked three times in the Gospel, whether he loved the Lord? that by answering thrice, he might loose those bonds with which he had bound himself by denying his Lord. But I am not sure that this triple confession always means thrice repeating the whole creed. For St. Ambrose⁵⁷ in another place makes this triple confession to be rather answering three times, I believe, to the several parts of the creed. Thou wast asked, says he, Dost thou believe in God the Father Almighty? And thou didst answer, I believe. Thou wast asked again, Dost thou believe in our Lord Jesus Christ, and his cross? And thou didst answer a second time, I believe. Thou wast asked a third time, Dost thou believe in the Holy Ghost? And thy answer was, I believe. So thou wast thrice buried under water, that thy triple confession might absolve thee from the manifold offences of thy former life. Where it is plain, the triple confession means no more than answering thrice, I believe, to the several parts of the creed. But there might be different customs in different places; for St. Cyril seems to mean something more, when he makes these answers not only to be a confession of the three persons of the Trinity, but a triple confession of Christ, which implies a repetition of the creed three times over, if I rightly understand him.

There was one circumstance more, which, if true, added great weight to the whole action: which was, that the party, after he had made his confession of faith, subscribed it also with his own hand, if he were able to do it, in the books or registers of the church. I cannot positively say, that this was any certain or universal practice, but there seem to be some footsteps of it in some ancient records, and the allusions of writers to such a custom. Gregory Nazianzen is thought to refer to it, when, exhorting men to continue stedfast to the faith which they professed at baptism, he says, If thou wast enrolled into any other faith⁵⁸ than what I have sanctæ multitudinis profiteri: non enim erat salus quam docebat in rhetorica, et tamen eam publice professus erat. Quanto minus ergo vereri debuit mansuetum gregem tuum, pronuncians verbum tuum, qui non verebatur in verbis suis turbas insanorum?

⁵¹ Dionys. de Eccles. Hierarch. cap. 2. p. 253.

⁵⁵ Cyril. lib. 12. in Joh. xxi. t. 4. p. 1119. Τόπος δὲ πάλιν ταῖς μὲν ἐκκλησιαῖσις ἐντεῦθεν εἰς τὸ χρῆσαι τρίτον διερωτῶν τὴν εἰς Χριστὸν ὁμολογίαν τοὺς ἀγαπᾶν αὐτὸν ἐλομένους, διὰ τῆ καὶ προσελθεῖν τῷ ἁγίῳ βαπτίσματι.

⁵⁶ Ambros. de Spir. Sancto, lib. 2. cap. 11. Ideo in mysteriis interrogatio trina defertur, et confirmatio trina celebratur: nec potest quis nisi trina confessione purgari.

Unde et ipse Petrus in evangelio tertio interrogatur, utrum diligat Dominum, ut trina responsione vincula, quæ Dominum negando ligavit, absolveret.

⁵⁷ Id. de Sacram. lib. 2. c. 7. Interrogatus es, Credis in Deum Patrem omnipotentem? Dixisti, Credo, &c. Iterum interrogatus es, Credis in Dominum nostrum Jesum Christum et in crucem ejus? Dixisti, Credo, et mersisti.—Tertio interrogatus es, Credis et in Spiritum Sanctum? Dixisti, Credo. Tertio mersisti, ut multiplicem lapsum superioris ætatis absolveret trina confessio.

⁵⁸ Naz. Orat. 40. de Bapt. p. 670. Εἰ μὲν ἄλλως ἐγγράφῃ, ἢ ὡς ὁ ἐμὸς ἀπαιτεῖ λόγος, δεῦρο καὶ μετεγγράφῃ. — Εἰπέ τοῖς μεταπειθεῖσι σε, ὁ γέγραφα, γέγραφα.

expounded, come and be enrolled again; and then tell those that would draw thee away from it, "What I have written, I have written." St. Ambrose seems also to allude to this, when⁵⁹ he tells the initiated, that their handwriting was recorded not only in earth, but in heaven, because it was taken both in the presence of men and angels. And St. Austin⁶⁰ says, The names of such as made their profession, were written in the book of life, not only by men, but by the heavenly powers above. Yet I confess St. Chrysostom has a passage which seems to go contrary to all this: for speaking of the difference between earthly masters buying slaves, and Christ taking us to be his servants, he reckons this among others, that Christ requires no witnesses nor handwriting of us,⁶¹ but only our bare word, to say, I renounce thee, Satan, and all thy pomp. Whence it must be concluded, either that this custom was not so universal as the rest, since St. Chrysostom knew nothing of it; or that the forecited evidences are not so cogent as at first sight they may seem to be. For St. Ambrose and St. Austin may be so interpreted, where they speak of being written in the book of life, as to be understood only in a figurative sense, for having their names written in heaven. Yet Vicecomes is very positive not only of this, but that men also set their seal⁶² to their subscription, and confirmed their profession with an oath. But I do not find any sufficient authority for this, and therefore will not any further insist upon it, which I had rather leave to the further discussion of the critical and curious reader.

But by what has been said we may easily perceive, that the design of the church in all these ceremonies, and the caution and deliberation used in the whole action, was only to make men truly sensible of the nature of the Christian religion, (which admitted of no proselytes without these formal and solemn professions,) and of their great obligations to continue stedfast in that faith and obedience to Christ, which they had so solemnly promised with their mouths, and subscribed with their own hands, not only before men, but in the presence of God and the holy angels. This was the greatest engagement imaginable upon them, and of force to influence their whole lives. To which purpose St. Chrysostom often proposes and insists upon it, to make men bear it perpetually in memory, and use it as their best armour and weapon against all temptations. In his last discourse to the people of

Antioch, he expatiates upon this topic, inveighing first severely against all the shows of the Roman theatre and circus, and observation of days, and presages, and omens, which he reckons among the pomps of Satan. To these he joins enchantments and ligatures: for some Christians made no scruple to hang golden medals of Alexander the Great about their head or feet to cure diseases. With whom he expostulates after this manner: Are these our hopes⁶³ and expectations, that after the cross and death of our Lord, we should put our trust for health in the image of a heathen king? Knowest thou not what wonders the cross hath done? how it hath destroyed death, extinguished sin, emptied hell, dissolved the power of the devil? And is it not as fit to be relied on to cure a bodily disease? It hath given resurrection to the world, and canst not thou confide in it? But thou not only procurest ligatures, but also charms, bringing some old drunken staggering woman to thy house for this purpose, and payest reverence to these things, after thou hast been disciplined in the religion of Christ. Nay, when men are admonished of these things, they plead in excuse, that the old woman the enchanter is a Christian, and names nothing but the name of God. For which she is the more to be abhorred, because she abuses the name of God to so scandalous a practice, and whilst she calls herself a Christian, does the works of the heathen. The devils named the name of Christ, and yet were devils for all that, and were rebuked and ejected by our Saviour. Therefore I beseech you, keep yourselves pure from this deceit, and take this word as your staff and armour. As none of you will choose to walk abroad without his shoes or clothes; so without this word, let none of you venture out in public; but when you go over the threshold of your gate, say first this word, I renounce thee, Satan, and thy pomp, and thy worship; and I make a covenant with thee, O Christ. Never go forth without this word, and it will be your staff, your armour, your invincible tower. And with this word, sign yourselves with the sign of the cross: and then not only man, but the devil himself cannot hurt you, whilst he finds you appearing guarded with this armour. Thus St. Chrysostom exhorts men daily to remember their solemn profession of faith and baptismal vow, wherein they renounced Satan and embraced Christ, as the best preservative against sin and danger. To which both he and Ephrem Cyrus add this momentous consideration,⁶⁴ That an account of

Sect. 13.
The use of all these ceremonies and engagements, to make men sensible of their obligation, and stedfast to their profession.

⁵⁹ Ambros. de Sacram. lib. 1. cap. 2. Chirographum tuum tenetur, non in terra, sed in cælo. It. de Initiatis, cap. 2. Tenetur vox tua, non in tumultu mortuorum, sed in libro viventium.

⁶⁰ Aug. de Symbolo ad Catechumenos, lib. 2. cap. 1. Nomina profitentium in libro excipiuntur vite, non a quolibet homine, sed a superiore cælitus potestate.

⁶¹ Chrys. Hom. 21. ad Populum Antioch. t. 1. p. 274. Οὐ νάρτηρας ἡμᾶς, οὐκ ἐγγράφου ἡμᾶς ἀπαιτεῖ, ἀλλ' ἀρκεῖται ψιλῆ τῆ φωνῇ, κἀν εἴπησ ἀπὸ διανοίας, ἀποτάσσομαί σοι Σατανά, &c.

⁶² Vicecom. de Ritib. Bapt. lib. 2. cap. 27. p. 343.

⁶³ Chrys. Hom. 21. ad Popul. Antiochen. t. 1. p. 275.

⁶⁴ Ephrem. de Abrenunc. Baptismi, p. 150. Hæc ipsa this vow will be required of men at the day of judgment; for "by thy words shalt thou be justified, and by thy words shalt thou be condemned." And Christ will say to every wilful transgressor of it, "Out of thine own mouth will I condemn thee, O thou wicked servant." As nothing therefore could be more useful than this part of the church's discipline, in requiring such professions and promises of every man before they entered the service of Christ; as it was usual for masters to do, before they bargained⁶⁵ with slaves and took them into their family: so nothing could be more material than the continued impressions of this vow upon men's minds, to keep them under a quick sense of their obligations, on which the whole conduct of their lives so much depended, and their eternal interest at the day of judgment.

There is one thing more remains to be inquired into under this head, that is, whether any public or particular confession of sins was required of men at their baptism, besides what was implied in the general renunciation of Satan and all his works and service? Now, this is plainly resolved by St. Chrysostom in the negative. For discoursing of the difference between God's choosing his servants, and the choice which earthly princes and masters make of their soldiers and slaves, he makes the difference chiefly to consist in this: That before men were allowed to enter the lists in any of the famous exercises of the theatre, a public crier must first lead them about by the hand before all, and cry out, saying, Does any one accuse this man? though there the engagement was only of the body, and not of the soul. But in God's choice of us it is quite otherwise: for though our engagement depends not upon strength of arms, but on the philosophy and virtue of our souls, yet the ruler and governor thereof acts quite contrary: he does not take a man, and lead him about, and say, Does any one accuse him? but he cries out, Though all men and devils should rise up against him, and accuse him of secret and horrible crimes, I do not reject, I do not abhor him; but I deliver him from his accuser, and absolve him from his iniquity, and so I lead him to the combat. Nor is this the only admirable thing, that he forgives our sins, but that he does not reveal nor disclose them; he neither makes open proclamation of them,⁶⁶ nor compels those that come to him to publish their own offences, but requires them to give account, and confess their sins to him alone. He does not, like earthly judges, oblige criminals to make a public confession before all men in hopes of pardon, but he forgives sins upon our private testimony without any other witnesses. This is undeniable evidence, that no public confession was required of men for their private offences, when they came to baptism. And therefore when Gregory Nazianzen⁶⁷ speaks of confession of sins made at baptism, he is to be understood either of a general confession, or such a particular confession as men voluntarily imposed upon themselves, to testify more eminently the sincerity of their repentance; which some think was done at John's baptism, Matt. iii. 6, and in the baptism of those mentioned Acts xix. 18, where it is said, that "many who believed came, and confessed, and showed their deeds;" though this was not imposed upon men by any necessary law or rule of the church. In case of public scandalous crimes, they were obliged particularly to promise and vow the forsaking of them; but for private crimes, no particular confession was required to be made, save only to God, with a general renunciation of all sin, in which every private crime was supposed to be included. Vid. Aug. Sermon. 116. de Tempore.

CHAPTER VIII.

OF THE USE OF SPONSORS OR SURETIES IN BAPTISM.

NEXT to the conditions and promises required of men in their baptism, we must examine the office and business of sponsors or sureties, who had always some concern in these obligations. And here it is first to be observed, that there were three sorts of sponsors made use of in the primitive church: 1. For children, who could not renounce, or profess, or answer for themselves. 2. For such adult persons, as by reason of sickness or infirmity were in the same condition with children, incapacitated to answer for themselves. 3. For all adult persons in general. For the church required sponsors also for those, who were otherwise qualified to make their own responses. Now, the office of sponsors was diversified a little in its nature according to these distinctions. They who were sureties or sponsors for children, were obliged first to answer in their names to all the interrogatories that were usually put in abrenunciatio et pulchra confessio exigetur a quocunque Christiano in illa die, &c. Chrys. Hom. 21. ad Pop. Antioch. p. 274. Hoc igitur dicamus, abrenuncio tibi Satana: tanquam in illa die hujus vocis rationem reddituri, ut saluum tunc reddamus depositum. ⁶⁵ Chrys. ibid. p. 273.

⁶⁶ Chrys. Hom. 21. ad Pop. Antioch. p. 270. Οὐ τοῦτο δὲ μόνον ἐστὶ Συνασπτόν, ὅτι ἀφήσιν ἡμῖν τὰ ἀμαρτήματα, ἀλλ' ὅτι αὐτὰ οὐδὲ ἐκκαλύπτει, οὐδὲ ποιεῖ φανερά καὶ δῆλα, οὐδὲ ἀναγκάζει παρελθόντας εἰς μέσον ἐξειπεῖν τὰ πεπλημμελημένα, ἀλλ' αὐτῷ μόνω ἀπολογήσασθαι κελεύει, καὶ πρὸς αὐτόν ἐξομολογήσασθαι.

⁶⁷ Naz. Orat. 40. de Bapt. p. 657.

baptism, and then to be guardians of their Christian education. Some will also needs have it, that they were obliged to give them a perfect maintenance, and take them as it were for their own children by adoption, in case their parents failed and left them destitute in their minority.

But this I take to be a mistake.

Sect. 2.
Parents commonly sponsors for their own children. For whoever were sponsors for children, if ever they became destitute, the burden devolved upon the church in general, and not upon any others. Which will be evidenced by these two considerations: first, That parents were commonly sponsors for their own children: and in that case, there can be no dispute where the obligation of maintenance lay so long as they were alive. For they were obliged to maintain their own children by a natural law, not because they were sponsors, but because they were parents to them. It was not indeed absolutely necessary that parents should be sponsors for their own children, though some in St. Austin's days were inclined to think so, which he reckons an error,¹ and shows, that in many cases there was a necessity it should be otherwise. But yet in most cases the parents were sponsors for their own children; as appears from St. Austin, who speaks of parents in all ordinary cases offering their own children to baptism, and making the proper responses for them:² and the extraordinary cases in which they were presented by others, were commonly such cases where the parent could not, or would not, do that kind office for them; as when slaves³ were presented to baptism by their masters; or children, whose parents were dead, were brought by the charity of any who would show mercy on them; or children exposed by their parents, which were sometimes taken up by the holy virgins of the church, and by them presented unto baptism. These are the only cases mentioned by St. Austin, in which children seem to have had other sponsors, and not their parents. Which makes it probable, that in all ordinary cases parents were sureties for their own children. Which may be collected also from the author of the Hypognostics,⁴ under the name of St. Austin, who speaks of infants being presented to baptism by the hands of their parents, and some of them dying in their arms before the priest could baptize them. Whilst parents therefore were sureties for their own children, they were obliged to maintain them; but this not by the law of sureties, but by the law of nature; and if they failed, this duty devolved upon the whole church.

Secondly, In other cases, where Sect. 3.
Other sureties not bound to maintain the children for whom they were sponsors. strangers became sureties for children, the burden of maintenance did never devolve upon them by any law of suretiship, except they were obliged by some antecedent law to take care of them. In case a master was sponsor for his slave, he was obliged to maintain him, because he was antecedently in the nature of a father to him; and this obligation arose, not from his suretiship, but from his being his master. But in other cases it was not so. For sometimes children, that were exposed, were taken up and presented to baptism by mere strangers, and in that case the burden of maintenance fell upon the church, and not upon the sponsors. And in some cases, as St. Austin⁵ informs us, such children were presented unto baptism by the sacred virgins of the church, who had no other maintenance but what they themselves received from the church; and in that case it is evident the children's maintenance must be derived from the same fountain as the virgins' was, that is, from the public stock of the church. So that in all cases the church was charged with this care, and not the sponsors, except there was some antecedent obligation. And there was good reason for this; for, as St. Austin⁶ observes, children were presented to baptism not so much by those in whose hands they were brought, (though by them too, if they were good and faithful men,) as by the whole society of saints. The whole church was their mother, she brought forth all and every one by this new birth; and therefore, if any were to be charged with maintenance, it was but reasonable that the church should maintain her own children. So that they who lay so much stress upon sponsors undertaking for children, as if they thereby undertook to give them maintenance too, have no grounds for their assertion, since it appears from the best light that we have, to have been otherwise

¹ Aug. Ep. 23. ad Bonifac. Illud autem nolo te fallat, ut existimes reatus vinculum ex Adam tractum, aliter non posse dirumpi, nisi parvuli ad percipiendam Christi gratiam a parentibus offerantur.

² Aug. ibid. Quid est illud, quod quando ad baptismum offeruntur, parentes pro eis tanquam fidedictores respondent, &c.

³ Aug. ibid. Videas multos non offerri a parentibus, sed etiam a quibuslibet extraneis, sicut a Dominis servuli aliquando offeruntur. Et nonnunquam mortuis parentibus suis, parvuli baptizantur, ab eis oblati, qui illis hujusmodi misericordiam præbere poterunt. Aliquando etiam quos crudeliter parentes exposuerunt, nutriendos a quibuslibet, nonnunquam a sacris virginibus colliguntur, et ab eis offeruntur ad baptismum.

⁴ Aug. Hypognostic. contra Pelag. lib. 6. cap. 7. t. 7. p. 633. Novimus etiam parvulos, quibus usus liberi arbitrii non est, ut de bonis aut malis eorum meritis judicemus, parentum manibus ad gratiam sacri baptismatis deportatos: et cum in uno eorum per manus sacerdotis mysterium fidei adimpleretur, aliquoties alterum in parentum manibus factum exanimem, fraudatum gratiæ salvatoris.

⁵ Aug. Ep. 23. ad Bonifac.

⁶ Aug. ibid. Offeruntur quippe parvuli ad percipiendam spiritualem gratiam, non tam ab eis quorum gestantur manibus, quamvis et ab ipsis, si et ipsi boni fideles sunt, quam ab universa societate sanctorum atque fidelium.—Tota hoc mater ecclesia quæ in sanctis est, facit: quia tota omnes, tota singulos parit.

in the practice of the primitive church. I have not said this to excuse sponsors from any duty that properly belongs to them, but only to take off the force of an unreasonable objection, which some have made against the present use of sponsors in baptism, as if they were of a different sort from those of the ancient church, because they are not under this particular obligation, which appears not to have any other foundation but the bare surmise of those who make the objection.

Two things indeed were anciently required of sponsors as their proper duty: 1. To answer in their names to all the interrogatories of baptism. Sect. 4.
But only to answer for them to the several interrogatories in baptism. This seems to be intimated by Tertullian,⁷ where he speaks of the promises which the sponsors made in baptism, and of the danger there was of their failing to fulfil them, either by their own mortality, or by the untoward disposition of the party. But if any one thinks these promises related only to what the sponsors promised for themselves, and not in the name of the child, he may be informed more clearly from others. Gennadius⁸ tells us, These promises for infants and such as were incapable of learning, were made after the usual manner of interrogatories in baptism. And St. Austin⁹ more particularly acquaints us with the form then used, which was, Doth this child believe in God? Doth he turn to God? which is the same as renouncing the devil, and making a covenant with Christ. In other places¹⁰ he tells us more expressly, That the sponsors answered for them, that they renounced the devil, his pomps, and his works. And disputing against the Pelagians, he proves by this argument, That children were under the power of Satan and the guilt of original sin, and needed pardon, because if a Pelagian himself brought a child to baptism, he must answer for him,¹¹ because he could not answer for himself, that he renounced the devil, that he turned to God, and that, among other things, he believed the remission of sins; all which would only be fallaciously said, if children had no concern in them. And he professes, he would not admit any child to baptism, whose sponsor he had reason to believe did not make these promises and responses sincerely for him. Of the form and practice, then, there is no dispute. Only it seemed a great difficulty to Bishop Boniface, and as such he proposed it to St. Austin, How it could be said with truth, that a child believed, or renounced the devil, or turned to God, who had no thought or apprehension of these things; or if any, yet secret and unknown to us? If any one should ask us concerning a child, Whether he would prove chaste, or a thief, when he became a man? we should doubtless in that case answer, We know not. Or if the question was, Whether a child in his infancy thought good or evil? we should make the same answer, We know not. Since, therefore, no one would promise either for his future morals, or his present thoughts, how is it that when parents present their children as sponsors in baptism, they answer and say, The children do those things which that age does not so much as think of? as, that they believe in God, and are turned unto him, &c. To this St. Austin answers, That the child is said to believe, because he receives the sacrament of faith and conversion, which entitles him to the name of a believer. For the sacraments,¹² because of the resemblance between them and the things represented by them, do carry the name of the things represented. Christ was but once offered in himself, and yet he is offered not only on the annual solemnity of the passover, but every day for the people; and no one tells a lie, that says, He is offered. As therefore the sacrament of Christ's body after a certain manner is called his body, and the sacrament of his blood is called his blood; so the sacrament of faith is faith. And upon this account, when it is answered, That an infant believes, who has not yet any knowledge

⁷ Tertul. de Bapt. cap. 18. Quid enim necesse est sponsors etiam periculo ingeri? Quia et ipsi per mortalitatem destituere promissiones suas possint, et proventu malæ indolis falli.

⁸ Gennad. de Eccles. Dogmat. cap. 52. Si vero parvuli sunt, vel hebetes, qui doctrinam non capiunt, respondeant pro illis qui eos offerunt, juxta morem baptizandi.

⁹ Aug. Ep. 23. ad Bonifac. Interrogamus eos, a quibus offeruntur, et dicimus, Credit in Deum? de illa ætate, quæ utrum sit Deus, ignoret: respondent, Credit; et ad cætera sic respondent singula quæ queruntur, &c.

¹⁰ Aug. Serm. 116. de Tempore, t. 10. p. 304. Fidejussores pro ipsis respondent, quod abrenunciant diabolo, pomps et operibus ejus.

¹¹ Aug. de Peccator. Meritis, lib. 1. cap. 34. Vellem aliquis istorum qui contraria sapiunt, mihi baptizandum parvulum afferret. Ipse certe mihi erat responsurus pro eodem parvulo quem gestaret, quia ille pro se respondere non posset. Quomodo ergo dicturus erat eum renunciare diabolo, cujus in eo nihil esset? Quomodo converti ad Deum, a quo non esset aversus? Credere inter cætera remissionem peccatorum, quæ illi nulla tribueretur? Ego quidem si contra eum hæc sentire existimarem, nec ad sacramenta cum parvulo intrare permitterem.

¹² Aug. Ep. 23. ad Bonifac. Nonne semel immolatus est Christus in seipso? Et tamen in sacramento non solum per omnes Paschæ solennitates, sed omni die populis immolatur; nec utique mentitur qui interrogatus eum responderit immolari. Si enim sacramenta quendam similitudinem earum rerum quarum sacramenta sunt non habent, sacramenta non essent. Ex hac autem similitudine plerumque etiam ipsarum rerum nomina accipiunt. Sicut ergo secundum quendam modum sacramentum corporis Christi corpus Christi est, sacramentum sanguinis Christi sanguis Christi est, ita sacramentum fidei fides est. Ac per hoc cum respondetur parvulus credere, qui fidei nondum habet affectum, respondetur fidem habere propter fidei sacramentum, et convertere se ad Deum propter conversionis sacramentum, quia et ipsa responsio ad celebrationem pertinet sacramenti.

or habit of faith, the meaning of the answer is, That he has faith because of the sacrament of faith, and is converted to God because of the sacrament of conversion; for these answers appertain to the celebration of the sacrament. So that, according to St. Austin, when an infant is said to have faith, the meaning is only that he receives the sacrament of faith, which faith he is bound to embrace when he comes to understand it. In the mean time he is called a believer, because he receives the sacrament of faith, and is entered into the covenant of God by his sponsors, who supply that part for him which he cannot perform in his own person. This was the first duty of sponsors toward children.

The other was, that they were to be guardians of their spiritual life for the future, and to take care by good admonitions and good instructions that they performed their part of the covenant they were now engaged in. St. Austin¹³ makes sponsors themselves concerned in this covenant with God, and therefore presses it as a duty upon them, that they should not only by their examples, but by their words and instructions, teach them the great duties of chastity, humility, sobriety, and peace, forasmuch as they had answered in their stead, that they renounced the devil, his pomps, and his works. And in another place¹⁴ he more particularly specifies their obligations: That they should admonish them to live chastely, and preserve their virginity to marriage, to refrain their tongues from evil-speaking and perjury, not to accustom their mouths to filthy and lascivious songs, not to be proud nor envious, not to retain anger nor hatred in their hearts, not to observe divination or soothsaying, nor to hang phylacteries or diabolical characters upon their own bodies or their relations; to keep and hold the catholic faith, to frequent the church, to hear the Scriptures read with attention, to entertain strangers, and wash their feet, according to what was said to them in baptism, to live peaceably, to be peacemakers among disagreeing brethren, and to honour the priests and their parents with the love of sincere charity. These were such things as they had promised for children in baptism, and therefore they were bound by compact with God to use their utmost endeavours to engage their spiritual pupils to perform them.

Another sort of sponsors were such as were appointed to make answers for such persons, as by reason of some infirmity could not answer for themselves. I have observed before, that such adult persons as were suddenly struck speechless, or seized with a frenzy by the violence of a distemper, might yet be baptized, if any of their friends could testify that they had beforehand desired baptism: and in this case the same friends became sponsors for them, making the very same answers for them as they did for children. This we learn from Cyril of Alexandria, who assures us, That when men were seized with extremity of sickness,¹⁵ and it was thought proper upon that account to baptize them, there were some appointed to make both the renunciations and confessions in their name. And so it is in the account which Fulgentius¹⁶ gives of the African negro, who just before his baptism fell sick of a fever, which bereaved him of his senses, and made him speechless: he was baptized, for all this, having his sponsors to answer in his name, as if it had been for an infant. So that all those canons which¹⁷ speak of baptizing dumb persons in cases of extremity, though they do not expressly require sponsors for them, yet are to be understood as intending them, according to the usual practice of the church. And if the party happened to recover after such a baptism, it was the sponsor's duty, not only to acquaint him, as a witness, with what was done for him, but also, as a guardian of his behaviour, to induce him to make good the promises, which he in his name had made for him. For this was the indispensable duty of sureties in all cases whatsoever.

The third sort of sponsors were for such sort of adult persons as were able to answer for themselves; for these also had their sponsors, and no persons anciently were baptized without them. These are spoken of not only by Dionysius¹⁸ and the author of the Apostolical Constitutions,¹⁹ but by many other more unquestionable writers. Victor Uticensis tells us²⁰ of one Muritta a deacon, who was sponsor for Elpidiphorus at Carthage. And Palladius²¹

Sect. 5.
And to be guardians of their spiritual life for the future.

Sect. 6.
A second sort of sponsors, for such adult persons as could not answer for themselves.

Sect. 7.
The third sort of sponsors for all adult persons in general.

¹³ Aug. Serm. 116. de Tempore, t. 10. p. 304. Non solum exemplis, sed etiam verbis, eos ad omne opus bonum admonere debetis.—Posteaquam baptizati fuerint, de castitate, de humilitate, de sobrietate vel pace eos admonere vel docere non desinant, et agnoscant se fidejussores esse ipsorum. Pro ipsis enim respondent, quod abrenunciant diabolo, pompis et operibus ejus.

¹⁴ Aug. Serm. 163. de Temp.

¹⁵ Cyril. Com. in Joh. xi. 26. t. 4. p. 683. Ὅτι περὶ δὲ τῶν ἐσχάτῃ νόσῳ κατελημμένων, μελλόντων τε διὰ τὸτο βαπτίζεσθαι, καὶ ἀποτάττονται τινες καὶ συντάττονται.

¹⁶ Fulgent. de Bapt. Æthiopsis, cap. 7. p. 610. Factum est, ut confessionem tempore præterito redditam, quia non potuit in hora baptismi reddere propter infirmitatem corporis, adjutorio fraternæ redderet charitatis. Vid. Gennad. de Eccl. Dogm. c. 52.

¹⁷ See chap. 5. sect. 2.

¹⁸ Dionys. Eccl. Hierarch. cap. 2. p. 252.

¹⁹ Constit. Apost. lib. 3. cap. 16.

²⁰ Victor. de Persecut. Vandal. lib. 3. Bibl. Patr. t. 7. p. 613. Hic dudum fuerat apud nos in ecclesia Fausti baptizatus, quem venerabilis Muritta diaconus de alveo fontis susceperat generatum.

²¹ Pallad. Hist. Lausiac. c. 12. Bibl. Patr. Gr. Lat. t. 2. p. 915. Ἀποδέχεται τὸν Ῥεφίνου ἄγιος ἀπὸ τῆ ἀχράντου βαπτίσματος.

says, Evagrius Ponticus performed the same office for Rufinus the great statesman, and præfectus-prætorio under Arcadius. St. Austin often mentions them, but then he also acquaints us, that it was no part of their office to make responses for their pupils in baptism, as it was in the case of infants and sick persons who could not answer for themselves. For though the church accepted it²² in the case of infants by reason of their disability, yet she would not allow adult persons to answer by proxy, who were able to answer for themselves; there being something of natural reason in that saying in the Gospel, "He is of age, let him speak for himself." The most rustic capacities and meanest understandings even in the weaker sex, would not ordinarily excuse them from doing this in their own persons, unless, as Gennadius²³ says, they were so heavy and dull, as not to be capable of learning, in which condition their sponsors were required to answer for them as for little children, from whom they differed so little in understanding.

Sect. 8.
Whose duty was not to answer in their names, but only to admonish and instruct them before and after baptism.

But in ordinary cases this was no office of the sponsors, when men were in a capacity to answer for themselves. Their only business was to be curators and guardians of their spiritual life; to which purpose, it was incumbent on them to take care of their instruction and morals, as well before as after baptism. Upon this account the deaconesses were usually employed in the private instruction of women, to teach them how to make their responses in baptism. And this was one qualification required in deaconesses by some ancient canons,²⁴ that they should be persons of such good understanding as to be able to instruct the ignorant and rustic women, how to make their responses to the interrogatories which the minister should put to them in baptism, and how to order their conversation afterward, as has been observed in another place.²⁵

Sect. 9.
This office chiefly imposed upon deacons and deaconesses.

And by some ancient rules this office was chiefly imposed upon deaconesses, to be sponsors for women, as the deacons were obliged to be for men. For so the author of the Apostolical Constitutions seems to represent it, when he orders²⁶ a deacon to be susceptor for a man, and a deaconess for a woman, in baptism. And we find the sacred virgins often mentioned as concerned in this office. St. Austin, as we heard before, speaks of them²⁷ as presenting exposed children to baptism, though they had no children of their own, nor intended to have any. And in the Life of Epiphanius²⁸ we read, that as one Lucian was his godfather in baptism, so Bernice, a sacred virgin, was godmother to his sister. Whence it appears, that at first the sacred virgins and monastics were thought as proper persons as any to take this weighty office upon them. Though afterward, in the French church, by a canon²⁹ of the council of Auxerre, monks are prohibited from being sponsors in baptism. And so the prohibition stands in the Romish church to this day.

But anciently there was no prohibition of any sorts of men from performing this charitable office, save only of such as unqualified themselves, by going contrary to the rules of the Christian religion. Fathers, as we heard before, were frequently sponsors for their own children; and I know of no prohibition of this before the time of Charles the Great, when the council of Mentz³⁰ made a decree against it, forbidding fathers to be susceptors to their own sons or daughters at the font in baptism. Anciently also presbyters and deacons were allowed to be sponsors, though this is also now prohibited in some provincial councils of the Romish church by Cardinal Borromæo,³¹ in the last age. But the only persons whom the ancients excluded from this office, were catechumens, energumens, heretics, and penitents; that is, persons who either were yet never in full communion with the church, as being themselves unbaptized; or else such as had forfeited the privileges of their baptism and church-communion by their errors, or crimes, or incapacity to assist others, who needed assistance themselves. And by some canons,³² persons who were never confirmed, were excluded from being sponsors both in baptism and confirmation.

Sect. 10.
What persons prohibited from being sponsors.

²² Aug. de Bapt. lib. 4. cap. 24. Cum alii pro infantibus respondent, ut impleatur circa eos celebratio sacramenti, valet utique ad eorum consecrationem, quia ipsi respondere non possunt. At si pro eo qui respondere potest, alius respondeat, non itidem valet, &c.

²³ Gennad. de Eccl. Dogm. c. 52. Si vero parvuli sunt, vel hebetes, qui doctrinam non capiant, respondeant pro illis qui eos offerunt juxta morem baptizandi.

²⁴ Conc. Carthag. 4. can. 12. Viduæ vel sanctimoniales quæ ad ministerium baptizandarum mulierum eliguntur, tam instructæ sint ad officium, ut possint apto et sancto sermone docere imperitas et rusticas mulieres, tempore quo baptizandæ sunt, qualiter baptizatori respondeant, et qualiter accepto baptisate vivant.

²⁵ See Book II. chap. 22. sect. 9.

²⁶ Constit. Apost. lib. 3. c. 16. Τὸν μὲν ἄνδρα ὑποδεχέσθω ὁ διάκονος, τὴν δὲ γυναῖκα ἡ διάκονος.

²⁷ Aug. Ep. 23. ad Bonifac. Aliquando etiam quos crudeliter parentes exposuerunt, nutriendos a quibuslibet, nonnquam a sacris virginibus colligunt, et ab eis offeruntur ad baptismum. Quæ certe proprios filios non habuerunt ullos, nec habere disponent.

²⁸ Vita Epiphani. n. 8. t. 2. p. 324. Ὅς καὶ πατὴρ αὐτοῦ ἐγενήθη ἐπὶ τοῦ ἁγίου φωτισματος.—Βερνίκημ τὴν ἁγίαν παρθένου, ἣ τις ἐγένετο μήτηρ τῆς ἀδελφῆς Ἐπιφανίου.

²⁹ Conc. Antissiodor. can. 25. Non licet abbati filium de baptismo suscipere; nec monachis commatres habere.

³⁰ Conc. Mogunt. an. 813. can. 55. Nullus igitur proprium filium vel filiam de fonte baptisatis suscipiat.

³¹ Borromæ. Synod. Dioces. 2. Decret. 18.

³² Conc. Moguntinum, ap. Gratian. de Consecrat. Dist. 4. cap. 102. In baptismate vel in chrismate, non potest alium

Sect. 11.
But one sponsor required, and that a man for a man, and a woman for a woman.

From what has been said, the reader will also easily observe, that anciently no more but one sponsor was required, and that was a man for a man, and a woman for a woman; for we never read of more than one, in all the accounts of the ancients, and one of the same sex for adult persons. In the case of infants, there was no regard had to the difference of sex: for a virgin might be a sponsor for a man-child, and a father for his own children, whether they were male or female. And one sponsor was sufficient in any case. Some rules forbid more than one, either in baptism or confirmation: as that decree of Leo,³³ cited by Gratian, which says, No more than one, whether man or woman, shall be admitted as surety for a child in baptism: and the like to be observed in confirmation. Which rule was renewed and confirmed by the council of Metz,³⁴ but upon a reason which is something peculiar. For they conclude, that because there is but one God, one faith, one baptism, therefore an infant ought to have only one sponsor, whether man or woman, at his baptism: which I mention not for the excellency of the reason, but only to show what conformity it bears to the ancient practice.

Sect. 12.
When first it became a law that sponsors might not marry a spiritual relation.

Some perhaps will here be desirous to know the original of that practice in the Romish church, which is the occasion of so many dispensations in matrimonial causes, arising from the prohibition of sponsors or godfathers marrying within the forbidden degrees of spiritual relation. Now, that which seems to have given the first tendency towards this, was a law of Justinian, still extant in the Code, wherein he forbids³⁵ any man to marry a woman, whether she be a slave or free, for whom he had been godfather in baptism when she was a child; because nothing does induce a more paternal affection, or juster prohibition of marriage, than this tie, by which their souls are in a divine manner united together. Now, this law extended no further than to prohibit marriage in this immediate relation; and it could not affect very many, whilst parents were commonly sponsors for their own children, and the sacred virgins, or the deaconesses, or the clergy, for others; and men were sponsors for men, suscipere in filiolum, qui non est ipse vel baptizatus vel confirmatus.

³³ Gratian. de Consecrat. Dist. 4. cap. 101. Non plures ad suscipiendum de baptismo infanitem accedant quam unus, sive vir, sive mulier. In confirmatione quoque id ipsum fiat.

³⁴ Conc. Metense, cap. 12, cited by Viccomes.

³⁵ Justin. Cod. lib. 5. Tit. 4. de Nuptiis, Leg. 26. Ea persona omnimodo ad nuptias venire prohibenda, quam aliquis, sive alumna sit, sive non, a sacrosancto suscepit baptisate; cum nihil aliud sic inducere potest paternam affectionem, et iustam nuptiarum prohibitionem, quam hujusmodi nexus, per quem, Deo mediante, animæ eorum copulatæ sunt.

³⁶ Conc. Trull. can. 53. "Εγνωνμέν τινας ἐκ τοῦ βαπτίσι-and women for women. But afterward this was improved a little further: for the council of Trullo³⁶ forbids the godfather not only to marry the infant, but the mother of the infant, for whom he answers; and orders them that have done so, first to be separated, then to do the penance of fornicators. This prohibition was extended to more degrees in the following ages, and grew so extravagant, that the council of Trent thought it a matter worthy of their reformation; though still by their rules this spiritual relation³⁷ was extended to more degrees than either the laws of Justinian or the canons of Trullo had prohibited. For they forbid marriage not only between the sponsors and their children, but also between the sponsors themselves; and the father and mother of the baptized is not to marry a sponsor; nor may the baptizer marry the baptized, nor the father or mother of the baptized, because of the spiritual relation that is contracted between them. But they forbid above two sponsors to appear for a child, and if more than two appear, they are not bound by this law of spiritual relation, though the canon law³⁸ had determined otherwise in former ages. Yet, after all their regulations about this matter, there remain a thousand difficulties to exercise the pens of the Roman casuists, which the reader that is curious may find referred to by So-teallus and Barbosa,³⁹ in their Declarations and Remissions on the council of Trent.

There is one thing indeed ordered by that council, which was anciently of good use, though not for the purpose for which they appointed it. That is, that not only the names of the baptized, but also the names of the sponsors, should be registered in the books of the church. The council of Trent orders it, only that men might know what persons were forbidden to marry by this spiritual relation. But anciently it had a much better use, that the church might know who were sponsors, and that they might be put in mind of their duty, by being entered upon record, which was a standing memorial of their obligations. This custom we find mentioned in the author under the name of Dionysius, where he describes the ceremony of admitting catechumens together with their sponsors.

Sect. 13.
Why the names of the sponsors ordered to be registered in the books of the church.

ματος παίδας ἀναδεχομένους, καὶ μετὰ τοῦτο ταῖς ἐκείνων μητράσι γαμικὸν συναλλάσσοντας συνοικέσιον. ὀρίζομεν ἀπὸ τοῦ παρόντος μηδὲν τοιοῦτο πραχθῆναι.

³⁷ Conc. Trident. Sess. 24. de Reform. Matrimon. cap. 2. Inter susceptores ac baptizatum ipsum, et illius patrem ac matrem, necnon inter baptizantem et baptizatum, baptizati- que patrem ac matrem, tantum spiritualis cognatio contrahatur.

³⁸ Sext. Decretal. lib. 4. Tit. 3. de Cognat. Spirit. cap. 3. Si plures accesserint, spiritualis cognatio inde contrahitur, &c.

³⁹ Canon. Conc. Trid. cum Remissionibus Barbosa, Col. 1621.

The bishop first explains to the catechumen the laws and rules of a divine life and conversation, and then asks him whether he purposes so to live? Which when he has promised, he lays his hand upon his head, and orders the priest to register⁴⁰ both the man and his sponsor. Afterward he speaks of reciting their names out of these registers, when men were presented by their sponsors immediately to be baptized. And thus much of the use of sponsors in the primitive church.

CHAPTER IX.

OF THE UNCTION AND THE SIGN OF THE CROSS IN BAPTISM.

Sect. 1.
Of the first original of unction in baptism. WE find in some of the ancient ritualists, but not in all, mention made of an unction preceding baptism, and used by way of preparation for it. They who first describe it, speak of it as used either immediately after the confession of faith, as the author¹ of the Constitutions; or else between the renunciation and the confession, as Cyril of Jerusalem² describes it. But there is no mention of this unction either in Justin Martyr or Tertullian. For though Tertullian speaks of an unction among the ceremonies of baptism; yet, as Daille³ rightly observes, it was not this unction preceding baptism, but the unction which followed after it in confirmation, accompanied with imposition of hands, which belongs to another subject. For it is plain from Tertullian, that neither of these were given before baptism, but when men⁴ were come out of the water, then they were anointed with the holy unction, and had imposition of hands, in order to receive the Holy Ghost. Whence I think Daille's conjecture very just and reasonable, that the unction preceding baptism is of later date, and was not as yet adopted among the ceremonies of baptism in the time of Tertullian.

Sect. 2.
Of the difference betwixt this and chrism in confirmation. But the writers of the following ages speak distinctly of two unctions, the one before, the other after baptism; which they describe by different names and different ceremonies, to distinguish them one from the other. The first they commonly call χρίσιν μυστικοῦ ἐλαίου, the unction of the mystical oil, and the other, χρίσιν μύρου, or χρίσμα, the unction of chrism. They both agree in this, that the bishop only consecrated them, whether for the use of baptism or confirmation. The author of the Constitutions gives us a form of consecration to be used by the bishop in sanctifying oil for this unction before baptism, where he prays⁵ to God, that he would sanctify the oil in the name of the Lord Jesus, and grant it spiritual grace, and efficacious power, that it might be subservient to the remission of sins, and the preparation of men to make their profession in baptism, that such as were anointed therewith, being freed from all impiety, might become worthy of the initiation according to the command of his only begotten Son. And this power of consecration is reserved to the bishop in all the canons of the ancient councils, of which more when we come to speak of confirmation. In the mean time, I observe, 1. That these two went by different names. The author of the Constitutions calls the first⁶ mystical oil, and the other mystical chrism, and has a distinct form of consecration for each of them. And the same distinction in name is observed by Cyril of Jerusalem,⁷ and the authors under the name of Justin Martyr,⁸ and Dionysius.⁹ 2. They differed in the time of administering them. For the one was given before the party went into the water, the other after he came out of it again. Which is clear from all the forementioned authors, and from St. Ambrose, who speaks of an unction with oil¹⁰ before baptism. As also the author of the Recognitions under the name of Clemens Romanus,¹¹ who tells persons that were to be baptized, that they were first to be anointed with oil consecrated by prayer. 3. They differed in respect to the persons concerned in the administration. For the unction before baptism was often done by a deacon or a deaconess; but that after baptism, by the bishop himself most commonly, or at least by a presbyter in some peculiar cases. The author of the Constitutions,¹² speaking particularly of the unction before the baptism of women, orders the bishop to anoint the head, the deacon the forehead, and the deaconesses the other parts of the body. But the chrism after baptism is reserved to the bishop only. Lastly, They differed

⁴⁰ Dionys. de Hierarch. Eccl. cap. 2. p. 253. Ἱεράρχης ἀπογράψασθαι κελεύει τοῖς ἱερεῦσι τὸν ἄνδρα καὶ τὸν ἀνάδοχον. It. p. 204. Καὶ τῶς ἱερέως ἐκ τῆς ἀπογραφῆς αὐτὸν τε καὶ τὸν ἀνάδοχον κηρῶσαντος, &c.

¹ Constit. Apost. lib. 7. cap. 41.

² Cyril. Catech. Myst. 2. n. 3.

³ Dallax. de Confirmat. lib. 2. cap. 11. p. 181.

⁴ Tertul. de Bapt. cap. 7. Exinde egressi de lavacro perunguntur benedicta unctione de pristina disciplina, qua ungui oleo de cornu in sacerdotium solebant, &c.

⁵ Constit. Apost. lib. 7. cap. 42.

⁶ Constit. lib. 7. c. 42. Μυστικὸν ἔλαιον. Lib. 7. c. 44. Μυστικὸν μύρον. Vid. lib. 3. cap. 17.

⁷ Cyril. Catech. Myst. 2. n. 3. et Catech. 3. n. 3.

⁸ Justin. Resp. ad Orthod. qu. 137.

⁹ Dionys. de Eccl. Hierar. cap. 2. p. 253.

¹⁰ Ambros. de Sacramentis, lib. 1. c. 2. Venimus ad fontem—Unctus es quasi athleta Christi, quasi luctamen hujus sæculi lucturatus.

¹¹ Clem. Recognit. lib. 3. c. 67. Baptizabitur autem unusquisque vestrum—perunctus primo oleo per orationem sanctificato.

¹² Constit. Apost. lib. 3. c. 15 et 16.

in the design and intent of them. For the design of the first unction was to prepare them for baptism, and enter them on their combat with Satan, as champions of Christ; the other was to consummate and confirm their baptism with the consignation or seal of the Holy Spirit.

Cyril of Jerusalem, speaking of the former unction,¹³ says, Men were anointed from head to foot with this exorcised or consecrated oil, and this made them partakers of the true olive tree, Jesus Christ. For they being cut out of a wild olive tree, and ingrafted into a good olive tree, were made partakers of the fatness of the good olive tree. Therefore that exorcised oil was a symbol of their partaking of the fatness of Christ, and an indication of the flight and destruction of the adverse power. For as the insufflations of the saints, and invocation of God, do, like a vehement flame, burn and put the devils to flight; so this exorcised oil, by prayer and invocation of God, gains such a power, as not only to burn up and purge away the footsteps of sin, but also to repel all the powers of the invisible wicked one, the devil. St. Ambrose compares it to the anointing of wrestlers before they enter their combat: Thou camest to the font, says he, and wast anointed¹⁴ as a champion of Christ, to fight the fight of this world. The author under the name of Justin Martyr, distinguishing between the two unctions, says, Men¹⁵ were first anointed with the ancient oil, that they might be Christ's, that is, the anointed of God; but they were anointed with the precious ointment (after baptism) in remembrance of him who reputed the anointing of himself with ointment to be his burial. The author of the Constitutions likewise uses the same distinction: Thou shalt first of all¹⁶ anoint him with the holy oil, then baptize him with water, and afterward sign him with the ointment: that the anointing with oil may be the participation of the Holy Spirit, and the water may be the symbol of death, and the signing with ointment may be the seal of the compact made with God. But if there be neither oil, nor ointment, water is sufficient both for the unction and the seal and the confession of Him with whom we die. So that this was only a ceremony of baptism, which might be omitted without any detriment to the substance or essential part of it. To these may be added the testimony of St. Chrysostom, who says,¹⁷ Every person, before he was baptized, was anointed, as wrestlers entering the field: and this, not as the high priest was anointed of old, only on the head, or right hand, or ear, but all over his body, because he came not only to be taught, but to exercise himself in a fight or combat. This is the account which they give of this unction preceding baptism.

Dr. Cave¹⁸ and some other learned persons are of opinion, that together with this unction, the sign of the cross was made upon the forehead of the party baptized. And there is no question to be made of this, though all the passages they refer to are not direct proofs of it. For many of them relate to the sign of the cross in the unction of chrism or confirmation. As particularly, that unction which Tertullian speaks of, and the sign of the cross accompanying it, was not the unction before baptism, but that which followed in confirmation, as I have showed before in the beginning of this chapter. Therefore, to understand this matter exactly, we are to distinguish at least four several times, when the sign of the cross was used, during the preparation or consummation of the ceremonies of baptism. 1. At the admission of catechumens to the state of catechumenship and the general name of Christians. 2. In the time of exorcism and imposition of hands, while they were passing through the several stages of catechumens. 3. At the time of this unction before baptism. 4. And lastly, at the unction of confirmation, which was then usually the conclusion of baptism both in adult persons and infants; and many of the passages which speak of the sign of the cross in baptism, do plainly relate to this, as an appendage of baptism, and closely joined to it, as the last ceremony and consummation of it. The use of this sign in the admission of catechumens, I have already showed before from St. Austin, and the Life of Porphyrius, bishop of Gaza.¹⁹ And the frequent use of it in exorcism and imposition of hands and prayer, during their catechetical exercises, has also been noted²⁰ in treating of them from St. Austin and St. Ambrose, which I therefore need not here repeat.

The third use of it was in this unction before baptism. For so the author under the name of Dionysius, describing the ceremony of anointing the party be-

¹³ Cyril. Catech. Myst. 2. n. 3.

¹⁴ Ambros. de Sacram. lib. 1. cap. 2. Venimus ad fontem.—Unctus es quasi athleta Christi, quasi luctamen hujus sæculi luctaturus.

¹⁵ Justin. Respon. ad Orthodox. qu. 137. Χρισόμεθα δὲ τῷ παλαιῷ ἐλαίῳ, ἵνα γινώμεθα Χριστοί. τῷ δὲ μύρῳ, πρὸς ἀνάμνησιν τῆ τὴν χρίσιν τῷ μύρῳ ἐνταφιασμὸν ἑαυτῶ λογιζομένων.

¹⁶ Const. Apost. lib. 7. cap. 22. Χρίσεις δὲ πρῶτον τῷ ἐλαίῳ ἁγίῳ· ἔπειτα βαπτίσεις ὕδατι, καὶ τελευταῖον σφραγίσεις μύρῳ· ἵνα τὸ μὲν χρίσμα μετοχή ᾖ τῷ Ἁγίῳ Πνεύματι, τὸ δὲ ὕδωρ σύμβολον τῷ θανάτῳ, τὸ δὲ μύρον σφραγὶς τῶν συνθηκῶν, &c.

¹⁷ Chrys. Hom. 6. in Colos. p. 1358. Ἀλειφεταί, ὡσπερ οἱ ἀθληταὶ εἰς σάδιον ἐμβρησόμενοι, &c.

¹⁸ Cave, Prim. Christ. par. 1. cap. 10. p. 318.

¹⁹ See Book X. chap. 1. sect. 3.

²⁰ Book X. chap. 2. sect. 8.

¹⁸ Sect. 3. The design of this unction, and the reason of it.

¹⁹ Sect. 4. The sign of the cross frequently used in the ceremonies of baptism. First, In the admission of catechumens. And, secondly, In the time of exorcism.

²⁰ Sect. 5. Thirdly, In this unction before baptism.

fore the consecration of the water, says, The bishop begins the unction by thrice signing him²¹ with the sign of the cross, and then commits him to the priests to be anointed all over the body, whilst he goes and consecrates the water in the font. St. Austin also may be understood of this, when he says,²² The cross is always joined with baptism. And by this we may interpret several passages in Cyprian, as where he tells Demetrian, They only escape who are born again, and signed with the sign of Christ. And what that sign is, and on what part of the body it is made, the Lord signified in another place, saying, "Go through the midst of Jerusalem, and set a mark upon their foreheads."²³ And so again in his book of the Unity of the Church,²⁴ speaking of Uzziah's leprosy, he says, He was marked for his offence against the Lord in that part of his body, where those are signed who obtain his mercy. Which seems plainly to refer to the sign of the cross made in baptism. The author of the Apostolical Constitutions is very express in this matter. For explaining the meaning of the several parts and ceremonies used in baptism, he says,²⁵ The water is to represent Christ's burial, the oil to represent the Holy Ghost, the sign of the cross to represent the cross, and the ointment or chrism, the confirmation of men's professions. And not improbably St. Jerom might refer to this, though his words be not so restrained to this time of unction, when he says, He was a Christian, born of Christian parents, and carried the banner of the cross²⁶ in his forehead. Some add also those words of Cyprian,²⁷ Let us guard our foreheads, that we may preserve the sign of God without danger. And those of Pontius²⁸ in his Life, where speaking of the Christian confessors who were branded by the heathen in the forehead, and sent as slaves into the mines, he says, They were marked in the forehead a second time; alluding to the sign of the cross, which, as Christians, they had received before. But these passages do not necessarily relate to baptism, but are only general expressions that may refer to the use of the sign of the cross upon any other occasion; it being usual in those times to sign themselves upon the forehead in the commonest actions of their lives, upon every motion, as Tertullian expresses it,²⁹ at their going out and coming in, at their going to bath, or to bed, or to meals, or whatever their employment or occasions called them to. Yet thus far it may be argued from them, that they who used it so commonly upon all other occasions, would hardly omit it in this solemn unction of baptism. And therefore these allegations may be allowed to be a sort of collateral evidence of the practice.

Lastly, It was always used in the unction of confirmation. And that ^{Sect. 6. Fourthly, in the unction of confirmation.} being then an appendage to baptism, what was done in it, was many times said to be done in baptism; and so both the unction and sign of the cross used in confirmation are ascribed to baptism, and upon that account sometimes mistaken for the former unction and consignation preceding baptism. There was no unction before baptism in the time of Tertullian; but there was one immediately after it, which, together with imposition of hands, had also the sign of the cross joined with it; and all these were properly ceremonies of confirmation, which came after baptism, and are not to be confounded with the former. Tertullian³⁰ says, The flesh is washed, that the soul may be cleansed; the flesh is anointed, that the soul may be consecrated; the flesh is signed, that the soul may be guarded; the flesh is overshadowed by imposition of hands, that the soul may be illuminated by the Spirit; the flesh is fed by the body and blood of Christ, that the soul may receive nourishment or fatness from God. Here he describes all things in order as they were done after baptism to the eucharist. There was an unction, and a signing with the sign of the cross, and imposition of hands, and then the eucharist. So that this sign of the cross plainly relates to the unction which came after baptism, and was a usual ceremony of imposition of hands ²¹ Dionys. de Hierar. Eccl. cap. 2. p. 253. Ὁ δὲ τοῖς χρίσεως διὰ τῶ σφραγίσαι τοῖς ἀπαρχόμενος, τὸ λοιπὸν τοῖς ἱερεῦσι τὸν ἄνδρα χρίσαι πανσώμως παραδὲς, &c.

²² Aug. Serm. 101. de Tempore, p. 290. Semper enim cruci baptisma jungitur.

²³ Cypr. ad Demetrian. p. 194. Evadere eos solos posse, qui renati et signo Christi signati fuerint, alio loco Deus loquitur.—Quod autem fit hoc signum et qua in parte corporis positum, manifestat alio in loco Deus, dicens, Transi per mediam Jerusalem, et notabis signum super frontes virorum, &c.

²⁴ Cypr. de Unit. Eccl. p. 116. In fronte maculatus est, ea parte corporis notatus, offenso Domino, ubi signantur qui Dominum promerentur.

²⁵ Constit. Apost. lib. 3. c. 17. Τὸ δὲ ὕδωρ ἀντι ταφῆς, καὶ τὸ ἔλαιον ἀντι Πνεύματος Ἁγίου, ἡ σφραγίς ἀντι τοῦ σταυροῦ, τὸ μύρον βεβαίωσις τῆς ὁμολογίας.

²⁶ Hieron. Ep. 113. Præfat. in Job, t. 3. Ego Christianus, et de parentibus Christianis natus, et vexillum crucis in mea fronte portans.

²⁷ Cypr. Ep. 50. al. 58. p. 125. Muniatur frons, ut signum Dei incolume servetur.

²⁸ Pontius. Vit. Cypr. p. 4. Confessores frontium notatarum secunda inscriptione signatos.

²⁹ Tertul. de Coron. Mil. cap. 3. Ad omnem progressum atque promotum, ad omnem aditum et exitum, ad vestitum, ad calceatum, ad lavacra, ad mensas, ad lumina, ad cubilia, ad sedilia, quæcunque nos conversatio exercet, frontem crucis signaculo tenemus. Vid. Cyril. Catech. 4. n. 10. Catech. 13. n. 19. Chrysost. Hom. 21. ad Popul. Antioch.

³⁰ Tertul. de Resur. cap. 8. Caro abluitur, ut anima emaculetur. Caro ungitur, ut anima consecretur. Caro signatur, ut et anima muniatur. Caro manus impositione adumbratur, ut et anima Spiritu illuminetur. Caro corpore et sanguine Christi vescitur, ut et anima de Deo saginetur.

or confirmation. And thus we are to understand that other passage in Tertullian,³¹ where he says, The devil apes the ceremonies of the divine sacraments in his idol mysteries. He baptizes those that believe in him; he promises them expiation of sins in his laver, as now it is in the mysteries of Mithra; he signs his soldiers in the forehead; he celebrates also the oblation of bread, &c. Where most probably signing in the forehead relates to the sign of the cross in confirmation, which comes between baptism and the eucharist. And so in Pope Leo,³² All that are regenerated in Christ, the sign of the cross makes them kings, and the unction of the Spirit consecrates them priests; meaning in the same sense as St. Peter says, All Christians are a royal priesthood. Which privileges are commonly by the ancients ascribed to the unction in confirmation, as here by Leo, who makes the sign of the cross an attendant of this unction after baptism. St. Austin's words are a little³³ more general; but yet learned men think³⁴ they refer to the sign of the cross in confirmation, when he says, Several sacraments or sacred rites are received in different ways; some, you know, are received in the mouth, meaning the eucharist; others in the whole body, meaning baptism, wherein the whole body is washed with water; others in the forehead, as the sign of the cross; where, because he distinguishes the sign of the cross, as a sacrament in the large sense of the word, both from baptism and the eucharist, it seems most reasonable to suppose that he intended the use of it in confirmation. Which, therefore, the Greeks often call σφραγίς, the sign or seal of the Holy Ghost;³⁵ and sometimes the sign of the cross is more distinctly called στανουρωδής σφραγίς, the sign made in the form of the cross, which was used not only in baptizing and confirming, but also in the ordination of priests, as I have had occasion elsewhere³⁶ to show out of Chrysostom and Dionysius,³⁷ and in the consecration of the waters of baptism, which is the next thing that comes now in order to be considered.

³¹ Tertul. de Præscript. cap. 40. Ipsas quoque res sacramentorum divinatorum in idolorum mysteriis æmulatur. Tinguunt et ipse quosdam, utique credentes et fideles suos. Expiationem de lavacro repromittit, et sic adhuc initiat Mithræ. Signat illic in frontibus milites suos, celebrat et panis oblationem.

³² Leo, Serm. 3. in Anniversario Die suæ Assumptionis, p. 3. Omnes in Christo regeneratos crucis signum efficit reges; Sancti vero Spiritus unctio consecrat sacerdotes.

³³ Aug. Enarrat. Psal. cxli. p. 671. Multa sacramenta aliter atque aliter accipimus. Quædam, sicut nôstis, ore accipimus, quædam per totum corpus accipimus. Quia vero in fronte erubescitur.—Crucem Christi quam pagani derident, in loco pudoris nostri constituit.

³⁴ Dallæ, de Confirm. lib. 2. cap. 21. p. 291.

³⁵ Conc. Gen. Constantinop. I. can. 7.

³⁶ Book IV. chap. 6. sect. 12.

³⁷ Chrys. Hom. 55. in Matt. p. 475. Dionys. de Hierarch. Eccl. cap. 5. p. 312 et 314.

CHAPTER X.

OF THE CONSECRATION OF THE WATER IN BAPTISM.

IMMEDIATELY after the unction the minister proceeded to consecrate the water, or the bishop, if he were present, consecrated it, while the priests were finishing the unction. For so the author under the name of Dionysius represents it. While the priests, says he,¹ are finishing the unction, the bishop comes to the mother of adoption, so he calls the font, and by invocation sanctifies the water in it, thrice pouring in some of the holy chrism in a manner representing the sign of the cross. This invocation or consecration of the water by prayer, is mentioned by Tertullian; for he says,² The waters are made the sacrament of sanctification by invocation of God. The Spirit immediately descends from heaven, and resting upon them sanctifies them by himself, and they, being so sanctified, imbibe the power of sanctifying. And Cyprian³ declares, That the water must first be cleansed and sanctified by the priest, that it may have power by baptism to wash away the sins of man. And so the whole council of Carthage,⁴ in the time of Cyprian, says, The water is sanctified by the prayer of the priest to wash away sin. Optatus has respect to this, when, speaking of the name of Piscis, Ἰχθῦς, the technical name that was given to Christ, from the several initial letters of his titles, which signifies a fish, he says, This is the Fish,⁵ meaning Christ, which is brought down upon the waters of the font in baptism by invocation and prayer. St. Austin often mentions this invocation in his books of baptism. That water⁶ is not profane and adulterated, over which the name of God is invoked, though the invocation be made by profane and adulterous men. In another place⁷ he says, This invocation was used both in consecrating the waters of baptism, and the oil for unction, and the eucharist, and in giving imposition

Sect. I.
The consecration of the water made by prayer.

¹ Dionys. de Hierarch. Eccl. cap. 2. p. 253. Αὐτὸς ἐπὶ τὴν μητέρα τῆς ὑιοθεσίας ἔρχεται, καὶ τὸ ταύτης ὕδωρ ταῖς ἱεραῖς ἐπικλήσει καθαγιασας, &c.

² Tertul. de Bapt. cap. 4. Sacramentum sanctificationis consequuntur, invocato Deo. Supervenit enim statim Spiritus de cælis, et aquis superest, sanctificans eas de semetipso, et ita sanctificatæ vim sanctificandi combibunt.

³ Cyprian. Ep. 70. ad Januar. p. 190. Oportet vero mundari et sanctificari aquam prius a sacerdote, ut possit baptismo sua peccata hominis, qui baptizatur, abluere.

⁴ Conc. Carthag. ap. Cyp. p. 233. Aqua sacerdotis prece sanctificata abluet delicta.

⁵ Optat. lib. 3. cont. Parmen. p. 62. Hic est Piscis, qui in baptismo per invocationem fontalibus undis inseritur.

⁶ Aug. de Bapt. lib. 3. cap. 10. Non est aqua profana et adultera, super quam nomèn invocatur, etiamsi a profanis et adulteris invocetur.

⁷ Id. de Bapt. lib. 5. cap. 20. Si ergo ad hoc valet, quod dictum est in evangelio, Deus peccatorem non audit, ut per of hands. And the sacraments were valid, though it were a sinner or a murderer that made the prayer. And again, answering the objection of the Cyprianists and Donatists, that a wicked man or a heretic could not sanctify the water, he says, Every error⁸ in the prayer of consecration does not destroy the essence of baptism, but only the want of those evangelical words (he means the form of baptizing in the name of the Trinity) instituted by Christ, without which baptism cannot be consecrated. For otherwise, if the water were not consecrated when the minister uses any erroneous words in his prayer, then not only wicked men, but many good brethren in the church, did not sanctify the water; for many of their prayers were daily corrected, when they were rehearsed to those that were more learned, and many errors were found in them contrary to the catholic faith. Yet they that were baptized when such prayers were said over the water, were not baptized again. This is a plain evidence, that prayers of consecration were then generally used both among the catholics and Donatists, though neither the use nor the orthodoxy of them were reckoned to be of absolute necessity to the very being and essence of baptism, which might consist with great errors in such prayers. It were easy to add many other testimonies of this ancient practice out of St. Ambrose,⁹ St. Basil,¹⁰ Theodoret,¹¹ Gregory Nyssen,¹² Theophilus of Alexandria,¹³ Victor Uticensis,¹⁴ and some others. But I think it needless to repeat them all at length, after such full evidence from St. Austin and those writers that came before him.

Only I shall add two or three observations more concerning this prayer of consecration, which may give a little light to some usages, and some doctrines also, of the ancient church. And first we find, that as they had forms for other parts of the Divine service, so they had a form for this consecration prayer, or benediction of the water, though that not so universal and invariable as the form of baptism. For St. Austin observes, that the one never varied, but the other was subject to some errors and corruptions, by reason of the liberty that was left to human compositures. One of these forms is now extant in

Sect. 2.
An ancient form
of this prayer in the Constitutions.

Only I shall add two or three observations more concerning this prayer of consecration, which may give a the Constitutions, which it will not be amiss here to insert. It goes under the title of a thanksgiving over the mystical water. The priest blesses¹⁵ and praises the Lord God Almighty, the Father of the only begotten God, giving him thanks, for that he sent his Son to be incarnate for us, that he might save us; that he took upon him in his incarnation to be obedient in all things, to preach the kingdom of heaven, the remission of sins, and the resurrection of the dead. After this he adores the only begotten God, and for him gives thanks to the Father, that he took upon him to die for all men upon the cross, leaving the baptism of regeneration as a type or symbol of it. He further praises God the Lord of all, that in the name of Christ and by the Holy Spirit, not rejecting mankind, he showed himself at diverse times in diverse providences towards them; giving Adam a habitation in a delicious paradise; then laying upon him a command in his providence, upon the transgression of which he expelled him in his justice, but in his goodness did not wholly cast him off, but disciplined his posterity in diverse manners, for whom in the end of the world he sent his Son, to be made man for the sake of men, and to take upon him all the affections of men, sin only excepted. After this thanksgiving, the priest is to call upon God, and say, Look down from heaven and sanctify this water; give it grace and power, that he that is baptized therein, according to the command of Christ, may be crucified with him, and die with him, and be buried with him, and rise again with him to that adoption which comes by him; that dying unto sin, he may live unto righteousness. Any one that will compare the form in our liturgy with this ancient form, will find a great resemblance between them, both in the thanksgiving, and the particular prayer of consecration.

Secondly, I observe, that together with this prayer, it was usual to make the sign of the cross also, not, as before, upon the person to be baptized, but as a circumstance of the consecration. This we learn not only from Dionysius,¹⁶ but from St. Austin, who says,¹⁷ The water of baptism was signed with the cross of Christ. And St. Chrysostom says, They

Sect. 3.
The sign of the cross used in this consecration.

peccatorem sacramenta non celebrentur: quomodo exaudit homicidam deprecantem, vel super aquam baptismi, vel super oleum, vel super eucharistiam, vel super capita eorum quibus manus imponitur? Quæ omnia tamen et fiunt et valent etiam per homicidas, &c.

⁸ Aug. de Bapt. lib. 6. cap. 25. Si non sanctificatur aqua, cum aliqua erroris verba per imperitiam prelator effundit, multi non solum mali, sed etiam boni, fratres in ipsa ecclesia non sanctificant aquam. Multorum enim preces emendantur quotidie, si doctioribus fuerint recitatæ, et multa in eis reperiuntur contra fidem catholicam. Nunquid si manifestarentur aliqui baptizati, cum illæ preces dictæ super aquam fuissent, jubebuntur denuo baptizari?—Certa illa evangelica verba, sine quibus non potest baptismus consecrari, tantum valent, ut per illa sic evacuentur quæcunque in prece vitiosa contra regulam fidei dicuntur, quemadmodum dæmonium Christi nomine excluditur.

⁹ Ambros. de Sacram. lib. 1. c. 5. lib. 5. c. 2. De Spir. Sancto, lib. 1. c. 7.

¹⁰ Basil. in Psal. xxviii. It. de Spir. Sancto, c. 27.

¹¹ Theodor. in I Cor. vi. 2. t. 3. p. 144.

¹² Nyssen. de Bapt. Christ. t. 3. p. 371. It. adv. eos qui Baptis. differunt, t. 2. p. 219.

¹³ Theophil. Ep. Paschal. 1. Bibl. Patr. t. 3. p. 87.

¹⁴ Victor. Utic. de Persec. Vandal. lib. 2. p. 602. Gelas. Cyzicæ. et Pseudo-Athanas. de Communi Essentia, &c.

¹⁵ Const. Apost. lib. 7. cap. 43.

¹⁶ Dionys. de Hier. Eccl. cap. 2. p. 254.

¹⁷ Aug. Hom. 27. ex 50. t. 10. p. 175. Quia baptismus, id est, aqua salutis, non est salutis, nisi Christi nomine con-used¹⁸ it in all their sacred mysteries; when they were regenerated in baptism, when they were fed with the mystical food in the eucharist, when they were ordained, that symbol of victory was always represented in the action, whatever religious matter they were concerned in. To which we may add the author under the name of St. Austin,¹⁹ who runs over all the solemn consecrations of the church, and tells us, the symbol of the cross was used in every one, in catechising of new converts, in consecrating the waters of baptism, in giving imposition of hands in confirmation, in the dedication of churches and altars, in consecrating the eucharist, and in promoting priests and Levites to holy orders.

Thirdly, I observe concerning the effects of this consecration, that the very same change was supposed to be wrought by it in the waters of baptism, as by the consecration of bread and wine in the eucharist. For they supposed not only the presence of the Spirit, but also the mystical presence of Christ's blood to be here after consecration. Julius Firmicus,²⁰ speaking of baptism, bids men here seek for the pure waters, the undefiled fountain, where the blood of Christ, after many spots and defilements, would whiten them by the Holy Ghost. Gregory Nazianzen²¹ and Basil²² say upon this account, That a greater than the temple, a greater than Solomon, a greater than Jonas is here, meaning Christ, by his mystical presence and the power of his blood. St. Austin²³ says, Baptism or the baptismal water is red, when once it is consecrated by the blood of Christ; and this was pre-figured by the waters of the Red sea. Prosper²⁴ is bold to say, That in baptism we are dipped in blood; and therefore martyrs are twice dipped in blood, first in the blood of Christ at baptism, and then in their own blood at martyrdom. St. Jerom²⁵ uses the same bold metaphor, explaining those words of Isaiah, "Wash ye, make ye clean:" Be ye baptized in my blood by the laver of regeneration. And again,²⁶ speaking of the Ethiopian eunuch, he says, He was baptized in the blood of Christ, about whom he was reading. After the same manner, Cæsarius says,²⁷ The soul goes into the living waters, consecrated and made red by the blood of Christ. And Isidore²⁸ says, What is the red sea, but baptism consecrated in the blood of Christ? Others tell us, that we are hereby made partakers of the body and blood of Christ, and eat his flesh, according to what is said in St. John's Gospel, "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you." Upon which words Fulgentius²⁹ founds the necessity of baptism: Forasmuch as it may be perceived by any considering man, that the flesh of Christ is eaten and his blood drunk in the laver of regeneration. Hence Cyril of Alexandria says,³⁰ We are partakers of the spiritual Lamb in baptism. And Chrysostom,³¹ That we thereby put on Christ, not only his Divinity, or only his humanity, that is, his flesh, but both together. And Nazianzen,³² That in baptism we are anointed and protected by the precious blood of Christ, as Israel was by the blood upon the door-posts in the night. St. Chrysostom³³ says again, That they that are baptized, put on a royal garment, a purple dipped in the blood of the Lord. Philo-Carpathius says, The spouse of Christ, his church, receives in baptism the seal³⁴ of Christ, being washed in the fountain of his most holy blood. Optatus,³⁵ as we have heard before, says, Christ comes down by the invocation, and joins himself to the waters of baptism.

secrata, qui pro nobis sanguinem fudit, cruce ipsius aqua signatur.

¹⁸ Chrys. Hom. 54. al. 55. in Matt. p. 475. ed. Commelin. Πάντα δὲ αὐτῆ τελεῖται τὰ καθ' ἡμῶν κἄν ἀναγεννηθῆναι δέη, ταυρὸς παραγίνεται κἄν τραφῆναι τὴν μουσικὴν ἐκείνην τροφήν κἄν χειροτονηθῆναι, &c.

¹⁹ Aug. Hom. 75. de Diversis in Append. t. 10. p. 702. Hujus crucis mysterio rudes catechizantur, eodem mysterio fons regenerationis consecratur, ejusdem crucis signo per manus impositionem baptizati dona gratiarum accipiunt. Cum ejusdem crucis caractere basilicæ dedicantur, altaria consecrantur, altaris sacramenta cum interpositione dominicorum verborum conficiuntur: sacerdotes et Levitæ per hoc idem ad sacros ordines promoventur.

²⁰ Firmic. de Error. Profan. Relic. c. 28. Quære fontes ingenuos, quære puros liquores, ut illic te post multas maculas cum Spiritu Sancto Christi sanguis incandidet.

²¹ Naz. Orat. 40. de Bapt. p. 657.

²² Basil. de Bapt. lib. I. c. 2. t. 1. p. 558.

²³ Aug. Tract. II. in Joh. p. 41. Significabat Mare Rubrum baptismum Christi. Unde rubet baptismus Christi, nisi Christi sanguine consecratus?

²⁴ Prosper. de Promissis, lib. 2. cap. 2. In cocco his tincto martyria sancta rutilant, semel baptismo Christi sanguine tinguntur, atque suo effusionis cruore denno retincti.

²⁵ Hieron. in Esai. i. 16. Baptizemini in sanguine meo pro lavacrum regenerationis.

²⁶ Id. in Esai. liii. 7. Statim baptizatus in Agni sanguine quem legebat, vir meruit appellari, et apostolus genti Æthiopiæ missus est.

²⁷ Cæsar. Arelatens. Hom. 6. de Paschat. Bibl. Patr. t. 2. p. 276. Ingreditur anima vitales undas velut rubras sanguine Christi consecratas.

²⁸ Isidor. Hispal. in Exod. xix. Quid est mare rubrum, nisi baptismum Christi sanguine consecratum?

²⁹ Fulgent. de Bapt. Æthiop. cap. 11. p. 611. Quisquis secundum mysterii veritatem considerare poterit, in ipso lavacro sanctæ regenerationis hoc fieri providebit.—Quod etiam sanctos patres indubitanter credidisse ac docuisse cognoscimus.

³⁰ Cyril. in Exod. xii. lib. 2. t. 1. p. 270. Μέτῳχος τοῦ νοετοῦ προβάτου, &c.

³¹ Chrys. Sermon. 27. de Cruce, t. 6. p. 293.

³² Naz. Orat. 40. de Bapt. p. 646.

³³ Chrys. Hom. 60. ad Illuminandos, t. 1. p. 796.

³⁴ Philo. in Cantic. iv. 12. Fons signatus sponsa dicitur, quia in baptisate signaculum Jesu Christi accepit, ex ejus sacratissimi sanguinis fonte perlota.

³⁵ Optat. lib. 3. p. 62. Hic est Piscis, qui in baptisate per invocationem fontalibus undis inseritur.

Nay, Chrysostom,³⁶ in one of his bold rhetorical flights, scruples not to tell a man that is baptized, that he immediately embraces his Lord in his arms, that he is united to his body, nay, compounded or consubstantiated with that body which sits above, whither the devil has no access. Some tell us, as Isidore, that the water of baptism is the water³⁷ that flowed out of Christ's side at his passion: and others, as Laurentius Novariensis,³⁸ that it is water mixed with the sacred blood of the Son of God. Others tell us,³⁹ that the water is transmuted or changed in its nature by the Holy Ghost, to a sort of Divine and ineffable power. So Cyril of Alexandria, who frequently uses the word μεταστοιχείωσις, transelementation, both when he speaks of the water in baptism, and the bread and wine in the eucharist, or of any other changes that are wrought in the mysteries of the Christian religion. Cyril of Jerusalem and Gregory Nyssen have the same observation upon the change that is wrought in the oil, after consecration, which they make to be the same with that of the bread and wine in the eucharist. Beware, says Cyril,⁴⁰ that you take not this ointment to be bare ointment. For as the bread in the eucharist, after the invocation of the Holy Spirit, is not mere bread, but the body of Christ; so this holy ointment, after invocation, is not bare or common ointment, but it is a gift of God, that makes Christ and the Holy Spirit to be present in the action. In like manner, Gregory Nyssen makes the same change to be in the mystical oil, and in the altar itself, and in the ministers by ordination, and in the waters of baptism, as in the bread and wine in the eucharist after consecration. Do not contemn, says he, the Divine laver, nor despise it as a common thing, because of the use⁴¹ of water. For great and wonderful things are wrought by it. This altar, before which we stand, is but common stone in its own nature, differing nothing from other stones, wherewith our walls are built; but after it is consecrated to the service of God, and has received a benediction, it is a holy table, an immaculate altar, not to be touched by any but the priests, and that with the greatest reverence. The bread also is at first but common bread, but when once it is sanctified by the holy mystery, it is made and called the body of Christ. So the mystical oil, and so the wine, though they be things of little value before the benediction, yet, after their sanctification by the Spirit, they both of them work wonders. The same power of the word makes a priest become honourable and venerable, when he is separated from the community of the vulgar by a new benediction. For he who before was only one of the common people, is now immediately made a ruler and president, a teacher of piety, and a minister of the secret mysteries: and all these things he does without any change in his body or shape; for to all outward appearance he is the same that he was, but the change is in his invisible soul, by an invisible power and grace. Pope Leo⁴² goes one step further, and tells us, that baptism makes a change not only in the water, but in the man that receives it; for thereby Christ receives him, and he receives Christ, and he is not the same after baptism that he was before, but the body of him that is regenerated is made the flesh of him that was crucified. From all which it is easy to observe, that in all these cases, the change which they speak of is not made in the substance of the things, but in the qualities only; the water is not the blood of Christ substantially and really, but only symbolically and mystically; nor is a man changed into the flesh of Christ thereby any other way, than as he is made a living member of his mystical body, participating of that Spirit whereby he rules and governs his church, as the Head of it. So that when the ancients speak of a Divine change or transelementation (for as yet the word transubstantiation was not known) in the bread and wine in the eucharist, they are to be interpreted, as here we do in baptism, of a change in qualities and powers, and not in substance; since all the words they used to express that change, are equally verified in the waters of baptism after consecration.

I must further observe, to avoid all mistakes, that when the ancients speak of an absolute necessity of invocation of God to consecrate the waters of baptism, they then do not mean any new forms of prayer instituted by the church, but the very form of baptism instituted by Christ, which they rightly suppose to be an invocation of the holy Trinity; in which sense, no baptism can be duly performed without an invocation to consecrate the water, though it may be performed, in times of exigence, without the additional⁴³ prayers of the church.

Sect. 5.
How far these prayers of consecration reckoned necessary in the church.

³⁶ Chrys. Hom. 6. in Colos. p. 1359. Αὐτὸν εὐθέως περιλαμβάνεις τὸν δεσπότην, ἀνακεράννυσαι τῷ σώματι, ἀναφήρη, (leg. ἀναφύρη) τῷ σώματι τῷ ἄνω κειμένῳ, &c.

³⁷ Isidor. de Offic. Eccl. lib. 2. cap. 24. Aqua est, quae tempore passionis Christi de latere profluxit.

³⁸ Laurent. Novar. Hom. 1. de Pœnitentia. Bibl. Patr. t. 2. p. 127. Asperges me aqua Filii tui sacro sanguine mixta.—Abluitor Adam corpore Christi, &c.

³⁹ Cyril. in Joh. iii. 5. p. 147. Διὰ τῆς τοῦ Πνεύματος ἐμεργείας τὸ αἰσθητὸν ὕδωρ πρὸς ζεῖαν τῷ καὶ ἄρρητον ἀναστοιχειοῦται δόναμιν. Vid. Albertinum de Eucharis- tia, lib. 2. p. 488, where he has collected all the passages that speak of this transelementation.

⁴⁰ Cyril. Catech. Myst. 3. n. 3. Ὅρα μὴ ὑπονοήσης ἐκεῖνον τὸ μύρον ψιλὸν εἶναι ὡσπερ καὶ ὁ ἄρτος τῆς εὐχαριστίας, μετὰ τὴν ἐπίκλησιν τοῦ Ἁγίου Πνεύματος, ἔκετι ἄρτος λιτός, ἀλλὰ σῶμα Χριστοῦ ἕτω τὸ ἅγιον πέτο μύρον ἐκ ἐπιψιλῶν, &c.

⁴¹ Nyssen. de Baptismo Christi, t. 3. p. 369.

⁴² Leo, Sermon. 14. de Passione, p. 62. Suscipietis a Christo, Christumque suscipietis, non idem est post lavacrum, qui ante baptismum fuit, sed corpus regenerati fit caro crucifixi.

⁴³ Vid. Albertin. de Eucharist. lib. 1. cap. 5. p. 18.

CHAPTER XI.

OF THE DIFFERENT WAYS OF BAPTIZING, BY IMMERSION, TRINE IMMERSION, AND ASPERSION IN THE CASE OF CLINIC BAPTISM.

HAVING thus far considered all things preceding the very act of baptizing, we are now to inquire into the manner how that was usually performed, whether by dipping and total immersion, or by aspersion and sprinkling, which is now the more general practice of the church. There is no question made but that either of these ways does fully answer the primary end of baptism, which is to purify the soul, and not the body, by washing away sin. But yet the ancients thought, that immersion, or burying under water, did more lively represent the death and burial and resurrection of Christ, as well as our own death unto sin, and rising again to righteousness; and the divesting or unclothing the person to be baptized, did also represent the putting off the body of sin, in order to put on the new man, which is created in righteousness and true holiness. For which reason they observed the way of baptizing all persons naked and divested, by a total immersion under water, except in some particular cases of great exigence, wherein they allowed of sprinkling, as in the case of clinic baptism, or where there was a scarcity of water. That persons were divested in order to be baptized is evident, partly from what has been said before of the unction, which was administered not only on the head, but on other parts of the body; partly from express testimonies which affirm it; and also from the manner of baptizing by immersion, which necessarily presupposes it. St. Chrysostom, speaking of baptism, says, Men were as naked as Adam in paradise, but with this difference; Adam was naked¹ because he had sinned, but in baptism, a man was naked that he might be freed from sin; the one was divested of his glory which he once had, but the other put off the old man, which he did as easily as his clothes. St. Ambrose² says, Men came as naked to the font, as they came into the world; and thence he draws an argument by way of allusion, to rich men, telling them, how absurd it was, that a man who was born naked of his mother, and received naked by the church, should think of going rich into heaven. Cyril of Jerusalem takes notice of this circumstance,³ together with the reasons of it, when he thus addresses himself to persons newly baptized: As soon as ye came into the inner part of the baptistery, ye put off your clothes, which is an emblem of putting off the old man with his deeds; and being thus divested, ye stood naked, imitating Christ, that was naked upon the cross, who by his nakedness spoiled principalities and powers, publicly triumphing over them in the cross. O wonderful thing! ye were naked in the sight of men, and were not ashamed, in this truly imitating the first man Adam, who was naked in paradise, and was not ashamed. So also Amphilochius in the Life of St. Basil,⁴ speaking of his baptism, says, He arose with fear and put off his clothes, and with them the old man. And Zeno Veronensis,⁵ reminding persons of their baptism, bids them rejoice, for they went down naked into the font, but rose again clothed in a white and heavenly garment, which if they did not defile, they might obtain the kingdom of heaven. Athanasius, in his invectives against the Arians, among other things, lays this to their charge, that by their persuasions the Jews and Gentiles broke into the baptistery, and there offered such abuses to the catechumens as they stood with their naked bodies,⁶ as was shameful and abominable to relate. And a like complaint is brought against Peter, bishop of Apamea, in the council of Constantinople, under Mennas,⁷ that he cast out the neophytes, or persons newly baptized, out of the baptistery, when they were without their clothes and shoes. All which are manifest proofs that persons were baptized naked, either in imitation of Adam in paradise, or our Saviour upon the cross, or to signify their putting off the body of sin, and the old man with his deeds.

And this practice was then so general, that we find no exception made, either with respect to the tenderness of infants, or the bashfulness of the female sex, save only where the case of sickness or disability made it necessary to vary from the usual custom. St. Chrysostom is an undeniable evidence in this matter. For writing about the barbarous proceedings of his enemies against him on the great sabbath, or Saturday before Easter, among other tragical things which they committed, he reports this for one, That they came armed into the church, and by violence expelled the clergy, killing many

¹ Chrys. Hom. 6. in Coloss. p. 2358. Ἐνταῦθα γυμνότης, καὶ κεῖ γυμνότης· ἀλλ' ἐκεῖ μὲν ἀμαρτήσας ἐγυμνώθη, ἐπειδὴ ἤμαρτεν· ἐνταῦθα δὲ, ἵνα ἀπαλλαγῇ γυμνοῦται, &c.

² Ambros. Sermon. 20. Nudi in sæculo nascimur, nudi etiam accedimus ad lavacrum.—Quam autem incongruum ac absurdum est, ut quem nudum mater genuit, nudum suscipit ecclesia, dives introire velit in cælum? ·

³ Cyril. Catech. Myst. 2. n. 2.

⁴ Amphiloc. Vit. Basil. cap. 5.

⁵ Zeno, Invitat. 2. ad Bapt. Bibl. Patr. t. 2. p. 442. Gaudete, in fontem quidem nudi demergitis, sed æthereæ veste vestiti, mox candidati inde surgitis, quam qui non polluerit, regna cœlestia possidebit.

⁶ Athan. Ep. ad Orthodoxos, t. 1. p. 946.

⁷ Conc. Constant. Act. 1. p. 53. ed. Crab. Cum essemus in baptisterio neophytarum, sine tunicis et calceamentis existentium, venit episcopus noster Petrus, et eiecit nos foras una cum neophytis, &c.

Sect. 1.
All persons anciently divested in order to be baptized.

Sect. 2.
No exception in this case either with respect to women or children.

in the baptistery, with which the women,⁸ who at that time were divested in order to be baptized, were put into such a terror that they fled away naked, and could not stay in the fright to put on such clothes as the modesty of their sex required. And that so it was in the case of children also, is evident from the custom of immersion, which continued in the church for many ages; as also from what is particularly said of infants in the Ordo Romanus,⁹ and Gregory's Sacramentarium, That after the priest has baptized them with three immersions, they are to be clothed, and brought to the bishop to be confirmed. For this clothing supposes that they were unclothed before in order to be baptized.

But yet, that no indecency might appear in so sacred an action, two things were especially provided for by ancient rules. 1. That men and women were baptized apart. To which purpose the baptisteries were commonly divided into two apartments, the one for the men, the other for the women, as I have had occasion to show from St. Austin¹⁰ in another place.¹¹ Or else the men were baptized at one time and the women at another, as Vossius¹² observes out of the Ordo Romanus, Gregory's Sacramentarium, Albinus Flaccus, and other writers. 2. There was anciently an order of deaconesses in the church, and one main part of their business was to assist at the baptism of women, where, for decency's sake, they were employed to divest them, and so to order the matter, that the whole ceremony, both of unction and baptizing, might be performed in such a manner as became the reverence that was due to so sacred an action; of all which I have given sufficient proofs in a former Book,¹³ which I need not here repeat.

Persons thus divested, or unclothed, were usually baptized by immersion, or dipping of their whole bodies under water, to represent the death and burial and resurrection of Christ together; and therewith to signify their own dying unto sin, the destruction of its power, and their resurrection to a new life. There are a great many passages in the Epistles of St. Paul, which plainly refer to this custom: Rom. vi. 4, "We are buried with him by baptism; that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life." So again, Col. ii. 12, "Buried with him in baptism, wherein ye are also risen with him, through the faith of the operation of God, who raised him from the dead." And as this was the original apostolical practice, so it continued to be the universal practice of the church for many ages, upon the same symbolical reasons as it was first used by the apostles. The author of the *Apostolical Constitutions*¹⁴ says, Baptism was given to represent the death of Christ, and the water his burial. St. Chrysostom proves the resurrection from this practice: For, says he, our being baptized and immersed in the water,¹⁵ and our rising again out of it, is a symbol of our descending into hell or the grave, and of our returning from thence. Wherefore St. Paul calls baptism our burial. For, says he, "we are buried with Christ by baptism into death." And in another place,¹⁶ When we dip our heads in water as in a grave, our old man is buried; and when we rise up again, the new man rises therewith. Cyril of Jerusalem makes it an emblem of the Holy Ghost's effusion upon the apostles: For as he that goes down into the water¹⁷ and is baptized, and surrounded on all sides by the water; so the apostles were baptized all over by the Spirit: the water surrounds the body externally, but the Spirit incomprehensibly baptizes the interior soul. The fourth council of Toledo keeps to the former reason,¹⁸ The immersion in water is as it were the descending into the grave, and the rising out of the water a resurrection. And so St. Ambrose¹⁹ explains it: Thou wast asked, Dost thou believe in God the Father Almighty? And thou didst answer, I believe: and then thou wast immersed in water, that is, buried. It appears also from Epiphanius and others, that almost all heretics, who retained any baptism, retained immersion also. Epiphanius²⁰ says, The Ebionites received baptism as it was practised in

⁸ Chrys. Ep. 1. ad. Innocent. p. 680. Γυναῖκες πρὸς τὸ βάπτισμα ἀποδύσασθαι κατ' αὐτὸν τὸν καιρὸν, γυμναί ἔφυγον ὑπὸ τοῦ φόβου τῆς χαλεπῆς ταύτης ἐφόδου· οὐδὲ τὴν πρέπουσαν γυναῖξιν εὐσηχησομένην συγχωροῦμεν περιέσθαι. Vid. Moschum Prat. Spir. c. 104.

⁹ Gregor. Sacram. de Bapt. Infant. Baptizat cum sacerdos sub trina mersione, &c. Et vestitur infans. It. Ordo Roman. Cap. de Die Sabbati S. Paschæ. Cum vestiti fuerint infantes, pontifex confirmet eos. Vid. Athanas. de Parabolis Evangel. qu. 92. Τὸ γὰρ καταδύσθαι τὸ παιδίον, &c.

¹⁰ Aug. de Civ. Dei, lib. 22. c. 8.

¹¹ Book VIII. chap. 7. sect. 1.

¹² Voss. de Bapt. Disp. 1. p. 36.

¹³ Book II. chap. 22. sect. 8.

¹⁴ Const. Apost. lib. 3. c. 17. Ἔστι τὸ ἵνα τὸ μὲν βάπτισμα εἰς τὸν θάνατον τοῦ Ἰησοῦ διδόμενον, τὸ δὲ ἵδωρ ἀντὶ ταφῆς.

¹⁵ Chrys. Hom. 40. in 1 Cor. p. 689. Τὸ γὰρ βαπτίζεσθαι καὶ καταδύεσθαι, εἶτα ἀναεῖναι, τῆς εἰς ἄδου καταβάσεως ἐστὶ σύμβολον, καὶ τῆς ἐκείθεν ἀνόδου, &c.

¹⁶ Chrys. in Joh. iii. 5. Hom. 25. p. 656.

¹⁷ Cyril. Catech. 17. n. 8. p. 247.

¹⁸ Conc. Tolet. 4. can. 6. In aquis mersio quasi ad infernum descensio est: et rursus ab aquis emersio resurrectionis est.

¹⁹ Ambros. de Sacram. lib. 2. cap. 7. Interrogatus es, Credis in Deum, Patrem Omnipotentem? dixisti, Credo, et mersisti, hoc est, sepultus es. Addalso Tertul. de Bapt. c. 2. Homo in aquam demissus, et inter pauca verba tinctus, non multo vel nihilo mundior resurgit. Paulin. Ep. 12. ad Severum. Mira Dei pietas; peccator mergitur undis, &c. Nyssen. de Bapt. Christi, t. 3. p. 372. Athanas. de Parabolis, qu. 94. t. 2. p. 422.

²⁰ Epiphani. Hær. 30. Ebion. n. 2 et 16.

the church, but they added to it a quotidian baptism, immersing themselves in water every day. So the Marcionites were guilty of many errors in other respects about baptism: they would baptize no persons but either virgins²¹ or widows, or unmarried men; they repeated their baptism three times;²² and introduced some other errors about it: but still the baptisms which they administered, were in this respect conformable to those of the church, that they baptized by a total immersion, as Tertullian²³ witnesses of them. Other heretics, as the Valentinians, to their baptism by water, added another baptism by fire,²⁴ which is mentioned by Tertullian. But yet we find no charge brought against them for their first baptism, as if it were administered in any other way than by a total immersion. The only heretics against whom this charge is brought, were the Eunomians, a branch of the Arians, of whom it was reported by Theodoret,²⁵ that they baptized only the upper parts of the body as far as the breast. And this they did in a very preposterous way, as Epiphanius²⁶ relates, τοὺς πόδας ἄνω, καὶ τὴν κεφαλὴν κάτω, with their heels upward, and their head downward. Which sort of men are called histopedes, or pederecti. Whence the learned Gothofred²⁷ conjectures, that in one of the laws of Theodosius, where it is now read, Eunomiani spadones; it should be Eunomiani histopedes, which signifies men hanged up by the heels, as he proves from Pausanias, Pollux, Hesychius, Harpocration, and others. So that these were the only men among all the heretics of the ancient church, that rejected this way of baptizing by a total immersion in ordinary cases.

Indeed the church was so punctual to this rule, that we never read of any exception made to it in ordinary cases, no, not in the baptism of infants. For it appears from the Ordo Romanus, and Gregory's Sacramentarium, that infants, as well as others, were baptized by immersion, and the rules of the church, except in cases of danger, do still require it. But in two cases a mitigation of this rule was allowed. 1. In case of sickness and extreme danger of life. Here that excellent rule, "I will have mercy and not sacrifice," was always allowed to take place.

Therefore that which the ancients called clinic baptism, that is, baptism by aspersion or sprinkling upon a sick bed, was never disputed against as an unlawful or imperfect baptism, though some laws were made to debar men who were so baptized, from ascending to the dignities of the church. For if men by neglect deferred their baptism to a sick bed, the church, in her prudence and discipline, (because this delay was a fault she always declaimed against,) thought fit to deny such men the privilege of ordination, as I have had occasion to show in a more proper place.²⁸ But yet she did not at any time attempt to annul such baptisms, or judge them imperfect as to what concerned the essence or substance of the action. This very question was moved by some, together with that of heretical baptism, in the time of Cyprian: but Cyprian, who determined against the validity of heretical baptism, makes no scruple in this case, but offers arguments to prove such clinic baptism by aspersion, to have all the necessary conditions of a true baptism. For though this was the case of Novatian, who had not been washed, but only sprinkled upon a sick bed; yet Cyprian²⁹ had no objection against his Christianity upon that account: but declares, that as far as he was able to judge, all such baptisms were perfect, where there was no defect in the faith of the giver or the receiver: for the contagion of sin was not washed away, as the filth of the body is, by a carnal and secular washing. There was no need of a lake or other such like helps to wash and cleanse it. The heart of a believer was otherwise washed, the mind of a man was cleansed by the merit of faith. In the sacraments of salvation, when necessity requires, God grants his indulgence by a short way of performing them. This lawfulness of aspersion in such cases he proves from those words of God in Ezekiel xxxvi. 25, "I will sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean: from all your filthiness, and from all your idols, will I cleanse you." And from several other texts, Numb. xix. 19; viii. 7; and xix. 9, where the water of sprinkling is called the water of purification. Whence he concludes, that the sprinkling of water was as effectual as washing; and what the church did in ²¹ Tertul. cont. Marc. lib. 1. c. 29. Non tinguitur apud illum caro, nisi virgo, nisi vidua, nisi cœlebs, &c.

²² Epiph. Hær. 42. n. 3. Οὐ μόνον παρ' αὐτῶ ἐν λουτρῶν δίδοται, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἔως τριῶν λουτρῶν, &c.

²³ Tertul. cont. Marc. lib. 1. cap. 28. Carnem mergit exsortem salutis.

²⁴ Tertul. Carmen cont. Marc. lib. 1. cap. 7. Namque Valentino Deus est insanus.—Bis docuit tingui, transducto corpore flamma. Vid. Hieron. in Ephes. iv.

²⁵ Theod. Hær. Fab. lib. 4. cap. 3.

²⁶ Epiph. Hær. 76. Anomœorum, p. 992.

²⁷ Gothofred. in Cod. Theod. lib. 16. Tit. 5. de Hæreticis, Leg. 17.

²⁸ Book IV. chap. 3. sect. 11.

²⁹ Cyr. Ep. 76. al. 69. ad Magnum, p. 185. Quæsi etiam, fili charissime, quid mihi de illis videatur, qui in infirmitate et languore gratiam Dei consequuntur, an habendi sint legitimi Christiani, eo quod aqua salutari non loti sint, sed perfusi.—Nos quantum concipit mediocritas nostra, æstimamus in nullo mutilari et debilitari posse beneficia divina, nec minus aliquid illic posse contingere, ubi plena et tota fide et dantis et sumentis accipitur, quod de divinis muneribus hauritur. Neque enim sic in sacramento salutari delictorum contagia, ut in lavacro carnali et seculari sordes cutis et corporis, abluuntur, &c. Aliter pectus credentis abluunt, aliter mens hominis per fidei merita mundatur. In sacramentis salutaribus, necessitate cogente, et Deo indulgentiam suam largiente, totum credentibus conferunt divina compendia.

this case in compliance with necessity and men's infirmities, was neither displeasing to God, nor detrimental to the party baptized, who received a full and complete sacrament by the power of God, and the truth of his own faith together. And therefore he blames those who nicknamed these men clinics, instead of Christians. It further appears from the canons which speak of these,³⁰ that they were only denied orders, not the name of Christians. The council of Neocæsarea allows them in time of great exigence, or in case of great merit, to be ordained, as Novatian was for his pregnant parts, and the hopes which the church had conceived of him, as Eusebius³¹ out of the epistle of Cornelius informs us. The council of Laodicea³² appoints such, if they recover, to learn the creed, but says not a word of rebaptizing them. And it appears from the council of Auxerre,³³ that these clinics were allowed to be baptized at any time when necessity required, without a solemn festival. So that many things were indulged to them, which were not allowed by the ordinary rules of the church. 2. Another case in which sprinkling was accepted instead of immersion, was in times of difficulty, when a sufficient quantity of water could not be procured; as when a martyr was to be baptized in prison, or was to baptize any other under such a confinement. Thus we read in the ancient Acts of St. Laurence, referred to by Walafridus Strabo,³⁴ how one Romanus, a soldier, was baptized by him in a pitcher of water. And again, how one Lucillus was baptized by the same martyr³⁵ only by pouring water upon his head. But as both these were extraordinary cases, they only show us, how far the church could dispense with this rule upon reasons of necessity or charity, not what was her standing and ordinary practice. Some learned persons³⁶ think Tertullian alludes to the allowance of sprinkling in extraordinary cases, when, speaking of men's pretending to be baptized without true repentance, he says, No man would grant such false penitents³⁷ so much as one aspersion of water. And Gregory Nyssen perhaps refers to it also in that famous story, which he tells of one Archias, who having neglected his opportunity of receiving baptism, was at last suddenly surprised with death at a season when there was no possibility of obtaining it: and then he cried out in that languishing condition, O ye mountains³⁸ and woods, baptize me; O ye trees, and rocks, and fountains, give me this grace: and with these words, being wounded to death, he expired in the hands of his enemies. This man's condition he compares to those, who have the sudden summons of death upon a sick bed: they then begin to call for a vessel of water, a priest, and words to prepare them for baptism; but the violence of their disease prevents them from obtaining it. This seems to imply, that such a sprinkling as men might have upon a sick bed, in cases of extremity, was reputed a saving baptism; and it was an unhappiness in some, that they could not obtain even that at their last hour, which the church allowed as the last refuge only in such extraordinary cases.

But I must observe further, that they not only administered baptism by immersion under water, but also repeated this three times. Tertullian speaks of it as a ceremony³⁹ generally used in his time: We dip not once, but three times, at the naming every person of the Trinity. The same is asserted by St. Basil,⁴⁰ and St. Jerom,⁴¹ and the author under the name of Dionysius,⁴² who says likewise, that it was done at the distinct mention of each person of the blessed Trinity. St. Ambrose is most particular in the description of this rite: Thou wast asked,⁴³ says he, Dost thou believe in God the Father Almighty? And thou repliedst, I believe, and wast dipped, that is, buried. A second demand was made, Dost thou believe in Jesus Christ our Lord, and in his cross? Thou answeredst again, I believe, and wast dipped. Therefore thou wast buried with Christ. For he that is buried with Christ, rises again with Christ. A third time the question was repeated, Dost thou believe in the Holy Ghost? And thy answer was, I believe. Then thou wast dipped a third time, that thy triple confession might absolve thee from the various offences of thy former life. Two reasons are commonly assigned for this

Sect. 6.
Trine immersion,
the general practice for several ages. The reasons of this.

³⁰ Conc. Neocæsar. can. 12.

³¹ Euseb. lib. 6. c. 43. ³² Conc. Laod. can. 47.

³³ Conc. Antissiodor. can. 18. Non licet absque Paschæ solemnitate ullo tempore baptizare, nisi illos quibus mors vicina est, quos grabatarios dicunt.

³⁴ Acta Laurentii, ap. Surium, t. 4. Unus ex militibus, Romanus nomine, urceum afferens cum aqua, opportunitatem captavit, qua eam offerret B. Laurentio, ut baptizaretur. Vid. Strabo, de Rebus Eccles. cap. 26.

³⁵ Acta, ibid. Cum exspoliasset eum, fudit aquam super caput ejus.

³⁶ Vid. Bevereg. Not. in Can. Apost. 30.

³⁷ Tertul. de Pœnitent. cap. 6. Quis enim tibi tam infidæ pœnitentiæ viro asperginem unam cujuslibet aque commodabit?

³⁸ Nyssen. de Bapt. t. 2. p. 220.

³⁹ Tertul. cont. Prax. cap. 26. Non semel, sed ter, ad singula nomina in personas singulas tinguimur. Id. de Coron. Mil. cap. 3. Dehinc ter mergitiamur, &c.

⁴⁰ Basil. de Spir. Sancto, c. 27.

⁴¹ Hieron. adv. Lucif. c. 4.

⁴² Dionys. de Hierarch. Eccles. cap. 2.

⁴³ Ambros. de Sacram. lib. 2. cap. 7. Interrogatus es, Credis in Deum, Patrem Omnipotentem? Dixisti, Credo, et mersisti, hoc est, sepultus es. Iterum interrogatus es, Credis in Dominum nostrum Jesum Christum? Dixisti, Credo, et mersisti. Ideo et Christo es conceptus. Qui enim Christo conceptus, cum Christo resurgit. Tertio interrogatus es, Credis et in Spiritum Sanctum? Dixisti, Credo. Tertio mersisti, ut multiplicem lapsum superioris ætatis absolveret trina confessio.

practice. 1. That it might represent Christ's three days' burial, and his resurrection on the third day. We cover ourselves in the water, says Gregory Nyssen,⁴⁴ as Christ did in the earth, and this we do three times, to represent the grace of his resurrection performed after three days. In like manner Cyril of Jerusalem⁴⁵ and the author of The Questions upon the Scripture,⁴⁶ under the name of Athanasius. Thus likewise Pope Leo among the Latins:⁴⁷ The trine immersion is an imitation of the three days' burial, and the rising again out of the water is an image of Christ rising from the grave. 2. Another reason was, that it might represent their profession of faith in the holy Trinity, in whose name they were baptized. St. Austin⁴⁸ joins both reasons together, telling us there was a twofold mystery signified in this way of baptizing. The trine immersion was both a symbol of the holy Trinity, in whose name we are baptized, and also a type of the Lord's burial, and of his resurrection on the third day from the dead. For we are buried with Christ by baptism, and rise again with him by faith. St. Jerom⁴⁹ makes this ceremony to be a symbol of the Unity as well as the Trinity. For, says he, we are thrice dipped in water, that the mystery of the Trinity may appear to be but one: we are not baptized in the names of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, but in one name, which is God. And therefore he adds, that though we be thrice put under water to represent the mystery of the Trinity, yet it is reputed but one baptism.

The original of this custom is not exactly agreed upon by the ancients.

Some derive it from apostolical tradition; others, from the first institution of baptism by our Saviour; whilst others esteem it only an indifferent circumstance or ceremony, that may be used or omitted, without any detriment to the sacrament itself, or breach of any Divine appointment. Tertullian,⁵⁰ St. Basil,⁵¹ and St. Jerom,⁵² put it among those rites of the church, which they reckon to be handed down from apostolical tradition. St. Chrysostom seems rather to make it part of the first institution. For he says, Christ delivered to his disciples⁵³ one baptism in three immersions of the body, when he said to them, "Go, teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." And Theodoret⁵⁴ was of the same opinion: for he charges Eunomius as making an innovation upon the original institution of baptism, delivered by Christ and his apostles, in that he made a contrary law, that men should not be baptized with three immersions, nor with invocation of the Trinity, but only with one immersion into the death of Christ. Pope Pelagius brought the same charge against some others in his time,⁵⁵ who baptized in the name of Christ, only with one immersion, which he condemns as contrary to the gospel command given by Christ, who appointed every one to be baptized in the name of the Trinity, and that with three immersions, saying to his disciples, "Go, baptize all nations, in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost." And this was so far esteemed a Divine obligation by the authors of the Apostolical Canons,⁵⁶ that they order every bishop or presbyter to be deposed, who should administer baptism not by three immersions, but only one in the name of Christ; because Christ said not, Baptize into my death, but, "Go, baptize all nations in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost." It is plain, all these writers thought this a necessary circumstance from our Saviour's institution. And the Eunomians, who first rejected this, are condemned by Theodoret and Sozomen, as making a new law of baptizing, not only against the general practice, but against the general rule and tradition of the church.

Yet there happened a circumstance in the Spanish churches in after ages, which gave a little turn to this affair.

For the Arians in Spain, not being of the sect of

Sect. 7.
The original of this practice.

Sect. 8.
When first the church allowed of any alteration in it.

⁴⁴ Nyssen, de Bapt. Christi, t. 3. p. 372.

⁴⁵ Cyril. Catech. Myst. 2. n. 4.

⁴⁶ Athan. de Parabolis Script. qu. 94.

⁴⁷ Leo, Ep. 4. ad Episc. Siculos, cap. 3. Sepulcrum triduanam imitatur trina demersio, et ab aquis elevatio resurgens instar est de sepulchro.

⁴⁸ Aug. Hom. 3. ap. Gratian. de Consecrat. Dist. 4. cap. 78. Postquam vos credere promisistis, tertio capita vestra in sacro fonte demersimus. Qui ordo baptismatis duplici mysterii significatione celebratur. Recte enim tertio mersi estis, qui accepistis baptismum in nomine Trinitatis. Recte tertio mersi estis, qui accepistis baptismum in nomine Jesu Christi, qui die tertia resurrexit a mortuis. Illa enim tertio repetita demersio typum Dominicæ exprimit sepultura, &c.

⁴⁹ Hieron. lib. 2. in Ephes. iv. p. 222. Ter mergimur, ut Trinitatis unum appareat sacramentum, et non baptizamus in nominibus Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti, sed in uno nomine, quod intelligitur Deus.—Potest et unum baptismum ita dici, quod licet ter baptizemur propter mysterium Trinitatis, tamen unum baptismum reputetur.

⁵⁰ Tertul. de Coron. Mil. c. 3.

⁵¹ Basil. de Spir. Sancto, c. 27.

⁵² Hieron. cont. Lucif. cap. 4. It. Sozomen. lib. 6. c. 26.

⁵³ Chrys. Hom. de Fide, t. 7. p. 290. Edit. Savil. Ἐν τρισὶ καταδύσει τοῦ σώματος ἐν βάπτισμα τοῖς ἑαυτοῦ μαθηταῖς παραδέδωκε, &c.

⁵⁴ Theod. Hæret. Fab. lib. 4. c. 3. p. 236. Αὐτὸς καὶ τῷ ἁγίου βαπτίσματος ἀνέτριψε τὸν ἀνέκαθεν παρὰ τοῦ Κυρίου καὶ ἀποστόλων παραδοθέντα Τρισμόν, καὶ ἄντικρυς ἐνομοθέτησε, μὴ χρῆναι λέγων τρίς καταδύει τὸν βαπτίζόμενον, &c.

⁵⁵ Pelag. Ep. ad Gaudentium, ap. Gratian. de Consecrat. Dist. 4. cap. 82. Multi sunt qui in nomine solummodo Christi, una etiam mersione se asserunt baptizare. Evangelicum vero preceptum, ipso Deo et Domino Salvatore nostro Jesu Christo tradente, nos admonet, in nomine Trinitatis, trina etiam mersione sanctum baptismum unicuique tribuere, dicente Domino discipulis suis. Ite, baptizate omnes gentes in nomine Patris, Filii, et Spiritus Sancti.

⁵⁶ Canon. Apost. can. 49. al. 50.

the Eunomians, continued for many years to baptize with three immersions: but then they abused this ceremony to a very perverse end, to patronize their error about the Son and Holy Ghost's being of a different nature or essence from the Father; for they made the three immersions to denote a difference, or degrees of Divinity, in the three Divine persons. To oppose whose wicked doctrine, and that they might not seem to symbolize with them in any practice that might give encouragement to it, some catholics began to leave off the trine immersion, as savouring of Arianism, and took up the single immersion in opposition to them. But this was like to prove matter of scandal and schism among the catholics themselves. And therefore, in the time of Gregory the Great, Leander, bishop of Sevil, wrote to him for his advice and resolution in this case. To which he returned this answer: Concerning the three immersions in baptism, you⁵⁷ have judged very truly already, that different rites and customs do not prejudice the holy church, whilst the unity of faith remains entire. The reason why we use three immersions, (at Rome,) is to signify the mystery of Christ's three days' burial, that whilst an infant is thrice lifted up out of the water, the resurrection on the third day may be expressed thereby. But if any one thinks this is rather done in regard to the holy Trinity, a single immersion in baptism does no way prejudice that; for so long as the unity of substance is preserved in three persons, it is no harm whether a child be baptized with one immersion or three; because three immersions may represent the Trinity of persons, and one immersion the unity of the Godhead. But forasmuch as heretics use to baptize their infants with three immersions, I think you ought not to do so; lest this multiplication of immersions be interpreted a division of the Godhead, and give them occasion to glory that their custom has prevailed. Yet this judgment of Pope Gregory did not satisfy all men in the Spanish church; for still many kept to the old way of baptizing by three immersions, notwithstanding this fear of symbolizing with the Arians. Therefore, some time after, about the year 633, the fourth council of Toledo, which was a general council of all Spain, was forced to make another decree to determine this matter, and settle the peace of the church. For while some priests baptized with three immersions, and the others but with one, a schism was raised,⁵⁸ endangering the unity of the faith. For the contending parties carried the matter so high, as to pretend, that they who were baptized in a way contrary to their own, were not baptized at all. To remedy which evil, the fathers of this council first repeat the judgment of Pope Gregory, and then immediately conclude upon it, That though both these ways of baptism were just and unblamable in themselves, according to the opinion of that great man; yet, as well to avoid the scandal of schism, as the usage of heretics, they decree, that only one immersion should be used in baptism, lest if any used three immersions, they might seem to approve the opinion of heretics, whilst they followed their practice. And that no one might be dubious about the use of a single immersion, he might consider, that the death and resurrection of Christ were represented by it. For the immersion in water was as it were the descending into hell or the grave, and the emersion out of the water was a resurrection. He might also observe the Unity of the Deity, and the Trinity of persons to be signified by it; the Unity by a single immersion, and the Trinity by giving baptism in the name of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Some learned persons⁵⁹ find fault with this council for changing this ancient custom upon so slight a reason, as that of the Arians using it: which, if it were any reason, would hold as well against a single immersion, because the Eunomians, a baser sect of the Arians, were the first inventors of that practice. And therefore the exception made ⁵⁷ Gregor. lib. I. Ep. 41. ad Leand. De trina mersione baptismatis nil responderi verius potest, quam quod ipsi sensit, quod in una fide nil officit sanctæ ecclesiæ consuetudo diversa. Nos autem quod tertio mergimus, triduanæ sepulturæ sacramenta signamus, ut dum tertio infans ab aquis educitur, resurrectio triduanæ temporis exprimitur. Quod si quis forte etiam pro summæ Trinitatis veneratione existimet fieri; neque ad hoc aliquid obsistit baptizando semel in aquis mergere: quia dum in tribus personis una substantia est, reprehensibile esse nullatenus potest, infantem in baptismate vel ter, vel semel immergere; quando et in tribus mersionibus personarum Trinitas, et in una potest Divinitatis singularitas designari. Sed quia nunc hucusque ab hæreticis infans in baptismo tertio mergebatur, fiendum apud vos esse non censeo: ne dum mersiones numerant, Divinitatem dividant; dumque quod faciebant faciunt, se morem vestrum vicisse glorientur.

⁵⁸ Conc. Tolet. 4. can. 5. De baptismi autem sacramento, propter quod in Hispaniis quidam sacerdotes trinam, simplicam quidam mersionem faciunt, a nonnullis schisma esse conspicitur, et unitas fidei scindi videtur. Nam dum partes diversæ in baptizandis aliqua contrario modo agunt, ab aliis non baptizatos esse contendunt.—Quapropter, quia de utroque sacramento, quod fit in sancto baptismo, a tanto viro reddita est ratio, quod utrumque rectum, utrumque irreprehensibile in sancta Dei ecclesia habeatur: propter vitandum autem schismatis scandalum, vel hæreticis dogmatis usum, simplicem teneamus baptismi mersionem; ne videantur apud nos, qui tertio mergunt, hæreticorum approbare assertionem, dum sequuntur et morem. Et ne forte cuiquam sit dubium hujus simpli mysterium sacramenti, videat in eo mortem et resurrectionem Christi significari. Nam in aquis mersio, quasi ad infernum descensio est: et rursus ab aquis emersio, resurrectio est. Item videat in eo unitatem Divinitatis, et Trinitatem personarum ostendi. Unitatem, dum semel mergimus: Trinitatem, dum in nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritûs Sancti baptizamus.

⁵⁹ Strabo de Offic. Eccl. cap. 26. Vossius de Bapt. Disp. 2. Thes. 4. p. 46.

by this Spanish council in the seventh century, cannot prejudice the more ancient and general practice of the church, which, as Strabo observed, still prevailed after this council; and if Vossius says true, the trine immersion, or what corresponds to it, the trine aspersion, is the general practice of all churches upon earth at this day. And such a custom could not well be laid aside, without some charge of novelty, and danger of giving offence and scandal to weaker brethren. I have now gone over the several circumstances and ceremonies accompanying baptism, so far as to make it a complete sacrament, and the instrument of salvation to all worthy receivers, if they happened to die without any further consummation, as sometimes they did, when baptism was administered to them with less solemnity, either in times of sickness, or at some distance from the mother-church; in both which cases they had the substance of the sacrament, but not all the ceremonies that were appointed to attend it. They were supposed to be made partakers of Christ's body, and to eat his flesh, and to be washed in his blood, which was drinking it by faith, in baptism as well as in the eucharist. And if they survived, they were also admitted immediately to the symbols of Christ's body and blood in the eucharist. But there were some other ceremonies following baptism, as it were to finish the solemnity of it; some of which were introductory and preparatory to the eucharist, as the second unction accompanying baptism, which we commonly call imposition of hands or confirmation. Of which, because it will be necessary to speak a little more distinctly, I shall make it, and the remaining ceremonies of baptism, the subject of another Book.

BOOK XII.

OF CONFIRMATION, AND OTHER CEREMONIES FOLLOWING BAPTISM, BEFORE MEN WERE MADE PARTAKERS OF THE EUCHARIST.

CHAPTER I.

OF THE TIME WHEN, AND THE PERSONS TO WHOM, CONFIRMATION WAS ADMINISTERED.

Sect. 1.
Confirmation anciently given immediately after baptism, if the bishop were present.

IMMEDIATELY after the persons came up out of the water, if the bishop was present at the solemnity, they were presented to him in order to receive his benediction, which was a solemn prayer for the descent of the Holy Ghost upon such as were baptized: and to this prayer there was usually joined the ceremony of a second unction, and imposition of hands, and the sign of the cross; whence the whole action many times took these names, χρίσμα, the unction, χειροθεσία, the imposition of hands, and σφραγίς, the sign or seal of the Lord, which are names much more common among the ancients than that of confirmation. But by all these names they understood one and the same thing, which was the bishop's prayer for the descent of the Spirit upon persons newly baptized. This was always administered together with baptism, if the bishop, who was the ordinary minister of it, were present at the action. But if he was absent, as it usually happened to be in churches at a distance from the mother-church, or when persons were baptized in haste upon a sick bed, then confirmation was deferred till the bishop could have a convenient opportunity to visit them. This we learn from St. Jerom, who speaks¹ of it as customary in the church, for bishops to go and invoke the Holy Spirit by imposition of hands on such as were baptized by presbyters and deacons in villages and places remote from the mother-church. And it many times happened, that such persons died before the bishop could come to give them imposition of hands. To prevent which inconvenience, the canons in some places obliged bishops to visit their whole dioceses once every year; and if they were so large that they could not do so, then they were to divide their dioceses and make them less, as we find it decreed and practised in some of the Spanish councils.² But in case persons were baptized in the presence of the bishop, then without any delay they were immediately confirmed with imposition of hands and the holy unction. Tertullian says³ very plainly, That as soon as they came out of the water, they were anointed with the oil of consecration, and then received imposition of hands, inviting down the Holy Spirit by that benediction. And so Cyril of Jerusalem represents it, when he tells the neophytes, that as soon as they come up out of the waters of the font,⁴ they received the chrism or unction, with the antitype of which (that is, the Holy Ghost) Christ was anointed when he came up out of Jordan. In like manner the author of the Constitutions, describing the ceremonies of baptism, orders the priest,⁵ as soon as he has baptized any one, to anoint him with the holy chrism, and give him imposition of hands, saying a prayer which is there appointed. Thus we find in the Life of St. Basil,⁶ how Maximinus the bishop, who baptized him and Eubulus together, immediately clothed them with the white garments, and anointed them with the holy

¹ Hieron. cont. Lucifer. cap. 4. Non abnuo hanc esse ecclesiarum consuetudinem, ut ad eos qui longe in minoribus urbibus per presbyteros et diaconos baptizati sunt, episcopus ad invocationem Sancti Spiritus manum impositurus excurrat. And a little after, In villulis aut in castellis, aut in remotioribus locis per presbyteros aut diaconos baptizati, ante dormierunt, quam ab episcopis inviserentur. Vid. Conc. Eliber. can. 77.

² Conc. Lucens. Conc. t. 5. p. 874.

³ Tertul. de Bapt. c. 7. Exinde egressi de lavacro perungimur benedicta unctione.—Cap. 8. Dehinc manus imponitur, per benedictionem advocans et invitans Spiritum Sanctum.

⁴ Cyril. Catech. Myst. 3. n. 1. Ὑμῖν ὁμοίως ἀναβεηκόσιν ἀπὸ τῆς κολυμβήθρας τῶν ἱερῶν ναμάτων, ἐδόθη χρίσμα, τὸ ἀντίτυπον ἢ ἐχρίσθη Χριστός· τῆτο δὲ ἐπὶ τὸ Ἅγιον Πνεῦμα.

⁵ Const. Apost. lib. 7. cap. 43 et 44. Μετὰ τῆτο βαπτίσας αὐτόν, χρισάτω μύρω, ἐπιλέγων, &c.

⁶ Amphiloch. Vit. Basil. c. 5. Baptizavit Maximinus episcopus Basilium et Eubulum, et vestivit abis, atque ungens eos sancto chrismate, tradidit eis communionem.

chrism, and gave them the communion. The same may be observed in the description of the ceremonies of baptism given by the author under the name of Dionysius,⁷ St. Ambrose, Optatus, Pacian, and all others amongst the ancients, who have made any mention of the time of administering confirmation.

Nor was this only true with respect to adult persons, but also with respect to infants, who were anciently confirmed by imposition of hands, and the holy chrism or unction, as soon as they were baptized. Which perhaps will seem a paradox to many, who look no further than to the practice of later ages; but it may be undeniably evidenced these two ways: 1. From plain testimonies of the ancients declaring it so to be; and, 2. From that known custom and usage of the church in giving the eucharist to infants, which ordinarily presupposes their confirmation. First, For the testimonies of the ancients, nothing can be plainer than those words of Gennadius, If they be infants that are baptized,⁸ let those that present them to baptism, answer for them according to the common way of baptizing: and then let them be confirmed with imposition of hands and chrism, and so be admitted to partake of the eucharist. In like manner Pope Innocent, in one of his decrees,⁹ says, Infants are not to be consigned or confirmed by any but the bishop. And in the Collection of Canons made by Martin Bracarenis¹⁰ out of those of the Greek church, this is one, That a presbyter may not consign infants in the presence of the bishop, except he be particularly appointed by the bishop to do it. This practice continued in the church for many ages. For it is mentioned by Pope Gregory both in his Sacramentarium and in his Epistles,¹¹ and after him by all the writers in the eighth and ninth centuries. Alcuin, who wrote about the offices of the church in the time of Charles the Great, speaking of infant baptism,¹² says, After an infant is baptized, he is to be clothed and brought to the bishop, if he be present, who is to confirm him with chrism, and give him the communion; and if the bishop be not present, the presbyter shall communicate him. The same is in the Ordo Romanus, a book written and used as a liturgy about the same time; where, after the bishop has given the white garment to infants, he lifts up his hand and lays it upon their heads,¹³ praying for the descent of the Holy Ghost upon them, and signing them with the sign of the cross in the forehead, he says, I confirm thee in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Baluzius, in his Notes upon Regino,¹⁴ gives us two ancient manuscript Pontificals of the ninth century, where in this order for confirming infants is continued. And to these he adds¹⁵ an epistle of Jesse, bishop of Amiens, describing the order of baptism, where the rule is for the bishop, After the child has been baptized with three immersions, to confirm him with chrism in the forehead, and then to confirm him (for so it is worded) or communicate him with the body and blood of Christ. These testimonies are so plain and convincing, that all learned men, who have exactly considered this matter, as well papists as protestants, are agreed, that this was the ancient and general practice of the church, to confirm infants as soon as they were baptized. For so I find not only Baluzius, but Peter de Marca,¹⁶ Hugo Menardus,¹⁷ Maldonat,¹⁸ Estius,¹⁹ Galenus,²⁰ among the papists, and Bishop Taylor²¹ and Daillé²² among the protestants, readily consenting. And some²³ tell us the same practice continues among the Greeks to this day. The learned reader may add to the former testimonies the authority of St. Austin, who witnesses for this practice in his own person. For he says,²⁴ He himself was used to ⁷ Dionys. de Hierarch. Eccl. cap. 2. p. 260. Ambros. de Sacram. lib. 3. c. 2. Optat. lib. 4. p. 81. Pacian. Serm. de Baptismo, Bibl. Patr. t. 3. p. 77.

⁸ Gennad. de Dogmat. Eccles. cap. 52. Si parvuli sint—respondeant pro illis qui eos offerunt, juxta morem baptizandi, et sic manus impositione et chrismate communiti, eucharistia mysteriis admittantur.

⁹ Innoc. Ep. 1. cap. 3. De consignandis vero infantibus, manifestum est non ab alio quam ab episcopo fieri licere.

¹⁰ Martin Bracar. Collec. Canon. cap. 52. Presbyter præse episcopo non signet infantes, nisi forte ab episcopo fuerit illi præceptum.

¹¹ Gregor. lib. 3. Ep. 9.

¹² Alcuin. de Offic. cap. de Sabbato Paschæ, Bibl. Patr. t. 10. p. 259. Postea vestiatur infans vestimentis suis. Si vero episcopus adest, statim confirmari eum oportet chrismate, et postea communicare; et si episcopus deest, communicetur a presbytero.

¹³ Ordo Roman. cap. de Bapt. Bibl. Patr. t. 10. p. 63. Pontifex elevat et imposita manu super capita omnium, dat orationem super eos cum invocatione septiformis gratiæ Spiritûs Sancti.—Et tincto pollice in chrismate faciat crucem in frontibus singulorum, ita dicendo, Confirmo te in nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritûs Sancti.

¹⁴ Baluz. Not. in Regino, lib. 1. cap. 69. Ex pontificali vet. MS. Statim autem confirmetur infans, et communicetur ab episcopo, ita dicente, Corpus et sanguis Domini. Item ex altero pontificali; Si episcopus adest, statim confirmari eum oportet chrismate, et postea communicari.

¹⁵ Jesse Ambianens. Ep. de Ordine Baptismi, ap. Baluz. ibid. Post trinam mersionem episcopus puerum chrismate confirmet in fronte, novissime autem corpore et sanguine Christi confirmetur seu communicetur, ut Christi membrum esse possit.

¹⁶ Marca, Not. ad Concil. Claramontan. p. 312.

¹⁷ Menard. Not. ad Librum Sacramentor. p. 144.

¹⁸ Maldonat. de Confirmat. qu. 2.

¹⁹ Estius, Sentent. lib. 4. Dist. 7. n. 23. p. 101.

²⁰ Galen. Catechism. ap. Dallæ. de Confirm. p. 21.

²¹ Taylor's Worthy Communicant, chap. 3. sect. 2. p. 209.

²² Dallæ. de Confirmat. lib. 3. cap. 13.

²³ Pet. du Moulin's Buckler of Faith, p. 381.

²⁴ Aug. Tract. 6. in 1 John iii. t. 9. p. 254. Quando impositimus manum istis infantibus, attendit unusquisque vestrum utrum linguis loquerentur? Et cum videret eos linguis give imposition of hands, or confirmation, to infants, that they might receive the Holy Spirit.

Sect. 3.
And secondly,
From the custom of giving the eucharist to infants for many ages.

If this matter needed further proof, we might insist upon that known practice and custom in the ancient church, of giving the eucharist to infants, which continued in the church for several ages. It is frequently mentioned in Cyprian, Austin, Innocentius, and Gennadius, writers from the third to the fifth century. Maldonat confesses it was in the church for six hundred years. And some of the authorities just now alleged, prove it to have continued two or three ages more, and to have been the common practice beyond the time of Charles the Great. Now, all men know, that in the common course of things confirmation always preceded the eucharist, unless there was some special cause, as sometimes it happened in the case of clinic baptism, or the bishop's absence, to prevent it. For in these two cases the eucharist was many times given before confirmation, as now it is in our large dioceses, where the bishop's presence cannot always be had to give confirmation, in places at a great distance, before the communion. But in all other cases, the usual way was to let confirmation usher in the communion. And therefore since it is evident, that the communion itself was given to infants, and that immediately from the time of their baptism; it would be reasonable to conclude from hence, were there no other evidence, that confirmation also was given to infants, together with baptism, because this rite by all ordinary rules and custom was prior and introductory to the communion.

Sect. 4.
Whence it appears,
that confirmation was not esteemed a proper sacrament distinct from baptism.

This observation may help us to understand some difficult passages in the ancients, and answer an objection which the Romanists draw from them, as if confirmation were a proper sacrament distinct from baptism. The ancients, it must be owned, sometimes give it the name of a sacrament, and call baptism and confirmation two sacraments. But then it is very evident, they take the word sacrament in a large sense, for any sacred ceremony, rite, or mystery, belonging to baptism: in which sense they suppose two sacraments, or chief mysterious ceremonies, to be in baptism, that is, the immersion in water, and the unction with the holy chrism, both which are spoken of as sacraments or ceremonies belonging to baptism. Thus in the council of Carthage, under Cyprian, Nemesianus à Tubunis says, It was not sufficient for men to be regenerated only by imposition of hands, but they ought to be born again²⁵ by both the sacraments in the catholic church; that is, as well by washing in water, as imposition of hands, both which he makes sacraments, that is, sacred rites of the same sacrament of regeneration. In the same sense Cyprian himself²⁶ says, both the sacraments of regeneration were required to complete men's sanctification. Which plainly shows, that by two sacraments he means no more but two of the principal ceremonies that belonged to a complete and perfect baptism, because he says men were regenerated or born again by them both. In like manner Optatus²⁷ makes imposition of hands and unction to be only parts and ceremonies completing baptism. For, speaking of the baptism of Christ, he says, He went not into the water, as if any thing in God could need cleansing; but it was necessary the water should go before the unction that was to follow after, to initiate and order and complete the mysteries or sacramental rites of baptism. When he was washed by the hands of John, the order of the mystery was settled; the Father fulfilled what the Son had asked, and what the Holy Ghost had foretold. The spiritual oil immediately descended in the image of a dove, and sat upon his head, and anointed him; from whence he began to be called Christ, because he was anointed of God the Father. And that imposition of hands might not seem to be wanting, the voice of God was heard from the cloud, saying, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." Here Optatus professes to describe the order, and parts, and mysteries of baptism, from the similitude of the baptism of Christ. In each of these he makes three sacraments or principal mysteries, the washing, the unction, and imposition of hands; which are not properly three distinct sacraments, but three parts or rites of the same sacrament of baptism, which, according to Optatus, were ordered, and shadowed, and completed in the baptism of Christ. Unless we take sacrament in this large sense, we shall have three proper sacraments in baptism, which neither Optatus nor any of the ancients non loqui, ita perverso corde aliquis vestrum fuit, ut diceret, non acceperunt isti Spiritum Sanctum?

²⁵ Conc. Carthag. ap. Cypr. n. 5. p. 231. Male sibi quidam interpretantur, ut dicant, quod per manus impositionem Spiritum Sanctum accipiant, et sic recipiantur: cum manifestum sit utroque sacramento debere eos renasci in ecclesia catholica.

²⁶ Cypr. Ep. 72. ad Stephan. p. 196. Parum est eis manum imponere ad recipiendum Spiritum Sanctum, nisi accipiant et ecclesie baptismum. Tunc enim demum plene sanctificari et esse Filii Dei possint, si sacramento utroque nascantur.

²⁷ Optat. lib. 4. p. 81. Descendit in aquam, non quia erat quod in Deo mundaretur, sed venturum oleum aqua debuit antecedere, ad mysteria initianda et ordinanda et complenda baptismatis. Lotus cum in Joannis manibus haberetur, secutus est ordo mysterii, et complevit Pater quod rogaverat Filius, et quod nunciaverat Spiritus Sanctus. Apertum est cœlum, Deo Patre ungente. Spiritale oleum statim in imagine columbæ descendit, et insedit capiti ejus et perfudit eum; unde cœpit dici Christus, quando unctus est a Deo Patre. Cui ne manus impositio defuisse videretur, vox audita est Dei de nube dicentis, Hic Filius est meus, &c.

ever thought of, when they speak of the mysteries of baptism; but they allow both unction and imposition of hands to be sacraments, as they are parts or rites of the mystery of baptism. After this manner Pacianus, bishop of Barcelona, makes also three sacraments of the mystery of baptism, viz. the laver or washing of water, the unction of the Spirit, and the hand and mouth of the priest. For he says, The seed of Christ, that is, the Spirit of God, brings forth a new man, by the hands of the priest, out of the womb of the church, which is the font, faith being the bride-maid to all this.²⁸ And without these three sacraments, the laver, the chrism, and the priest, this new birth is not effected. For by the laver, sin is purged away; by the chrism, the Holy Spirit is poured down upon us; and both these we obtain by the hand and mouth of the priest; and so the whole man is regenerated and renewed in Christ. Here we must of necessity say, either that the laver, the chrism, and words and action of the priest, are three sacraments, or else that they are but three parts or ceremonies of the same sacrament of baptism, which is what Pacian plainly intended; for he is speaking of the manner how men are regenerated in baptism, and he makes chrism to be one means of this regeneration; whence it is evident, he had no other notion of it, but as of an integral part of baptism, though not absolutely essential to it. This, then, is one plain reason why the ancients sometimes call the immersion in the water and the unction of chrism two sacraments, because they are parts, or rites, or ceremonies of the mystery of baptism. And there is nothing more usual with the ancients than this way of speaking, to call every sacred rite or ceremony used in the church, by the name of a sacrament or mystery. As St. Austin calls exorcism²⁹ a sacrament. And the salt which was given to the catechumens before baptism, is called the sacrament of the catechumens, both by St. Austin³⁰ and the third council of Carthage,³¹ as has been observed in another place, where I speak particularly of this sacrament of the catechumens. Cyprian³² speaks of sacraments in the Lord's prayer. And to insist no longer upon these, it is usual also with the ancients to divide the proper sacraments, baptism and the eucharist, each of them into two or more, meaning the several parts or rites belonging to them. Thus Isidore speaks of four sacraments³³ in the church, which are, baptism, chrism, the body of Christ, and the blood of Christ. As therefore the bread and wine are called two sacraments, though they be but two parts of the same eucharist; so the washing and the unction are called two sacraments, though they be but two rites of the same sacrament of baptism. The like style is used by Pope Innocent,³⁴ when he calls the bread and wine sacraments, in the plural. And Fulbertus Carnotensis³⁵ is more express, when he says, There are two sacraments of life, the body and blood of Christ. No wonder therefore the same author³⁶ should call the immersion in water and the unction of chrism, conveying the Spirit, by the name of the two sacraments of baptism. For nothing can be plainer, than that immersion and chrism are not properly two sacraments of baptism, but only two rites of it: as the bread and wine are not strictly two sacraments of the eucharist, but only different parts of the same communion. It were easy to add abundance more of such expressions out of other authors, many of which the reader may find collected together by the learned Daillé;³⁷ I shall only add the words of Haimo Haberstatensis, where he expressly makes confirmation a rite or ceremony of baptism, always accompanying, and administered at the same time with it, as the consummating act and perfection of it: The gift of the Holy Spirit, says he,³⁸ is given in baptism by the imposition of the bishop's hands. So that when the ancients call confirmation a sacrament, they always mean, that it is a part or ceremony of the sacrament of baptism. In which sense, they give the name of sacraments to many other things, which were only parts, or ceremonies, or attendants on it, such as exorcism, and the sign of the cross, which were sacraments in the same sense as confirmation.

But it may be said, that confirmation, imposition of hands, or unction, was many times given to men at some years' distance from baptism, as in the case of heretics and schismatics, who

Sect. 5.
No, not when it was separate from baptism, as in the case of heretics who were baptized out of the church.

²⁸ Pacian. Serm. de Bapt. Bibl. Patr. t. 3. p. 77. Christi semen, id est, Dei Spiritus, novum hominem, alvo matris agitatum, et partu fontis exceptum, manibus sacerdotis effundit, fide tamen pronuba.—Hæc autem compleri alias nequeunt, nisi lavacri, et chrismatis, et antistitis Sacramento. Lavacro enim peccata purgantur, chrismate Sanctus Spiritus superfunditur; utraque vero ista manu et ore antistitis impetramus; atque ita totus homo renascitur et innovatur in Christo.

²⁹ Aug. Hom. 83. de Diversis. Exorcismi Sacramento quasi molebamini.

³⁰ Aug. de Peccator. Meritis, lib. 2. cap. 26.

³¹ Conc. Carthag. 3. can. 5. See these cited, Book X. chap. 2. sect. 16.

³² Cypr. de Orat. Dom. p. 142.

³³ Isidor. Origin. lib. 6. c. 19. Sunt autem sacramenta baptismus, et chrisma; corpus et sanguis Christi.

³⁴ Innoc. Ep. 1. ad Decent. cap. 5. Non longe portanda sunt sacramenta.

³⁵ Fulbert. Ep. 1. Bibl. Patr. t. 3. p. 434. Duo vitæ sacramenta, id est, Dominici corporis et sanguinis.

³⁶ Fulbert. ibid. p. 436. Requiritur sane in baptismatis sacramentis aqua propter sepulturam, et Spiritus Sanctus propter vitam æternam.

³⁷ Dallæ. de Confirm. lib. 1. cap. 8. p. 150. It. lib. 3. cap. 13. p. 386.

³⁸ Haimo in Hebr. xiii. cited by Daillé. Donum Spiritus Sancti datur in baptismate per impositionem manûs episcoporum.

were baptized in infancy out of the church, and were received by imposition of hands when they returned to the church afterwards. To which I answer, that the imposition of hands which the church gave in this case separate from baptism, was what could not be avoided, because the church had no opportunity of administering it before; and therefore no argument is to be drawn from what she was forced to do upon such an exigence, being only an exception to her ordinary practice. It is owned, that the church gave imposition of hands to all heretics upon their return to the church: and this, as I have showed at large in another³⁹ discourse, was to supply the deficiencies of that outward form of baptism, which could not grant them the graces of the Spirit, whilst they remained in heresy or schism. And there I also observed, that some heretics retained the unction and imposition of hands as well as baptism, and administered it to infants together with baptism; which was the practice of the Donatists, and, it may be, of several others. But yet the church, though she neither repeated the outward form of baptism, nor always the unction of chrism; especially in the western parts, where St. Austin, Optatus, Aleimus, and Avitus lived; yet she always gave a new imposition of hands with prayer, to implore the descent of the Holy Ghost upon them. And though this was separating confirmation from baptism, yet it was only in an extraordinary case, when the church was not capacitated to do otherwise. In other cases she always joined these two ceremonies together, as well in infants as adult persons, as I suppose the allegations and proofs alleged in this chapter, do abundantly show to any candid reader, beyond possibility of contradiction.

But some will be apt to object, that if this were the case, then all churches at present, as well protestant as popish, differ from the practice of the primitive church in this particular, that now they never administer confirmation to infants, but only to adult persons, who can confirm their baptismal vow in their own persons. And this difference is readily owned, as to practice. But then, if the question be about right, which is the more suitable and agreeable practice? and whether we ought not to conform in every circumstance to the practice of the primitive church? I suppose every church in this case is best judge for herself, what is most for the edification of her children. And as no church now thinks herself under any obligation to give the eucharist to infants, because the primitive church for eight hundred years did so; so neither does any church judge herself bound to give confirmation to infants from the same example: though some learned persons have pleaded for both, as Bishop Bedel,⁴⁰ among the protestants, for the communion of infants, and Matthew Galen,⁴¹ among the papists, for giving them confirmation. Whilst others judge the modern practice the more edifying way, and think there are no sufficient arguments to engage the church to make an alteration.

CHAPTER II.

OF THE MINISTER OF CONFIRMATION.

NEXT to the persons to whom confirmation was given, we are to make inquiry about the ministry of it, and see by whom it was usually given.

Sect. 1.
The consecration of chrism reserved only to the office of bishops by the canons.

And here it will be necessary to distinguish the several parts and ceremonies of confirmation, and cases ordinary and extraordinary; as also the consecration of the chrism from the use of it, and the practice and custom of some churches from others: for one rule was not precisely observed in all these. Confirmation consisted of several acts, as we shall see in the next chapter: there was first the consecration of the chrism, which was always the bishop's act; then there was the unction itself, or the use of it, with consignation or the sign of the cross on the forehead or other parts of the body; then imposition of hands with prayer: there were also cases ordinary, when the bishop was present at baptism, and cases extraordinary, when he was absent, and the party in danger of death: there were also different practices according to the rules of different churches: and according to these distinctions the answer must be given to this general question. The consecration of the chrism was generally reserved to the bishop in all churches, and so the use of it was derived from his authority in all cases whatsoever. The second council of Carthage¹ forbids presbyters to have any concern in it, and refers to a former council, wherein the like prohibition was made before. The third council of Carthage allows presbyters, by the commission of the bishop, to consecrate virgins, but never² to consecrate the chrism. The fourth council of Carthage³ obliges presbyters in country churches to go to the bishop yearly be-³⁹ Scholast. Hist. of Lay Baptism, chap. 1. n. 21.

⁴⁰ See Bishop Usher's Letters, Ep. 163. p. 442.

⁴¹ Galen. Catechism. ap. Dallæ. de Confirm. lib. 1. p. 21.

¹ Conc. Carth. 2. can. 3. Memini præterito concilio statutum fuisse, ut chrisma, vel reconciliatio penitentium, necnon et puellarum consecratio a presbyteris non fiant.

² Ibid. 3. can. 36. Ut presbyter inconsulto episcopo virgines non consecret, chrisma vero nunquam conficiat.

³ Ibid. 4. can. 36. Presbyteri, qui per dioceses ecclesias regunt, non a quibuslibet episcopis, sed a suis, nec per minore clericum, sed omni anno aut per seipos, aut per illum qui sacrarium tenet, ante Paschæ solennitatem chrisma petant.

fore Easter, or else to send their sacrist to him for the chrism. In some churches of Spain the presbyters took upon them to consecrate it themselves, which occasioned the first council of Toledo to renew the decree against this as a usurpation,⁴ forbidding any beside the bishop to do it from that day forward, and obliging presbyters, as before, to go to their own bishop for it before Easter. The like injunctions are made in the first council of Vaison,⁵ the council of Auxerre,⁶ the council of Barcelona,⁷ the first and second council of Bracara,⁸ and in the Collection of Greek Canons made by Martin Bracarenis;⁹ as also in the Roman Decrees made by Pope Innocent,¹⁰ Leo,¹¹ and Gelasius,¹² which I need not repeat at length upon this occasion. So that by this means the bishop's authority was secured, even in such cases where presbyters were allowed to have their share in this holy unction.

Now, this unction or consignation, in many churches, (particularly in the Roman church,) was distinguished into two sorts, the consignation of the forehead, and the consignation of the other parts of the body. And the former, in such churches where this distinction was made, was generally reserved to the bishop, to be administered with imposition of hands; but the latter was given by presbyters also. All churches did not allow of this distinction of chrism into two sorts, but such as did allow of two, granted authority to presbyters to administer the one, but not the other. The double chrismation was first brought in by Pope Innocent, and he thus divides the office between bishops and presbyters. A presbyter, says he,¹³ baptizing either in the bishop's presence or absence, may anoint the baptized party with chrism, provided it be consecrated beforehand by the bishop; but he may not sign him in the forehead with the same oil, because it belongs to bishops only when they give the Holy Ghost. And so it is in the decrees of Gelasius,¹⁴ and Pope Gregory,¹⁵ his successor in the Roman see. But this double chrismation was not received in France, nor in any of the Eastern churches. In France it was the office of presbyters, and the imposition of hands was only reserved to the bishop. This is undeniably evident from the council of Orange,¹⁶ which orders every minister, who had received the office of baptizing, wherever he went, to have the chrism with him, because it was agreed, that chrism should only be once used in baptism. But if by any necessity it had been omitted in baptism, then the bishop should be put in mind of that omission in confirmation. For it was agreed to have only one chrismation. This canon is repeated and referred to again in the second council of Arles,¹⁷ and Valesius adds¹⁸ to them an inscription in Gruter, confirming the same thing, That the bishop did not minister the chrism, except it had been omitted by the presbyter before. In the Eastern churches they had but one unction after baptism, and that performed by the bishop, except in some particular and extraordinary cases. The author of the Apostolical Constitutions makes this the office¹⁹ of the bishop, to anoint those that were baptized with the holy chrism. And this, he says, was the confirmation of the professions which they had made in baptism.²⁰ The author under the name of Dionysius says the same,²¹ That after the presbyters have baptized a man, they bring him to the bishop, and he anoints him with the divine chrism, and pronounces him capable of partaking of the holy eucharist. Now, this episcopal unction was not only in the forehead, as was usual in the Roman church, but in all other parts of the body. For, as Cyril of Jerusalem²² tells those that were baptized, They were first anointed in the forehead, to wipe

⁴ Conc. Tolet. 1. can. 20. Quamvis pene ubique custodiatur, ut absque episcopo chrisma nemo conficiat, tamen quia in aliquibus locis vel provinciis, presbyteri dicuntur chrisma conficere, placuit, ex hac die nullum alium nisi episcopum chrisma conficere, et per diocesim destinare, ita ut de singulis ecclesiis ad episcopum ante diem Paschæ diaconi destinantur, aut subdiaconi, qui confectum chrisma ab episcopo destinatum ad diem Paschæ possint ad tempus deferre.

⁵ Conc. Vasense, 1. can. 3. ⁶ Conc. Antissiodor. can. 6.

⁷ Conc. Barcinon. can. 2.

⁸ Conc. Bracar. 1. can. 37. Bracar. 2. can. 4.

⁹ Martin Bracar. Collect. Can. cap. 51.

¹⁰ Innoc. Ep. 1. ad Decentium, cap. 3.

¹¹ Leo, Ep. 88. ad Gallos.

¹² Gelas. Ep. 9. ad Episcopos Lucaniæ, cap. 6.

¹³ Innoc. Ep. 1. ad Decent. c. 3. Presbyteris, seu extra episcopum, seu presente episcopo, baptizant, chrismate baptizatos ungere licet, sed quod ab episcopo fuerit consecratum; non tamen frontem ex eodem oleo signare, quod solis debetur episcopis, cum tradant Spiritum Sanctum Patrum.

¹⁴ Gelas. Ep. 9. c. 6.

¹⁵ Greg. Ep. 9. lib. 3.

¹⁶ Conc. Arausican. 1. can. 2. Nullus ministrorum, qui baptizandi recipit officium, sine chrismate usquam debet progredi, quia inter nos placuit semel in baptismate chrismari. De eo autem, qui in baptismate, quacunque necessitate faciente, non chrismatus fuerit, in confirmatione sacerdos comonebitur. Nam inter nos chrismatis ipsius non nisi una benedictio est.

¹⁷ Conc. Arelaten. 2. can. 27. Nullum ministrum, qui baptizandi recipit officium, sine chrismate usquam debere progredi, quia inter nos juxta synodi constitutionem, placuit semel chrismari.

¹⁸ Vales. Not. in Euseb. lib. 6. cap. 43. p. 135. ex Gruter. p. 1177. de Marea, has this distich;

Tuque sacerdotes docuisti, chrismate sancto
Tangere bis nullum, iudice posse Deo.

¹⁹ Constit. Apost. lib. 3. cap. 16. Μετὰ τοῦτο ὁ ἐπίσκοπος χρίτω τοὺς βαπτισθέντας τῷ μύρῳ.

²⁰ Ibid. cap. 17. Τὸ μύρον βεβαίωσις τῆς ὁμολογίας. Vid. lib. 7. cap. 43.

²¹ Dionys. de Hier. Eccl. c. 2. p. 254. Ὁ ἱεράρχης τῷ μύρῳ τὸν ἀνδρα σφραγισάμενος, &c.

²² Cyril, Catech. Myst. 3. n. 3. Πρῶτον ἐχρίεσθε ἐπὶ τὸ μέτωπον, &c.

away that shame which the first man by his transgression had contracted; and that they might now with open face behold the glory of the Lord. Then they were anointed on the ears, that they might have ears to hear the Divine mysteries. After that on the nose and breast, that they might be a sweet savour unto the Lord, and being armed with the breastplate of righteousness, might be able to withstand all the insults of the devil. Thus²³ also all such heretics as were to be received into the church without rebaptization, as having been baptized in due form before, are appointed to be received by consignation or unction of the holy chrism; first on the forehead, then on the eyes, nose, mouth, and ears, with this form of words, The seal of the gift of the Holy Spirit. But though this whole ceremony of unction in the Eastern church was ordinarily to be performed only by the bishop, and not divided (as in the Roman) between the bishop and presbyters; yet in some special cases, in some particular churches this office devolved upon the presbyters. For at Alexandria, if the bishop was absent, it was usual for the presbyters to give this consignation at the same time that they baptized. As I think the words of the author under the name of St. Ambrose²⁴ are to be understood, when he says, In Egypt the presbyters consign in the bishop's absence. And this another author under the name of St. Austin²⁵ calls consecration. Which some learned persons, I know, take for the consecration of the eucharist. But that was nothing singular, but common to all the world, for presbyters to consecrate the eucharist in the bishop's absence in all churches, and therefore needed not to be noted as a peculiar custom in Egypt. Therefore I rather judge it to mean some consecration, which presbyters in many other churches were not allowed in the absence of the bishop, as the consecrating or consigning such as were baptized, with the chrism of confirmation, which a presbyter might not do in the Roman churches. But in some of the Eastern churches this was allowed, for the author of the Constitutions, speaking of the celebration of baptism, addresses himself both to bishops and presbyters, telling them in what order they should perform it: Thou bishop, or presbyter, shalt first anoint the party to be baptized with the holy oil; then thou shalt baptize him with water; and last of all²⁶ thou shalt sign him with the holy chrism. Where we see not only the unction preceding baptism, but that which followed after, which was the unction of confirmation, is commanded to the presbyter as well as the bishop; which must at least be interpreted to mean his doing it in the absence of the bishop; or in his presence, if he has a particular command and delegation. So that as to what concerned this first ceremony of confirmation, the unction of chrism, the practice of different churches varied much upon it. Some churches, as the Roman, divided the office between bishops and presbyters: others, as those of France, committed it wholly to presbyters, reserving to the bishop only the consecration of the oil, and imposition of hands in confirmation: others, as those of the East, reserved not only the consecration of the chrism, but the use of it, to the bishop entirely, when he was personally present, and in all ordinary cases; only allowing it to be used by presbyters in his absence, or some such extraordinary cases.

As to the other ceremony, of imposition of hands in confirmation, we find that more universally and strictly reserved to the office of bishops; yet not so absolutely and entirely, but that the canons authorized presbyters to do it in subordination to their bishop in some certain cases. It is certain Cyprian²⁷ speaks of it as the ordinary office of bishops or chief ministers of the church. For mentioning the imposition of hands given by the apostles to those whom Philip had baptized, Acts viii., he says, The same custom was now observed in the church, that those who were baptized, were presented to the governors of the church, that by their prayer and imposition of hands, they might receive the Holy Ghost, and be consummated with the seal of the Lord. In like manner, Firmilian, bishop of Cæsarea in Cappadocia, who was contemporary with Cyprian, makes bishops the ordinary ministers of this office,²⁸ whilst he draws a comparison between St. Paul giving imposition of hands to those whom he baptized at Ephesus, Acts xix., and the bishop's giving imposition of hands to such as returned from heresy or schism to the unity of the catholic church. So likewise the anonymous²⁹

Sect. 3.
The other ceremony, of imposition of hands, reserved more strictly to the office of bishops.

²³ Conc. Constant. 1. can. 7.

²⁴ Ambros. in Ephes. iv. 11. Denique apud Ægyptum presbyteri consignant, si præsens non sit episcopus.

²⁵ Aug. Quæst. in Vet. et Nov. Test. qu. 101. In Alexandria et per totam Ægyptum, si desit episcopus, consecrat presbyter.

²⁶ Constit. Apost. lib. 7. cap. 22. Ὁ ἐπίσκοπε ἢ πρεσβύτερε, πρῶτον χρίσεις ἐλαίῳ ἁγίῳ, ἔπειτα βαπτίσεις ὕδατι, καὶ τελευταίον σφραγίσεις μύρω.

²⁷ Cyp. Ep. 73. ad Jubaian. p. 202. Quod nunc quoque apud nos geritur, ut qui in ecclesia baptizantur, præpositis ecclesiæ offerantur, et per nostram orationem ac manûs impositionem Spiritum Sanctum consequantur, et signaculo Dominico consummentur.

²⁸ Firmil. Ep. 75. ap. Cyp. p. 221. Nisi si his episcopis, de quibus nunc, minor fuit Paulus; ut hi quidem possint per solam manûs impositionem venientibus hæreticis dare Spiritum Sanctum; Paulus autem idoneus non fuerit, qui a Joanne baptizatis Spiritum Sanctum per manûs impositionem daret; nisi eos prius etiam ecclesiæ baptismo baptizasset.

²⁹ Anonym. de Bapt. Hæreticorum, ap. Cyp. p. 23. in Appendice. Per manûs impositionem episcopi datur unicuique credenti Spiritus Sanctus, sicut apostoli circa Samaritanos post Philippi baptismum manum eis imponendo fecerunt author, who writes of the baptism of heretics; at the end of St. Cyprian's works, makes imposition of hands the office of bishops, in imitation of the apostles giving imposition of hands to those who were baptized by Philip the deacon, Acts viii. And in another place³⁰ he says, If bishops were present at baptism, they gave imposition of hands together with baptism; but if any were baptized by the inferior clergy in time of necessity, then the bishops supplied this afterwards, or else the Lord supplied it as he saw fit. The council of Eliberis not long after made two canons to this purpose. In one of which³¹ it is ordered, That if a layman baptized a catechumen, when he was dangerously sick at sea, or where there was no church near at hand, he should afterward bring him to the bishop, that he might perfect his baptism by imposition of hands. And in the other canon it is also ordered, That in case a deacon governing a country people,³² where there is no bishop or presbyter present, shall baptize any of them, the bishop shall afterwards perfect them by his benediction. Or if they chanced to die before this could be done, they were to be reputed in a salvable condition by the faith in which they were baptized. We have heard St. Jerom³³ before testifying of this, as the general practice of the church, for bishops to go about the country villages and remoter places in their dioceses, to give imposition of hands to such as were baptized by presbyters and deacons: and some of these died before the bishop could come to them; which implies, not only that it was the bishop's ordinary office, but that presbyters and deacons did not administer imposition of hands, even in such cases of necessity; otherwise the party who wanted it, could not have died without it. This was evidently the practice of the Roman church, where, though the office of chrismation was in part allowed to presbyters, yet the consignation in the forehead, with imposition of hands, was still reserved to the bishop, as his peculiar office in confirmation: as we learn from the Letters of Pope Innocent,³⁴ Gelasius,³⁵ and Gregory³⁶ the Great, which have already been mentioned in the last section. To which we may add the testimony of Cornelius, who lived before all these in the time of Cyprian, as it is recorded by Eusebius. He there, speaking³⁷ of Novatian, who was baptized only with clinic baptism upon a sick bed, says, When he recovered from his distemper, he never received those things, which by the laws of the church he was obliged to receive, to wit, consignation by the hands of the bishops, &c. All those testimonies likewise, which require heretics to have imposition of hands from the bishop, in order to obtain the gift of the Holy Ghost, are a further evidence of this practice. To which purpose we have the decrees of Pope Leo,³⁸ and Siricius,³⁹ who particularly observes this to have been the general practice of the whole church, both Eastern and Western, as well as the church of Rome, in the reception of those who had been baptized in any heresy or schism. And as to all persons baptized in the church, St. Austin is a further witness, who says, That in propriety of speech, neither the apostles nor any other man, but Christ alone, as he is God, could give the Holy Ghost: for the apostles only⁴⁰ laid hands on men, that the Holy Ghost by their prayers might descend upon them; which custom the church now observed and practised by her bishops or governors also. In like manner, St. Ambrose⁴¹ says, The spiritual seal, or seal of the Spirit, which was the completion of baptism, came after the font, when by the prayer of the priest, that is, in his language, the bishop, the Holy Ghost was poured upon them. From all which testimonies it is most undeniably evident, that the ³⁰ Id. p. 26. Et ideo cum salus nostra in baptisate Spiritus, quod plerumque cum baptisate aquæ conjunctum, sit constituta, si quidem per nos baptisma tradetur, integre et solemniter et per omnia quæ scripta sunt adsignetur, atque sine ulla ullius rei separatione tradatur: aut si a minore clero per necessitatem traditum fuerit, eventum expectemus, ut aut suppleatur a nobis, aut a Domino splendendum reservetur.

³¹ Conc. Eliber. can. 38. Peregre navigantes, aut si ecclesia in proximo non fuerit, posse fidelem, qui lavacrum suum integrum habet, nec sit bigamus, baptizare in necessitate positum catechumenum: ita ut si supervixerit, ad episcopum eum perducat, ut per manuum impositionem perficere possit.

³² Ibid. can. 77. Si quis diaconus regens plebem, sine episcopo vel presbytero aliquos baptizaverit, episcopus eos, per benedictionem perficere debet. Quod si ante de seculo recesserint, sub fide qua quis crediderit, poterit esse justus.

³³ Hieron. Dial. cont. Lucifer. cap. 4. See before, chap. 1. sect. 1.

³⁴ Innocent. Ep. 1. ad Decentium, cap. 3.

³⁵ Gelas. Ep. 9. ad Episc. Lucan. cap. 6.

³⁶ Gregor. lib. 3. Ep. 9.

³⁷ Euseb. lib. 6. c. 43. Οὐδὲ τῶν λοιπῶν ἔτυχε, διαφυγῶν τὴν νόσον, ὧν χρῆ μέταλαμβάνειν κατὰ τὸν τῆς ἐκκλησίας κανόνα, τὰ τε σφραγισθῆναι ὑπὸ τῆ ἐπισκόπου.

³⁸ Leo, Ep. 37. ad Leonem Raven. cap. 2. Si ab hæreticis baptismum quempiam fuisse constiterit—hoc tantum quod ibi defuit, conferatur, ut per episcopalem manuum impositionem virtutem Sancti Spiritus consequatur.

³⁹ Siric. Ep. 1. ad Himerium, cap. 1. Arianos nos cum Novatianis—per invocationem solam septiformis Spiritus, episcopalis manuum impositione catholicorum conventui sociamus. Quod etiam totus Oriens Occidensque custodit.

⁴⁰ Aug. de Trin. lib. 15. cap. 26. Neque enim aliquis discipulorum ejus dedit Spiritum Sanctum. Orabant quippe ut veniret in eos quibus manum imponebant, non ipsi eum dabant. Quem morem in suis præpositis etiam nunc servat ecclesia.

⁴¹ Ambros. de Sacram. lib. 3. cap. 2. Sequitur spirituale signaculum, quod audistis hodie legi, quia post fontem superest ut perfectio fiat quando ad invocationem sacerdotis Spiritus Sanctus infunditur.

bishop in all ordinary cases, was the only standing and regular minister of this part of confirmation, which consisted in imposition of hands and prayer, to invoke the gift of the Holy Ghost.

Yet there were some special and extraordinary cases, in which some churches, if not all, granted a licence by canon to presbyters, to minister this part of confirmation also. As when bishops, either in their presence or absence, appointed a presbyter by a particular delegation or command to do it. This was no encroachment upon the bishop's authority, nor infringement of his privilege and power, because what was done, was only done in subordination to him, and in pursuance of his command. This licence we find sometimes granted to presbyters, even in the bishop's presence; as is clear from that canon⁴² in the collection of Martin Bracaraensis, out of the canons of the Greek church, A presbyter shall not consign infants in the presence of his bishop, unless it be particularly enjoined him by his bishop. Here three things are manifestly implied: 1. That this consignation, or imposition of hands with the sign of the cross and prayer, was ordinarily the sole office of the bishop. 2. That by a special commission he might authorize presbyters to do it even in his presence. 3. That in his absence they were authorized to do it by a general commission, rather than infants or any other baptized persons should die without confirmation. And this agrees very well with what has been said before in the last section, concerning the practice of the churches of Alexandria and Egypt; though in the Western churches it was otherwise, as is evident from what has been alleged before out of Pope Innocent⁴³ and St. Jerome,⁴⁴ who tell us, That presbyters neither in the presence of the bishop, nor in his absence, were allowed to do it, but many men were forced to die without confirmation or imposition of hands, because the bishop did not come time enough to administer it to them.

Yet also in the Western churches there were some special cases, in which this consignation was allowed to be performed by presbyters. Nay, and in one case by

Sect. 5.
2dly, Presbyters might administer to the energumens.

⁴² Martin, Bracar. Collect. Canon. can. 52. Presbyter, præsentate episcopo, non signet infantes, nisi forte ab episcopo fuerit illi præceptum.

⁴³ Innoc. Ep. 1. ad Decent. cap. 3.

⁴⁴ Hieron. cont. Lucif. cap. 4.

⁴⁵ Innoc. Ep. 1. ad Decent. c. 6. De his vero baptizatis, qui postea a dæmonio, aut vitio aliquo, aut peccato interveniente, arripiuntur, quæsit dilectio tua, si a presbytero vel diacono possint aut debeant consignari: quod hoc nisi episcopus concesserit, non licet: nam eis manus imponenda non est, nisi episcopus auctoritatem dederit id faciendi. Ut autem fiat, episcopi est imperare, ut manus eis vel a presbytero, vel a cæteris clericis imponatur. Nam quomodo id fieri sine deacons also. As it was in the case of energumens, or persons possessed with evil spirits after baptism; concerning whom Pope Innocent makes this decree, in the same epistle where he prohibits presbyters from consigning in all ordinary cases: That if any one was seized⁴⁵ with an evil spirit after baptism, the bishop might give orders to a presbyter or a deacon to consign him in that condition. It was not to be done but by the bishop's authority; for he only had the power of imposition of hands; but because an energumen, who was at a great distance from the bishop, might have several chances in his journey, it was therefore thought more proper for the bishops to grant a commission to a presbyter or deacon, to give him imposition of hands at home, than to venture his falling into his distemper, by either coming to the bishop, or returning.

Another extraordinary case in which this office of imposition of hands was granted to presbyters, was, when any who had been baptized by heretics or schismatics, were, upon their return to the church, seized with a violent sickness, and in imminent danger of death, before they could go to the bishop, or the bishop come to them, to give them imposition of hands, and confirm them with that grace of the Spirit, which they could not have in heresy or schism. In that case, rather than such persons should die without this office, a commission was granted to presbyters to administer it. This we find most expressly in the first council of Orange,⁴⁶ That heretics, if they be in extremity and apparent danger of death, when they desire to become catholics, shall, in the bishop's absence, be consigned by the presbyters with chrism and benediction, that is, imposition of hands in the benediction prayer. And the like decree is made in the council of Epone,⁴⁷ That if any heretics, who lay desperately sick, upon a death-bed, desired suddenly to be converted, in that case, for the salvation of their souls, which was heartily desired, a presbyter should be permitted to give them the consolation of chrism; which they that were in health were to go to the bishop for, at their conversion. Where we may observe, that the chrismation here spoken of, was not the chrismation which presbyters were ordinarily al-

Sect. 6.
2dly, And to such as were baptized in heresy or schism, in case they were in danger of death.

magno labore poterit, ut longe constitutus energumens ad episcopum deducatur, cum, si talis casus ei in itinere acciderit, nec perferri ad episcopum, nec referri ad sua facile possit?

⁴⁶ Conc. Arausican. l. can. 2. Hæreticos in mortis discrimine positos, si catholici esse desiderent, si desit episcopus, a presbyteris cum chrismate et benedictione consignari placet.

⁴⁷ Conc. Epaunens. can. 86. Presbytero, propter salutem animarum, quam in cunctis optamus desperatis et in lecto recumbentibus hæreticis, si conversionem subitam petant, chrismate subvenire permittimus. Quod etiam omnes convertendi, si sani sunt, ab episcopo noverint expetendum. Vid. Pontifical. Damasi, Vit. Sylvestri. p. 229. ap. Crab. t. 1.

lowed to give in the Western church, but that which was joined with imposition of hands, which was peculiarly reserved to the bishop, except in such cases of extremity, when a presbyter was allowed to give it, rather than a converted heretic should die without it. And the reason of this concession was, because heretics, who were baptized out of the church, were supposed to be without the grace of the Spirit, till they received it by imposition of hands in the catholic church. For which reason, all heretics, as well those who used imposition of hands at baptism, as those that did not, received a new benediction when they returned to the unity of the church, as I have showed from St. Austin,⁴⁸ Optatus,⁴⁹ and Aleimus Avitus,⁵⁰ in another place. See Scholast. Hist. of Lay Baptism, part I. p. 86.

CHAPTER III.

OF THE MANNER OF ADMINISTERING CONFIRMATION, AND THE CEREMONIES USED IN THE CELEBRATION OF IT.

HAVING thus far considered both the subject of confirmation, or persons to whom it was administered, and the persons by whom it was administered, we are in the next place to take a view of the form and manner of its administration; in which we may observe four distinct ceremonies besides the consecration of the chrism, which were, the unction, the sign of the cross, imposition of hands, and prayer. The unction was commonly first in order, as we learn from that of Tertullian,¹ As soon as we are come out of the water, we are anointed with the blessed unction. And then we receive imposition of hands, invoking the Holy Spirit by a benediction.

The first rise and original of this unction in the church is not exactly known, and the sentiments of learned men are various about it. The late famous writer,

^{Sect. 1.}
The first ceremony of confirmation, was the unction of chrism.

^{Sect. 2.}
The original of this unction.

⁴⁸ Aug. de Bapt. lib. 3. c. 16.

⁴⁹ Optat. lib. 7. p. 109.

⁵⁰ Avitus, Ep. 24. ad Stephanum.

¹ Tertul. de Bapt. cap. 7. Exinde egressi de lavacro perungimur benedictâ unctione.—Cap. 8. Dehinc manus imponitur, per benedictionem advocans et invitans Spiritum Sanctum.

² Habert. Archieratic. p. 702. Quod divinare quidam nos volunt, apostolos in libro Praxapostolor. confirmâsse cum chrismate, id rationem fugit. Præfracte id contra summos theologorum persuadere nititur Petrus Aurelius in Orthodoxo contra Sirmondum.

³ Estius in Sent. lib. 4. Dist. 7. sect. 7. Communior sententia est, apostolos initio suæ prædicationis non usos fuisse chrismate in administratione hujus sacramenti.

under the feigned name of Petrus Aurelius, in his book called Orthodoxus, against Sirmond, takes a great deal of pains to prove it an apostolical practice. But Habertus² calls this a dream and a mad undertaking, against the general stream and current of learned men. And Estius says,³ The common opinion is, that the apostles, in the beginning of their preaching, used no chrism in the administration of this sacrament, as he calls it. So that what the Romanists now make the matter of their new sacrament, is confessed to be without any foundation in Scripture. Bishop Pearson⁴ is of opinion, that the use of it came into the church shortly after the time of the apostles. Basnage⁵ and Daillé⁶ think not till the third century, when it is first mentioned by Origen⁷ and Tertullian. Some indeed allege an author more ancient than either of these, which is Theophilus Antiochenus,⁸ who says, That we are therefore called Christians, because we are anointed with the oil of God. But the unction he speaks of is a spiritual and mystical unction, such as, he says, the whole air and earth under heaven is anointed with, viz. the unction of light and the Spirit of God. So that there being no author before Tertullian, who mentions the material unction as used in confirmation, it is most probable it was a ceremony first begun about his time, to represent the unction of the Holy Ghost.

But when it was once admitted, it was usually magnified as the symbol, and sometimes the instrumental cause, of very great effects. The consecration of it was supposed to work a mystical change in its nature, answerable to the change wrought in the waters of baptism, and the bread and wine in the eucharist, which Cyril of Jerusalem compares together.⁹ It was this unction, as the completion of baptism, to which they ascribed the power of making every Christian, in some sense, partaker of a royal priesthood. Which is not only said by Origen in the passage last mentioned, but by Pope Leo,¹⁰ St. Jerom,¹¹ and many others.¹² To it they also ascribed the noble effects of confirming the soul with the strength of all spiritual graces on God's part, as well as the confirmation of the professions and

^{Sect. 3.}
The form and manner of administering it, together with the effects of it.

⁴ Pearson, Lect. in Act. v. n. 6. p. 69.

⁵ Basnag. Critic. in Baron. p. 76.

⁶ Daill. de Confirm. lib. 2. cap. 2. p. 116, &c.

⁷ Origen. in Levit. Hom. 9. p. 156. Omnes quicunque unguento sacri chrismatis delibuti sunt, sacerdotes effecti sunt, sicut et Petrus ad omnem dicit ecclesiam, Vos regale sacerdotium.

⁸ Theophil. ad Autolycum, lib. 1. Bibl. Patr. G. L. t. I. p. 110. Καλούμεθα Χριστιανοί, ὅτι χρίομεθα ἔλαιον Θεοῦ.

⁹ Cyril. Catech. Myst. 3. n. 3.

¹⁰ Leo, Ser. 3. de Assumptione sua, p. 3.

¹¹ Hieron. cont. Lucif. cap. 2.

¹² Vid. Prosper. Sentent. 342. Ambros. de Initiatis, cap. 6. Aug. Ser. 3. post 40. a Sirmondo editis, in Appendice, t. 10. p. 847.

covenant made on man's part. The author of the Constitutions makes it to be on man's part βεβαίωσις τῆς ὁμολογίας, καὶ συνθηκῶν, the confirmation¹³ of the confessions and compacts made with God in baptism; and on God's part, the collation of the Holy Spirit, represented by this ceremony of anointing. Which is so frequently mentioned in every Greek writer upon this subject, that it is superfluous to refer any learned reader to them. It will be sufficient only to hint the forms of prayer which they used upon this occasion; for these will evidently show what spiritual effects they expected from this unction. Now, of these we have two ancient forms remaining, a shorter and a longer, the one an express, and the other an implicit prayer. The shorter form was conceived in these words, Σφράγις δωρεῆς Πνεύματος Ἁγίου, The seal of the gift of the Holy Spirit, as we find it in the first general council of Constantinople,¹⁴ where they order such as were baptized by heretics, to be confirmed by the unction of chrism in this form of words. And so again, in the council of Trullo¹⁵ and some private writers.¹⁶ Not to mention now, that this is the form still in use in the Euchologium of the present Greek church. But beside this shorter form, (which was only an implicit prayer, as if they had said, Let this unction be unto thee the seal of the gift of the Holy Spirit,) they had also some larger forms, which were more express prayers; one of which is in the author of the Apostolical Constitutions, under the title of an εὐχαριστία περὶ τοῦ μυστικοῦ μύρου, a thanksgiving or benediction to be used in the unction of the mystical chrism, where the bishop is ordered to anoint the party baptized, saying these words,¹⁷ O Lord God, the unbegotten, who hast no Lord, who art Lord of all, who madest the sweet savour of the knowledge of the gospel to go forth among all nations: grant now, that this chrism may be effectual in this baptized person, that the sweet savour of thy Christ may remain firm and stable in him, and that he being dead with him, may rise again and live with him. Now, this unction, in the Greek church, was not only in the forehead, but in several other parts of the body, all performed by the bishop in one and the same act; but the Latins divided the office in some places between the bishop and presbyters, as has been observed before: but whether united or divided, it was all reckoned the unction of confirmation. Which is evident from that canon of the council of Barcelona, which, speaking of presbyters receiving the consecrated chrism from their bishops, which they themselves were to use, says expressly,¹⁸ that it was for confirming neophytes, or persons newly baptized. Which is a manifest proof, that that part of the ceremony of unction, which was committed to presbyters, was reckoned a part of confirmation. And so much of it might be committed to presbyters, acting in subordination to their bishop, as the rules of every church allowed. For this part of confirmation being wholly of ecclesiastical institution, it was in the power of the church to make orders in all things concerning it, both in what manner, and by what persons she would have it performed. Which is the true reason of so much variety, as we have observed, in different churches in the administering this first ceremony of confirmation.

Together with this unction they usually joined the sign of the cross. For this ceremony they used upon all occasions, and therefore would not omit it in this solemn act of confirmation. Of this we have several clear proofs in Tertullian, Pope Leo, and others, which, because they have been already recited at large,¹⁹ in speaking of the use of the sign of the cross in baptism, I will not here repeat them; but only add, that the name consignation, which is so often used by the Latin writers to denote confirmation,²⁰ seems to have had its rise from this ceremony and custom of signing with the sign of the cross, when they gave the unction to persons baptized. And this in some measure answers to the Greek name σφραγις, which many times, though not always, denotes the sign of the cross, as used in baptism or confirmation, or any other office of religion; of which I need not here be more particular.

The most noted ceremony in this whole affair, and that which most universally prevailed, was imposition of hands; a ceremony used in all sorts of benedictions, but more peculiarly applied to ordination, reconciling of penitents, and confirmation. The Latin writers commonly speak of confirmation under this title. But some think it was not in use among the Greeks, who, they say, only used chrism, and not imposition of hands, in confirmation. But this is a great mistake: for the author of the Constitutions,²¹ in the same chapter where he rehearses the prayer of the mystical chrism, immediately sub-

¹³ Constit. Apost. lib. 3. cap. 17. lib. 7. c. 22.

¹⁴ Conc. Constant. 1. can. 7. ¹⁵ Conc. Trull. can. 95.

¹⁶ Asterius Amasen. de Filio Prodigio, ap. Photium, Cod. 271. p. 1499.

¹⁷ Constit. Apost. lib. 7. c. 44.

¹⁸ Conc. Barcinon. can. 2. Statutum est, ut cum chrisma presbyteris diœcesanis pro neophytis confirmandis datur, nihil pro liquoris pretio accipiatur, &c.

¹⁹ Book XI. chap. 9. sect. 6.

²⁰ Innoc. Ep. 1. ad Decent. c. 3. De consignandis vero infantibus, &c. Martin. Bracaren. can. 52. Presbyter non signet infantes, &c.

²¹ Constit. Apost. lib. 7. cap. 44. 'Ἐκάστου γὰρ ἡ δύναμις τῆς χειροθεσίας' εἰν γὰρ μὴ εἰς ἕκαστον τούτων ἡ ἐπίκλησις γίνηται παρὰ τοῦ εὐσεβοῦς ἱερέως τοιαύτη τις, εἰς ὕδωρ μόνον καταβαίνει ὁ βαπτιζόμενος, ὡς ἰουδαῖοι, &c.

Sect. 4. The second ceremony of confirmation was the sign of the cross.

Sect. 5. The third and most noted ceremony, imposition of hands; and fourthly, prayer joined therewith.

joins, This is the power of imposition of hands necessary for every one: for unless he that is baptized have this invocation of the holy priest, he only goes into the water as a Jew, and puts off the filth of the body, but not the filth of the soul. Therefore, though this imposition of hands be not so frequently mentioned in the Greek writers, yet it is always to be understood, as chrism is in the Latin writers, where only imposition of hands is mentioned.

The antiquity of this ceremony is by all ancient writers carried as high as the apostles, and founded upon their example and practice. There are three passages in Scripture from which they generally deduce it: Acts viii., where mention is made of the apostles' laying hands on those whom Philip had baptized. Acts xix., where St. Paul laid his hands on those whom he baptized after John's baptism. And Heb. vi. 2, where mention is made of imposition of hands among the first principles of religion. Cyprian derives it from the practice of the apostles²² laying their hands on those whom Philip baptized: For, says he, the same custom is now observed in the church, that they who are baptized, are presented to the governors of the church, that by their prayer and imposition of hands they may receive the Holy Ghost. And in other places,²³ he refers it in general to apostolical institution and practice. The anonymous author of the book concerning heretical baptism, at the end of Cyprian,²⁴ deduces it likewise from the same example of the apostles' laying hands on the Samaritans whom Philip baptized. Firmilian compares the bishop's imposition of hands to invoke the Holy Spirit, to that of St. Paul,²⁵ upon those whom he baptized at Ephesus. St. Jerom owns the Luciferian's argument to be good, when he derives this custom²⁶ from the Acts of the Apostles, and the case of the Samaritans receiving imposition of hands after Philip had baptized them: though he thinks the practice and tradition of the church sufficient to authorize such a custom in this case, as well as in several other rites belonging to baptism and other things, which had the authority of laws, though they were no where expressly commanded in Scripture; as the triple immersion in baptism, and the tasting of milk and honey in token of a new birth. St. Austin in like manner affirms²⁷ this observation descended to the governors of the church from the apostles, who prayed over those on whom they laid their hands, that they might receive the Holy Ghost. And because it might be objected, that the apostolical practice was for a quite different end, to confer on men the miraculous gift of the Spirit, empowering them to speak with new tongues; he is very careful once or twice to answer this objection, and show, that notwithstanding any such difference, this practice of imposition of hands in order to obtain the Holy Spirit, might be said to descend from the apostles. For, says he,²⁸ by the Holy Ghost, which is given only in the catholic church by imposition of hands, our forefathers would have us to understand that which the apostle says, "The love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given us." For that is the charity, which they have not who are cut off from the communion of the catholic church; and though they speak with the tongues of men and angels, and know all mysteries and all knowledge, it profits them nothing. For they have not the love of God, who love not the unity of the church; upon which account it is rightly said, that the Holy Spirit is not received but only in the catholic church. For now the Holy Spirit, which is given by imposition of hands, does not appear with sensible and temporal miracles to attest it, as it was heretofore given to recommend the first plantation of faith, and to dilate the church in its infancy. For who now expects, that they to whom imposition of ²² Cypr. Ep. 73. ad Jubaian. p. 202. Quod nunc quoque apud nos geritur, ut qui in ecclesia baptizantur, præpositis ecclesiæ offerantur, ut per nostram orationem et manus impositionem Spiritum Sanctum consequantur.

²³ Cypr. Ep. 72. ad Stephan. p. 196.

²⁴ Anonym. de Bapt. Hæretic. ap. Cypr. in Append. p. 23. Per manus impositionem episcopi datur unicuique credenti Spiritus Sanctus, sicut apostoli circa Samaritanos post Philippi baptismam manum eis imponendo fecerunt.

²⁵ Firmil. Ep. 75. ap. Cypr. p. 221.

²⁶ Hieron. cont. Lucifer. cap. 4. An nescis et jam ecclesiarum hunc esse morem, ut baptizatis postea manus imponatur, et ita invocetur Spiritus Sanctus? Exigis ubi scriptum sit? In Actibus Apostolorum. Etiamsi Scripturæ auctoritas non subesset, totius orbis in hac parte consensus instar præcepti obtinet. Nam et multa alia quæ per traditionem in ecclesiis observantur, auctoritatem sibi scriptæ legis usurpaverunt; velut in lavacro ter caput mergitare; deinde egressos lactis et mellis prægustare concordiam ad infantiam significationem.

²⁷ Aug. de Trin. lib. 15. c. 26. Orabant ut veniret in eos quibus manus imponebant, non ipsi eum dabant. Quem morem in suis præpositis etiam nunc servat ecclesia.

²⁸ Aug. de Bapt. lib. 3. cap. 16. Spiritus autem Sanctus, quod in sola catholica per manus impositionem dari dicitur, nimirum hoc intelligi majores nostri voluerunt, quod apostolus ait, Quoniam caritas Dei diffusa est in cordibus nostris per Spiritum Sanctum, qui datus est nobis. Ipsa enim est caritas, quam non habent qui ab ecclesiæ catholicæ communione præcisi sunt; ac per hoc etiamsi linguis hominum loquantur et angelorum, si sciant omnia sacramenta et omnem scientiam, &c., nihil eis prodest. Non autem habent Dei charitatem, qui ecclesiæ non diligunt unitatem; ac per hoc recte intelligitur dici, non accipi nisi in catholica Spiritus Sanctus. Neque enim temporalibus et sensibilibus miraculis attestantibus per manus impositionem modo datur Spiritus Sanctus; sicut antea dabatur ad commendationem rudis fidei, et ecclesiæ primordia dilatanda. Quis enim nunc hoc expectat, ut ii quibus manus ad accipiendum Spiritum Sanctum imponitur, repente incipient linguis loqui? Sed invisibiliter et latenter intelligitur per vinculum pacis eorum cordibus divina caritas inspirari, ut possint dicere, Quoniam caritas, &c.

hands is given to receive the Holy Spirit, should immediately begin to speak with new tongues? But the love of God is supposed to be inspired into their hearts invisibly and latently by the bond of peace, so as they may truly say, "The love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost that is given us." He gives the same answer to this pretended difficulty in another place.²⁹ "Hereby," says he, "we know that he dwells in us, by the Spirit which he hath given us." If thou findest in thy heart the love of God, thou hast the Spirit to give thee knowledge. Which is a very necessary thing. In the first age the Holy Ghost fell on them that believed, and they spake with tongues, which they had never learned, as the Spirit gave them utterance. These were signs proper for that time; for then it was necessary that the Holy Ghost should be thus demonstrated in all kinds of tongues, because the gospel was to run throughout the whole world in all sorts of languages. But this demonstration once made, it ceased. For does any man now expect to hear them speak with new tongues, who receive imposition of hands as a means to obtain the Holy Spirit? Or, when we laid hands on these infants, did any of you look when they should speak with tongues? And when they did not speak with tongues, was any one so perverse in heart, as to say, They have not received the Holy Ghost? For if they had received it, they would have spoken with tongues, as was done heretofore. If, therefore, there be no such miracles now, to testify the presence of the Spirit, how knows any man that he has received the Holy Ghost? Let him ask his own heart: if he loves the brethren, the Spirit of God abideth in him. Thus St. Austin derives imposition of hands for conveying the Spirit from the practice of the apostles, though there were very different effects then from what there are now: though men had not the gift of tongues conferred upon them, as in the days of the apostles; yet they might have other graces, sufficient both to testify the presence of the Spirit, and to entitle the act of imposition of hands to the dignity of an apostolical institution. From whence also we may observe, that charity and unity, or stedfastness in the love of God and religion, was a particular grace of the Spirit given by imposition of hands: which because heretics could not have, who were baptized out of the church, therefore they always received imposition of hands upon³⁰ their return to the church, whether they had received it in pretence among their own party before or not. For some heretics gave imposition of hands together with baptism, and others did not; but both of them received imposition of hands again upon their return to the catholic church. There is one passage more, upon which some of the ancients found this practice, which is Heb. vi. 2, where the apostle joins imposition of hands with baptism. Upon which, the author under the name of St. Ambrose³¹ notes, That it means that imposition of hands, which is supposed to confer the Holy Ghost, which is ordinarily given by the chief priests or bishops after baptism, for the confirmation of men in the unity of the church of Christ. Which exposition is repeated by Haymo³² and some later writers, and allowed as probable by Grotius and Calvin. There is one writer more, who seems to derive it from the descent of the Holy Ghost upon the apostles at the day of Pentecost. He goes under the name of Eusebius Emisenus; but learned men suppose him to be Eucherius of Lyons, or Hilary of Arles, or some other writer about the time of Pope Leo, in the middle of the fifth century. Whoever he was, the account he gives of confirmation is very particular and instructive, and therefore the whole passage may be worth translating. That which imposition of hands,³³ says he, now gives to every one in confirming neophytes, the same did the descent of the Holy Ghost then confer on all believers. But because we have said, that imposition of hands and confirmation confers something on him that is born again and regenerated in Christ; perhaps some one will be ready to think with himself, and say, What can the ministry of confirmation profit me after the mystery of baptism? If, after the font, we want the addition of a new office, then we have not received all that was necessary from the font. It is not so, beloved. For, if you observe, in the military ²⁹ Aug. Tract. 6. in 1 Joan. iii. t. 9. p. 254. In hoc cognoscimus quia manet in nobis, de Spiritu quem dedit nobis. Si enim inveneris te habere caritatem, habes Spiritum Dei ad intelligendum. Valde enim necessaria res est. Primis temporibus cadebat super credentes Spiritus Sanctus, et loquebantur linguis quas non didicerant, quomodo Spiritus dabat eis pronuntiare. Signa erant temporis opportuna. Oportebat enim ita significari in omnibus linguis Spiritum Sanctum; quia evangelium Dei per omnes linguis cursurum erat toto orbe terrarum. Significatum est illud, et transiit. Nunquid modo quibus imponitur manus ad accipiendum Spiritum Sanctum, hoc expectatur, ut linguis loquantur? Aut quando imposuimus manum istis infantibus, attendit unusquisque vestrum, utrum linguis loquerentur? Et cum videret eos linguis non loqui, ita perverso corde aliquis vestrum fuit, ut diceret, Non acceperunt isti Spiritum Sanctum?

Nam si acceperunt, linguis loquerentur, quemadmodum tunc factum est. Si ergo per hæc miracula modo testimonium presentis Spiritus Sancti non fit: unde cognoscit quisque accepisse se Spiritum Sanctum? Interrogat cor suum: si diligit fratrem, manet Spiritus Dei in illo.

³⁰ Aug. de Bapt. lib. 5. cap. 23. Propter caritatis copulationem, quod est maximum donum Spiritus Sancti, sine quo non valeant quæcunque alia sancta in homine fuerint, manus correctis hæreticis imponitur.

³¹ Ambros. in Heb. vi. 2. Impositionis manuum per quam Spiritus Sanctus accipi posse creditur: quod post baptismum ad confirmationem unitatis in ecclesia Christi a pontificibus fieri solet.

³² Haymo in Heb. vi. 2.

³³ Euseb. Emisens. Hom. de Pentecost.

life, when the emperor has chosen any one to be a soldier, he does not only set his mark or character upon him, but furnishes him with competent arms for fighting: so it is in a baptized person, the benediction is his armour. Thou hast made him a soldier; give him also the weapons of warfare. What doth it profit, though a father confer a great estate upon his child, if he do not also provide him a tutor? Now, the Holy Ghost is the keeper, and comforter, and tutor to those who are regenerated in Christ. As the Scripture saith, "Except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain." Therefore the Holy Ghost, which descends with his saving presence on the waters of baptism, there gives us the plenitude of perfection to make us innocent; but in confirmation he gives us an augmentation of grace. Because in this world we are to live all our lives among invisible enemies, and to walk in the midst of dangers; in baptism we are born again to life, but after baptism we are confirmed to fight; in baptism we are washed, but after baptism we are strengthened. And so the benefits of regeneration are sufficient for those who presently leave this world; but to them who are to live in it, the auxiliary aids of confirmation are also necessary. Regeneration by itself alone saves those who are presently received in peace into a better world; but confirmation arms and prepares those who are reserved to fight the battles and combats of this world. He that, after baptism, goes immaculate, with the innocence which he has acquired, to death, is confirmed by death; because he cannot sin after death. If here we shall ask, what advantage the apostles had by the coming of the Holy Spirit after the passion and resurrection of Christ? the Lord himself evidently shows us, saying, "I have many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now: howbeit, when he the Spirit of truth is come, he will guide you into all truth." You see, when the Holy Ghost is given, the heart of a believer is dilated and enlarged with prudence and constancy. Before the descent of the Holy Ghost, the apostles were terrified even to the denial of Christ; but after his visitation they were armed with a contempt of death, even to suffer martyrdom for his sake. Thus it is that we have redemption by Christ, but the Holy Ghost gives us the gift of spiritual wisdom, by which we are illuminated, edified, instructed, and consummated to perfection. This is the account which the ancients generally give of the original of imposition of hands; which ceremony is now wholly laid aside and disused in the Roman church, though they pretend to make another sacrament of confirmation. But this only by the way.

From the account given by this author, we clearly learn, what the ancients supposed confirmation super-added to the benefit of regeneration.

Sect. 7.
What opinion the ancients had of the necessity of confirmation.

The new birth gave innocence and pardon of sins; but the invocation of the Spirit added wisdom and strength to preserve and establish men in innocence to perfection. He also shows us what opinion the ancients had of the necessity of confirmation. It was not absolutely the same as that of baptism. For if men died immediately after baptism without imposition of hands, they were saved by their innocence which they had acquired in baptism: they needed no other confirmation but death, which was a security against all other dangers. Confirmation was only necessary to those who were to live and fight with the world and invisible powers. And this is the sense of all other writers, who speak the highest of the necessity of confirmation. The council of Eliberis having said,³⁴ That it was necessary for the bishop to consummate those by his benediction, who were baptized by deacons; adds, Yet if any one die before this can be done, he is justified by the faith which he professed in baptism. And so the author of the Apostolical Constitutions says,³⁵ If there be neither oil nor chrism, the water alone is sufficient both for the unction of the Holy Ghost and the seal of the covenant. By which we are to mollify that other harsh expression of his in another place,³⁶ where he says, That baptism without this imposition of hands and prayer of the priest, is only a bodily washing, like that of the Jews, purging the filth of the body, but not of the soul. For unless some very candid interpretation be put upon this expression, it will be highly injurious and derogatory to the saving power of baptism, which purges away sin by a spiritual regeneration. And therefore it is but reasonable to let the harsh expressions of this author be interpreted by himself, when he owns that the water of baptism is sufficient to answer all the ends of chrism or confirmation, where that is omitted not by any contempt, but for want of opportunity to receive it. And this is plainly St. Jerom's meaning, when he says, That though the practice of imposition of hands descends from the acts of the apostles;³⁷ yet in many places

³⁴ Conc. Eliber. can. 77. Si quis diaconus regens plebem, sine episcopo vel presbytero, aliquos baptizaverit, episcopus eos per benedictionem perficere debet. Quod si ante de seculo recesserint, sub fide; qua quis crediderit, poterit esse justus.

³⁵ Constit. Apost. lib. 7. c. 22. Εἰ δὲ μήτε ἔλαιον ᾗ, μήτε ὕδρον, ἀρκεῖ ὕδωρ, καὶ πρὸς χρισμίν, καὶ πρὸς σφραγίδα.

³⁶ Constit. lib. 7. c. 44.

³⁷ Hieron. cont. Lucifer. c. 4. Quod si obloqueris, Quare in ecclesia baptizatus nisi per manus episcopi non accipiat Spiritum Sanctum, quem nos asserimus in vero baptisate tribui; discere hanc observationem ex ea auctoritate descendere, quod post ascensum Domini Spiritus Sanctus descendit. Multis in locis id tamen esse factum reperimus ad honorem potius sacerdotii, quam ad legis necessitatem. Alioquin si episcopi tantum imprecatione Spiritus Sanctus

it was observed rather for the honour of the chief priesthood, than for any absolute necessity of the thing. For otherwise, if the Spirit was only obtained by the prayer of the bishop, those men must be in a deplorable condition that were baptized in villages, and castles, and remote places, by presbyters and deacons, and died before the bishop could come to visit them. All, therefore, that was necessary to salvation was conferred in baptism, which ministered such a portion of the Spirit, as was sufficient to cleanse men from sin, and qualify them for eternal life. So that when some of the ancients say, That baptism does not minister the Spirit, which was only given by imposition of hands in confirmation; as Cornelius pleads in his letter³⁸ against Novatian; and Tertullian,³⁹ who says, That we do not obtain the Holy Ghost in baptism, but are only cleansed in the water and prepared for the Holy Ghost; they are to be understood as meaning only that the Holy Ghost is not given in that full measure in baptism, as afterward by imposition of hands. They do not deny that baptism grants men remission of sins by the power of the Holy Ghost, but only that there are some further effects and operations of the Holy Spirit, which are not ordinarily conferred on men, but by the subsequent invocation of the Spirit, the increase of which men were to desire, and to receive imposition of hands in order to obtain it. In which sense it is said in the Gospel, that "the Holy Ghost was not yet given," because the apostles had not yet received that plentiful effusion of it in the gift of tongues, which they afterwards had on the day of Pentecost, though they had before received such a measure of it as both enabled them to work several sorts of miracles, and also qualified them in every respect for the kingdom of heaven.

But though the ancients did not think this imposition of hands so absolutely necessary, as that the want of it should exclude those who were baptized from the kingdom of heaven; yet they thought fit to punish the neglect of it, by setting some marks of disgrace and public censure upon such as voluntarily and carelessly omitted it, when they had opportunity to receive it. Such men were ordinarily denied the privilege of ecclesiastical promotion and holy orders. As appears from the objection made against Novatian, that he ought not to be ordained, defluit, lugendi sunt qui in villulis aut in castellis aut in remotioribus locis per presbyteros et diaconos baptizati ante dormierunt, quam ab episcopis inviserentur.

³⁸ Ap. Euseb. lib. 6. cap. 43. Τούτου μή τυχῶν, πῶς αὐ τοῦ Ἁγίου Πνεύματος ἔτυχε;

³⁹ Tertul. de Bapt. cap. 6. Non quod in aqua Spiritum Sanctum consequamur, sed in aqua emundati, sub angelo Spiritui Sancto præparamur.

⁴⁰ Euseb. lib. 6. c. 43. ⁴¹ Conc. Neocæsar. can. 12.

⁴² Conc. Eliber. can. 38.

¹ Cyril. Catech. Myst. 4. n. 2. Ἐνδυσάμενος τὰ πνευμα-

tica λευκά, χορὴ λευχειμονεῖν διαπαντός, &c. ² Lactant. Carmen de Resur. Dom. Fulgentes animas vestis quoque candida signat; Et græge de niveo gaudia pastor habet. Moschus, Prat. Spir. cap. 207. Ἰδόντες αὐτὴν λευκοφοροῦσαν, &c. Paulin. Ep. 12. ad Sever. p. 145. Unde parens sacro ducit de fonte sacerdos Infantes niveos corpore, corde, habitu. ³ Pallad. Vit. Chrysost. cap. 9. ⁴ Socrat. lib. 5. cap. 8. ⁵ Sozom. lib. 7. cap. 8. Τὴν μυτικὴν ἐσθῆτα ἔτι ἡμφιεσμένους, &c.

because being baptized privately with clinic baptism, he had afterward neglected to receive his consummation from the hands of the bishop, which⁴⁰ he ought to have done by the laws of the church. And to this purpose the council of Neocæsarea⁴¹ has a canon, forbidding such to be ordained; which is made part of the code of the universal church. The council of Eliberis also⁴² excludes such as have not lavacrum integrum, their own baptism completed by imposition of hands, from the privilege of giving baptism to others, which in cases of necessity they allowed to all other laymen. So far they thought fit to discountenance the contempt and neglect of confirmation, though they neither esteemed it a distinct sacrament from baptism, nor of absolute necessity to salvation, but only as a proper means to strengthen men in their Christian warfare.

CHAPTER IV.

OF THE REMAINING CEREMONIES OF BAPTISM FOLLOWING CONFIRMATION.

MUCH about the same time as the unction of confirmation was administered to persons newly baptized, they were also clothed in white garments. In the Latin church it came immediately before confirmation, but in the Greek church it seems to have followed after. For Cyril of Jerusalem speaks of it as following the unction.¹ This was to represent their having put off the old man with his deeds, and having put on the new man Christ Jesus. Hence they were called λευχειμονοῦντες, and græc Christi candidus et niveus, the white flock of Christ,² as we find in Lactantius and many others. Palladius, in the Life of St. Chrysostom,³ notes it particularly, as a great piece of barbarity in Arcadius, that when St. Chrysostom's presbyters in his exile had baptized three thousand persons at one festival, the emperor sent his soldiers to disperse them, as they were λευχειμονοῦντες, clothed in their white garments. This was otherwise called, the garment of Christ, and the mystical garment. For so Socrates⁴ and Sozomen,⁵ speaking of the ordination of Nectarius, bishop of Constan-τικά λευκά, χορὴ λευχειμονεῖν διαπαντός, &c.

Sect. 1. Persons newly baptized, clothed in white garments.

² Lactant. Carmen de Resur. Dom.

Fulgentes animas vestis quoque candida signat;

Et græge de niveo gaudia pastor habet.

Moschus, Prat. Spir. cap. 207. Ἰδόντες αὐτὴν λευκοφοροῦσαν, &c. Paulin. Ep. 12. ad Sever. p. 145.

Unde parens sacro ducit de fonte sacerdos

Infantes niveos corpore, corde, habitu.

³ Pallad. Vit. Chrysost. cap. 9. ⁴ Socrat. lib. 5. cap. 8.

⁵ Sozom. lib. 7. cap. 8. Τὴν μυτικὴν ἐσθῆτα ἔτι ἡμφιεσμένους, &c.

tinople, which was immediately given him after his baptism, say, He was ordained whilst he had his mystical garment on; meaning this white robe, which had just before been given him at his baptism. St. Jerom⁶ also, writing to Fabiola, seems to allude to this, when he says, We are to be washed with the precepts of God, and when we are prepared for the garment of Christ, putting off our coats of skins, we shall put on the linen garment, that hath nothing of death in it, but is all white, that rising out of the waters of baptism, we may gird about our loins with truth, and cover the former filthiness of our breasts. Some also allege two other passages of his in his epistles to Pope Damasus,⁷ where he speaks of his having put on the garment of Christ at Rome. But others, who have more exactly⁸ considered the time of St. Jerom's baptism, and the same phrase as used by him in other places, more probably conclude, that he means the monastic habit, which he elsewhere⁹ calls the garment of Christ, and not the albes of baptism. However, not insisting on those dubious passages of St. Jerom, the ancient custom is sufficiently attested from other authors.

Some of which also tell us, that these garments were wont to be delivered to the neophytes with a solemn form of words, in the nature of a charge: such as that in Gregory's Sacramentarium,¹⁰ Receive the white and immaculate garment, which thou mayest bring forth without spot before the tribunal of our Lord Jesus Christ, that thou mayest have eternal life. Amen.

These garments were commonly worn eight days, and then laid up in the church. St. Austin, or some one under his name,¹¹ speaks of the Sunday after Easter, as the time appointed for this purpose. That was the conclusion of the Paschal festival, and then the neophytes changed their habit; whence that day is thought to have the name of Dominica in Albis; and Whit-Sunday is said to be so called from this custom of wearing white robes after baptism. These, being laid aside, were carefully preserved in the vestries of the church, as an evidence against men, if afterward they violated those professions which they had made in baptism. A remarkable instance of which we have related in Victor Uticensis, concerning one Elpidiphorus, a citizen of Carthage, who having a long time lived in the communion of the church, at last turned Arian, and became a bitter enemy to the orthodox in the Vandalic persecution. Among others, whom he summoned before him as their judge, was one Muritta, a deacon, who had been sponsor for him at his baptism. He, being ready to be put upon the rack, produced against him those white robes with which he had been clothed at his baptism; and with words¹² melting all the whole city into tears, he thus bespoke him: These are the garments, O Elpidiphorus, thou minister of error, which shall accuse thee, when the majesty of the great Judge shall appear; these I will diligently keep as a testimony of thy ruin, which shall depress thee to the bottom of the lake that burns with fire and brimstone. These are they that were girt about thee, when thou camest immaculate out of the holy font; these are they that shall bitterly pursue thee, when thou shalt begin to take thy portion in the flames of hell; because thou hast clothed thyself with cursing as with a garment, and hast cast off the sacred obligation of thy baptism, and the true faith which thou didst then profess and take upon thee. So that the design of this significant ceremony was, first to represent that innocence and angelical purity, which every man obtained by the remission of his sins in baptism, and then to remind them of the obligations and professions they had entered into, which, if they violated, would rise up as so many accusers at the day of judgment.

To this ceremony of wearing white robes, they added another of the like nature, which was the carrying of lighted tapers in their hands. I cannot say this was so universal a practice as the former, but it is mentioned by Gregory Nazianzen among other ceremonies following baptism. The station, says he, when immediately after bap-

⁶ Hieron. Ep. 128. ad Fabiol. Præceptis Dei lavandi sumus, et cum parati ad indumentum Christi, tunicas pellicæ deposuerimus, tunc induemur veste lineæ, nihil in se mortis habente, sed tota candida, ut de baptismo consurgentes, cingamus lumbos in veritate.

⁷ Id. Ep. 57. ad Damas. Cathedram Petri, et fidem apostolico ore laudatam censui consulendam; inde nunc animæ postulans cibum, unde olim Christi vestimenta suscepi. It. Ep. 78. ad Damas. Christi vestem in Romana urbe suscipiens, nunc barbaro Syriæ limite teneor.

⁸ See Wall of Infant Baptism, par. ii. chap. 3. sect. 10.

⁹ Hieron. Ep. 22. ad Eustoch. c. 1.

¹⁰ Gregor. Sacrament. de Bapt. Infant. Vestitur infans dicente presbytero, Accipe vestem candidam et immaculatam, quam perferas sine macula ante tribunal Domini nostri Jesu Christi, ut habeas vitam æternam. Amen. Ordo Roman. de S. Sabbato. Bibl. Patr. t. 10. p. 83. Deportantur ipsi infantes ante eum, et dat singulis stolam candidam et decem siliquas et chrimale, dicens, Accipe vestem candidam, &c.

¹¹ Aug. Hom. 86. de Diversis, in Octavis Paschæ, t. 10. p. 709. Paschalis sollemnitas hodierna festivitate concluditur, et ideo hodie neophytorum habitus commutatur; ita tamen, ut candor, qui de habitu deponitur, semper in corde teneatur.

¹² Victor. de Persec. Vandal. lib. 5. Bibl. Patr. t. 7. p. 613. Hæc sunt linteamina, Elpidiphore, minister erroris, quæ te accusabunt, dum majestas venerit judicantis; custodiende diligentia mea ad testimonium tuæ perditionis, ad demergendum te in abyssu putei sulphurantis. Hæc te immaculatum cinxerant de fonte surgentem; hæc te acriter persequuntur, flammantem Gehennam cum cæperis possidere, &c.

Sect. 2.
These sometimes delivered to them with a solemn form of words.

Sect. 3.
Worn eight days, and then laid up in the church.

Sect. 4.
The ceremony of lights and tapers. What intended by it. And at whose charge both these were provided.

tism thou shalt be placed before the altar, is an emblem of the glory of the life to come; the psalmody with which thou shalt be received, is a foretaste of those hymns and songs of a better life; and the lamps which thou shalt light,¹³ are a figure of those lamps of faith, wherewith bright and virgin souls shall go forth to meet the Bridegroom. Others refer it to another reason, that it might be a symbol of their own present illumination, and as done in allusion to that saying of our Saviour, "So let your light shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven." In some baptisms also of great men, we find these ceremonies enlarged and set off with greater pomp; for not only they themselves, but all their retinue and attendance were clothed in white garments, and all carried lamps in their hands. As it was in the magnificent baptism of the younger Theodosius, related in an epistle of Marcus Gazensis¹⁴ published by Baronius; where he says, The procession from the church to the palace was extremely splendid; for the leaders of the people were all clothed in white, which made the company look as if it had been covered with snow; and all the senators, and men of quality, and soldiers in their ranks carried lamps in their hands, that one would have thought the stars had appeared upon earth. The expense of these things, especially when so very sumptuous and magnificent, we may reasonably suppose, was defrayed by every person at his own proper cost and charge. And so the objection which some make in Gregory Nazianzen against baptism, upon the account of the charge attending it, plainly intimates. For thus they object against it: Where is the gift that I shall offer at baptism? where is the garment¹⁵ of light in which I must shine? wherewithal shall I entertain my baptizers? To which Nazianzen replies, That in great things men should not be concerned about such small matters as these. For the sacrament itself was far above these visible objects. Therefore offer thyself for a gift, put on Christ for a garment, and let thy entertainment of me, the minister, be a holy conversation. God requires no great thing of us, which the poor cannot give. From whence we may conclude, that either these ceremonies were omitted in the baptism of poor men, or else the church herself was at the charge of them. Which some think may be inferred from the donations of Constantine made to the baptisteries of Rome, mentioned in the Pontifical, in the Life of Pope Sylvester; but it may more certainly be proved from the epistles of Pope Gregory,¹⁶ where he often mentions his giving these garments to the poor, who could not provide them for themselves.

Another ceremony used to congratulate such as were newly baptized, upon their admission and incorporation into the church, was the kiss of peace. Which was observed even towards infants, as we learn from that objection raised against it in Cyprian; where the opponents pleaded for deferring baptism till the child was eight days old, because children at their birth were unclean, and every one abhorred to kiss them, as was necessary to be done after baptism, to testify their right of fraternity upon their adoption into God's family. To which Cyprian replied, That this was no impediment to their baptism; for all things were clean to them that were clean. No one ought to abhor that which God had vouchsafed to make. For though an infant was but just born, yet he was then in such a condition, as no one ought to abhor¹⁷ in giving him the grace of baptism, or imparting to him the kiss of peace. This custom is also mentioned by St. Austin,¹⁸ and it seems to be founded upon that apostolical rule, observed in the eucharist and other holy offices, of saluting one another with a holy kiss, in token of their most cordial affection, and acknowledging one another as brethren. St. Chrysostom gives another reason why it was called, the peace, or the kiss of peace, because men were now reconciled to God by baptism, and restored to his peace and favour. For elegantly comparing the two natiivities of man together, the natural and the spiritual, he says, The first birth is always attended with tears and lamentations, nature as it were presaging the subsequent sorrows and miseries of life: but in the second birth it is otherwise: here are no tears or mournings, but salutations, and kisses, and embracings of the brethren, who acknowledge the person baptized as one of their own members, and receive

Sect. 5.
The kiss of peace given to persons newly baptized.

¹³ Naz. Orat. 40. de Bapt. p. 672.

¹⁴ Ap. Baron. an. 401. t. 5. p. 134. Baptizato juniori Theodosio, et ab ecclesia egresso in palatium, licebat rursus intueri decorem eorum qui praeerant multitudini, et vestem eorum refulgentem. Erat enim omnes candidati, ut existimaretur multitudo esse nive repleta. Praecedebant autem patricii, illustres, et omnis dignitas cum ordinibus militariibus, omnes portantes cereos, ut putarentur astra cerni in terra.

¹⁵ Naz. Orat. 40. de Bapt. p. 655. Πού δὲ ἐμφώτειος ἐσθίης, ἢ λαμπρυνθήσομαι, &c.

¹⁶ Greg. lib. 7. Ep. 24. ad Faust. Quoscumque ex iis pauperes, et ad vestem sibi emendam non sufficere posse cognoscis: te eis vestem, quam ad baptismum habeant, comparare volumus ac praebere. Vid. lib. 4. Ep. 16.

¹⁷ Cypr. Ep. 59. al. 64. ad Fidum, p. 160. Nam et quod vestigium infantis in primis partibus suis diebus constituit, mundum non esse dixisti, quod unusquisque nostrum adhuc horreat exosculari; nec hoc putamus ad caelestem gratiam dandam impedimento esse oportere; scriptum est enim, Omnia munda sunt mundis. Nec aliquis nostrum id debet horrere, quod Deus dignatus est facere. Nam etsi adhuc infans a partu novus est, non ita est tamen, ut quisquam illum in gratia danda atque in pace facienda exosculari horrere debeat, &c.

¹⁸ Aug. cont. Epist. Pelag. lib. 4. cap. 8.

him as one returning from a long peregrination out of his own country. For because before his baptism he was an enemy, but after baptism is made a friend of our common Lord, we therefore all rejoice with him: and upon this account, the¹⁹ kiss has the name of peace, that we may learn thereby, that God has ended the war, and received us into familiarity and friendship with himself. Hence it is, that to give the peace to any one, is the same thing many times in the writings of the ancients, as to salute him with the holy kiss, in the phrase of the apostle.

They were used also to give to the newly baptized a little taste of honey and milk: which Salmasius and some others²⁰ suppose to be given them instead of the eucharist; but that is a mistake, for the eucharist was given them at the same time. The ancients themselves give another reason for it. St. Jerom²¹ and Tertullian²² say it was to signify their new birth, and that they were now as children adopted into God's family. Tertullian says moreover,²³ That the Marcionites retained the custom for the same reason as they did many other usages of the church. St. Jerom²⁴ says further, That in some of the Western churches, the mixture was made up of milk and wine instead of honey, and this in allusion to those passages of the apostle, "I have fed you with milk, and not with strong meat;" and St. Peter's saying, "As new-born babes, desire the sincere milk of the word." For milk denotes the innocence of children. Clemens Alexandrinus also²⁵ takes notice of this custom, saying, As soon as we are born, we are nourished with milk, which is the nutriment of the Lord. And when we are born again, we are honoured with the hope of rest by the promise of Jerusalem which is above, where it is said to rain milk and honey. For by these material things we are assured of that sacred food. We learn further, from the third council of Carthage, that this milk and honey had a peculiar consecration distinct from that of the eucharist. It is there said to be offered at the altar,²⁶ on a day most solemn, (which means the great sabbath, or Saturday before Easter, which was the most solemn time of baptism,) and there to have its proper benediction for the mystery of infants, (that is, persons newly baptized, who are commonly called infants in the mystical sense,) that it might be distinguished from the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ. This part of the canon indeed is omitted in some collections, but Labbe says it was in the ancient manuscripts, and it is now so read in the body of the African²⁷ Code; which puts the matter beyond all dispute. I have given this canon with a little explanatory paraphrase, because some learned men complain of the obscurity of it, and profess themselves to be in the dark about the mystery of infants, which seems to me evidently to refer to this custom of giving milk and honey to the newly baptized.

When persons were thus adopted into God's family, and acknowledged as brethren in Christ, then they were admitted as sons to call upon God their Father, and immediately required to do it in the form of words taught us by Christ. The author of the Constitutions²⁸ bids them repeat the Lord's prayer standing upright, because they were now risen with Christ from the dead: and after that repeat this other short form: "Almighty God, the Father of Christ, thy only begotten Son, give me an immaculate body, a pure heart, a watchful soul, an unerring knowledge, with the influence of the Holy Ghost, that I may possess and enjoy the fulness of the truth, through thy Christ, by whom all glory be to thee in the Holy Ghost for ever. Amen." St. Chrysostom²⁹ also mentions their repeating the Lord's prayer presently after their coming up out of the water; and that standing also, not falling upon their faces, but looking up to Christ, to whose body they are united, as he sits above in heaven, where Satan has no access. And this was the first time they were allowed to use this prayer. For till men were baptized, and made sons of God by regeneration, they were not allowed to call God their Father. And though they learned the Lord's prayer before baptism, yet they were not permitted till after baptism to use it as a prayer publicly in the church.

Among other ceremonies after baptism, Gregory Nazianzen mentions their reception with psalmody,³⁰ which, ¹⁹ Chrys. Serm. 50. de Util. Legendæ Scripturæ, t. 5. p. 686. Διὰ τοῦτο καὶ τὸ φίλημα εἰρήνη καλεῖται, ἵνα μάθωμεν ὅτι πόλεμον κατέλυσεν ὁ Θεός, καὶ πρὸς τὴν οἰκείωσιν ἐπανήγαγε τὴν ἑαυτοῦ.

²⁰ Salmas. ap. Suicer. Thesaur. Part. 2. p. 1136.

²¹ Hieron. cont. Lucif. cap. 4. Deinde egressos lactis et mellis prægustare concordiam ad infantia significationem.

²² Tertul. de Coron. Mil. c. 3. Inde suscepti lactis et mellis prægustamus concordiam.

²³ It. cont. Marcion. lib. 1. cap. 14. Sed et ille usque nec aquam reprobavit creatoris, qua suos abluit, nec oleum quo suos unxit, nec mellis et lactis societatem, qua suos infantat, nec panem, quo ipsum corpus suum repræsentat.

²⁴ Hieron. in Esai. lv. 1. Lac significat innocentiam parvulorum. Qui mos ac typos in Occidentis ecclesiis hodie usque servatur, ut renatis in Christo vinum lacque tribuatur. De quo lacte dicebat et Paulus, Lac vobis potum dedi, non solidum cibum. Et Petrus; Quasi modo nati parvuli, rationale lac desiderate.

²⁵ Clem. Alex. Pædagog. lib. 1. cap. 6. p. 103.

²⁶ Conc. Carth. 3. can. 24. Primitiæ vero, seu mel et lac, quod uno die sollemnissimo pro infantis mysterio solet offerri, quamvis in altari offeratur, suam tamen habet propriam benedictionem, ut a sacramento Dominici corporis ac sanguinis distinguatur.

²⁷ Codex Eccles. Afric. can. 37. ap. Justellum.

²⁸ Constit. Apost. lib. 7. cap. 44 et 45.

²⁹ Chrys. Hom. 6. in Colos. p. 1953.

³⁰ Naz. Orat. 40. de Bapt. p. 672.

Sect. 6.
And a taste of honey and milk, in token of their new birth.

Sect. 7.
Then required to say the Lord's prayer.

Sect. 8.
Received with psalmody.

he says, was a prælium or foretaste of those hymns and praises which should be the employment of the life to come. But whether this means any particular psalms appointed to be sung at baptism, or the common psalmody of the church, he does not inform us. If I may be allowed to conjecture, I should conclude for the former, because the common psalmody of the church was no more than what catechumens were allowed to hear before, as being part of the missa catechumenorum, or first service, at which not only catechumens, but professed Jews and heathens might be present. Perhaps they sung the 118th Psalm, in which are these words, "This is the day which the Lord hath made, we will rejoice and be glad in it;" because St. Austin,³¹ speaking of the Easter festival, seems to refer to it, saying, This is the day which the Lord hath made, higher than all, brighter than all, in which he hath acquired to himself a new people by the Spirit of regeneration, and hath filled our minds with joy and gladness. And Paulinus³² speaks of singing hallelujahs upon this occasion. But in doubtful matters I will not be over-positive to determine.

It is more certain, that as soon as the ceremonies of baptism were finished, men were admitted to a participation of the eucharist. For this was the τὸ πᾶσιον, the perfection or consummation of a Christian, to which he was entitled by virtue of his baptism. Therefore all the ancient writers speak of this as the concluding privilege of baptism, which in those days was always immediately subjoined to it. And this was observed, not only with respect to adult persons, but children also. For proof of which custom, at present it will be sufficient to allege the testimony of Gennadius,³³ who joins the baptism of infants, and confirmation, and the eucharist all together. And this continued to the ninth century, as appears from the rituals of that age, some of which have been produced before,³⁴ and many others might be added; but these belong to another place, where it will be more proper to treat of the communion of infants among other things that relate to the subject of the eucharist, which, together with the ancient psalmody, reading of the Scriptures, preaching, and prayers, which make up the whole ordinary service of the church, under the name of missa catechumenorum, and missa fidelium, will be the subject of the next volume, which is intended to give an account of the liturgy of the church.

Sect. 9.
And admitted immediately to the communion of the altar.

There was one ceremony more, used in some churches, but rejected by others, which it will not be improper to give some account of here in the close: that was the custom of washing the feet of the baptized. Vicecomes³⁵ thinks, at first it was a ceremony preceding baptism, and used on Maundy Thursday, or the same day that our Saviour (from whose example it was taken) washed his disciples' feet. And this seems to be clear, he says, from St. Austin's words, who has occasion to mention it in two of his epistles. But in the former epistle,³⁶ St. Austin is speaking of the custom of bathing the whole body before Easter, that the catechumens, who had neglected themselves in the observation of Lent, might not appear offensive when they came to be baptized: therefore Maundy Thursday was chosen as the day to cleanse themselves, by bathing, from the bodily filth which they had contracted. And because this was allowed to the catechumens, many others chose to bathe themselves with them on that day also, and relax their fast, because fasting and bathing would not agree together. So that this washing was not the washing of the feet, however Vicecomes came to mistake it, but the bathing of the whole body; and not used as a religious ceremony, but as a ceremony of convenience and civil decency, that they might not be offensive to the senses of others, when they came to baptism. In the other epistle he speaks particularly of washing the feet, but that was after baptism, on the third day, or the octaves, or such other time as those churches which retained the ceremony thought fit to appoint it. For many churches,³⁷ he says, would never admit of this custom at all, lest it should seem to belong to the

Sect. 10.
Of the ceremony of washing the feet, retained in some churches.

³¹ Aug. Serm. 163. de Tempore, t. 10. p. 332. Hic est dies, dilectissimi, quem fecit Dominus, celsior cunctis, lucidior universis, in quo sibi novam plebem, ut videtis, regenerationis Spiritu conquisivit, &c.

³² Paulin. Ep. 12. ad Sever. p. 145.
Hinc senior sociæ congaudet turba catervæ;
Alleluia novis balat ovile choris.

³³ Gennad. de Eccles. Dogm. cap. 52. Si parvuli sint, qui doctrinam non capiunt, respondeant pro illis qui eos offerunt, juxta morem baptizandi: et sic manûs impositione et chrismate communiti, eucharistiæ mysteriis admittantur.

³⁴ Book XII. chap. 1. sect. 2.
³⁵ Vicecom. de Ritib. Bapt. lib. 3. cap. 20.

³⁶ Aug. Ep. 118. ad Januarium, p. 213. Si autem quæris, cur etiam lavandi mos ortus sit: nihil mihi de hac re cogitanti probabilius occurrit, nisi quia baptizandorum corpora per observationem quadragessimæ sordidata, cum offensione sensûs ad fontem tractarentur, nisi aliqua die lavarentur. Istum autem diem potius ad hoc electum quo cœna Domini anniversarie celebratur. Et quia concessum est hoc baptismum accepturis, multi cum his lavare voluerunt, jejuniûm-que relaxare.

³⁷ Aug. Ep. 119. ad Januar. cap. 18. De lavandis vero pedibus, cum Dominus hoc propter formam humilitatis, propter quam docendam venerat, commendaret, sicut ipse consequenter exposuit, quæsitum est, Quonam tempore potissimum res tanta etiam facta doceretur, et in illud tempus occurrit, quo ipsa commendatio religiosus inhæreret. Sed ne ad ipsum sacramentum baptismi videretur pertinere, multi hoc in consuetudinem recipere noluerunt. Nonnulli etiam de consuetudine auferre non dubitarunt. Aliqui autem, ut hoc sacratiore tempore commendarent, et a baptismi sacramento distinguerent, vel diem tertium octavarum, quia ternarius numerus in multis sacramentis maxime sacrament of baptism, when our Saviour only intended it as a lesson of humility. And other churches, for the same reason, abrogated the custom, where it had been received. And others, who retained it, that they might recommend it by fixing it to some more sacred time, and yet distinguish it from the sacrament of baptism, chose either the third day of the octaves, or the octave after baptism itself, as most convenient for this purpose. Among the churches which wholly refused, or abrogated this custom, the Spanish church is one, which in the council of Eliberis made a canon against it; forbidding at once the exacting any gift or reward for administering baptism, lest the priest should seem to sell what he freely received; (of which I have given a full³⁸ account, in speaking of the revenues of the church;) and also forbidding the priests,³⁹ or any other of the clergy, to wash the feet of such as were baptized. Among those churches which never received this custom, we may reckon the Roman church; and among those which always received it, the church of Milan, whose practice is opposed to the Roman by St. Ambrose, or whoever was the author of the books De Sacramentis, and De iis qui Mysteriis initiantur, among his works. He says,⁴⁰ In the church of Milan the bishop was used to wash the feet of the baptized. But the Roman church had not this custom. And he thinks they might decline it, because of the multitude of those that were baptized. But they of the Roman church pleaded, that it was not to be done by way of mystery in baptism or regeneration, but only by way of humility, as the custom of washing the feet of strangers. But on the contrary, the church of Milan pleaded, that it was not merely a business of humility, but of mystery and sanctification, because Christ said to Peter, "Except I wash thy feet, thou hast no part with me." This I urge, says our author, not to reprehend others, but to commend my own office. For though we desire to follow the Roman church, yet we are men that have our senses about us. And therefore we observe that practice, which we conceive to be righter in other churches. He adds further, That this was not done⁴¹ to obtain remission of sins, for that was already done in baptism: but because Adam was supplanted by the devil, and the serpent's poison was cast upon his feet, therefore men were washed in that part for greater sanctification, that he might have no power to supplant them any further. These were the reasons given by the church of Milan, for their adhering to this practice: but they were not so strong as to prevail with others, and so this custom never got any great footing in the Christian church.

I have now gone over the most material ceremonies and usages of the church, observed about the administration of baptism, as well those that went before, as those that accompanied the action itself, and those that followed after; and, as near as I could, delivered them in the same order and manner as she herself observed them. And shall here close the discourse only with one general reflection, which may be of some use to vindicate the practice of the present church, and give satisfaction to such sober dissenters as scruple our office of baptism for the sake of an innocent, significant ceremony or two retained in it. The candid reader may observe throughout this discourse, that not only one or two, but many significant ceremonies were observed by the ancient church in the administration of baptism; particularly, the sign of the cross was used at least four or five times in the whole process of the action. Therefore they who now raise objections against the present office, had they lived in the primitive times, must have had much more reason to complain of the ancient practice. And yet we do not ordinarily find objections raised against the baptism of the church, upon the account of the ceremonies she used therein, no, not even by those who in other things differed from her. Which consideration, methinks, should a little satisfy those, who really value the peace and unity of the church, and be an argument to them not to dissent from the practice of the present church, for those things which must more forcibly have obliged them to have been dissenters in all ages. I know not how far this consideration may prevail upon any, but I know how far it ought to prevail upon

Sect. 11.
A general reflection upon the whole preceding discourse, with relation to the practice of the present church.

excellit, vel etiam ipsum octavum, ut hoc facerent, elegerunt.

³⁸ Book V. chap. 4. sect. 14.

³⁹ Conc. Eliber. can. 48. Emendari placuit, ut hi qui baptizantur (ut fieri solet) nummos in concham non mittant, ne sacerdos, quod gratis accepit, pretio distrahere videatur. Neque pedes eorum lavandi sunt a sacerdotibus vel clericis.

⁴⁰ Ambros. de Sacram. lib. 3. cap. 1. Succinctus summus sacerdos pedes tibi lavit.—Non ignoramus, quod ecclesia Romana hanc consuetudinem non habeat, cujus typum in omnibus sequimur et formam: hanc tamen consuetudinem non habet, ut pedes lavet. Vide ergo ne propter multitudinem declinarit. Sunt tamen qui dicant, et excusare conentur, quia hoc non mysterio faciendum est, non in bap-tismate, non in regeneratione: sed quasi hospiti pedes lavandi sunt. Aliud est humilitatis, aliud sanctificationis. Denique audi, quia mysterium est, et sanctificatio. Nisi laveris tibi pedes, non habebis mecum partem. Hoc ideo dico, non quod alios reprehendam, sed mea officia ipse commendem. In omnibus cupio sequi ecclesiam Romanam, sed tamen et nos homines sensum habemus. Ideo quod alibi rectius servatur, et nos recte custodimus.

⁴¹ Ibid. In bap-tismate omnis culpa diluitur. Recedit ergo culpa: sed quia Adam supplantatus a diabolo est, et venenum ei suffusum est supra pedes, ideo lavas pedes, ut in ea parte, in qua insidiatus est serpens, majus subsidium sanctificationis accedat, quo postea te supplantare non possit. He repeats this reason in his Book de Initiatis, cap. 6.

all that love the peace and study the quiet of the church, and therefore I could not but in this place here seasonably suggest it.

CHAPTER V.

OF THE LAWS AGAINST REBAPTIZATION BOTH IN CHURCH AND STATE.

To what has been said about baptism, it will not be improper to add something about the laws made both in church and state against the repetition of it, when once duly performed. The ancients generally determine against a repetition of baptism; though Vossius thinks¹ their reasons are not always strictly conclusive. Some argued, that baptism was not to be repeated, because we are baptized into the death of Christ, who died but once. So St. Basil,² and St. Austin.³ But Vossius thinks there is no weight in this argument, because that which is but once done, may be often represented; as the sacrament of the eucharist is often repeated, though it also be in remembrance of the Lord's death till he come. Others prove it from those words of our Saviour, John xiii. 10, "He that is washed needeth not save to wash his feet, but is clean every whit." This argument is used by Optatus, St. Austin, Fulgentius, Pacianus, and St. Ambrose. But Vossius thinks there is as little force in this reason as the former; because men may become polluted and unclean after baptism, and so have need of a second washing, if there were no other reason against it. Others argued from those words of the apostle, Heb. vi. 4, "It is impossible for those who are once enlightened, if they shall fall away, to renew them again unto repentance." The ancient expositors, Chrysostom, Theodoret, Primasius, Sedulius, and Haimo, understand this as a prohibition of renewing men to repentance again by a second baptism; for they do not deny absolutely the possibility of a second repentance or pardon, but only upon a second baptism. And so Vossius says it is also expounded by Epiphanius,⁴ Cyril of Alexandria,⁵ St. Jerom,⁶ St. Austin,⁷ and St. Ambrose.⁸ But he thinks their exposition not so agreeable to this place, as that of others, who interpret the falling away, either to mean the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, or what St. John calls "a sin unto death," or a total apostacy from the Christian religion, for which there is no renewal of repentance. But I will not be so positive as Vossius, that any of these are better interpretations of that text, which is so unanimously urged by the ancients against the Novatians, as a prohibition, not simply of a second repentance, but of a repentance by a second baptism. Others made use of those words of the apostle, Eph. iv. "One faith, one baptism." Which is the argument urged by Cyril of Jerusalem and Pope Leo against rebaptization. But this, as Vossius observes, probably was not intended as a prohibition of a second baptism, but only to declare the community of that baptism, which is received one and the same by all, without exception. As the apostle calls the eucharist "one bread," not because it was only once to be received, but because it was that common bread, of which all were partakers. The true reason, Vossius thinks, why baptism is not to be repeated, is the Divine will that so appointed it. For there is no command to reiterate baptism, as there is to repeat the eucharist, in the words of institution. Neither is there any example of any rebaptization in Scripture, though we often read of men's falling into gross and scandalous sins after baptism. To which may be added, that baptism succeeds in the room of circumcision, being the entrance and seal of the covenant, which, on God's part, is never broken: so that as circumcision was never repeated, though the passover was yearly; in like manner, men enter into the covenant by baptism, and their breaches of the covenant are not to be repaired by repeated baptisms, but by confession and repentance, which is the method prescribed by the apostle for restoring fallen brethren. St. Jerom⁹ observes, that though there were many heretics in the apostles' days, as the Nicolaitans and others, yet there was no command given to rebaptize them upon their repentance. And Optatus¹⁰ makes the unity of circumcision a good argument for the unity of baptism, in which both the catholics and Donatists agreed. For though the Donatists rebaptized the catholics, yet they did it not under the notion of a second baptism, but as supposing they had received no true baptism before.

Indeed, among all the ancient heretics, we find none for a plurality of baptisms, but only the Marcionites. Which Epiphanius observes to have been an invention of Marcion, their first founder,

Sect. 2. Only the Marcionites allowed baptism to be thrice repeated.

¹ Voss. de Bapt. Disp. 17. n. 5. p. 210.

² Basil. de Spir. Sancto, cap. 15.

³ Aug. de Vera et Falsa Pœnit. cap. 3.

⁴ Epiphanius. Hær. 59. Novatianor.

⁵ Cyril. lib. 5. in Joan. xvii.

⁶ Hieron. cont. Jovin. lib. 2. ⁷ Aug. Com. in Rom.

⁸ Ambros. de Pœnit. cont. Novat. lib. 2. cap. 2.

⁹ Hieron. cont. Lucifer. cap. 8. De Apocalypsi quoque approbemus, hæreticis sine baptismate debere pœnitentiam concedi. Nunquid dixit, Rebaptizentur qui in Nicolaitarum fidem baptizati sunt?

¹⁰ Optat. lib. 1. p. 35. Quid magis dici pro nobis, et nostrum esse potest, quam quod dixisti, in comparationem baptismatis semel factum esse diluvium? Et singularem circumcissionem salubriter profecisse populo Judæorum, magis pro nobis, quasi noster locutus es.

in regard to his own conversation:¹¹ for he having been guilty of deflowering a virgin, invented a second baptism, asserting, that it was lawful to repeat baptism three times for the remission of sins. So that if any man fell, he might receive a second baptism after the first, and a third after that, upon his repentance. Which he pretended to ground upon those sayings of our Saviour, "I have a baptism to be baptized with, and I have a cup to drink;" which have no reference to any other baptism in water, but to his baptism in blood, that is, his death and passion. Of which the ancients speak much, as they do of some other sorts of baptism, which are only metaphorical, as the baptism of afflictions, the baptism of tears and repentance, and the baptism of fire at the last day. But here the question is only about proper baptism by water, which the Marcionites affirmed might be repeated three times in the same way, which the church never allowed of.

It is true, indeed, there were some doubtful cases, in which it might happen accidentally that a man might be a second time baptized; but these were such cases only, in which the party was reputed not to have received any former baptism at all. As when a man could neither give any account of his own baptism, nor were there any other credible witnesses that could attest it. Which often happened to be the case of those who were taken captives in their infancy, and made slaves by the heathen. When any such were redeemed or recovered by the Christians, the church made no scruple to baptize them; because, though they might perhaps have received a former baptism, yet no evidence of it appeared. And so this was not reputed a rebaptization. A decree was made to this purpose in the fifth council of Carthage,¹² upon a question put by the bishops of Mauritania, who affirmed that they redeemed many such captive children from the hands of the barbarians: the council ordered, That in this case, as often as it happened, that there were no certain witnesses found, who could give undoubted testimony of their baptism; nor were they able of themselves to affirm, by reason of their age, that they ever had received it; they should be baptized without any scruple, lest a hesitation in this case should deprive them of the purgation of the sacraments. The like determination was also given in one of the Roman synods under Leo upon the same case, where it was concluded,¹³ That in such a doubtful case, neither the baptizer nor the baptized incurred the crime of rebaptization. And Leo resolves the matter¹⁴ himself after the same manner in other places. Neither was it reckoned any crime, though it afterward appeared that the party had been baptized before, because it was done in ignorance: but yet, like clinic baptism, it was a sort of blemish to him, that deprived him of ecclesiastical promotion, except in some extraordinary case, as we learn from Theodore's¹⁵ Pœnitentiale, cited by Gratian.

Neither was it reckoned properly a second baptism, when the church baptized any who had before been unduly baptized in heresy or schism. For then she did it only on presumption that they had received no true baptism before. Some heretics corrupted baptism by altering the necessary form, and others corrupted it by changing the matter of it into some other substance of their own appointing; and the baptisms of all such were looked upon as no baptisms; and therefore the church ordered all those to be baptized upon their return to her communion, in the very same manner as Jews and Gentiles, as supposing their former pretence of baptism to be nothing at all, but her own baptism the first true baptism that was given them. And even the Cyprianists, who baptized all that had been baptized in any heresy or schism whatsoever without distinction, did it still only upon this supposition, that the baptism which they had received before, was no baptism at all, but a mere nullity. But if any had been baptized in the catholic church, and after that turned heretics or schismatics, or even apostates, Jews or Gentiles, they never gave such another baptism upon their return to the church again.

For the Cyprianists in this agreed with the rest of the catholic church, that catholic baptism was never to be repeated in the greatest apostates. This doctrine is not only inculcated by St. Austin,¹⁶ but even by Cyprian himself and his followers, where they plead so much for baptizing those who had been baptized

Sect. 3.
What the church did in doubtful cases, not reckoned a rebaptization.

Sect. 4.
Nor when she baptized those who had been unduly baptized before in heresy or schism.

Sect. 5.
Apostates never rebaptized in the catholic church.

¹¹ Epiphan. Hær. 42. Marcionit. n. 3.

¹² Conc. Carthag. 5. can. 6. Placuit de infantibus, ut quoties non inveniuntur certissimi testes, qui eos baptizatos esse sine dubitatione testentur, neque ipsi sint per ætatem idonei de traditis sibi sacramentis respondere, absque ullo scrupulo eos esse baptizandos, ne ista trepidatio eos faciat sacramentorum purgatione privari. Hinc enim legati Maurorum fratres nostri consulerunt, quia multos tales a barbaris redimunt. Vid. Cod. Eccl. Afric. can. 72. et Conc. Trull. can. 81.

¹³ Leo, Ep. 37, ad Leon. Raven. Non potest in iterationis crimem devenire, quod factum esse omnino nescitur.

¹⁴ Id. Ep. 92. ad Rustic. cap. 16. Si nulla existant indicia inter propinquos aut familiares, nulla inter clericos aut vicinos, quibus hi, de quibus quæritur, baptizati fuisse doceantur; agendum est ut renascantur, ne manifeste periant, in quibus quod non ostenditur gestum, ratio non sinit ut videatur iteratum.

¹⁵ Theodor. Pœnitent. ap. Gratian, Dist. 4. de Consecrat. cap. 117. Qui bis ignorantur baptizati sunt, non indigent pro eo pœnitere: nisi quod secundum canones ordinari non possunt, nisi magna aliqua necessitas cogat.

¹⁶ Aug. de Bapt. lib. 2. cap. 1. Cont. Liter. Petil. lib. 2. cap. 7 et 48. Coat. Crescon. lib. 2. cap. 16.

in any heresy or schism; they still except those heretics who had originally been baptized in the catholic church: though they turned apostates they were not to be received again by baptism,¹⁷ but only by repentance, as was determined in the council of Carthage, over which Cyprian presided. St. Austin refers us to this very passage, and thence concludes this was a point agreed upon universally in the catholic church, that no lapse or crime could make it necessary to give a second baptism to any who had once been truly baptized within the pale of the church. A longer penance indeed was imposed upon such deserters and apostates as had been baptized in the church, than upon those who had been baptized among heretics originally, as the Rules of Pope Innocent¹⁸ inform us; the one were obliged to go through a long course of penance for their apostasy, but the other were admitted immediately by imposition of hands upon their recantation: yet still the church kept strict to her rule, that whatever way she admitted them she would not do it by a second baptism.

Sect. 6.
What heretics re-baptized the catholics.

Several heretics pretended to observe the same rule; for they rebaptized the catholics; yet they said this was not a second baptism, because the catholics were reputed heretics with them, and therefore their baptism of no value in their account. Upon this ground the Novatians rebaptized the catholics, as we learn from Cyprian,¹⁹ and the epistle of Pope Innocent last cited. The Donatists followed the Novatians in this sacrilegious practice, as the charge is often brought against them by St. Austin,²⁰ and many others. And the Eunomians not only rebaptized the catholics, but all others of the Arian sects that were not of their own particular faction, as is noted by Epiphanius²¹ in his account of them. And the other Arians, though they were at first averse to this practice, (as Papebrochius²² and Pagi²³ rightly observe, in order to refute the story of Constantine's being baptized by Pope Sylvester, and rebaptized by Eusebius of Nicomedia; for at that time the Arians had not taken up the practice of rebaptizing the catholics,) yet afterwards they gave way to it about the time of St. Austin. For he charges it upon them more than once,²⁴ that they rebaptized the catholics. And it appears from Victor Uticensis,²⁵ that they insisted stiffly upon it in the time of the Vandalic persecution, and we afterwards meet with the same in the epistles of Vigilius.²⁶ Valesius²⁷ cites the Life of Fulgentius, and the author of the Breviarium Fidei, published by Sirmondus, to the same purpose. By which last author²⁸ we find, that the Arians not only rebaptized the catholics, but also made an argument of it, (as some Romanists in another case have since argued against the protestants,) that their baptism was better than the catholics', because the catholics never rebaptized those that came over from the Arians, but reconciled them only by imposition of hands; but the Arians, whenever they could seduce any from the catholics, always gave them a second baptism.

Now, to prevent this petulant humour from spreading in the church, many and severe laws were made against it, both by the ecclesiastical and the secular power. The church by her canons²⁹ not only censured and condemned all such rebaptizations, as impious and sacrilegious, as a crucifying of Christ again, a doing despite to the Spirit, as a mockery of the Divine mysteries, and derision of holy things; but also inflicted penalties on all those who were either actively or passively concerned in them. The council of Lerida³⁰ forbids the faithful so much as to eat with persons that suffered themselves to be rebaptized. The canons of Pope Innocent enjoin them a long penance to

Sect. 7.
What punishments were inflicted on rebaptizers by the laws of church and state.

¹⁷ Conc. Carthag. ap. Cypr. n. 8. p. 232. Censeo omnes hæreticos et schismaticos, qui ad catholicam ecclesiam voverint venire, non ante ingredi, nisi exorcisati et baptizati prius fuerint; exceptis his sane qui in ecclesia catholica fuerint ante baptizati, ita tamen ut per manûs impositionem in pœnitentiam ecclesiæ reconcilientur. See the same, ibid. n. 22. And Cypr. Ep. 71. ad Quintum, p. 194. Ep. 74. ad Pompeium, p. 216.

¹⁸ Innoc. Ep. 2. ad Victricium, cap. 8. Ut venientes a Novatianis vel Montensibus, per manûs tantum impositionem suscipiantur. Quia quamvis ab hæreticis, tamen in Christi nomine sunt baptizati; præter eos, si qui forte a nobis ad illos transeuntes, rebaptizati sunt: hisi respiscentes, et ruinam suam cogitantes, redire maluerint, sub longa pœnitentiæ satisfactione admittendi sunt.

¹⁹ Cypr. Ep. 73. ad Jubaian. p. 198. Nec nos movet, quod in literis tuis complexus es, Novatianenses rebaptizare eos, quos a nobis sollicitant.

²⁰ Aug. cont. Fulgent. cap. 7. Da mihi aliquem sanctorum post Trinitatem rebaptizare, quod facis. It. de Hæres. c. 69. Audent etiam rebaptizare catholicos, &c. Vid. Cod. Theodos. lib. 16. Tit. 6. Ne sanctum baptismata iteretur.

Leg. 4. Honorii.

²¹ Epiphanius. Hæres. 76. Anomæor. p. 992.

²² Papebroch. Vit. Constant. Mai. 21. t. 5. p. 17.

²³ Pagi, Critic. in Baron. an. 324. n. 12.

²⁴ Aug. de Hæres. cap. 49. Rebaptizari quoque ab his catholicos novimus, utrum et non catholicos nescio. It. de Hæres. cap. 7. Baptizato ingerit baptismum, &c.

²⁵ Victor. de Persec. Vandal. lib. 1. Bibl. Patr. t. 7. p. 590.

²⁶ Vigil. Ep. 2. ad Euther. cap. 3. It. Conc. Tolet. 3. Præfat.

²⁷ Vales. Not. in Sozomen. lib. 6. cap. 26.

²⁸ Breviar. Fidei adversus Arianos. Dicere etiam solent de baptismum, quod in eo melius sit ipsorum baptismum, quam nostrum; quia qui de illis ad nos convertuntur, non eos rebaptizamus, sed per manûs impositionem reconciliamus. Illi vero, si quos de nostris seducere possint, inconsideranter rebaptizant.

²⁹ Vid. Cod. Eccles. Afric. can. 48. Constit. Apost. lib. 6. cap. 15.

³⁰ Conc. Ilerdens. can. 14. Cum rebaptizatis fideles religiosi nec in cibo participant.

make satisfaction.³¹ And those of Pope Leo³² require even those who through fear or terror were rebaptized against their wills, to do penance at the discretion of the bishop, before they were admitted again to communion. If they were bishops, presbyters, or deacons, who thus suffered themselves to be rebaptized, then they were to be degraded, and obliged to do penance all their lives, without being suffered to communicate with the church either in the prayers of the faithful, or the prayers of the catechumens, and were only to be admitted to lay communion at the hour of death, because they had not only denied their orders, but their Christianity, and openly professed themselves pagans, by being rebaptized. This we find in the decrees of Felix III., made in a Roman council,³³ with respect to the African churches, where such rebaptizations were often practised, by the power of the Arians, who compelled the catholics to be rebaptized. This was the ancient discipline of the church toward those, who were only passive in admitting a second baptism, after they had once been truly baptized with catholic baptism before. Then again for those who were actively concerned in such rebaptizations, the Canons appointed, that if any bishop or presbyter presumed to give a second baptism after a true one once received,³⁴ he should be degraded: and this penalty was confirmed by the civil law; for Valentinian put forth an edict against such rebaptizers, declaring them unworthy of the priesthood.³⁵ But because such sort of penalties did not much affect either the Donatists or the Eunomians, who were already out of the church, and little regarded her censures; therefore Honorius reinforced the former laws by adding a civil penalty to them. For in two laws made against the Donatists, who were chiefly concerned in this crime, he enacted,³⁶ That it should be confiscation of all a man's goods, whoever was found to rebaptize another. And Theodosius junior³⁷ laid the same penalty upon the Eunomians, and those that were rebaptized by them, commanding their goods to be confiscated, and their persons to be banished. Such was the care both of the civil and ecclesiastical governors to preserve the unity of baptism in the catholic church. But as Gothofred, I think, rightly observes, these laws seem only intended against heretics rebaptizing catholics. For if heretics rebaptized heretics, as the Eunomians did the other Arians, it does not appear, that in that case the penalties of these laws affected them, but only were designed to restrain their insolencies against the catholic church. Some catholics continued still, after the Cyprianic way, to rebaptize all heretics and schismatics whatsoever, without distinguishing those that were baptized in the name of the Trinity from those that were not: and though this was contrary to the general custom and discipline of the church, yet I conceive the penalties of these laws did not affect them neither. And the same may be said of those, who thought themselves obliged to rebaptize those who were only baptized by laymen. For though it was reckoned a rebaptization by those churches which practised otherwise, yet it was not that criminal rebaptization, against which these laws were chiefly intended: and these being something more of doubtful and disputed cases, about which good catholics themselves were divided, a greater allowance was made in these, so long as men only observed the custom and practice of the churches in which they lived, about them: which was St. Basil's advice to the churches of Asia, which were divided upon these questions.

³¹ Innoc. Ep. 2. ad Victric. cap. 9. Qui rebaptizati sunt, sub longa penitentia et satisfactione admittendi sunt.

³² Leo, Ep. 79. ad Nicetam, cap. 6. Qui ad iterandum baptismum vel metu coacti sunt—non nisi per penitentia remedium, et per impositionem episcopalis manûs, communionis recipiant unitatem.

³³ Felix, Ep. 7. cap. 2. Eos, quos episcopus, presbyteros, vel diaconos fuisse constiterit, et seu optantes forsitan, seu coactos lavaeri illius unici salutarisque claruerit fecisse jacturam; et Christum, quem non solum dono regenerationis, verum etiam gratia percepti honoris induerant, exuisse; cum constet neminem ad secundam tinctionem venire potuisse, nisi se palam Christianum negaverit, et professus fuerit se esse paganum;—usque ad exitus sui diem, si respiscunt, jacere conveniet, nec orationi non modo fidelium, sed nec catechumenorum omnimodis interduci, quibus communicatio laica tantum in morte reddenda est.

³⁴ Vid. Canon. Apost. can. 47.

³⁵ Theod. lib. 16. Tit. 16. de non Iterando Bapt. Leg. 1. Antistitem, qui sanctitatem baptismi iterata usurpatione geminaverit, et contra instituta omnium eam gratiam iterando contaminaverit, sacerdotio indignum esse censemus.

³⁶ Ibid. Leg. 4. Quisquis post hæc fuerit rebaptizasse detectus—Facultatam omnium publicatione multatus, inopia penam expendat. Vid. ibid. Leg. 5. Honorii.

³⁷ Ibid. Leg. 7. Theodosii. Nefarios Eunomianorum cætus, ac funesta conventicula penitus arceri jubemus. Eos qui episcoporum, seu clericorum, vel ministrorum nomine usurpato, hujusmodi cætibus præsumt—cum in hoc fuerint scelere deprehensi, stilum proscriptionis incurrere, et bonorum amissione coerceri. Eos vero qui fide, ut dictum est, imbutos immani furore rebaptizare deteguntur, cum his qui rebaptizantur (arceri jubemus).

BOOK XIII.

GENERAL OBSERVATIONS RELATING TO DIVINE WORSHIP IN THE ANCIENT CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

SOME NECESSARY REMARKS UPON THE ANCIENT NAMES OF DIVINE SERVICE, WHICH MODERN CORRUPTIONS HAVE RENDERED AMBIGUOUS.

Sect. 1.
The partition of this work. WE have hitherto seen the method of introducing men into the church, through the various steps of their catechumenship, and baptism, and confirmation: we are now to view their practice in the worship of God after their admission, and to examine into the manner of their holding religious assemblies, and performing there the several public offices of Divine service. Some things of this kind are general considerations, that run through all offices, and relate to every part of Divine worship; such as the object of their worship, and the circumstances of language, and forms, and habits, and gesture, and time; and therefore of these general things I shall discourse first in this Book. After this I shall consider the several parts of their most solemn worship on the Lord's day; such as their psalmody, and reading of the Scriptures, and preaching, and prayer, and receiving the communion, which were their solemn acts of worship on every festival. And because some of these were such as the catechumens and all others were allowed to be present at, for their benefit and edification; whilst other parts of Divine service were more restrained to persons baptized, who were complete and perfect Christians (who were therefore called communicants, because they had a more peculiar right to all the privileges of Christian communion); I shall upon this account speak of their worship under these two heads, according to their own distinction; the missa catechumenorum, and the missa fidelium, the service of the catechumens, and the service of the communicants; or, as we may otherwise term them, the ante-communion service, and the communion service.

The missa catechumenorum comprehended all that part of the service, which preceded the common prayers of the communicants at the altar; that is, the psalmody, the reading of the Scriptures, the sermon, and the particular prayers that were made over the catechumens and other orders of penitents, energumens, &c., before they were dismissed. For by the ancient rules and discipline of the church, the method of Divine service was so ordered that all persons, except some very scandalous sinners, had liberty to be present at some parts of it. The psalms, and lessons, and sermons were for the instruction, not only of believers, but also of catechumens and heathens, Jews and infidels, unbelievers and heretics: and therefore by some canons all these had liberty to stay in the church, till this part of the service, called missa catechumenorum, was ended. The fourth council of Carthage¹ has a rule to this purpose, That the bishop shall not prohibit any one to enter the church, and hear the word of God, whether he be Gentile, Jew, or heretic, till the service of the catechumens was ended. A like canon was made by the first council of Orange, That the catechumens² should have the liberty to stay and hear the Gospels read in all their churches. The council of Valentia³ in Spain extends the privilege to heretics and heathens, as well as catechumens, and therefore orders

Sect. 2.
Of the missa catechumenorum, or first part of Divine service, to which all orders of men were admitted.

¹ Conc. Carthag. 4. can. 84. Ut episcopus nullum prohibeat ingredi ecclesiam, et audire verbum Dei, sive Gentilem, sive hæreticum, sive Judæum, usque ad missam catechumenorum.

² Conc. Arausican. 1. can. 18. Evangelia placuit deinceps catechumenis legi apud omnes provinciarum nostrarum ecclesias.

³ Conc. Valentin. can. 1. Ut sacrosancta evangelia ante munerum illationem, in missa catechumenorum in ordine lectionum post legantur, quatenus salutaria præcepta Domini nostri Jesu Christi, vel sermones sacerdotis, non solum fideles sed etiam catechumeni ac penitentes, et omnes qui e diverso sunt, audire licitum habeant. Sic enim pontificum prædicatione audita, nonnullos attractos ad fidem evidenter scimus.

that the Gospel should be read before the oblation was brought forth, in the usual order of the lessons; so that not only the communicants, but the catechumens, and penitents, and Gentiles, and heretics, who were of the contrary part, might have liberty to hear the saving precepts of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the sermons of the bishops. For they had learned by experience, that by the bishops' preaching many had been brought over to the faith. And by this we may interpret an obscure canon⁴ of the council of Lerida, which orders, That incestuous persons, so long as they continued in their sin, should not be permitted to stay any longer in the church, save only during the service of the catechumens, that is, to hear the psalmody, the lessons, and the sermon. St. Chrysostom abundantly confirms this observation: for in many of his homilies⁵ he speaks not only of catechumens, but of heretics and heathen being present as part of his auditory. Particularly in his homily⁶ upon the forty-fourth Psalm, he wishes all the Jews and heathens had been then present to have heard him expound that prophetic Psalm of Christ. In another homily⁷ upon the forty-eighth Psalm, he brings in a heathen using this form of complaint against Christians: I went into a Christian church, and there I heard Paul say to their women, that they should not adorn themselves with gold or pearl; but I saw every thing contrary in their practice. And, says Chrysostom, will not the heathen, when he comes into the church, and sees the women thus adorned in the galleries above, and hears Paul thus speaking below, be ready to say, our religion is mere pageantry and fable? It is not so indeed; but the heathen is scandalized and offended at this contrariety in our practice. This plainly implies, that the heathens had free liberty to come into the Christian churches, and hear the Scriptures read, and the sermon preached. And it is very remarkable, what Sozomen⁸ observes of St. Chrysostom, that by this means he brought over many of those who heard him in the church, to acknowledge the Divinity of Christ. Which some understand of the scholars of Libanius, but Valesius, I think, more truly interprets it of heathens and heretics in general, who flocked to St. Chrysostom's church to hear him. There is but one thing that can be said against all this, and that is, that the council of Laodicea has a contrary canon, which absolutely forbids⁹ the permitting of heretics to enter into the house of God. But this is only a local ordinance; and the thing being a matter of pure discipline, there might be prudential reasons for denying heretics in some places the privilege that was allowed them in others. Or else the canon may be understood of not permitting them to come into the church for prayers or communion, which was a thing forbidden by all canons whatsoever, till after their recantation. Some indeed think, that in Tertullian's time the catechumens were excluded before sermon, because he objects it to the heretics,¹⁰ that there were such confusions in their assemblies, that no one could tell who was a catechumen, and who was a communicant, because they all met, and heard, and prayed together. And heathens, if they came in among them, were not excluded from the very mysteries of their religion. But in this, as Schelstrate¹¹ has observed against Albaspineus and Christianus Lupus, Tertullian does not object to the heretics, that they admitted catechumens to hear their sermons, but that they made no distinction in their assemblies, as the church did; but without any observation of decency or order, suffered their catechumens to mingle themselves with communicants, whom the catholics always confined to a separate place in the church, while heretics admitted them confusedly, not only to hear sermons, but to be present at their prayers, and the oblation of the eucharist also. So that this passage of Tertullian rather confirms the thing asserted, that the missa catechumenorum, or service of the catechumens, lasted to the end of the sermon. After which, it was usual for the deacon to call to the heathens and heretics, if there were any present, to be gone: Μή τις τῶν ἀκροαομένων μή τις τῶν ἀπίστων: Let none that are only hearers, none of the unbelievers, be present, as the author of the Constitutions¹² words it. Then followed the prayers for the catechumens, of the order called prostrators; and after their dismissal, prayers for the energumens; and after them, the prayers for the candidates of baptism; and last of all, the prayers for the penitents. All which was included in the general name of missa catechumenorum, the service of the catechumens, or ante-communion service.

After this was ended, it was usual for the deacon to make another solemn proclamation to all orders of non-communicants to withdraw: Οἱ ἀκοινωνήτοι

Sect. 3.
Of the missa fidelium, or communion service, peculiar to communicants only.

⁴ Conc. Herden. can. 4. De his qui incesta pollutione se commaculant, placuit, ut quousque in ipso detestando et illicito carnis contubernio perseverant, usque ad missam tantum catechumenorum in ecclesia admittantur.

⁵ Chrys. Hom. 41. de Pelagia, t. 1. p. 560. Hom. 72. de Phoca. t. 1. p. 878. Hom. 8. t. 5. p. 124. Hom. 1. in Mat. p. 5. Hom. 27. in Mat. p. 271. Hom. de Prophet. Obscuritate, t. 3. p. 926. Hom. 2. p. 946. Hom. 40. in 1 Cor. p. 688.

⁶ Hom. in Psal. xlv. al. xlv. t. 3. p. 206.

⁷ Hom. in Psal. xlviii. al. xlix. p. 806.

⁸ Sozom. lib. 8. cap. 2.

⁹ Conc. Laodic. can. 6. Περί τοῦ μή συγχωρεῖν τοῖς αἱρετικοῖς εἰσεῖναι εἰς τὸν οἶκον τοῦ Θεοῦ.

¹⁰ Tertul. de Præscript. advers. Hæreticos, cap. 41. In primis quis catechumenus, quis fidelis, incertum est: pariter adeunt, pariter audiunt, pariter orant: etiam ethnici si supervenerint, sanctum canibus, et porcis margaritas, licet non veras, jactabunt.

¹¹ Schelstrat. de Concilio Antiocheno, p. 200.

¹² Constit. lib. 8. cap. 5.

περιπατήσατε, Ye that cannot communicate, walk off and be gone. Let no catechumen be present, no hearer, no infidel, no heterodox or heretical person, as the author of the Constitutions words it.¹³ And, as St. Chrysostom acquaints¹⁴ us, he was used to add further, ἐπιγινώσκετε ἀλλήλους, Ye that are communicants, discern and know one another: see that there be no catechumen, none of those that cannot eat of the sacrifice, no spy, no one that cannot see the heavenly blood shed for the remission of sins, no one unworthy of the living sacrifice, no unbaptized person, no one that may not touch the tremendous mysteries with his polluted lips. And here began the missa fidelium, or communion service, so called, because none might be present at it but communicants only, as appears from these solemn forms of dismissing all others before it began. This contains all those prayers which were said at the altar, and were properly called εὐχαι πιστῶν, prayers of the faithful or communicants, in opposition to the prayers of the catechumens, which went before: these were the prayers for the whole state of the church, and peace of the world, which preceded the oblation and consecration of the eucharist; and then the consecration prayers, and prayers again for all orders of men in the church, with proper forms of communicating, and doxologies, hymns, and thanksgivings after reception; of which we discourse particularly in the last of these Books, under the general title of missa fidelium, or communion service. This part of the service being wholly spent in prayers, and that by the communicants only, is therefore peculiarly distinguished by the name of εὐχαι πιστῶν, the prayers of the faithful, by the council of Laodicea,¹⁵ which speaks of them as coming after the prayers of the catechumens and their dismissal. In other canons they are called the common prayers of the people, and absolutely, the prayers, without taking notice of any other prayers in the church. Whence in the council of Nice,¹⁶ speaking of penitents, the phrase, communicating in prayers with the people without the oblation, denotes joining in this part of the service of the church, distinguished by the name of prayers, or communion service, which belonged not to the catechumens, but the body of the people, in which the penitents of the highest class, called co-standers, were allowed to join, though they might neither make their oblations, nor partake of the eucharist with the faithful. And in the same sense the council of Ancyra¹⁷ speaks of penitents, who, as they were to be three years substrators among the catechumens, and bow down under the bishop's hands for benediction; so were they for two years to communicate in prayers only, without the oblation. And so communicating in prayers with the people is taken in the council of Antioch, when they say, All such as come to church, and hear the Holy Scriptures read, but will not communicate¹⁸ in prayers with the people, or withdraw themselves disorderly from partaking of the eucharist, shall be cast out of the church. Where, as reading of the Scriptures is put for the whole service of the catechumens, which was the first service; so communicating in prayers and the eucharist, denotes the second part of the service, peculiar to communicants, or persons baptized; from which, as catechumens were debarred, so others might not withdraw themselves, under pain of ecclesiastical censure. This was the true order of the first and second service in the ancient church, and the true distinction between the missa catechumenorum and missa fidelium, of which I intend to give a full account in the two next Books.

At present we may observe, how shamefully they have abused the ancient name missa, under the appellation of mass, who apply it only to denote the office of consecrating bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ, and offering that as an expiatory sacrifice for the quick and dead. For anciently the name missa signified no such thing, but was a general name for every part of Divine service. It signified, as we have seen already, the service of the catechumens, as well as the service of the altar, and is often used for the psalmody, for the lessons, and for the prayers at evening, when there was no communion, as well as for the prayers used in time of celebration of the eucharist. Thus Cassian¹⁹ often mentions the missa nocturna, by which he means the morning prayers and psalmody before day, when it is certain they had no communion. The council of Agde²⁰ speaks of evening mass, as well as morning, which meant no more but morning and evening prayer, without any communion. For they had no communion either morning or evening at their daily prayers, but only on festivals, at a distinct hour from both those. So the emperor Leo, in his Tactics,²¹ speaks of the μίσαι ἑσπεριναί, a word plainly borrowed from the

Sect. 4.
The true original and meaning of the ancient name, missa, the mass, which in its primitive use denotes every part of Divine service; but no where an expiatory sacrifice for the quick and dead.

¹³ Constit. lib. 8. cap. 12.

¹⁴ Chrys. Hom. 1. cont. Judæos, t. 1. p. 440. et Hom. 37. de Filio Prodigio, t. 6. p. 375.

¹⁵ Conc. Laodic. can. 19.

¹⁶ Conc. Nicen. can. 11. Δύο δὲ ἔτη χωρὶς προσφορῶς, κοινωήσουσι τῷ λαῷ τῶν προσευχῶν.

¹⁷ Conc. Ancyra. can. 24. Ὅτι τὸν κανόνα πεπιπέτωσαν τρία ἔτη ὑποπτώσεως, καὶ δύο ἔτη εὐχῆς χωρὶς προσφορῶς.

¹⁸ Conc. Antioch. can. 2. Πάντας τοὺς εἰσιόντας εἰς τὴν ἐκκλησίαν, καὶ τῶν ἱερῶν γραφῶν ἀκούοντας, μὴ κοινωοῦντας δὲ εὐχῆς ἅμα τῷ λαῷ, ἢ ἀποστρεφομένους τὴν μετὰληψιν τῆς εὐχαριστίας κατὰ τινα ἀταξίαν, τούτους ἀποβλήτους γίνεσθαι τῆς ἐκκλησίας.

¹⁹ Cassian. Institut. lib. 2. cap. 13. lib. 3. cap. 5 et 6.

²⁰ Conc. Agathen. can. 30. In conclusione matutinarum vel vespertinarum missarum, post hymnos capitella de psalmis dici, &c.

²¹ Leo, Tactic. cap. 11. num. 18, cited by Bishop Usher.

Latin missa, (for the Greeks had originally no such name,) to signify only evening prayer. And Bishop Usher, in his Religion of the Ancient Irish,²² gives us another such instance out of Adamnanus, who uses the name vespertinalis missa for what is commonly called evening prayer. And the late learned Mabillon²³ has observed out of the Rules of Cæsarius Arelatensis and Aurelian, that the word missa is sometimes used for the lessons also. For it is one of Aurelian's Rules, That they should take six missas, that is, lessons, out of the prophet Isaiah, Facite sex missas de Esaia propheta. And Mabillon very judiciously remarks further,²⁴ That the word missa has at least three significations. It sometimes signifies the lessons, sometimes the collects or prayers, and sometimes the dismissal of the people. And indeed the third sense is the original notation of the word. For missa is the same as missio. And it was the form used in the Latin church, Ite missa est, which answers to the Greek Ἀπολύθετε and Προέλυθετε, the solemn words used at the dismissal of the catechumens first, and then of the whole assembly afterwards, at the end of their respective services. Whence the services themselves at last took their names from these solemn dismissions, the one being called missa catechumenorum, and the other missa fidelium, neither of which ever signify more than the Divine service, at which the one or the other attended.

In vain, therefore, do many learned men labour to deduce its original from foreign languages, to make it signify something agreeable to the modern notion of the Roman mass, when it is so plainly of Latin extraction. Baronius,²⁵ after Reuclin and Genebrard, would have it come from the Hebrew word missah, an oblation: but Durantus²⁶ has a good reason against that; because if it had been of Hebrew extraction, the Greeks would have retained it in their language, as they do the words hosanna, sabaoth, allelujah, and amen: whereas there is no Greek writer uses it till the time of Leo Sapiens, who first borrows it from the Latin in his Tactics. Albaspinæus has still a wilder conjecture; he says, the word mess, among the northern nations, signifies a festival, and therefore he imagines the name missa and mass might come from that: which is only to invert the origination, and make the daughter to become the mother; since it is evident the name mess comes from missa, and not missa from that.

Cardinal Bona²⁷ takes a great deal of pains to confute these and all other false opinions, and establishes the true one with undeniable evidence from Alcimus Avitus, and all the ancient ritualists, Isidore, Rabanus Maurus, Florus Magister, Remigius Altissiodorensis, Alcuinus, Gregory's Sacramentarium, Hugo Victorinus, and Bernoldus, who all agree in this, that missa comes from the dismissal of the people, and not from any other original. So that I think it needless to trouble my reader with any of these authorities, since the matter is now cleared beyond all contradiction by Mabillon and Bona, two such eminent writers of the Roman communion.

Another general name of the ancient service, which in later ages has met with some abuse, is sacrificium, sacrifice; a name borrowed from the Jewish carnal sacrifices, and applied to the spiritual sacrifices of Christians, viz. their prayers and praises, and preaching, and devoting themselves entirely, body and soul, to the service of Christ by the sacraments of baptism and the Lord's supper. Hence every part of Divine worship had the name of sacrifice, and not only the service of the altar. For they commonly call their evening hymns and prayers by the name of evening sacrifice. Thus St. Jerom bids Læta accustom her daughter not only to the morning hymns, and daily hours of prayer, the third, the sixth, and the ninth, but also when night comes, and the lamps are lighted, then in like manner to render to God her evening sacrifice.²⁸ And so St. Hilary, upon those words of the psalmist, "Let the lifting up of my hands be an evening sacrifice," says, The sacrifice of Christians is their prayers, recommended to God by stretching forth their hands to relieve the poor. For we, says he, upon whom²⁹ the ends of the world are come, do not sacrifice to God with blood or burnt-offerings: but the evening sacrifice which is pleasing to God, is that which Christ teaches in his Gospel, "I was an hungry, and ye fed me; thirsty, and ye gave me drink," &c. This is the evening sacrifice, that is, the sacrifice of the last times. In this we are to lift up our hands; for by such prayers the inheritance of the kingdom of heaven is prepared for those that are blessed of God, from the foundation of the world. In the same sense Eusebius calls the prayers of Christians the rational sacrifices,³⁰ that are offered without blood to God. And Clemens Alexandrinus says, The sacri-

Sect. 5.
In what sense Divine service anciently called sacrificium.

²² Usher, Relig. of the Ancient Irish, chap. 4. p. 26. ex Adamnani Vita Columban. lib. 3. cap. 31.

²³ Mabil. de Cursu Gallicano, lib. 2. p. 107.

²⁴ Ibid. p. 393. ²⁵ Baron. an. 34. n. 59.

²⁶ Durant. de Ritibus, lib. 2. cap. 1. n. 1. So also Bellarmine and Bona both refute it.

²⁷ Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. 1. cap. 1. sect. 6, where he censures Genebrard, as nimis addictus rebus Hebraicis.

²⁸ Hieron. Ep. 7. ad Lætam. Accensa lucerna reddere sacrificium vespertinum.

²⁹ Hilar. in Psal. cxl. p. 330. Non enim sanguine et holo-caustis nos, in quos consummatio sæculorum devenit, sacrificamus Deo: sed quod sacrificium vespertinum placitum sit, audiamus Dominum—Hoc sacrificium vespertinum, id est, temporum novissimorum est. In hoc manus elevandæ sunt: quia istiusmodi orationibus jam ab initio mundi benedictis Dei, regni cælestis præparata possessio est.

³⁰ Euseb. de Laud. Constant. Orat. p. 659. Τὰς ἀνάμμεσ και λογικὰς θυσίας τὰς δι' εὐχῶν. Vid. de Vit. Constant. lib. 4. cap. 45. Θυσίαις ἀνάμμεσ, &c.

offices of Christians are their prayers and praises,³¹ and reading of the Scriptures, and psalms and hymns before meals, and at their meals, and at bedtime, and in the night. And there are hundreds of passages in the ancients, both of public and private prayers, to the same purpose, besides what is said of the sacrifice of the eucharist, or communion service, of which we shall have reason to say something more upon another occasion. Here it is sufficient to have hinted the grounds, upon which the ancients gave the general name of sacrifice to all parts of Divine service.

Another name, though neither so ancient nor so common as the former, is that of sacramenta, which in some authors signifies not what we now call sacraments, but the order or manner of performing Divine offices, and that as well the prayers and service in general, as the particular offices of administering baptism and the Lord's supper. For the word sacramentum, answering to the Greek μυστήριον, is a word of a large extent, denoting not only the proper sacraments, but all sacred ceremonies and usages of the church, that have any thing of symbolical or spiritual significancy in them, representing something more to the understanding than appears to the outward senses; and in a more restrained, though not the strictest sense, it denotes the manner or method of performing Divine offices in the church, whether relating to the sacraments properly so called, or any other parts of Divine service, as the prayers, hymns, lessons, in morning or evening service. In this sense, it is observed by learned men,³² that the book of Divine offices composed by Gregory the Great for the use of the Roman church, bears the title of Liber Sacramentorum, The Book of Sacraments, that is, a book or method for performing Divine offices in the church. And Gelasius did the same thing before him under the title of Codex Sacramentarius, lately published by Thomasius at Rome, 1680. And Gennadius³³ says, Musæus, a presbyter of Marseilles, composed Volumen Sacramentorum, a large Book of Sacraments, that is, Divine offices, to direct what lessons, and psalms, and hymns were to be used in the communion service, according to the seasons of the year, and what prayers and thanksgivings were to make up the service of the church. And it is the opinion of two very learned men, Menardus and Bishop Stillingfleet,³⁴ that both St. Austin and St. Ambrose give the name of Sacramenta to the books of liturgic offices used in their time. And they observe that the old Missal published by Illyricus, bears the name of Ordo Sacramentorum, which can mean nothing but the manner of performing Divine offices in the administration of the eucharist and other parts of public worship.

These offices are by other writers styled cursus ecclesiasticus, the order or course of Divine offices. For under this title, Gregory Turonensis is said to have composed a book, De Cursibus Ecclesiasticis, for the use of the Gallican church, which is now lost; but he himself³⁵ mentions it in his history. And Bishop Usher³⁶ cites an ancient manuscript out of the Cotton library, which says, that Germanus and Lupus brought Ordinem Cursus Gallorum, the Gallican liturgy, into Britain with them. And this was the liturgy of the British churches for some ages, till by degrees the Cursus Romanus was brought in upon them. Bede says,³⁷ In the time of Pope Agatho, Joannes Abbas, the Roman precentor, was sent over to settle the Roman cursus, or psalmody for the whole year, according to the usage and way of St. Peter's church at Rome. And the council of Calchuth,³⁸ some time after Bede, speaks of the liturgy under the same title, ordering all churches at the canonical hours reverently to perform their cursus. And Mabillon³⁹ cites the Lives of Walaricus and Senericus, where there is frequent mention of the Cursus Gallicanus.

Among the Greek writers we seldom meet with any of these names, but they usually style all holy offices, and all parts of Divine service, by the general name of λειτουργία, and ἱερουργία, liturgy, and sacred service. Though liturgy in its extended sense denotes any public office or ministration, as the apostle uses it, Phil. ii. 30, and 2 Cor. ix. 12, for the ministration of charity; and ecclesiastical writers do the same, often applying it both to civil and sacred functions, as to the office of a magistrate or a bishop, as Casaubon⁴⁰ shows at large; yet in a more limited sense it is put to signify those sacred offices which make up the several parts of

Sect. 7.
And cursus ecclesiasticus.

Sect. 6.
And sacramenta.

Sect. 8.
The names λειτουργία, ἱερουργία, ἱερά, and ἱερολογία, most usual in the Greek church.

³¹ Clem. Alex. Strom. 7. lib. p. 860. Ed. Oxon. Θυσίαι τῷ Θεῷ, εὐχαί τε καὶ αἶνοι, καὶ αἱ πρὸ τῆς ἐπιάσεως ἐντελέξεις τῶν γραφῶν, &c. Vid. Cassian. Instit. lib. 3. c. 3. Conc. Aurelian. 3. can. 23. Martin. Bracarensis Capitul. c. 63.

³² Menard. Not. in Sacrament. Gregor. p. 1. et Stillingfleet, Orig. Britan. p. 225.

³³ Gennad. de Scriptor. cap. 79. Composuit Sacramentorum egregium et non parvum volumen, per membra quidem pro opportunitate officiorum et temporum, pro lectionum textu, psalmodicorumque serie et decantatione discretum, &c. Id. cap. 78. de Voconio. Composuit Sacramentorum Volumen.

³⁴ Menard. ibid. Stillingfleet, ubi supra.

³⁵ Greg. Turon. Hist. lib. 10. cap. ult. De Cursibus Ecclesiasticis unum librum condidi.

³⁶ Usher. de Primord. Eccles. p. 185.

³⁷ Bede, Hist. lib. 4. c. 18. Quatenus in monasterio suo cursus canendi annum, sicut ad Sanctum Petrum Romæ agebatur, edoceret.

³⁸ Conc. Calchuthens. can. 7. Conc. t. 6. p. 1865. Ut omnes ecclesiæ publicæ canonicis horis cursum suum cum reverentia habeant.

³⁹ Mabil. de Cursu Gallican. p. 420.

⁴⁰ Casaub. Exercit. in Baron. 16. n. 41. p. 471.

Divine worship, as prayers, reading, preaching, and administration of the sacraments. But it is never used, as the Romanists would appropriate it, for the business of sacrificing only. The council of Ephesus speaks both of evening⁴¹ and morning liturgies, which doubtless mean evening and morning prayers only. And so Casaubon observes, that Justinian⁴² takes it for the office of reading the Scripture as well as administering the eucharist, when he says of a certain monastery, that the Divine liturgy was performed in it, as it was used to be in the churches, both by reading the Holy Scriptures and receiving the holy communion. And Antiochus⁴³ applies the name of liturgy, not only to morning prayer, but also to the service of their midnight assemblies. Neither of which was in his time the ordinary hours of the communion service. So that Erasmus and others are governed more by prejudice than reason, who would have that passage of Acts xiii. 2, λειτουργούντων αὐτῶν, to be rendered, sacrificantibus illis, as if there were no Divine service without sacrifice in their notion of it; when yet the Vulgar translation renders it ministering, and the old Syriac and Arabic, as Beza observes, have it praying; which is agreeable to the notion of liturgy for Divine service. Yet when the epithet of mystica was added to liturgia, then it commonly signified the communion service. As when Theodoret says, that the salutation of St. Paul, 2 Cor. xiii. 14, "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ," &c., is the beginning of the mystical liturgy,⁴⁴ he means the communion office, where this form of salutation was always used. And so in the Clementina Epitome,⁴⁵ the sacred liturgy denotes the service of the altar, which came after the εὐχὴν τῶν ἱερῶν ἕμνων, prayers used in psalmody, or the service of the catechumens. And it is Bona's observation⁴⁶ out of Vincentius Riccardus,⁴⁷ that except the words sacred, or mystical, be added to the name liturgy, it is never to be taken for the sacrifice of the altar, but for some other part of Divine service: though, I think, this is more than can be fairly proved. As on the other hand, when the epithet of mystical is added, it does not always, but only for the most part, as I said before, mean the eucharistical service. For the service of baptism was ever esteemed a mystical service, as well as that of the eucharist. And the name μυσταγωγία, communion in the sacred mysteries, is upon that account frequently given by St. Chrysostom,⁴⁸ Theodoret,⁴⁹ and others, to baptism, as well as the Lord's supper; as may be seen at large in Suicerus's⁵⁰ Collections upon that subject. It is certain the author under the name of Dionysius the Areopagite, uses the title of mystagogia, as well when he is describing the ceremonies and service of baptism, as the eucharist: and Cyril's Mystagogical Catechisms are equally an exposition of the rites observed in administering baptism and confirmation, as of those of the other sacrament; these being the two great mystical services of the Christian church. The names ἱερά, ἱεροργία, and θυσία, are all words of the same importance: they most commonly signify the communion service, or the sacrifice of prayers at the altar. But sometimes they denote the offices of baptism, preaching, reading the Scripture, and psalmody; these being the spiritual sacrifices of Christians. It is certain the apostle calls preaching the gospel by the name of ἱεροργία, Rom. xv. 16, and the conversion of the Gentiles thereby, the offering them up or sacrificing them to God. Upon which words Chrysostom⁵¹ observes, That the apostle does not call this service barely λατρεία, but λειτουργία, and ἱεροργία, sacrifice, or sacred service. For this is my priesthood, to preach and publish the gospel; this the sacrifice that I offer to God. And St. Basil⁵² gives the same names of ἱεροργία and θυσία to the duty of praise and thanksgiving: "I will offer unto thee the sacrifice of praise." And we have seen before (sect. 5.) how the evening prayer is commonly styled sacrificium vesperinum, evening sacrifice, by the Latin writers.

It is further to be observed, that as the Latins, by the names missa, cur-
Sec. 9.
Liturgy sometimes taken for set forms of prayer.
sus, ordo, and officium, mean not only the Divine worship itself, but also the books containing the method and prescriptions for the regular performance of it, which we usually call set forms of prayer; so the Greeks sometimes understand the same thing by the name of liturgy; and that not only when they speak of the forms of administering the sacraments, but of any other parts of Divine service. It is plain the author of the Constitutions⁵³ takes the word in this sense, when he applies it to ⁴¹ Conc. Ephes. Epist. Synod. ad Imperat. ap. Casaubon. ibid. Τὰς ἑσπερινὰς ἢ τὰς ἑωθινὰς λειτουργίας.

⁴² Justin. Novel. 7. Ἐὰρ γέγονε λειτουργία—τῶν τε Σείων ἀναγνωσκόμενων γραφῶν, τῆς τε ἱεράς καὶ ἀρρήτου μεταδόμενης κοινωνίας.

⁴³ Antioch. Hom. 19. Bibl. Patr. G. L. t. I. p. 1056. Ἐξέγειρον ἡμᾶς πρὸς τὰς νυκτερινὰς καὶ ἑωθινὰς λειτουργίας.

⁴⁴ Theod. Ep. 146. p. 1032. Ἐν πάσαις ταῖς ἐκκλησίαις τῆς μυστικῆς λειτουργίας προοίμιον.

⁴⁵ Clementina Epitome de Gestis Petri, ap. Coteler. t. I. p. 796. Τὸ πατριάρχου τὴν ἱεράν ἐκτελέσαντος λειτουργίαν.

⁴⁶ Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. 1. cap. 3. n. 3.

⁴⁷ Riccard. Comment. in Proclum de Tradit. Missæ.

⁴⁸ Chrys. Hom. 21. t. 1. ad Popul. Antioch. p. 272.

⁴⁹ Theod. in cap. 1. Canticorum.

⁵⁰ Suicer. Thesaur. voce Μυσταγωγία.

⁵¹ Chrys. Hom. 29. in Rom. p. 302. Οὐχ ἀπλῶς λατρείαν λέγων, ἀλλὰ λειτουργίαν καὶ ἱεροργίαν· αὕτη γὰρ μοι ἱεροσύνη, τὸ κηρύττειν καὶ καταγγέλλειν· τάντην προσφέρω τὴν θυσίαν.

⁵² Basil. in Psal. cxv. p. 275. Ἐιροργίσω σοι τὴν τῆς ἀλιείως θυσίαν.

⁵³ Constit. lib. 8. cap. 6. Ἡ Σεία λειτουργία, ἐν ἣ προσφώνησις ὑπὲρ τῶν κατηχομένων.

the forms of prayer then made for the catechumens. And Casaubon observes,⁵⁴ That all those forms of worship which go under the names of Peter, James, Andrew, Chrysostom, and Basil, bear the name of liturgies, which the Latins call ordo, and officium, and the modern Greeks, ἀκολουθία. These were sometimes also, among the ancient Greek writers, termed εὐχῶν διατάξεις, the order of prayers; which is the name that Nazianzen gives the liturgy of St. Basil,⁵⁵ composed by him by the direction of his bishop, whilst he was presbyter of Cæsarea; and those forms and orders of Divine worship collected by the author of the Constitutions, bear the same title, διατάξεις. In Chrysostom they are styled νόμοι, the rules or appointments of the church; and the prayers particularly are distinguished into two sorts of forms, both by him⁵⁶ and the council of Laodicea,⁵⁷ the one called εὐχαὶ καθηγουμένων, the prayers of the catechumens, and the other, εὐχαὶ πιστῶν, the prayers of the faithful, or believers. But I shall say no more of liturgies here, considered as set forms or prescriptions of worship, because they will come to be discoursed of more fully hereafter in their proper place.

There is one general name more, which the first writers use to denote all sorts of public prayers, but the middle ages have appropriated it to a particular form of worship, that is, litanies, in Greek called λιτανείαι, and λιταί: in Latin, supplicationes, and rogationes. These words, in their original signification, are but another name for prayers in general, of whatever kind, that either were made publicly in the church, or by any private person. Eusebius, speaking of Constantine's custom of making his solemn addresses to God in his tent, before he went out to battle, says, He endeavoured to render God propitious to him by supplications and litanies,⁵⁸ that he might obtain his favour, assistance, and direction in his enterprises. And again, he says,⁵⁹ A little before his death he spent some time in the house of prayer, making supplications and litanies to God. In which places, litany seems to be a general name, and not to intend any particular sort of prayers. So Chrysostom also uses the word litany, when he says⁶⁰ to his people, To-morrow I shall go forth with you to make our litany, that is, the public service. And again,⁶¹ speaking of the solemn form of words, Pax vobis,

Peace be with you, he says, The bishop used it in all offices when he first entered the church, when he made the prayers and litanies, and when he preached. And Arcadius, in one of his laws⁶² made against heretics about the same time, takes litany in the same sense for prayers in general, when he forbids heretics to hold profane assemblies in the city, either by night or by day, to make their litany. Where it is plain, his intent was, not to prohibit heretics from making any particular sort of prayers, but all prayers in general within the city, and to cut off all opportunities of meeting either by night or by day for that purpose: and so Gothofred understands him. For this law was made with a direct view to the Arian assemblies for psalmody in their night stations, which had occasioned some tumults and murder in the city, as Socrates⁶³ and Sozomen inform us. So that the morning hymns, and psalmody, and prayers then came all under the general name of litany, and the Arians were forbidden in this sense to make any litanies within the city by this law of Arcadius. What Hamon L'Estrange⁶⁴ alleges out of St. Austin, Cyprian, and Tertullian, proves nothing, but that there were always prayers made in the church to implore God's mercy and favours; which no one ever denied: neither is the name litany used by any of them. It is more to the purpose, what St. Basil⁶⁵ says to the church of Neocæsarea, where Gregory Thaumaturgus was bishop; that though in Gregory's time they had no litanies, yet afterward, before St. Basil's time, they had admitted the use of them. By which argument, he defends the nocturnal prayers, and psalmody, and vigils, against those who objected that they were not used in St. Gregory's time. For neither were litanies used in his time, and yet now they were in use, and no one objected novelty against them. This shows, that St. Basil takes litanies for a peculiar sort of prayers lately set up in the church. For it cannot be doubted, but that they had prayers before, though not of this particular kind.

Some think, that litanies, in this new limited sense, were first introduced by Mamercus, bishop of Vienna in France, about the year 450. But St. Basil's testimony proves them to be earlier in the East. And it is a mistake in those who assert Mamercus to be the first author of them in the West: for Sidonius Apollinaris, who lived in the time of Mamercus, and wrote some epistles to him, says

Sect. 10.
Of litanies.
This at first a general name for prayers. How and when it came to be appropriated to certain particular forms of worship, called rogations.

⁵⁴ Casaubon. Exerc. 16. in Baron. n. 41. p. 472.

⁵⁵ Naz. Orat. 20. in Laud. Basil. p. 340.

⁵⁶ Chrys. Hom. 2. in 2 Cor. p. 740.

⁵⁷ Conc. Laodic. can. 19.

⁵⁸ Euseb. Vit. Const. lib. 2. cap. 14. Τὸν Θεὸν ἱκετηρίας καὶ λιταῖς ἰλεούμενος, &c.

⁵⁹ Id. lib. 4. cap. 61. Εὐκτηρίῳ ἐνδιατρύνας οἴκῳ, ἱκετηρίους εὐχὰς τε καὶ λιτανείας ἀνέπεμπε τῷ Θεῷ.

⁶⁰ Chrys. Hom. inquit iret in exilium, t. 4. p. 965. Αἰρίου εἰς λιτανεῖον ἐξελεύσομαι μεθ' ὑμῶν.

⁶¹ Chrys. Hom. 3. in Colos. p. 1338. Ἐν ταῖς ἐκκλησιαῖς εἰρήνην, ἐν ταῖς εὐχαῖς, ἐν ταῖς λιταῖς, &c.

⁶² Cod. Theod. lib. 16. Tit. 5. de Hæreticis, Leg. 30. Interdicatur his omnibus, ad litaniam faciendam intra civitatem noctu vel interdiu profanis coire conventibus.

⁶³ Socrat. lib. 6. cap. 8. Sozomen. lib. 8. cap. 8.

⁶⁴ L'Estrange's Alliance of Divine Offices, cap. 4. p. 100.

⁶⁵ Basil. Ep. 63. ad Neocæs. p. 97. Ἄλλ' οὐδὲ αἱ λιτανεῖαι ἐπὶ Γρηγορίου, ὡς ὑμεῖς νῦν ἐπιτηθεύετε.

expressly, that he was not the first inventor of them, but only of the Rogation fast days before Ascension, to which he applied the use of these litanies, which were in being long before, though not observed with such solemnity, nor fixed to any stated times, but only used as exigences required, to deprecate any impending judgment. This he declares at large in an epistle to Mamerus himself,⁶⁶ styling him the author of the Rogation days, and showing both the reasons of their institution, and the manner of observing them, with ardent supplications and fastings, in imitation of the Ninevites, to avert the threatening judgments of fire, or earthquakes, or inundations, or hostile invasions. But that we may not think Mamerus was the first author of litanies, because he applied their use particularly to the Rogation days, he speaks more expressly in another epistle,⁶⁷ where he says, that Mamerus indeed first brought in the observation of the Rogation solemnities, which spread by his example: but supplications or litanies were in use before, when men had occasion to pray against excessive rains or droughts; though they were observed but in a cold and disorderly manner, without fasting or full assemblies: but those which he instituted, were observed with fasting, and praying, and singing, and weeping. What Sidonius says here, proves that Mamerus was the author of the Rogation fast in France; but litanies were in use before: and if Savaro judge right of one of St. Austin's homilies,⁶⁸ the Rogation fast must have been observed long before in the African churches. For among his homilies de Tempore, there is one upon the vigil of the Ascension, where he speaks of a fast⁶⁹ observed for three days before Ascension day, advising all men to keep those days with fasting, prayer, and psalmody. However, from the time of Mamerus we are sure these Rogation days and litanies were celebrated with great solemnity in the church, being frequently mentioned by Alcimus Avitus,⁷⁰ Cæsarius Arelatensis,⁷¹ Eucherus Lugdunensis junior,⁷² and Gregory of Tours,⁷³ to name no later writers. The first council of Orleans, anno 511, established them⁷⁴ by a decree, ordering the three days before Ascension to be kept a fast with abstinence after the manner of Lent, and with rogations or litanies, and that on these days servants should rest from their labours. In the Spanish churches they deferred these rogations to the week after Pentecost: for they kept to the old rule of the ancient church, not to have any fast during the fifty days between Easter and Whitsuntide; therefore, as Walafridus Strabo observes of them,⁷⁵ they would not observe the Rogation fast in the time that the Bridegroom was with them. But by an order of the council of Gironne,⁷⁶ these litanies and this fast was put off to the week after Whitsuntide. And they ordered a second litany to be used on the first day of November. The fifth council of Toledo⁷⁷ appointed another such litany and fast to be celebrated yearly for three days, commencing on the thirteenth day of December. The sixth council of Toledo⁷⁸ confirmed this decree about two years after, anno 638, and made it a general rule for all the churches of Spain and Gallicia, and Gallia Narbonensis, which was at this time under the government of the Gothic king Chintillan. And in the seventeenth council of Toledo,⁷⁹ anno 694, under King Egicanes, a more general decree was made, That such litanies should be used in every month throughout the year. And so

⁶⁶ Sidon. lib. 7. Ep. 1. ad Mamerum. Solo tamen invectorum, te auctore, Rogationum palpamur auxilio, quibus inchoandis, instituendisque populus Arvernus cœpit initiari, &c.

⁶⁷ Id. lib. 5. Ep. 14. Rogationum nobis solennitatem primus Mamerus pater et pontifex, reverentissimo exemplo, utilissimo experimento, invenit, instituit, invexit. Erant quidem prius (quod salva fidei pace sit dictum) vagæ, tepentes, infrequentesque, utque sic dixerim, oscitabundæ supplicationes, quæ sæpe interpellantium prandiorum obicibus hebetabantur, maxime aut imbres aut serenitatem deprecaturæ:—In his autem, quas suprafatus summus sacerdos nobis et protulit pariter et contulit, jejunatur, oratur, psallitur, fletur.

⁶⁸ Savaro, Not. in Sidon. lib. 5. Ep. 14. p. 354.

⁶⁹ Aug. Hom. 173. de Temp. t. 10. p. 338. Sine dubio peccatorum suorum vulnera diligit, qui in istis tribus diebus, jejunando, orando, et psallendo medicamenta sibi spiritualia non requirit.

⁷⁰ Avitus, Hom. de Rogationibus.

⁷¹ Cæsarius. Hom. 33.

⁷² Eucherus. Hom. de Litanis.

⁷³ Greg. Turon. lib. 2. cap. 31.

⁷⁴ Conc. Aurelian. 1. can. 27. Rogationes, id est, litanias, ante ascensionem Domini placuit celebrari, ita ut præmissum triduanum jejuniū in Dominicæ ascensionis solennitate solvatur, &c.

⁷⁵ Strabo, de Offic. Eccles. cap. 28. Hispani autem, propter hoc quod scriptum, Non possunt filii sponsi lugere, quamdiu cum illis est sponsus, infra Quinquagesimam Paschæ recusantes jejunare, litanias suas post Pentecosten posuerunt.

⁷⁶ Conc. Gerunden. can. 2. Ut litanis post Pentecosten a quinta feria usque in sabbatum celebrentur. So it is in the title of the canon: and in the body of it, Ut per hoc triduum abstinencia celebretur. Ibid. can. 3. Item secunda litania faciendæ est kalendis Novembris.

⁷⁷ Conc. Tolet. 5. can. 1. Ut a die iduum Decembriū litania triduo ubique annua successione peragatur, &c.

⁷⁸ Conc. Tolet. 6. can. 2. Universalis autoritate censemus concilii, ut hi dies litaniarum, quæ in synodo præmissa sunt instituti, annuo recurso omni observatione habeantur celeberrimi.

⁷⁹ Conc. Tolet. 17. can. 6. Quando priscorum patrum institutio, per totum annum, per singulorum mensium cursum, litaniarum vota decreverit persolvenda—decernimus, ut deinceps per totum annum, in cunctis duodecim mensibus, per universas Hispaniæ et Galliarum provincias pro statu ecclesiæ Dei, pro incolumitate principis nostri, atque salvatione populi, et indulgentia totius peccati, et a cunctorum fidelium cordibus expulsione diaboli, exomologeses votis gliscentibus celebrentur.

by degrees these solemn supplications came to be used weekly, on Wednesdays and Fridays, the ancient stationary days, in all churches.

In the mean time, Gregory the Great instituted some such rogations at Rome, and one particularly on the twenty-fifth day of April, which goes by the name of litanía septiformis, because he ordered the church to go in procession in seven distinct classes; first the clergy, then the laymen, next the monks, after them the virgins, then the married women, next the widows, and last of all the poor and the children. This is mentioned both by Gregory⁸⁰ himself and Walafridus Strabo,⁸¹ who give it the name of litanía major: whence some have been led into a mistake, to think the Roman litanies were distinguished by the name of the greater litanies from those of Mamercus, which they call the less. So Hamon L'Estrange,⁸² and others, in their accounts of these things. But the French writers do not allow of this distinction. Cellotius⁸³ says, The rogation or litanía of Mamercus, was always dignified with the title of litanía major by their old writers, as well as that of Gregory, and that Gregory's litanía was of little use among them. It is certain, the council of Mentz,⁸⁴ and the Capitulars of Charles the Great,⁸⁵ which repeat the words of that council, applied the name of litanía major to their own rogations before Ascension. And Cellotius says, Gualterus Aurelianensis and Strabo both give it the same title. But still he does not tell us what they mean by the litanía minor, the lesser litanía, in contradistinction to the greater. If the reader will take my conjecture, it is no more but the known form, Kyrie, eleison, as the Latins read it, from the Greek, Κύριε ἐλέησον, Lord, have mercy upon us, or, Lord, have mercy upon them, if they were praying for others. As this was the constant response made by the people to each petition of their larger supplications for the catechumens and others (as we shall see hereafter); so it was used sometimes by itself, in all their offices, as a shorter form of supplication: and then it had the nature of a litanía by itself, and was not a part of a larger prayer. This is evident from the order made in the council of Vaison,⁸⁶ for introducing the use of it into the French churches: Whereas, say they, it is a very useful and agreeable custom in the Roman church, and all the provinces of Italy and the East, to use the frequent repetition of the Kyrie, eleison, Lord, have mercy upon us, with great affection and contrition; we therefore decree, That the same holy custom be introduced into all our churches, both at morning and evening prayer, and in the communion service. The Greeks usually said, Lord, have mercy upon us, without adding the other part, Christ, have mercy upon us: but the Latins used both clauses, and repeated them alternately, as we now do, first the minister, and then the people; whereas by the Greeks the supplication was made by the common voice of all together. This difference is noted by Gregory the Great;⁸⁷ but it does not detract from our observation, but rather confirms it, that this was a short form of supplication used one way or other in all churches, and that as a part of all their daily offices; whence it borrowed the name of the lesser litanía, in opposition to the greater litanies, which were distinct, complete, and solemn services, adapted to particular times, or extraordinary occasions. I must note further, that the greater litanies are sometimes termed exomologeses, confessions;⁸⁸ because fasting, and weeping, and mourning, and confession of sins, was usually joined with supplication to avert God's wrath, and reconcile him to a sinful people.

Sometimes to these solemn supplications they added processions, which Sect. 12. Of their processions. at first had nothing of harm or superstition in them: for they were only of the same nature with their processions at a funeral, when they carried a corpse with the solemnity of psalmody to its interment. They sometimes made their processions, and sometimes their litanies, as occasion required, in the open field: but here was no pomp of relics, nor exposing of the eucharist to adoration, in such solemnities; they only carried the cross, as they did also in some of their night processions for psalmody, as the badge of their profession, before them. Of this indeed there are some instances as early as Chrysostom; for it is noted in his Life by Palladius,⁸⁹ that his enemies trampled under foot the sign of the cross, which the people carried on their shoulders as they made their litanies in the field. And in those vigils which he set up at Constantinople in opposition to the Arians, the historians⁹⁰ say, they had silver crosses given them by the empress for this purpose. And the laws of Justinian⁹¹ expressly provided, That ⁸⁰ Greg. lib. 11. Ep. 2. ⁸¹ Strabo de Offic. Eccles. cap. 28.

⁸² L'Estrange, Alliance, cap. 4. p. 100.
⁸³ Cellot. Not. in Capitula Gualteri Aurelianensis. Conc. t. 8. p. 649.
⁸⁴ Conc. Moguntin. an. 813. cap. 33.
⁸⁵ Carol. Capitular. lib. 5. c. 85.
⁸⁶ Conc. Vasens. 2. can. 3. Quia tam in sede apostolica, quam etiam per totas Orientis atque Italiae provincias, dulcis et nimium salubris consuetudo intronmissa est, ut Kyrie, eleison, frequentius cum grandi affectu ac compunctione dicatur: placuit etiam nobis, ut in omnibus ecclesiis nostris ista con-suetudo sancta, et ad matutinum, et ad missas, et ad vesperam, Deo propiciante, intronmittatur.

⁸⁷ Greg. lib. 7. Ep. 64. ad Joan. Syracusan.
⁸⁸ Vid. Conc. Moguntin. can. 32.
⁸⁹ Palladius, Vit. Chrysost. cap. 15. p. 27. in Appendice, t. 2. Crucis signum venerabile, quod illi ferentes in humeris, litanias in campo agebant, pedibus suis consultantes.
⁹⁰ Socrat. lib. 6. cap. 8. Sozomen. lib. 8. cap. 8.
⁹¹ Justin. Novel. 123. cap. 32. Omnibus laicis interdici-mus litanias facere sine sanctis episcopis, et qui sub eis sunt reverentissimis clericis, — sed et ipsas honorandas cruces as these litanies should not be celebrated without the bishop or the clergy; so the crosses to be used in these solemnities should not be reposed in any places but the churches, nor be carried by any but such as were appointed. And because in these solemn processions some were inclined to appear in pomp unsuitable to the occasion, with gay clothing, and on horseback; therefore both these things were particularly forbidden. Sidonius⁹² notes it as a great absurdity for men to appear, castorinati ad litanias, dressed up in their rich beaver cloths at a litany, because sackcloth and ashes were more becoming such solemnities, which were intended for fasting, and mourning, and supplication, and humiliation, and confession of sins, after the example of the Ninevites, in their solemn addresses to God. And for this reason the canons⁹³ forbade any one to appear on horseback or in rich apparel at the rogation solemnities, but rather disalceate in sackcloth and ashes, unless he had the excuse of infirmity to hinder him. For these rogations were intended to implore God's mercy in the most humble manner; and, with the most ardent affections of soul, to beseech him to avert all sicknesses, and plagues, and tribulations; to repel the evils of pestilence, war, hail, and drought; to compose the temper of the air, so that it may be for the health of men's bodies, and fertility of the earth; that he would keep all the elements in due order and harmony, and grant men peaceable times; as Eucherius⁹⁴ relates the chief heads of them in his sermon upon this subject. Whereas, yet, we may observe, no prayers or intercessions were made to saints or angels, as in the modern litanies of the Romish church, but to God only, as shall be showed at large in the following chapter.

CHAPTER II.

THAT THE DEVOTIONS OF THE ANCIENT CHURCH WERE PAID TO EVERY PERSON OF THE BLESSED TRINITY.

HAVING thus distinguished the ambiguity of the names of the ancient worship, and settled the true meaning of them, our next inquiry must be into the object of the Christian worship, to see what persons they were to whom they paid their devotion. That which makes this in-

Sect. 1.
Proofs of the worship of Christ, as the Son of God, or the second person of the blessed Trinity, in the first century.

(cum quibus et in litanis ingrediuntur) non alibi nisi in venerabilibus locis reponi, &c.

⁹² Sidon. lib. 5. Ep. 7. ad Thaumastum. p. 327. Libenter incedunt armati ad epulas, albat ad exequias, pelliti ad ecclesias, pullati ad nuptias, castorinati ad litanias.

quiry necessary, which otherwise might have been omitted, is the prevalency of two contrary errors, too much reigning in these later ages; one of which asserts, that the Father alone was the sole object of true Divine worship, and not the Son or Holy Ghost; and the other, that saints and angels had also a share in it. To show the falseness of both which pretences, I shall a little detain the reader with the proofs and evidences of the contrary assertions. And first to show, that Christ, as the Son of God, and the second person of the ever blessed Trinity, was the object of Divine worship in all ages, we will begin with the original of Christian worship, and carry the inquiry through the three first centuries. For the first age, the Scripture is sufficient evidence of the Christians' practice. For not to insist on the precept of honouring the Son, as they honoured the Father; or the form of baptism, in which they are commanded to join the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost in one act of worship; or the injunction to believe in the Son, as they believed in the Father; with many other acts of internal worship peculiar to God alone; I only argue from their example and practice. St. Stephen, the protomartyr, when he was sealing his confession with his blood, breathed out his last in a prayer to Christ, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit:" and, "Lord, lay not this sin to their charge," Acts vii. 59, 60. St. Paul professes he never baptized any but only in the name of Christ, 1 Cor. i. 13. And his common forms of blessing were with invocation of the name of Christ: "Grace be to you and peace from God the Father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ;" and, "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all:" as the solemn forms run almost in all his epistles, both in the beginning and the conclusion of them. Nay, so common was this practice, that among other titles of the believers, at their first rise and appearance in the world, they were distinguished by the character of those that called on the name of Christ, Acts ix. 14, 21; 1 Cor. i. 2; 2 Tim. ii. 22. Some critics, I know, would have the phrase, ἐπικαλούμενοι τὸ ὄνομα Χριστοῦ, to be taken passively only for those who were named by the name of Christ, that is, Christians; but this criticism is of no weight; for they were called invocers, or worshippers of Christ, before the name Christian was known in the world: for this name was not used till some time after St. Paul's conversion, when, as St. Luke says expressly, Acts xi. 26, "the disciples were first called Christians in Antioch." But they were worshippers of him before, and therefore were distinguished by the chaacter of the men that called upon his name. Many other such like evidences are obvious to any one that reads the New Testament: I only add that of Revelation v. 8—13, where the church in heaven and earth together is represented as offering both prayers and hymns to Christ: "When he had taken the book, the four beasts and four and twenty elders fell down before the Lamb, having every one of them harps, and golden vials full of odours, which are the prayers of saints. And they sung a new song, saying, Thou art worthy to take the book, and to open the seals thereof: for thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation; and hast made us unto our God kings and priests: and we shall reign on the earth. And I beheld, and I heard the voice of many angels round about the throne and the beasts and the elders: and the number of them was ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands; saying with a loud voice, Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honour, and glory, and blessing. And every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, heard I saying, Blessing, and honour, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever."

⁹³ Conc. Mogunt. can. 33. Sicut sancti patres nostri instituerunt, non equitando, nec preciosis vestibus induti, sed disalceati, cinere et cilicio induti, nisi infirmitas impedierit. Vide Burchard. lib. 13. cap. 7.

⁹⁴ Eucher. Hom. de Litanis.

We have here seen the model of the worship of Christ, as begun and settled in the practice of the church in the first age. And we shall find it continued in the same manner in those that followed immediately after. For Pliny, who lived in the beginning of the second century, and, as a judge under Trajan, took the confessions of some revolting Christians, says, They declared to him, they were¹ used to meet on a certain day before it was light, and among other parts of their worship, sing a hymn to Christ, as to their God. Which is a plain indication of their worship of Christ on the Lord's day. Not long after this lived Polycarp, who² joins God the Father and the Son together in his prayers for grace and benediction upon men: The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and Jesus Christ himself, the eternal High Priest, the Son of God, build you up in faith and truth, and in all meekness, to live without anger, in patience, in long-suffering, and forbearance, and give you a lot and part among the saints, and to us with you, and to all them that are under heaven, who shall believe in Jesus Christ our Lord, and in his Father, who raised him from the dead. And so he begins his epistle, Mercy and peace from God Almighty, and from the Lord Jesus Christ, be multiplied unto you. And when he came to his martyrdom, he made a prayer to God at the stake, before he was burnt, concluding it with this doxology to the whole Trinity:³ I praise thee, I bless thee, I glorify thee for all things, together with the eternal and heavenly Jesus Christ, thy beloved Son; with whom unto thee, and the Holy Spirit, be glory both now and for ever, world without end. Amen. When Polycarp was dead, the church of Smyrna wrote a circular epistle to other churches, to give an account of his sufferings, wherein they relate this remarkable occurrence, that as soon as he was dead, the Jews suggested to the heathen judge, that he should not suffer the Christians to take Polycarp's body and bury it, lest they should leave their crucified Master, and begin to worship this other. Not considering, says the epistle, that we can never either forsake the worship of Christ, who suffered for the salvation of all those who are saved in the whole world, the just for the unjust; or worship any other. For we worship him as being the Son of God; but the martyrs we only love, as they deserve, for their great affection to their King and Master, and as being disciples and followers of their Lord, whose partners and fellow disciples we desire to be. This is an unanswerable testimony, to prove both the Divine worship of Christ, as the true Son of God, and that no martyr or other saint was worshipped in those days. Not long after this lived Justin Martyr, who, in his second Apology, to wipe off the charge of atheism, brought against them by the heathens, who objected to them, That they had cast off the worship of God; answers, That they worshipped and adored still the God of righteousness, and his Son, (that

¹ Plin. lib. 10. Ep. 97. Affirmabant, quod essent soliti stato die ante lucem convenire; carmenque Christo, quasi Deo, dicere secum invicem.

² Polycarp. Ep. ad Philip. n. 12. Deus autem et Pater Domini nostri Jesu Christi; et ipse sempiternus Pontifex, Dei Filius, Christus Jesus, ædificet vos in fide et veritate, et in omni mansuetudine, &c.; et det vobis sortem et partem inter sanctos suos, et nobis vobiscum, et omnibus qui sunt sub cælo, qui credituri sunt in Dominum nostrum Jesum Christum et in ipsius Patrem.

³ Martyrium Polycarpi, ap. Coteler. Patr. Apostol. t. 2. p. 199. Περὶ πάντων αἰνῶ σε, εὐλογῶ σε, δοξάζω σε, σὺν τῷ αἰωνίῳ καὶ ἑσπερανίῳ Ἰησοῦ Χριστῷ, ἀγαπητῷ σὲ παιδί, μεθ' ἑ σοὶ καὶ Πνεύματι Ἁγίῳ ἡ δόξα καὶ νῦν, καὶ εἰς τοὺς μέλλοντας αἰῶνας. Ἀμὴν. Eusebius, lib. 4. c. 15. ex Epist.

Ecclesie Smyrnenis, reads this with a little variation of the particles: Διὰ τῆ αἰωνίᾳ ἀρχιερέως Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ τῆ ἀγαπητῆ σε παιδὸς δὲ ἑ σοὶ συναὐτῷ ἐν Πνεύματι Ἁγίῳ ἡ δόξα, &c. But this makes no alteration in the sense; for still it concludes with a doxology to the three Divine persons: By whom and with whom unto thee and the Holy Spirit be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

⁴ Smyrn. Eccles. Epist. ap. Euseb. l. 4. c. 15. et ap. Coteler. p. 200. Μὴ, φησὶν, ἀφέντες τὸν ἐπαρωμένον, τῆτον ἄρξωνται σέβεσθαι—ἀγνοῦντες, ὅτι ἔτε τὸν Χριστὸν ποτὲ καταλείπει δυνήσόμεθα, τὸν ὑπὲρ τῆς τῷ παντὸς κόσμῳ τῶν σωζομένων σωτηρίας παθόντα, ἄμωμον ὑπὲρ ἁμαρτωλῶν, ἔτε ἑτερόν τινα σέβεσθαι: τῆτον γάρ, ὕδιν ὄντα τῷ Θεῷ, προσκυνοῦμεν τοὺς δὲ μάρτυρας, ὡς μαθητὰς καὶ μιμητὰς τῷ Κυρίῳ, ἀγαπώμεν ἀξίως, &c.

came from him, and taught both them and the host of good angels, who followed him, and were made like unto him,) as also the Holy Spirit of prophecy:⁵ to these they paid a rational and true honour, as they always frankly owned to all such as were disposed to learn. Bellarmine⁶ very fraudulently urges this place, to prove the worship of angels: as if Justin had said, that they worshipped the Father, the Son, the angels, and the Holy Spirit; whereas he says nothing of the worship of angels, but that the angels were taught by the Son, and that the Son, together with the Father and Holy Spirit, were the object of Christian worship. Which he repeats again in his foresaid Apology,⁷ saying, in answer to the same objection, that they could demonstrate, that as they worshipped God the Creator of all things, so with equal reason they worshipped Jesus Christ in the second place, and the Holy Spirit of prophecy in the third, knowing Jesus Christ to be the Son of the true God. For whereas the heathens objected further, that it was madness in them, next to the immutable and true God, Maker of all things, to give the second place to a crucified man, he tells them, They understood not the mystery of this practice. Which shows, that as they worshipped Christ, so they worshipped him as the true Son of God, and not as a creature: for he tells the emperors a little after,⁸ they held it unlawful to worship any but God alone. Therefore in their practice they also showed their belief of his true Divinity; since they worshipped him only upon this foundation and supposition, that he was truly God, and not a mere man; and to have done it upon any other supposition, had been gross idolatry by their own confession. Which I wish were duly considered by those who now write against the Divinity of Christ, and absurdly pretend that all the fathers of the three first ages were of their opinion. For this is only to make them guilty of the grossest idolatry, and involve them in a monstrous contradiction; whilst they pretended to worship none but God alone, and yet gave Divine honour to one, whom (if our modern representers say true) they did not believe to be truly God by nature, but only a creature.

But to go on with the inquiry, as to what concerns the object of their worship in practice. Athenagoras answers the charge of atheism, after the same manner as Justin Martyr had done before him: We are no atheists,⁹ who worship the Creator of all things, and his Word that proceedeth from him. Minucius Felix, to another objection, That they worshipped a crucified man, answers, That they were mistaken in the charge; for he whom they worshipped¹⁰ was God, and not a mere mortal man: miserable is he whose hope is only in man; for his help is at an end, when the life of man is extinct. About this time lived Lucian the heathen, who, in one of his Dialogues, takes notice of the Christian worship. For, bringing in a Christian instructing a catechumen,¹¹ he makes the catechumen ask this question, By whom shall I swear? And he that personates the Christian, answers, By the God that reigns on high, the great, immortal, heavenly God, and the Son of the Father, and the Spirit proceeding from the Father, one in three, and three in one. Take these for your Jupiter, imagine this to be your God. Which evidently shows, that Lucian had learned this from the Christian institutions, that the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, were the object of their Divine worship. And he elsewhere objects to them the worship of their crucified impostor,¹² as he blasphemously terms our blessed Lord. Not long after Irenæus, speaking of the miracles which the church wrought in his time, particularly in casting out devils, says, She did this¹³ not by invocation of angels, nor by enchantments, nor by any other wicked piece of curiosity, but by directing her prayers, clean, and pure, and openly, to the God over all; and by invoking the name of Jesus Christ she works miracles for the benefit of men, and not for their seduction. And that this was so, appears further from some of the forms of prayer used then in the church for the energumens in the public service, one of which is recorded by the author of the Con-

⁵ Justin. Apol. 2. p. 56. ἼΑΛΛ' ἐκεῖνόν τε, καὶ τὸν παρ' αὐτοῦ Υἱὸν ἐλθόντα, καὶ διδάξαντα ἡμᾶς ταῦτα, καὶ τὸν τῶν ἄλλων ἐπομένων καὶ ἐξομοιοιμένων ἀγαθῶν ἀγγέλων στρατὸν, Πνεῦμά τε τὸ προφητικὸν σεβόμεθα καὶ προσκυνούμεν, &c.

⁶ Bellarm. de Beatitud. Sanctor. lib. 1. cap. 13. t. 1. p. 1957.

⁷ Justin. Apol. 2. p. 60. Τὸν δημιουργὸν—καὶ Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν, Υἱὸν αὐτοῦ τοῦ ὄντως Θεοῦ μαθόντες, καὶ ἐν δευτέρῃ χώρῃ ἔχοντες, Πνεῦμά τε προφητικὸν ἐν τρίτῃ τάξει, ὅτι μετὰ λόγου τιμῶμεν, ἀποδείξομεν. It. Dial. cum Tryph. p. 302, he styles him Θεὸν ἰσχυρὸν καὶ προσκυνητὸν, the mighty God that was to be adored.

⁸ Ibid. p. 61. Θεὸν μὲν ἰσχυρὸν προσκυνούμεν, &c.

⁹ Athenag. Legat. pro Christianis, Bibl. Patr. Gr. Lat. t. 1. p. 76. Οὐκ ἐσμὲν ἄθεοι, ἀγνοῦντες τὸν ποιητὴν τοῦ τοῦ παντός, καὶ τὸν παρ' αὐτοῦ Λόγον.

¹⁰ Minuc. Dial. p. 88. Quod religioni nostræ hominem noxium et crucem ejus adscribitis, longe de vicinia veritatis erratis, qui putatis Deum credi aut meruisse noxium, aut potuisse terrenum. Næ ille miserabilis, cujus in homine mortali spes omnis innititur: totum enim ejus auxilium cum extincto homine finitur.

¹¹ Lucian. Philopatris, prope finem.

Ἵψιμέδοντα Θεὸν, μέγαν, ἄμβροτον, οὐρανίωνα, Υἱὸν Πατρὸς, Πνεῦμα ἐκ Πατρὸς ἐκπορευόμενον,

Ἐν ἐκ τριῶν, καὶ ἐξ ἐνὸς τρία,

Ταῦτα νόμιζε Ζήνα, τὸν δ' ἠγοῦ Θεόν.

¹² Lucian. de Morte Peregr. p. 277. Τὸν ἀνεσκολοπισμένον ἐκεῖνον σοφιστὴν προσκυνεῖν.

¹³ Iren. lib. 2. cap. 57. Nec invocationibus angelicis facit, nec incantationibus, nec aliqua prava curiositate, sed munde et pure et manifeste orationes dirigens ad Dominum, qui omnia fecit, et nomen Domini nostri Jesu Christi invocans, virtutes secundum utilitates hominum, sed non ad seductionem perficit.

their worship, because they knew him to be the true natural Son of God, by a spiritual generation, and therefore called God and the Son of God, because he was of one and the same essence or substance. For God was a Spirit; and the Son was Spirit of Spirit, and God of God, as Light is of Light. In that manner he was begotten of God, so as to be God and the Son of God, as they were both one. In another place, dissuading Christian women from marrying with unbelievers, among other arguments, he uses this,²⁹ That in such a family there could be no mention of God, no invocation of Christ, no cherishing of faith by their joint reading of the Scripture. At the same time, he tells us,³⁰ a Christian could pray to no other but the eternal, the living, and true God: he could not ask such things, as they were wont to ask in prayer, of any other but him, from whom he knew he could obtain them, and who alone was able to give them. Now, this had been absurd and ridiculous arguing to the heathens, had not Christians believed Christ to be the eternal, living, and true God. Their arguments might easily have been retorted, and charged with contradiction; and they would have stood self-condemned by their own practice, if, whilst they were arguing against the heathen idols upon this foot, that nothing was to be worshipped but the eternal, living, and true God, they themselves had worshipped one who fell short of that character. Therefore we must conclude, that as it is plain from the foregoing testimonies, that Christians did give Divine worship to Christ in this age, so they did it only upon this supposition, that he was the eternal, living, and true God, as the eternal Son of the eternal Father; and that however they differed, as far as it was necessary for a Father and Son to be distinct, yet they were but one Creator, and one God.

We are now come to the third century, where we have first an illustrious testimony for the worship of Christ as God, in the Fragments of Caius, a Roman presbyter, preserved by Eusebius, out of his book called The Labyrinth, written against Artemon, one of the first that appeared against the Divinity of our Saviour. Here, among many other things, showing the novelty of that heresy, he observes,³¹ There were anciently many psalms and hymns composed by the brethren, and transcribed by the faithful, setting forth the praises of Christ as the Word of God, and ascribing Divinity to him. And that such sort of hymns were used in the service of the church, we learn from another passage in the same Eusebius, taken out of the council of Antioch against Paulus Samosatensis, the heretical bishop of Antioch, about the middle of this century. For there he is charged as giving orders³² to forbid the use of such psalms or hymns as were used to be sung in the church to the honour of our Lord Jesus Christ, under pretence that they were only the novel compositions of late and modern authors: whilst, in the mean time, he suborned women on the great day of the Lord's passion, (or the resurrection, for pascha will signify both,) to sing hymns composed to his own honour; where, among other things, he that would not allow Christ any other but an earthly original, was not ashamed to hear himself blasphemously extolled as an angel come down from heaven; which, as those holy fathers observe, was enough to make a hearer tremble. And for this insolent attempt against the Divinity and worship of Christ, that heretical bishop was anathematized and deposed.

A little before this time, Nepos, an Egyptian bishop, composed psalms and hymns for the use of the church, which are commended by Dionysius,³³ bishop of Alexandria, as a useful work for the edification of the brethren. And, probably, they might be some of those hymns which Paulus Samosatensis discarded as novel inventions of modern authors, though hymns of the like nature had been in use from the first foundation of the church. Dionysius of Alexandria was one of those who opposed the practice of Paulus Samosatensis by his letters, though he was not present in the council; and he is commended by St. Basil,³⁴ as one that always used this form of doxology: To God the Father, and the Son, our Lord Jesus Christ, with the Holy Spirit, be glory and dominion now and for ever, world without end. Amen. But we have more pregnant testimonies from the works of Origen in the beginning of this century. In his fifth Book against Celsus, he tells us, That they could not lawfully worship angels, but they might and did worship the Son of God. All prayers, says he, and supplications,³⁵ and intercesgeneratum, et idcirco Filium Dei, et Deum dictum ex unitate substantiæ: nam et Deus Spiritus.—Ita de Spiritu Spiritus, et de Deo Deus, ut lumen de lumine accensum,—ita quod de Deo profectum est, Deus est, et Dei Filius, et unus ambo.

²⁹ Tertul. ad Uxor. lib. 2. cap. 6. Quæ Dei mentio? quæ Christi invocatio? ubi fomenta fidei de Scripturarum interlectione?

³⁰ Id. Apol. cap. 30. Nos pro salute imperatoris Deum invocamus æternum, Deum verum, Deum vivum, &c. Hæc ab alio orare non possum, quam a quo me scio consecutorum, quoniam et ipse est qui solus præstat.

³¹ Euseb. lib. 5. cap. 28. Ψαλμοὶ δὲ ὅσοι καὶ ὠδαὶ ἀδελφῶν, ἀπαρχῆς ὑπὸ πικτῶν γραφεῖσαι, τὸν Λόγον τῆ Θεῆ τὸν Χριστὸν ἡμέτεσι Σεολογῶντες.

³² Conc. Antioch. Epist. Synod. ap. Euseb. lib. 7. cap. 30. Ψαλμοὶ δὲ τοὺς εἰς τὸν Κύριον ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν παύσας, ὡς δὴ νεωτέρως καὶ νεωτέρων ἀνδρῶν συγγράμματα, &c.

³³ Dionys. de Pronission. ap. Euseb. lib. 7. cap. 24. Ἐλατῶ Νέπωτα—τῆς τε ψαλμωδίας, ἣ μεχρὶ νῦν πολλοὶ τῶν ἀδελφῶν εὐθυμῶνται.

³⁴ Basil. de Spir. Sancto, cap. 29.

³⁵ Origen. cont. Cels. lib. 5. p. 233. Πᾶσαν μὲν γὰρ δέησιν, καὶ προσευχῆν, καὶ ἔντευξιν, καὶ εὐχαριστίαν, sions, and thanksgivings, are to be sent up to God the Lord of all, by the High Priest who is above all angels, being the living Word and God. And we can also pray to the Word himself, and make intercessions to him, and give thanks, and make supplications to him, if we rightly understand how prayer is to be taken in propriety of speech, or with some restriction. He means, that prayers offered to the Son of God, considered as a Son, redound to the Father, as the fountain of the Deity: as Bishop Bull³⁶ judiciously explains, and vindicates this passage from the unjust exceptions which Huetius makes against it. As he does also another passage in the eighth Book, where Origen more largely asserts the worship of Christ against the common objection renewed by Celsus, That the Christians worshipped one that had but lately appeared in the world. Celsus had thus formed the objection with all the art and force he was able: If the Christians, says he, worshipped no other but one God,³⁷ their arguments might be of some weight and force against others; but now they give immense honour and worship to this new upstart, who so lately made his appearance in the world, and yet think they commit no offence against God, though they give Divine worship to his servant. To this Origen replies, not by dissembling, or denying, or diminishing the worship of Christ, but by asserting it upon such grounds and principles, as show that Father and Son can be but one God; and that to worship two persons under such relation and economy of real Father and Son, cannot be to worship two Gods. If Celsus, says he, had understood the meaning of this, "I and the Father are one;" or what the Son of God says in his prayer, "As I and thou are one," he would never have imagined that we worship any but the God who is over all. For he saith, "The Father is in me, and I in the Father." But that no one may think that, in saying this, we run over to those who deny the Father and Son to be two hypostases or persons, (meaning the Sabellians,) let him consider that which is said, "All they that believed were of one heart and one soul," that he may understand this, "I and the Father are one." We therefore worship one God, as I have showed, the Father and the Son; and our reasoning stands still in full force against others; neither do we give Divine honour to an upstart being, as if he had no existence before. For we believe him, when he says, "Before Abraham was, I am;" and again, "I am the Truth." Neither is any of us of so mean and servile understanding, as to imagine, that the substance of Truth had not a being before the appearance of Christ in the flesh. Therefore we worship the Father of Truth, and the Son, who is the Truth, two things in personal subsistence, but one in agreement, and consent, and identity of will, ὄντα δύο τῇ ὑποστάσει πράγματα, ἐν δὲ τῇ ὁμοιοίᾳ, καὶ τῇ συμφωνίᾳ, καὶ τῇ ταυτότητι τοῦ βουλήματος: so that whoever sees the Son, who is the brightness of the glory of God, and the express image of his person, sees God in him, as being the true image of God. Now Celsus imagines, that because together with God we worship his Son, it follows upon our own principles, that we may not only worship God, but his ministers and servants. And, indeed, if he meant the true servants of God, after his only begotten Son, such as Michael and Gabriel, and the rest of the angels and archangels, and stood up for the worship of these; perhaps, taking worship, and the acts of the worshippers, in a sound and qualified sense, (he means the common respect of love and honour, which is due to good angels,) we might say something proper upon this head; but now, when he understands by the servants of God, only the devils whom the Gentiles worship, he does not oblige us by any just consequence to worship such as these, whom the Scripture assures us to be only servants of the wicked one, the prince of this world, and the author of apostacy from God. We refuse to worship all such, as knowing them to be no servants of God; for had they been servants, we should not have called them devils; but we worship one God, and his only Son, and Word, and Image, with supplications and prayers to the utmost of our power, offering our prayers to God over all by his only begotten Son; to whom we first present them, beseeching him who is the propitiation for our sins, as our High Priest, to offer our prayers, and sacrifices, and intercessions to God, the Lord of all things. Therefore our faith relies only upon God, by his Son who confirms it in us. And therefore Celsus has no reason or colour for his charge of sedition, or departing from God upon the account of his Son; for we worship the Father, whilst we admire and adore the Son, who is his Word, and Wisdom, and Truth, and Righteousness, and whatever else we are taught to believe of the Son of God, begotten of such a Father.

I have recited this passage at length, not only because it is such a full proof of the matter of fact, that the Christians did give Divine honour and worship to the Son; but also because it shows us upon what principle and foundation they did it; viz. as ἀναπεμπτόν τῷ ἐπὶ πᾶσι Θεῷ, διὰ τοῦ ἐπὶ πάντων ἀγγέλων ἀρχιερέως, ἐμφύχου Λόγου καὶ Θεοῦ· δεησόμεθα δὲ καὶ αὐτοῦ τοῦ Λόγου, καὶ ἐντευξόμεθα αὐτῷ, καὶ προσευξόμεθα δὲ, ἐὰν δυνάμεθα κατακοῦναι τῆς περὶ προσευχῆς κυριολεξίας καὶ καταχρήσεως· ἀγγέλους γὰρ καλεῖσαι— οὐκ εὐλογον.

³⁶ Bull. Defens. Fid. Nicen. sect. 2. cap. 9. n. 15. p. 199.

³⁷ Orig. cont. Cels. lib. 8. p. 385. Celsi verba: Εἰ μὲν οὐ μὴδὲνα ἄλλων ἱερατεύον οὔτοι, πλὴν ἕνα Θεόν, ἦν ἂν τις αὐτοῖς ἴσως, πρὸς τοὺς ἄλλους ἀτεινὴς λόγος· οὐκ δὲ τὸν ἑναγχος φανέντα τοῦτον ὑποθησκεύουσι, &c. Vid. Orig. Περὶ εὐχῆς, n. 49 et 50; and Bp. Fell's note upon it.

being the true Son of God, and one God with the Father. For though Huetius has excepted against some words in this passage, as derogatory to the Son; and the modern Arians have abused it to patronize their heresy; and the Romanists would fain draw it into a proof for the worship of angels; yet I dare be bold to say, there is not a tittle in it, when rightly understood, to countenance any of their suggestions: but as it is a solid proof of the matter of fact, so it is an illustrious evidence of Origen's belief, and clear explication of the unity of the Godhead. For excepting that sort of unity, which Origen and all catholic writers reject as inconsistent with a real Trinity, that is, the unity of hypostases, or persons, which none but Sabellians and their followers maintain; he asserts all other kinds of unity, in opposition to Arians, who denied the unity of essence or nature, and made the Son to be of a different substance from the Father, as a created Being; in opposition to the Marcionites, and such other heretics, as maintained contrary principles, one good, and another evil, in the Godhead; in opposition to the Tritheites, who brought in the proper doctrine of three Gods, by denying the subordination and relation of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and asserting three co-ordinate and independent principles, and baptizing in the name of three such ἀναρχοι, ἀναίριοι, and ἀγέννητοι, (as the Apostolical Canons³⁸ call them,) three unoriginated and unbegotten principles, wholly independent of one another; in opposition to Hieracas and the Triformians, who absurdly divided the Trinity into three parts of one whole; and finally, in opposition to all that swarm of heretics, who distinguished, with the Cerdonians, between the God of justice and the God of goodness, styling the one the God of the law and the prophets; and the other, the Father of Christ and God of the gospel. Origen, I say, in opposition to all these, asserts every sort of unity, except the Jewish and Sabellian notion of unity, which confines the Divine nature to one person. For, in saying first that the Son is the express and true image of God the Father, he asserts the identity of nature, against Arius; and so could not believe him to be a creature of a different substance or nature, but as a true Son, of the same essence with his Father, and equal to him in all infinite and Divine perfections. 2. In saying that he was a Son, deriving his original from the Father, and not another independent being, he maintains the unity of principle, and reserves to the Father the privilege of being the fountain of the Deity; and, consequently, opposes the heresy of the Tritheites, who maintain three co-ordinate and independent principles, and destroy the monarchy, and make three Creators instead of one, by destroying the due subordination and relation of the Son to the Father. 3. In saying that the Father and Son are one in agreement, and consent, and identity of will, he asserts the unity of operation, creation, and government: which destroys the heresy of those who maintained contrary principles in the Godhead. 4. In saying that the Son was equal to the Father in all infinite perfections, he rejects the absurdity of those who dreamed of three parts in the Divine nature. 5. In asserting Christ to be the Son of the Creator and God of the Old Testament, he maintains the unity of Providence, and refutes the heresy of those who maintained that the Creator and God of the Old Testament was a different God from the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. So that he maintains all sorts of unity, except personal unity, which cannot consist with a real Trinity in the Godhead. And upon this foot he answers the objection of Celsus, who charged the Christians with polytheism, for giving Divine honour to Jesus Christ.

Having made this short and useful digression upon this celebrated passage of Origen, to vindicate it from the abuses of the modern Arians, I now return to the history of fact, to show that Divine worship was given to Christ as the Son of God. And of this there is further evidence in Origen: for this is not the only place in which he is put to vindicate the worship of Christ from the charge of polytheism, which is frequently repeated by Celsus. In the third Book³⁹ Celsus objects, That they worshipped one who was apprehended and put to death; in which respect they were no better than the Getæ, who worshipped Zamolxis; and the Cilicians, Mopsus; and the Acarnanes, Amphiloehus; and the Thebans, Amphiarus; and the Lebadians, Trophonius. In replying to which, Origen says, They offered their prayers to Christ, as Mediator between God and men, who conferred the blessings of the Father upon men, and presented their prayers, as High Priest, to the God over all. Not long after, Celsus⁴⁰ repeats the charge again, That they who ridiculed the heathens for worshipping Jupiter, whose sepulchre the Cretians could show, did themselves worship one that was laid in the grave. In the seventh Book, he renews the impeachment three times, bidding the Christians⁴¹ not be so ridiculous as to revile the heathen gods as idols, whilst they worshipped a God of their own more wretched than any idol, and not so much as an idol, for that he was truly dead. If they had a mind to innovate in worshipping a dead man,⁴² they might with more reason, he thinks, have chosen Hercules, or Æsculapius, or Orpheus, or Anaxarchus, or Epictetus, or Sibylla, rather than have made a god of one who ³⁸ Canon. Apost. c. 49.

³⁹ Origen. cont. Cels. lib. 3. p. 131.

⁴⁰ Ibid. lib. 3. p. 136.

⁴² Ibid. p. 367, 368.

⁴¹ Celsus, lib. 7. p. 358.

lived an infamous life, and died a miserable death. Yea, they might have chosen among their own prophets, Jonas under the gourd, or Daniel in the lions' den, as more worthy of this honour. He whom they worshipped, he cries again,⁴³ is no demon, but a dead man. Thus, from the charges of Celsus, and Origen's replies, we may collect what worship was given to Christ as the Son of God, and also as Mediator between God and men.

It is further observable, that Origen, in his first Book,⁴⁴ speaking of the wise men who came to worship Christ, by the leading of a star, says, They offered gifts to him suited to his different qualities, who was compounded, as one might say, of God and mortal man: they therefore presented him with gold, as a king; with myrrh, as a mortal man that should die; and with frankincense, as a God. And Origen himself, in his other works, frequently speaks of his own prayers offered to Christ. In one of his homilies⁴⁵ he addresses him in these words: O Lord Jesus, grant that I may be found worthy to have some monument of me in thy tabernacle. I could wish to offer gold, or silver, or precious stones, with the princes of the people: but because these things are above me, let me at least be thought worthy to have goats' hair in the tabernacle of God, only that I may not in all things be found empty and unfruitful. In another homily:⁴⁶ We must pray to the Lord Jesus and the Holy Spirit, that he would take away that mist and darkness, which is contracted by the filth of our sins, and dims the sight of our souls. And again:⁴⁷ I must pray to the Lord Jesus, that when I seek he would grant me to find, and open to me when I knock. And in another homily:⁴⁸ Let us pray from our hearts to the Word of God, who is the only begotten of the Father, that reveals him to whom he will, that he would vouchsafe to reveal these things unto us. And he has many the like prayers in his other discourses.⁴⁹ But especially that passage in his Comment on the Epistle to the Romans is most remarkable, where he proves Christ to be God, from his being called upon in prayer: The apostle, he says, in those words, 1 Cor. i. 2, "With all that call on the name of the Lord Jesus Christ," declares him to be God,⁵⁰ whose name was called upon. And if to call upon the name of the Lord, and to adore God, be one and the self-same thing; then as Christ is called upon, so is he to be adored: and as we offer to God the Father first of all prayers, so must we also to the Lord Jesus Christ; and as we offer supplications to the Father, so do we also to the Son; and as we offer thanksgivings to God, so do we offer thanksgivings to our Saviour. For the Holy Scripture teaches us, that the same honour is to be given to both, that is, to God the Father and the Son, when it says, "That they may honour the Son, as they honour the Father."

Not long after Origen lived Novatian at Rome, and Cyprian at Carthage, who both speak of the prayers of the church, as offered up to Christ together with the Father. Novatian⁵¹ makes it an argument of his Divinity, that he is present in all places to them that call upon him; which belongs not to the nature of man, but God. And he argues further from the church's praying to him as Mediator; which kind of prayers would be of no use, if he were a mere man: and from our obligations to fix our hope on him, which would be a curse rather than a blessing, if he were not God, as well as man. For cursed is the hope that is placed only in man. St. Cyprian in like manner speaks of his being worshipped in many places. In his book of the Advantage of Patience, he styles him,⁵² the Lord God of hosts, the God of the Christians: and particularly tells us, That God the Father has commanded his Son to be worshipped; and in regard to that command, the apostle Paul says, "That God hath highly exalted him, and given him a name above every name; that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth:" and in the Revelation, when St. John would have worshipped the angel, the angel opposed it, and said, "I am thy fellow servant, and of thy brethren: worship the Lord Jesus." So Cyprian reads it, Jesum Dominum adora. And he uses this as an argument to persuade men to patience, that the Lord Jesus, who is worshipped in heaven, bears with many indignities on earth, and does not avenge himself till his second coming in glory. Again, in one of his epis-

⁴³ Celsus, lib. 7. p. 976.

⁴⁴ Ibid. lib. 1. p. 46.

⁴⁵ Orig. Hom. 13. in Exod. xxv. t. 1: p. 102. Domine Jesu, præsta mihi, ut aliquod monumenti habere merear in tabernaculo tuo, &c.

⁴⁶ Hom. 1. in Levit. p. 106. Ipse nobis Dominus, ipse Sanctus Spiritus deprecandus est, ut omnem nebulam, omnemque caliginem, quæ peccatorum sordibus concreta, visum nostri cordis obscurat, auferre dignetur, &c.

⁴⁷ Hom. 5. in Levit. p. 126. Dominum meum Jesum invocare me oportet, ut quærentem me faciat invenire, et pulsanti aperiat, &c.

⁴⁸ Hom. 26. in Numer. p. 271. Nos autem oremus ex corde Verbum Dei, qui est unigenitus ejus, et qui revelat Patrem quibus vult, ut et nobis hæc revelare dignetur.

⁴⁹ Orig. Hom. 3. in Ezek. p. 627. Præsta mihi, Christe, ut dirumpam cervicalia in animarum consuta luxuriam. It. t. 32. in Joan. p. 404. Utinam nobis adsit columna illa lucida nubis Jesu, &c.

⁵⁰ Orig. Com. in Rom. x. lib. 8. p. 587.

⁵¹ Novat. de Trin. cap. 14. Si homo tantummodo Christus; quomodo adest ubique invocatus, cum hæc hominis natura non sit, sed Dei, ut adesse omni loco possit? Si homo tantummodo Christus; cur homo in orationibus Mediator invocatur, cum invocatio hominis ad præstandam salutem inefficax judicetur? Si homo tantummodo Christus: cur spes in illum ponitur, cum spes in homine maledicta referatur?

⁵² Cypr. De Bono Patientiæ, p. 220.

bles, he speaks of their offering prayers to him as Mediator⁵³ first, and then by him to God the Father; and that upon this double foundation, that he was their Advocate and Intercessor, and also their Lord and their God. In another place,⁵⁴ writing to Lucius, bishop of Rome, who had been a confessor for Christ, he tells him, They would not cease, in their sacrifices and prayers, to give thanks for him to God the Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ his Son, and also make supplications and prayers for him, that he who was the Author of all perfection, would keep and consummate in him the glorious crown of his confession. Not long after Cyprian, Arnobius wrote in vindication of the Christian worship, and here again he brings in the heathens forming their usual charge against the worship of Christ. Our gods,⁵⁵ say they, are not displeased with you for worshipping the Almighty God, but that ye make a God of one that was born a man, and put to death by the punishment of the cross (an infamous punishment, only inflicted on vile men); and because ye believe him to be yet alive, and make daily supplications unto him. To this he answers, first, upon their own principles, That admitting it were so, that Christ were only a man, yet he might with more reason deserve to be worshipped for his good deeds to mankind, than either their Bacchus, or Ceres, or Æsculapius, or Minerva, or Triptolemus, or Hercules, because there was no comparison between their actions and his for the benefit of the world. But, secondly, he answers more closely upon true Christian principles, That the reason of their worshipping Christ,⁵⁶ was indeed their certain knowledge that he was the true God, whom they could not but worship and honour as the Head of their body. And though an angry heathen would rave at his being called God, yet they must answer plainly, that he was God, and God, too, of the interior powers of the soul; that is, "the searcher of the hearts and reins," which is the peculiar property of God. The same objection is once more proposed,⁵⁷ and answered by Lactantius. They are wont, says he, to object to us his passion, by way of reproach, that we worship a man, and one that was put to a notorious death by men. In replying to which, after having largely set forth the reasons of his incarnation and sufferings, he at last answers that part of the objection which concerns their worshipping him, and pleads, that they worshipped him as one God with the Father. For, says he, when we speak of God the Father, and God⁵⁸ the Son, we do not speak of diverse natures, or separate the one from the other; for neither can he be a Father without a Son, nor the Son be divided from the Father: forasmuch as he cannot be called a Father without a Son, nor the Son be begotten without a Father. Seeing therefore a Father makes a Son, and a Son makes a Father, they have both one mind, and one spirit, and one substance: but the Father, as the fountain and original; and the Son, as the stream flowing from the fountain. A little after, he explains their⁵⁹ unity by this similitude: When any one hath a son, who is his dearly beloved, as long as he is in his father's house and under his hand, although he allow him the name and power of lord, yet it is called but one house, and one lord. So this world is one house of God; and both the Son and the Father, who unanimously dwell therein, are but one God; because the one is as two, and the two as one. Meaning two persons, and one God. Nothing can be plainer than these two things from the words of Lactantius; first, that Christians gave Divine worship to Christ; secondly, that they gave him this worship, as one God with the Father: and there was no other way to avoid the charge of polytheism, which they objected to the heathens, and the heathens were so desirous to recharge and throw back upon them.

There is one thing more may be observed as very ⁵³ Cypr. Ep. 8. al. 11. p. 25. Primo ipsum Dominum rogare, tum deinde per ipsum Deo Patri satisfacere debemus. Habemus Advocatum et Deprecatorem pro peccatis nostris, Jesum Christum Dominum et Deum nostrum.

⁵⁴ Cypr. Ep. 58. al. 61. p. 145. Hic quoque in sacrificiis atque in orationibus nostris non cessantes Deo Patri et Christo Filio ejus gratias agere, et orare pariter ac petere, ut qui perfectus est atque perficiens, custodiat et perficiat in vobis confessionis vestræ gloriosam coronam.

⁵⁵ Arnob. cont. Gentes, lib. 1. p. 30. Sed non (inquit) ideo dii vobis infesti sunt, quod omnipotentem colatis Deum: sed quod hominem natum, et (quod personis infame est vilibus) crucis supplicio interemptum, et Deum fuisse contenditis, et superesse adhuc creditis, et quotidianis supplicationibus adoratis.

⁵⁶ Arnob. ibid. p. 36. Cum vero Deus sit re vera, et sine ullius rei dubitationis ambiguo, inficiaturos arbitramini nos esse, quam maxime illum a nobis coli, et presidem nostri corporis nuncupari? Ergone, inquiet aliquis furens—Deus ille est Christus? Deus, respondebimus: et interiorum potentiarum Deus.

⁵⁷ Lact. lib. 4. cap. 16. Venio nunc ad ipsam passionem, quæ velut opprobrium nobis objectari solet, quod et hominem, et ab hominibus insigni supplicio affectum et excruciatum, colamus.

⁵⁸ Ibid. cap. 29. De mortalitate jam diximus, nunc de unitate doceamus. Cum dicimus Deum Patrem, et Deum Filium, non diversum dicimus, nec utrumque secernimus; quia nec Pater esse sine Filio potest, nec Filius a Patre secerni: siquidem nec Pater nuncupari sine Filio, nec Filius potest sine Patre generari. Cum igitur et Pater Filium faciat, et Filius Patrem; una utrique mens, unus spiritus, una substantia: sed ille quasi exuberans fons est, hic tanquam defluens ex eo rivus.

⁵⁹ Ibid. Propiore exemplo uti libet: Cum quis habet filium, quem unice diligit, qui tamen sit in domo, et in manu patris, licet ei nomen domini potestatemque concedat, civili tamen jure et domus una et unus dominus nominatur. Sic hic mundus una Dei domus est: et Filius ac Pater, qui unanimes incolunt mundum, Deus unus est; quia et unus tanquam duo, et duo tanquam unus.

remarkable in this age, which was an age of great persecution: that is, that the martyrs, who suffered in it, commonly directed their last prayers, as St. Stephen did, personally to Christ, in whose cause they laid down their lives, and into whose hands they resigned their spirit, commending their souls to him, as unto a faithful Creator and Redeemer. Thus Eusebius observes of a whole city in Phrygia in the time of the Diocletian persecution, that being all met together in the church, men, women, and children, magistrates and people, (for the city was entirely Christian,) they were surprised by their enemies, and barbarously burnt all together in the church, as they were at their devotions, calling⁶⁰ upon Christ, the God over all, τὸν ἐπὶ πάντων Θεὸν Χριστὸν ἐπιβοηθούμενος. So in a former persecution in France under Antoninus, Blandina, one of the martyrs, when she was put into a net, to be tossed by a wild bull, is said not to have been sensible of any pain, whilst she made her prayers to Christ, διὰ τὴν ὁμιλίαν πρὸς τὸν Χριστὸν.⁶¹ And Eusebius himself, who gives us these particular relations, makes a more general observation concerning the worship of Christ, That the highest powers on earth confessed and adored him,⁶² not as a common king, made by men, but as the true Son of the supreme God, as the true and very God; who had preserved his church against all the opposition of so many fierce persecutions; there being nothing that was able to withstand the will of that Word, who was the universal King and Prince of all things, and very God⁶³ himself. We see, in the opinion of Eusebius, the ground of their worship was no other than his being the living and true God, and the great King of all the earth. Which is the title that is given him in the Acts of St. Felix, an African bishop, who suffered in the Diocletian persecution: O Lord God of heaven and earth, Jesus Christ, I bow my neck⁶⁴ to thee as a sacrifice, who livest to all eternity: to whom belongs honour and power for ever and ever. Amen. And in the Acts of Thelica:⁶⁵ I give thanks to the God of all kingdoms. Lord Jesus Christ, we serve thee: thou art our hope: thou art the hope of Christians: most holy God, most high God, God

Almighty, we give thanks to thee for thy great name. So again, in the Acts of Emeritus:⁶⁶ I beseech thee, O Christ: I give thanks to thee: deliver me, O Christ. In thy name I suffer, I suffer for a moment, I suffer willingly: let me not be confounded, O Christ. The curious reader may find many other prayers in the like terms in the Passions of Glycerius,⁶⁷ Olympius,⁶⁸ Ampelius,⁶⁹ Euplius,⁷⁰ Dativus,⁷¹ Saturninus⁷² senior and junior, recorded in Baronius, which I need not here transcribe. I only add two further instances out of Eusebius and St. Ambrose. Eusebius,⁷³ speaking of the passion of Porphyrius, a Palestine martyr, and one of the scholars of Pamphilus, says, When he was surrounded with flames, he called upon Jesus the Son of God to be his helper, and with those words he gave up the ghost. And St. Ambrose⁷⁴ tells us, Vitalis the martyr made this his last prayer: O Lord Jesus Christ, my Saviour and my God, command that my spirit may be received; for I desire to obtain the crown which thy holy angel hath showed me.

It were easy to add many other testimonies of the like nature, but these are abundantly sufficient to show what was the practice of the church, in reference to the worship of Christ, during the three first ages, before Arianism appeared in the world, or any of those difficult questions were raised, which afterwards perplexed men with unintelligible subtleties, occasioned by the restless endeavours and sophistry of the Arian party. The Christians of the three first ages, we see, in their disputes with the heathens, always, with a great deal of honest plainness and simplicity, freely owned that they worshipped Christ as their Creator and their God; not as a creature, but as the true and living God; equal to the Father in all Divine perfections, as a genuine Son; who, as a Son, could not be another God, but only one God with the Father. For they declared, that so long as he was owned to be a true Son, he could neither be a creature, nor another God, which would imply another co-ordinate and independent being, which was inconsistent with his being the Son of God. They declared at the same time, that ⁶⁰ Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 11.

⁶¹ Ibid. lib. 5. cap. 1. p. 164. ex Epist. Eccles. Lugdun. et Vien.

⁶² Ibid. lib. 10. cap. 4. p. 375. Οὐχ οἷα κοινὸν ἐξ ἀνθρώπων βασιλεῖα γενόμενον ὁμολογεῖσθαι, ἀλλ' οἷα τῷ καθόλου Θεῷ παῖδα γνήσιον καὶ αὐτόθεν προσκυνεῖσθαι, &c.

⁶³ Ibid. p. 376. Τί γὰρ ἐμελλε τῷ παμβασιλείως, καὶ πανηγυμέρους καὶ αὐτῷ Θεῷ λόγῳ ἐνψήσεσθαι τῷ πνεύματι.

⁶⁴ Acta Felic. ap. Baron. an. 302. n. 124. Domine Deus cœli et terræ, Jesu Christe, tibi cervicem meam ad victimam flecto, qui permanes in æternum: cui est claritas et magnificentia in sæcula sæculorum. Amen.

⁶⁵ Acta Thelicæ, ap. Baron. an. 303. n. 41. Gratias ago Deo regnorum. Domine Jesu Christe, tibi servimus: tu es spes nostra: tu es spes Christianorum: Deus sanctissime, Deus altissime, Deus omnipotens, tibi laudes pro nomine tuo agimus.

⁶⁶ Acta Emeriti, ap. Baron. an. 303. n. 50. Rogo, Christe: tibi laudes: libera me, Christe. In nomine tuo patior, breviter patior, libenter patior: Christe non confundar.

⁶⁷ Acta Glycerii, ap. Baron. an. 301. n. 28.

⁶⁸ Acta Olympii, ap. Baron. an. 259. n. 30.

⁶⁹ Acta Ampelii, ap. Baron. an. 303. n. 52.

⁷⁰ Acta Euplii, ibid. n. 148. ⁷¹ Acta Dativi, ibid. n. 44, 45.

⁷² Acta Saturnin. ibid. n. 48 et 51.

⁷³ Euseb. de Martyr. Palæst. c. 11. p. 339. Τὸν Υἱὸν τοῦ Θεοῦ Ἰησοῦν βοηθὸν ἐπιβοηθούμενος.

⁷⁴ Ambr. Hortat. ad Virgines, t. 1. p. 105. Domine Jesu Christe, Salvator meus, et Deus meus, jube suscipi spiritum meum; quia jam desidero ut accipiam coronam, quam angelus tuus sanctus mihi ostendit.

it was unlawful and idolatry to give Divine worship to any creature, or any being, how excellent soever, that was not the living and true God; as we shall see more fully in the next chapter: and that is such a sensible and intelligible argument of their believing the Son to be the living and true God, as any one of the meanest capacity may understand; and it is such an argument of his Divinity, as all the art and sophistry in the world cannot evade, without charging those holy men with the grossest idolatry, and self-condemnation, and a flat contradiction of their principles in their practice, if they gave Divine honour to one, whom they did not believe to be by nature the living and true God. And for this reason I have insisted a little the longer upon this plain way of proving their belief of the Divinity of our blessed Lord, from their constant and universal practice in giving Divine worship to him as their God. And as to those distinctions between absolute, relative, and mediatorial worship; or those of latría, dulia, and hyperdulia, (hard words invented to solve the idolatry of later ages,) whatever shelter modern idolaters may think to find in them; the ancients had no occasion to lay the stress of their cause upon any such subtleties and distinctions. For they knew no distinction between latría, dulia, and hyperdulia, when they spake of religious worship, but plainly said all religious worship was solely due to God: and though they distinguished between absolute, relative, and mediatorial worship, yet they gave all these to the Son; worshipping him with mediatorial worship, as the only proper Mediator in both natures between God and man; beseeching him by his own merits, as their great High Priest, to present their prayers to the Father; and with relative worship, as the Son of God, whose honour redounds to the Father; and with absolute worship, as their Creator and Author of their being; declaring it to be idolatry to give any such honour to any mere creature. So that either they believed Christ to be the living and true God, or else it is impossible to understand men by their words or practice.

We are now to see whether they gave the same Divine honour to the Holy Ghost. And for this the reader only needs to look back into the former proofs; for many of the preceding allegations join the Son and Holy Ghost together. Polycarp's doxology⁷⁵ is to the whole Trinity: To Thee (the Father) with him (the Son) and the Holy Spirit, be glory now and for ever. Amen. Justin Martyr⁷⁶ declares also to the heathen, that the object of their worship was the whole Trinity: We worship and adore the God of righteousness, and his Son, and the Holy Spirit of prophecy. And again he proves,⁷⁷ That Christians were no atheists, as the heathens objected, because they worshipped the Creator of all things, and his Son Jesus Christ in the second place, and the Holy Spirit of prophecy in the third place: only observing the natural order of the persons, not distinguishing them into one God and two creatures; for then it had been unlawful to worship them upon their principles, which denied Divine worship to any thing that by nature was not God. We have heard Lucian before, representing the Christian worship,⁷⁸ as the worship of the great God of heaven, and the Son of the Father, and the Spirit proceeding from the Father, three of one, and one of three. Theophilus, bishop of Antioch, expressly mentions the Trinity,⁷⁹ under the title of the Father, his Word, and his Wisdom; and says further, That it was his Word and his Wisdom to whom he said⁸⁰ in the beginning, "Let us make man." So that if the Holy Ghost was the Creator of man, there can be no dispute but that he was worshipped as his Creator together with the Father and Son. We have heard Clemens Alexandrinus concluding his Pædagog⁸¹ with this doxology, To the Father, and the Son, with the Holy Spirit, be glory now and for ever. Amen. We have heard St. Basil testifying of Athenogenes the martyr,⁸² that he composed a hymn to the glory of the Holy Ghost; and that the church, time out of mind, used that known doxology in her evening hymn at setting up lights, We laud the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit of God. Which hymn was so ancient, that St. Basil professes he knew not who was the author of it. He testifies further in the same place, that Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, was always wont to use this form of doxology; To God the Father, and the Son our Lord Jesus Christ, with the Holy Ghost, be glory and dominion now and for ever. Amen. We have heard Origen saying,⁸³ That we are to pray to the Lord, to the Holy Spirit; that he would vouchsafe to take away that mist and darkness, which is contracted in our hearts by the defilement of sin, and dims the sight of our minds. They that said such things as these, did certainly own and practise the religious adoration and worship of the Holy Ghost. And all this we have seen proved in the former allegations. To which we may here add that plain testimony of Origen upon the first chapter to the Romans, where he compares the practice of the heathens and Christians.⁸⁴ It is the property of those only to dishonour their bodies, says he, ⁷⁵ Polycarp. Martyr. ap. Coteler. t. 2. p. 199.

⁷⁶ Justin. Apol. 2. p. 56.

⁷⁷ Ibid. p. 60.

⁷⁸ Lucian, Philopatris.

⁷⁹ Theoph. ad Autolye. lib. 2. p. 106.

⁸⁰ Ibid. p. 114.

⁸¹ Clem. Pædagog. lib. 3.

⁸² Basil. de Spir. Sancto, cap. 29.

⁸³ Orig. Hom. 1. in Levit. p. 106.

⁸⁴ Orig. in Rom. i. lib. 1. p. 468. Eorum est contumelias afficere corpora sua, qui deserviunt simulacris; et eorum colere creaturam, qui dereliquerunt Creatorem. Nos autem who serve idols; and of them only to worship the creature, who have forsaken the Creator. As for us, who worship and adore no creature, but the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit, as we do not err in our worship, so neither let us offend in our actions and conversation: but, looking to what the apostle says, "Know ye not, that your bodies are the members of Christ?" and again, "that your bodies are the temples of the Holy Ghost?" let us keep our bodies in all holiness and purity, as members of Christ, and as temples of the Holy Spirit. St. Basil, who wrote in defence of the worship of the Holy Ghost, cites another passage of Origen, out of his Commentaries⁸⁵ upon St. John, wherein he speaks of the worship of the whole Trinity in the celebration of baptism, saying, Baptism, by virtue of the invocations there made, is the fountain and spring of spiritual graces to every one that dedicates himself to the Divine Majesty of the adorable Trinity. In which words Origen, by invocations, seems to refer to two things: first, the consecration of water to a mystical use, which was always performed by prayer, (as I have showed at large in another place,⁸⁶) and secondly, the form of baptism, which was always administered in the name of the holy Trinity; in like manner as bread and wine in the eucharist was consecrated by invocation of the three Divine persons. Which is expressly said by St. Cyril,⁸⁷ That before invocation of the adorable Trinity it is common bread and wine, but after invocation it is made the body and blood of Christ. Where he uses the same expression about the consecration of the eucharist, as Origen does about baptism, saying, that it was done by invocation of the adorable Trinity. And this is what Justin Martyr⁸⁸ means, when he says, That the minister, in consecrating the eucharist, sent up praise and glory to the Father of all by the name of his Son and Holy Spirit. Optatus,⁸⁹ speaking of the sacrilege of the Donatists, says, They had broken down the altars, where God Almighty was wont to be invoked, and the Holy Ghost prayed to, that he might come down and sanctify the oblation. Theophilus of Alexandria says, in like manner,⁹⁰ That the bread and wine in the eucharist was consecrated by the invocation and descent of the Holy Ghost. And we are told, that in the old Gallican liturgy the oblation prayer⁹¹ was conceived in this form: Receive, O holy Trinity, this oblation, which we offer unto thee, in memory of the passion, resurrection, and ascension. And, probably, Origen might have respect to some such invocation of the holy Trinity in the consecration of the waters of baptism. However, the form of administering baptism in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, was ever esteemed an act of adoration of the Trinity, both as a profession of faith in three Divine persons, and as a dedication of the party to the service of the holy Trinity, and as a solemn invocation of their benediction. The ancient author of The Recognitions, who lived before Origen, says expressly,⁹² That baptism was anciently given by invocation of the name of the blessed Trinity. By which we can understand nothing but joining the Holy Ghost as God with the Father and the Son in the same act of adoration, expressed either in the prayers or form of baptism. And hence the ancients were used to prove the Holy Ghost⁹³ to be God, because he was joined in the same Divine worship with the Father and the Son in the administration of baptism. And that baptism was generally esteemed null and void, which was given to any person without mentioning the Holy Ghost, as well as Father and Son, as I have fully showed in another place.⁹⁴

It is further observable, that in Tertullian's time, the worship of the Holy Ghost was so common in the church, that Praxeas and other Unitarians were ready to charge the catholics with tritheism, or the worship of three Gods, upon this account. They boasted that⁹⁵ they were the only persons who truly worshipped one God, and preserved the Divine monarchy entire; whilst all other Christians, by worshipping three persons, introduced the worship of three Gods: As if, says Tertullian, the Unity absurdly collected, might not make a heresy; and a Trinity rationally conceived, might not consist with qui nullam creaturam, sed Patrem, Filium, et Spiritum Sanctum colimus et adoramus, sicut non erramus in cultu, ita nec in actibus quidem et conversatione peccemus, &c.

⁸⁵ Orig. t. 6. in Joan. ap. Basil. de Spir. Sanct. cap. 29. Τῷ ἐμπαρέχοντι ἑαυτὸν τῇ θεότητι τῆς προσκυνητῆς Τριάδος, διὰ τῆς δυνάμεως τῶν ἐπικλήσεων, χαρισμάτων ἀρχὴν ἔχει καὶ πηγὴν.

⁸⁶ Book XI. chap. 10. sect. 1, 2.

⁸⁷ Cyril. Catech. Myst. 1. n. 4. Πρὸ τῆς ἁγίας ἐπικλήσεως τῆς προσκυνητῆς Τριάδος ἄρτος ἦν καὶ οἶνος λιτὸς, &c. It. Catech. 3. n. 3. Μετὰ τὴν ἐπικλήσιν τοῦ Ἁγίου Πνεύματος, ἐκ ἔτι ἄρτος λιτὸς.

⁸⁸ Justin. Apol. 2. p. 97. Αἶνον καὶ δόξαν τῷ Πατρὶ τῶν ὅλων, διὰ τοῦ ὀνόματος τοῦ Υἱοῦ καὶ τοῦ Πνεύματος τοῦ Ἁγίου ἀναπέμπει.

⁸⁹ Optat. lib. 6. p. 93. Quid tam sacrilegum, quam altaria Dei frangere, quo Deus omnipotens invocatus sit, quo postu- latus descendit Spiritus Sanctus?

⁹⁰ Theophil. Ep. Paschal. 1. Bibl. Patr. t. 3. p. 87. Panem Dominicum—per invocationem et adventum Sancti Spiritus consecrari.

⁹¹ Microlog. de Observat. Eccles. cap. 11. Suscipe sancta Trinitas hanc oblationem, quam tibi offerimus in memoriam passionis, resurrectionis, ascensionis.

⁹² Clemen. Recognit. lib. 3. cap. 67. Baptizabitur unusquisque vestrum in aquis perennibus, nomine trinæ Beatitude invocato super se.

⁹³ Vid. Idacium, lib. 3. contra Varimundum, Bibl. Patr. t. 4. p. 300. Basil. de Spir. Sanct. cap. 29.

⁹⁴ Book XI. chap. 3. sect. 2.

⁹⁵ Tertul. cont. Prax. cap. 3. Duos et tres jam jactitant a nobis prædicari, se vero unius Dei cultores præsumunt: quasi non et unitas irrationaliter collecta, hæresin faciat: et Trinitas rationaliter expensa veritatem constituat.

Unity. He there explains how these three are one God,⁹⁵ by unity of original, by unity of substance, condition, and power. And he adds, That as the Father was God, so the Son⁹⁶ was God, and the Holy Ghost God. And says in another place,⁹⁷ That the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, was a Trinity in one Godhead, or Divine nature. So that it is plain, the difference then between the Praxean heretics and the catholics was, that the Praxeans worshipped but one person as God; but the catholics worshipped three persons, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, under the title and appellation of one God. And Erasmus was wonderfully mistaken, when he asserted, that the name, God, was never given to the Holy Ghost before the time of St. Hilary, in the middle of the fourth century; when it is so evident he had both the name and worship of God given him in the time of Tertullian, and in effect by all Christians in former ages, whilst they joined him in all acts of Divine worship and glorification with the Father and Son as one God.

Cyprian expressly styles him God, when, disputing against the validity of heretical baptism, he uses this argument:⁹⁸ If a man can be baptized by heretics, he may obtain remission of sins; if he may obtain remission of sins, he may be sanctified and be made the temple of God. I ask, of what God? If it be said, the Creator; he cannot be his temple, who believes not in him. If Christ; neither can he be his temple, who believes not Christ to be God. If the Holy Ghost; seeing the three are one, how can the Holy Spirit be reconciled to him who is an enemy to the Father or the Son? As the Holy Ghost is here plainly styled God, so every true Christian is said to be the temple of the Holy Ghost, as God; and temples being for the worship of God, it may be concluded, that, according to Cyprian, the Holy Ghost was then worshipped in all his living temples as God.

At the same time with Cyprian lived those two shining lights of the Asiatic church, Firmilian, bishop of Cæsarea, and Gregory, of Neocæsarea, from his power in working miracles, surnamed Thaumaturgus. Of both these St. Basil⁹⁹ testifies, That in their prayers and books they were always wont to use this doxology, To God the Father, and his Son our Lord Jesus Christ, with the Holy Ghost, be glory and dominion for ever and ever.

And this is the doxology that most commonly occurs in the author of the Constitutions, which, though I do not, with a late author, take for an inspired writing, nor for the genuine work of Clemens Romanus, yet I believe it to be a very good collection of the rituals and liturgy of the ancient church, for the three first ages, and not infected with those pernicious principles of Arianism, which some would fain father upon him, who pervert his words, as they do the other Ante-Nicene writers, from their proper meaning to an heretical sense. This author, I say, commonly uses that doxology which is so much commended by St. Basil, as expressing the true worship of the holy Trinity. Of which I shall give a few instances out of his eighth Book, which is a collection of the forms of prayer used in the ancient service. In the twelfth chapter of that Book the oblation prayer is thus concluded: We beseech thee to gather us into the kingdom of thy Christ, the God of the whole nature of things both visible and invisible, and our King; for to thee belongs all glory, and worship, and thanksgiving, and honour, and adoration, the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost, now and for ever, throughout all ages, world without end. In the thirteenth chapter, the prayer after consecration ends in the same manner: By thy Christ, to whom, with thee and the Holy Ghost, be glory, honour, and praise, doxology, and thanksgiving, for ever and ever. In the same chapter all the people sing this hymn to Christ: There is one holy, one Lord Jesus Christ, blessed for ever, to the glory of God the Father. Glory be to God on high, and on earth peace, good will towards men. Hosanna to the Son of David: blessed be God the Lord, who came in the name of the Lord, and was manifested unto us: hosanna in the highest. In the fourteenth chapter, after the communion, the deacon says, παράθωμιθα, Let us commend ourselves to God, the only unbegotten God, and to his Christ. Now the παράθεσις, or commendations, were one sort of prayers, as I shall show hereafter.¹⁰⁰ Then the bishop makes a thanksgiving in the fifteenth chapter, which he concludes in these words: By Jesus Christ our Lord, to whom, with thee and the Holy Ghost, be glory, honour, and adoration, now and for ever. Amen. And in his invocation in the same chapter, he says, To thee and thy Son Jesus, thy Christ, our Lord, and God, and King, and to the Holy Ghost, be glory, praise, majesty, worship, and adoration, now and for ever, world without end. Amen. There are many other such doxologies in other prayers throughout this ⁹⁵ Tertul. cont. Prax. cap. 2. Tres sunt unius substantiæ, et unius status, et unius potestatis: quia unus Deus, ex quo (tres) in nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti deputantur.

⁹⁶ Ibid. cap. 13. Et Pater Deus, et Filius Deus, et Spiritus Sanctus Deus, et Deus unusquisque.

⁹⁷ Tertul. de Pudicitia, cap. 21. Trinitas unius Divinitatis, Pater et Filius et Spiritus Sanctus.

⁹⁸ Cypr. Ep. 73. ad Jubaian. p. 203. Si baptizari quis apud hæreticos potuit, utique et remissam peccatorum consequi potuit. Si peccatorum remissam consecutus est, et sanctificatus est, et templum Dei factus est; quæro, cujus Dei? Si Creatoris; non potuit qui in eum non credidit. Si Christi; nec hujus fieri potest templum, qui negat Deum Christum. Si Spiritus Sancti; cum tres unum sint, quomodo Spiritus Sanctus placatus ei esse potest, qui aut Patris aut Filii inimicus est?

⁹⁹ Basil. de Spir. Sanct. cap. 29.

¹⁰⁰ Book XV. chap. 3. sect. 29.

this Book,¹⁰¹ which I need not here repeat. For if these be not plain instances of the worship of the Holy Ghost, together with the Father and the Son, it is hard to say what words can express it.

Now, then, by all this we may interpret the meaning of that African canon, which orders all prayers at the altar to be directed to the Father.¹⁰²

For that was not intended to exclude the worship of the Son and Holy Ghost together with the Father; for the hymns and doxologies before mentioned, which were used at the altar, plainly show the contrary: but it was designed, that when the sacrifice of Christ was commemorated, he should be considered as the great Mediator, by whose sacrifice we apply to the Father, and have access by his merits and intercession to the throne of grace and mercy. And therefore all prayers at the altar are ordered to be directed to the Father in his name: which very application was a worship of the Son as Mediator, and an honour peculiar to him, and incommunicable to any creature. In other prayers, direct applications were made to the Son, as we have seen before in that of the Constitutions,¹⁰³ for the dispossessing of devils: and in these prayers at the altar, the glorification was in common to the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Whence Fulgentius, who was an African bishop, and therefore may be presumed to understand the meaning of the African canons, tells us,¹⁰⁴ That all worship and adoration of honour and sacrifice was equally given to the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, that is, to the holy Trinity, by the catholic church. And that it was no prejudice to the Son or the Holy Ghost, that the minister at the altar directed the prayers to the person of the Father; for in the end of them, the names of the Son and Holy Spirit were always expressed; and that showed, that there was no difference in the holy Trinity: because when the words were only directed to the person of the Father, yet the whole Trinity was honoured by the faith of the true believer; and whilst the intention of the sacrifice was more peculiarly fixed upon the Father, the sacrifice itself was by one and the same act offered to the whole Trinity. From all which it is evident to a demonstration, that the three persons of the holy Trinity were always the object of Divine adoration from the first foundation of the Christian church, and that the giving of Divine honour to the Son and Holy Ghost, as God, was not the invention or addition of any later ages.

CHAPTER III.

THAT IN THE ANCIENT CHURCH RELIGIOUS WORSHIP WAS GIVEN TO NO CREATURE, SAINT OR ANGEL, BUT TO GOD ALONE.

It has been observed in the foregoing chapter, that the worship of Christ in the primitive church was esteemed a good argument of his Divinity, because it was then an undoubted principle, that no creature, how excellent soever, was to be worshipped with religious worship, but only the living and true God. And an Arian or a Socinian can never answer or evade this argument from antiquity, so long as both these assertions stand good, that Christ was worshipped with religious worship, and that nothing is to be worshipped with religious worship but only the living and true God. The force of this argument has been much weakened, and indeed wholly enervated and destroyed, by the writers of the Romish church, in whose mouths the argument signifies nothing to an Arian or Socinian, because their own practice, in giving religious worship to saints and angels, is a sufficient answer to it. For upon supposition that saints and angels may be worshipped, the worship of Christ can be no argument of his Divinity, no more than it is of the Divinity of saints or angels, because they are worshipped in the Romish church. But upon the principles of the primitive church, the argument is unanswerable: for, at the same time that they asserted the worship of Christ, they asserted, likewise, that religious worship was not to be given to any creature, but to God alone. And in this view, the argument for Christ's Divinity was very rational and solid. As, therefore, we have seen the truth of the first position, That Christ was religiously worshipped in the primitive church, made good from their undeniable assertions and practice; so now we will a little examine the truth of the second, That nothing is to be religiously worshipped but only the living and true God. Which position is designed to be handled here, only as an illustration and confirm-¹⁰¹ Vid. Constit. lib. 8. cap. 16, 18, 20, 21, 22, 29, 37, 38, 39, 41.

¹⁰² Conc. Carthag. 3. can. 23.

¹⁰³ Constit. lib. 8. cap. 7.

¹⁰⁴ Fulgent. ad Monimum, lib. 2. cap. 5. Omne cuiuslibet honorificentiae et sacrificii salutis obsequium, et Patri et Filio et Spiritui Sancto, hoc est, sanctae Trinitati ab ecclesia catholica pariter exhiberi.—Neque enim praedjudi-cium Filio vel Sancto Spiritui comparatur, dum ad Patris personam precatio ab offerente dirigitur. Cujus consummatio dum Filii et Spiritus Sancti complectitur nomen, ostendit nullum esse in Trinitate discrimen. Quia dum ad solius Patris personam sermo dirigitur, bene credentis fide tota Trinitas honoratur: et cum ad Patrem litantis destinatur intentio, sacrificii munus omni Trinitati uno eodemque offertur litantis officio.

ation of the argument for the Divinity of Christ, drawn from the practice of the primitive church in giving religious adoration to him. And the truth of this proposition I shall confirm briefly these three ways: 1. By showing, in general, that the ancients declare universally against giving religious worship or adoration to any creature, or being which by nature is not God. 2. That in particular they rejected the worship of saints and angels, as idolatry and unlawful. 3. That there is no mention made of it but in the practice either of heretics or heathens, whose idolatry is aggravated upon the account of this practice. In the first place it is observable, that the ancients in general declare against giving religious worship to any creature, or being which by nature is not God. It would fill a whole volume to cite all that is said by the ancients upon this head, therefore I shall content myself to select a few plain passages out of an infinite number that might be alleged to this purpose. Justin Martyr¹ often tells the emperors in his Apology, That Christians could worship none but God alone: and that Christ had taught them so in saying, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve with all thy heart, and with all thy strength, the Lord God that made thee; and again in saying, "Render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and to God the things that are God's." Therefore we worship God alone, but in all other things we cheerfully serve you. In like manner Theophilus, bishop of Antioch: I will honour the king, says he, not by worshipping him, but praying for him. But I will worship God, the living and true God, knowing that by him the king is ordained. You will say then, Why do you not worship the king? Because he is not made to be worshipped, but to be honoured with lawful honour. For he is not a God, but a man. And as he will not suffer any other to assume the title of king but himself; so neither is it lawful² to worship any other but God alone. In another place³ he says, God's laws forbid not only the worship of idols, but all other creatures, the sun, moon, and stars, heaven, earth, and sea; and command the worship of the true God alone, who is the Creator of all things. After the same manner Tertulian, speaking of the Christians' prayers for the em-perors and the peace of the world,⁴ says, They asked these things of the living and true God, and they could ask them of no other but him, of whom they were sure to obtain them, because he alone was able to give them. And he repeats the same in several⁵ other places of his writings. This was the answer which the martyrs commonly gave to the persecuting judges, when they solicited them to worship other gods. When Fructuosus (a Spanish bishop and martyr, who suffered at Tarragone about the year 262) was commanded to sacrifice, he replied, I only worship one God,⁶ the Maker of heaven and earth, and of all things that are therein. And so Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, answered Æmylian the prefect, as he himself tells us in an epistle recorded by Eusebius:⁷ I have publicly testified, says he, that I worship none but the true God alone, neither can I ever depart from this practice, or cease to be a Christian. And when Æmylian urged him further to worship the gods of the empire together with his own God, his answer was still the same, We worship him and no other. There are many the like expressions in Irenæus,⁸ Clemens Alexandrinus,⁹ Origen,¹⁰ Cyprian,¹¹ Lactantius,¹² the author of the Recognitions under the name of Clemens Romanus,¹³ Athenagoras, Tatian, and others; which, because the learned reader may have recourse to himself, or read them collected together in one view in that excellent book of Mr. Daille,¹⁴ against the idolatry of the church of Rome, I shall here omit them, and proceed

To the second observation; which is, That the ancients not only in general reject the worship of any creature, but reject the worship of saints and angels in particular, as idolatry and unlawful. And of this we cannot have a plainer proof than was given in the answer of the church of Smyrna to the suggestion of the Jews, when, at the martyrdom of Polycarp, the Jews desired the heathen judge, that he would not permit the Christians to carry off the body of Polycarp, lest they should leave their crucified Master, and begin to worship this man in his stead. This suggestion, says the answer, proceeded purely from ignorance, that we could neither forsake Christ, nor worship any¹⁵

Sect. 2.
Secondly, from their denying the worship of saints and angels in particular, and condemning it as idolatry.

¹ Just. Apol. 2. p. 63. Τὸν Θεὸν μόνον δεῖ προσκυνεῖν, &c. It. p. 64. Ὅθεν Θεὸν μόνον προσκυνούμεν, &c.

² Theoph. ad Autolyc. lib. 1. p. 30. Οὐδὲ ἄλλω ἐξόν ἐστι προσκυνεῖσθαι, ἀλλ' ἢ μόνω Θεῷ.

³ Id. lib. 2. p. 173. Μόνω τῷ ὄντως Θεῷ καὶ ποιητῇ τῶν ὄλων χρῆ λατρεῖν.

⁴ Tertul. Apol. cap. 30. Nos pro salute imperatorum Deum invocamus æternum, Deum verum, Deum vivum. — Hæc ab alio orare non possum, quam a quo me scio consecutum, quoniam et ipse est qui solus præstat, &c.

⁵ Tertul. Scopiac. cap. 4. Præscribitur mihi, ne quem alium adorem, aut quocummodo venerer, præter unicum illum, qui ita mandat. Vid. Apol. c. 17. et ad Scapul. c. 2.

⁶ Acta Fructuosi, ap. Baron. an. 262. n. 62. Ego unum Deum colo, qui fecit cælum et terram, et omnia quæ in eis sunt.

⁷ Dionys. Epist. ap. Euseb. lib. 7. c. 11. Τὸν Θεὸν τὸν ὄντα μόνον, καὶ οὐδὲνα ἕτερον σέβων.

⁸ Iren. lib. 5. cap. 22.

⁹ Clem. Strom. 6. p. 825.

¹⁰ Orig. cont. Cels. lib. 1. p. 10. lib. 8. p. 395. et passim.

¹¹ Cypr. Ep. 58. It. ad Demetrian. p. 130.

¹² Lactant. lib. 2. cap. 1. lib. 4. c. 14.

¹³ Recognit. lib. 5. c. 16.

¹⁴ Daille. de Objecto Cult. Religiosi, lib. 1. cap. 2, 3, 4.

¹⁵ Martyr. Polycarp. ap. Euseb. lib. 4. cap. 15. p. 131.

other. For we worship him, as being the Son of God; but the martyrs, as the disciples and followers of the Lord, we love with a due affection, for their great love of their own King and Master; with whom we desire to be partners and fellow disciples. A like answer was given at the martyrdom of Fructuosus in Spain. For when the judge asked Eulogius, his deacon, whether he would not worship Fructuosus? as thinking, that he who refused to worship the heathen idols, might yet perhaps be inclined to worship a Christian martyr: to this Eulogius plainly replied, I do not worship¹⁶ Fructuosus, but I worship him whom Fructuosus worships. We are beholden to Baronius himself for this testimony: and we cannot desire a clearer evidence, that in those early times the Christians did not worship the martyrs, but only the God of the martyrs, to whom the martyrs offered their own bodies in sacrifice, whilst they died for his name, and sealed their confession with their blood. Before this, Origen, in his answers to Celsus, positively denies that ever the Jews or Christians gave any religious worship to angels. He says, They are ministering spirits, that bring the gifts of God to us, but there is no command in Scripture to worship¹⁷ or adore them. For all prayers, supplications, intercessions, and giving of thanks, are to be sent up to God by the great High Priest, the living Word of God, who is superior to all angels. He says again,¹⁸ Allowing what Celsus pleaded to be true, that the angels were God's heralds and heavenly messengers; yet still the heralds and messengers were not to be worshipped, but he whose heralds and messengers they were. He repeats this frequently in his eighth Book in several places,¹⁹ which for brevity's sake I here omit, only reciting one passage more, because it so handsomely meets with that common pretence of the Romanists, that we are to worship angels, because they are the friends of God. We must endeavour, says he,²⁰ to please God alone, who is above all things, and labour to have him propitious unto us, procuring his good will with piety and all kind of virtue. And if Celsus will yet have us to procure the good will of any others, after him that is God over all; let him consider, that as, when the body is moved, the shadow follows its motion; so, in like manner, when we have God, who is over all, favourable unto us, it follows, that we shall have all his friends, both angels, and souls, and spirits, favourable unto us also. For they have a fellow feeling with them that are thought worthy to find favour from God. Neither are they only favourable to such as are thus worthy, but they labour with them also that are willing to worship God over all, and are friendly to them, and sympathize with them, and pray with them. So that we may be bold to say, that when men, who with resolution propose unto themselves the best things, do pray unto God, many thousands of the sacred powers pray together with them unspoken to, ἀκληροί, without any invocation. A like answer is given to the same pretence by the author under the name of St. Ambrose. Men are wont, says he,²¹ when they are ashamed of their neglecting of God, to use this miserable excuse; that by these they might go to God, as by officers we go to the king. To which he answers, Is any man so mad, or so unmindful of his salvation, as to give the king's honour to an officer; when if any shall be found but to treat of such a matter, they will be justly condemned as guilty of high treason? And yet these men think themselves not guilty, who give the honour of God's name to a creature, and forsaking the Lord, adore their fellow servants; as though there were any thing more that could be reserved to God. For therefore men go to the king by tribunes or officers, because the king is but a man, and knows not with whom he may intrust the affairs of the commonwealth. But to obtain the favour of God, (from whom nothing is hid, for he knows the merits of all men,) we have no need of an advocate or spokesman, but only a devout mind. For wheresoever such a one shall speak unto him, he will answer him. We have heard before out of Irenæus,²² that the church in his time, though she wrought many miracles for the benefit of men, yet did nothing by invocation of angels, but only by prayer to God and the Lord Jesus Christ. And that thus it continued to be in the time of Athanasius, appears plainly from his way of disputing with the Arians, when he proves the unity of the Father and Son, from the apostle's joining them together in prayer, 1 Thess. iii. 11, "God himself and our Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ, direct our way unto you." No man, says he,²³

¹⁶ Acta Fructuosi, ap. Baron. an. 262. n. 62. Ego Fructuosum non colo, sed ipsum colo, quem et Fructuosus. Vid. Aug. Serm. 101. de Diversis, p. 571.

¹⁷ Orig. cont. Cels. lib. 5. p. 233. Ὅχι ἵστε προστάσσειν ἡμῖν τοὺς διακονοῦντας—σέβειν καὶ προσκυνεῖν ἀντι τοῦ Θεοῦ, &c.

¹⁸ Lib. 8. p. 416.

¹⁹ Ibid. p. 239.

²⁰ Ibid. p. 420.

²¹ Ambros. in Rom. i. Solent tamen pudorem passi neglecti Dei, misera ea uti excusatione, dicentes, Per istos posse ire ad Deum, sicut per comites pervenitur ad regem. Age, nunquid tam demens est aliquis, aut salutis suæ immemor, ut honorificentiam regis vindicet comiti, cum de hac re si qui etiam tractare fuerint inventi, jure ut rei majestatis damnentur? Et isti se non putant reos, qui honorem nominis Dei deferunt creaturæ, et relicto Domino conservos adorant; quasi sit aliquid plus, quod reservetur Deo. Nam et ideo ad regem per tribunos aut comites itur, quia homo utique est rex, et nesciat quibus debeat rempublicam credere. Ad Deum, (ante quem nihil latet, omnium enim merita novit,) promerendum suffragatore non opus est, sed mente devota.

²² Iren. lib. 2. c. 57. Nec invocationibus angelicis facit, nec incantationibus, &c.

²³ Athan. Orat. 4. cont. Arian. t. 1. p. 464.

would pray to receive any thing from the Father and the angels, or from any other of the creatures: neither would any man say, God and the angel give me this. And whereas the Arian might have said, that Jacob joined God and the Angel together in prayer, Gen. xlviii. 16; Athanasius obviates this exception, by saying, He did not join one of the created angels, who are angels by nature, with God, who was their Creator; neither did he, omitting God that fed him, desire a blessing from an angel upon his children: but in saying, "the Angel which redeemed me from all evil," he showed that it was not any of the created angels, but the Word of God, whom he joined with the Father, and prayed unto him. There had been no force in this argument, had the church used invocation of angels in her prayers in the time of Athanasius: the Arian might easily have replied, that his argument was refuted by experience in the church's daily practice. But that neither men nor angels were the object of religious adoration in his time, appears further from another discourse of his against the Arians,²⁴ where he argues thus: Peter the apostle did forbid Cornelius, when he would have worshipped him, saying, "I myself am also a man," Acts x. 26. And the angel likewise did forbid John, when he would have worshipped him, in the Revelation, saying, "See thou do it not; for I am thy fellow servant, and of thy brethren the prophets, and of them who keep the sayings of this book: worship God," Rev. xxii. 9. Wherefore it belongs to God only to be worshipped. And this the angels very well know, that though they excel others in glory, yet they are all but creatures, and not in the number of those that are to be worshipped, but of those that worship the Lord. We cannot have clearer evidences than these either of the church's doctrine or practice. Both which are equally attested by St. Austin, in his book of True Religion; where he makes it a distinguishing character and property of true religion, to worship no sort of creature, particularly neither angels, nor saints after death, but the sovereign majesty of God alone. Let not our religion,²⁵ says he, consist in the worship of dead men: because if they lived piously, they are not esteemed such as would desire that kind of honour; but would have Him to be worshipped by us, by whose illumination they rejoice to have us partners with them in their merit. They are, therefore, to be honoured for imitation, not to be worshipped for religion. A little after he says, That which the highest angel worships, the same is to be worshipped by the meanest man. And this we are to believe, that the very greatest of angels, and most excellent ministers of God, would have us worship one God with them. And therefore we honour angels with love, not with religious service: neither do we build temples to them; for they desire not to be so honoured by us; because they know, that we ourselves, when we are good, are the temples of the most high God. And therefore it is well recorded, that the angel forbade the man to worship him, and bid him worship God, under whom he was his fellow servant, Rev. xxii. 9.

It is true, indeed, the Manichees about this time began to charge the catholics with worshipping their martyrs: Faustus objected to them, That they had only exchanged the heathen idols for martyrs, whom they worshipped with the same devotions, offering sacrifice of wine and meats to the ghosts and shades of dead men. Had this been a true charge, though it could not have affected the argument, as drawn from the practice of the church in former ages, yet it would have proved the corruption of saint-worship to have crept a little earlier into the church than will now be allowed. But the truth of the matter is, it was a mere calumny of Faustus's own inventing; and St. Austin rejects it with the utmost scorn and indignation. Therefore he says,²⁶ in answer to it, That the Christian people did celebrate the memories of the martyrs with religious solemnity, both to excite themselves to their imitation, and to be partners in their merits, and to have the benefit of their prayers: yet so, as that we never offer any sacrifice to a martyr, but to the God of martyrs, although we erect altars in the memories of the martyrs, meaning churches called by their memoriis (al. in memorias) martyrum constituamus altaria. Quis enim antistitem in locis sanctorum corporum adsisens altari, aliquando dixit, Offerimus tibi, Petre, vel Paule, vel Cypriane? Sed quod offertur, offertur Deo, &c. Colimus ergo martyres eo cultu dilectionis et societatis, quo et in hac vita coluntur sancti homines Dei, quorum cor ad talem pro evangelica veritate passionem paratum esse sentimus.—At vero illo cultu, quæ Græce latria dicitur, Latine uno verbo dici non potest, cum sit quædam proprie Divinitati debita servitus, nec colimus, nec colendum docemus, nisi unum Deum. Cum autem ad hunc cultum pertineat oblatio sacrificii, unde idololatria dicitur eorum, qui hoc etiam idolis exhibent: nullo modo tale aliquid offerimus, aut offerendum præcipimus, vel cuiquam martyri, vel cuiquam sanctæ animæ, vel cuiquam angelo: et quisquis in hunc errorem delabitur, corripitur per sanam doctrinam, sive ut corrigatur, sive ut condemnetur, sive ut caveatur.

²⁴ Athan. Orat. 3. cont. Arian. p. 394.

²⁵ Aug. de Vera Relig. cap. 55. t. I. p. 317. Non sit nobis religio cultus hominum mortuorum: quia si pie vixerunt, non sic habentur, ut tales quaerant honores: sed illum a nobis coli volunt, quo illuminante lætantur meriti sui nos esse consortes. Honorandi sunt ergo propter imitationem, non adorandi propter religionem.—Quod colit summus angelus, id colendum est etiam ab homine ultimo.—Hoc etiam ipsos optimos angelos, et excellentissima Dei ministeria velle credamus, ut unum cum ipsis colamus Deum.—Quare honoramus eos charitate, non servitute; nec eis templa construimus: nolunt enim se sic honorari a nobis, &c.

²⁶ Aug. cont. Faust. lib. 20. cap. 21. t. 6. p. 156. Populus Christianus memorias martyrum religiosa solennitate celebrat, et ad excitandam imitationem, et ut meritis eorum consocietur, atque orationibus adjuvetur: ita tamen ut nulli martyrum, sed ipsi Deo martyrum sacrificemus, quamvis in

names. For what priest, standing at the altar in the places where the holy bodies lie, ever said, We offer unto thee, Peter, or Paul, or Cyprian? But whatever is offered, is offered unto God that crowned the martyrs, at the memories of those whom he crowned, that by the very admonition of the places our affection may rise higher, to quicken our love both toward them, whom we may imitate, and toward Him who enables us to imitate them. Therefore we worship the martyrs with that worship of love and society, wherewith we worship holy men of God in this life, whose heart we perceive to be prepared to suffer in like manner for the gospel truth. But with that worship, which the Greeks call latría, and the Latins cannot express by one word, being a service proper to God, we neither worship, nor teach any one to worship any other but God alone. And whereas the offering of sacrifice appertains to this kind of worship, whence it is called idolatry in those that give it to idols; we neither offer, nor teach any to offer such worship, either to any martyr, or any holy soul, or any angel; but whoever falls into this error, is rebuked by sound doctrine, either to correct him, or condemn him, or to make him be avoided by others.

It is plain from this answer of St. Austin's, that the charge of giving religious worship to saints and angels was false, and a mere calumny upon the church in those days; and that the only persons then guilty of it, were such as were disowned and discarded by the church. Which brings me to the third and last consideration proposed to confirm this position, That the ancient church did not give religious worship either to saints or angels, because she condemned the practice both in heathens and heretics, and aggravated their idolatry upon this account.

St. Austin in another place makes a severe remark upon all such as sought to angels by prayer for their assistance: he says they were distracted with strange curiosities and illusions. Take it in his own words, as he delivers it in a pious reflection upon his own happiness in escaping the snare at his own conversion, and a thankful acknowledgment of God's mercy in delivering him from such a delusion. Whom, says he, should I have found, that might reconcile me unto thee? Should I have gone unto²⁷ the angels? With what prayer? with what sacraments? Many, endeavouring to return unto thee, and not being able to do it by themselves, as I hear, have tried these things; and have fallen into the desire of curious visions, and were accounted worthy of illusions. St. Chrysostom has a more severe reflection on this sort of men; for he not only says,²⁸ That no creature is to be worshipped by man, neither of things above, nor things below, whether man, or demons, or angels, or archangels, or any other supernal powers, but only God the Lord of all; and that the apostle, in the second chapter of his Epistle to the Colossians, discourses against such as taught, that man was to come to God by angels, and not by Christ; for that was too great for him:²⁹ but he adds, in pursuance of the same matter, that it was the devil³⁰ which introduced this having recourse to angels, whilst he envied the honour of man. These be the enchantments of devils. Though it be an angel, though an archangel, though they be cherubims; endure it not. For neither will these powers themselves receive it, but reject it, when they see their Lord dishonoured. I have honoured thee, saith God, and bid thee call upon me. And dost thou then dishonour him? Where we see plainly, that invocation of God and invocation of angels are opposed to one another; and as the one is made the character of true religion, so the other is said to be the doctrine of devils.

The persons here reflected on by Chrysostom, were probably the same as had been known in the church, and condemned, from the apostles' days, as heretics, under the name of angelici, or angel-worshippers. For so St. Austin³¹ describes them, calling them angelici, from their inclination to worship angels. And so Isidore³² after him. Irenæus³³ seems to insinuate that heretics were wont to invoke angels, when he opposes the church's practice to them, telling them, that many miracles were wrought in the church, not by invocation of angels, but by prayer to God and the Lord Jesus Christ. And Tertullian³⁴ says expressly of the followers of Simon Magus, that they worshipped angels in the exercise of their magical art, which idolatry was condemned by St. Peter in their first founder. Now, there being such footsteps of angel-worship in the practice of so many heresies; and it being a thing that some were fond of, because it had a show of humility in it; the council of Laodicea, to prevent the growing ²⁷ Aug. Confess. lib. 10. cap. 42. Quem invenirem, qui me reconciliaret tibi? An eundem mihi fuit ad angelos? Qua prece? quibus sacramentis? Multi conantes ad te redire, neque per seipsos valentes, sicut audio, tentaverunt hæc; et inciderunt in desiderium curiosarum visionum, et digni habitus illusionibus.

²⁸ Chrys. Hom. 5. in Colos. p. 1348.

²⁹ Hom. 7. in Col. p. 1360.

³⁰ Hom. 9. in Col. p. 1381. Ὁ διάβολος τὰ τῶν ἀγγέλων ἐπεισήγαγε, βασκαίνων ἡμῶν τῆς τιμῆς τῶν δαιμόνων τοιαῦται αἱ ἐπιφοῖαι, &c.

³¹ Aug. de Hæres. cap. 39. Angelici, in angelorum cultu inclinati.

³² Isidor. Origin. lib. 8. cap. 5. Angelici vocati, quia angelos colunt.

³³ Iren. lib. 2. cap. 57.

³⁴ Tertul. de Præscrip. cap. 33. Simonianæ autem magiæ disciplina angelis serviens, utique et ipsa inter idololatrias deputabatur, et a Petro apostolo in ipso Simone damnabatur.

malady, made a severe canon under the denunciation of anathema to restrain it. Christians, say they,³⁵ ought not to forsake the church of God, and go aside, and hold conventicles, to invoke or call upon the names of angels. Which things are forbidden. If any one therefore be found to exercise himself in this private idolatry, let him be accursed; because he hath forsaken our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, and gone over to idolatry. The first publishers of this canon in the Latin editions, changed the word angelos into angulos, corners instead of angels: but the Greek admits of no such corruption, and therefore the fraud is easily discovered; and nothing but the shame of seeing their practice so plainly condemned in this canon, could have induced any men to have attempted such a childish corruption. Theodoret, in his Comment upon the Epistle to the Colossians, has occasion twice to mention this canon. Where he says, That because some in the apostles' days commanded men to worship angels, therefore the apostle enjoined³⁶ the contrary, that they should adorn their words and deeds with the commemoration of the Lord Christ, and send up thanksgiving to God and the Father by him, and not by the angels. And that the synod of Laodicea, following this rule, and desiring to heal that old disease, made a law that men should not pray to angels, nor forsake our Lord Jesus Christ. And again,³⁷ This vice continued in Phrygia and Pisidia for a long time, for which cause also the synod assembled in Laodicea, the chief city in Phrygia, made a law to prohibit praying to angels. But yet, even to this day, among them and their neighbours, there are oratories of St. Michael to be seen. Cardinal Perron uses a great deal of art and sophistry to pervert the sense of the apostle and this canon together, which the reader may find sufficiently exposed and refuted by the learned Daille,³⁸ with the false glosses of Petavius and others, with which I shall not trouble this discourse. I only observe further, that as the church condemned heretics as guilty of idolatry for worshipping of angels, so did she likewise for worshipping of their leaders and martyrs. Apollonius, who wrote against the Montanists,³⁹ objects it to them, ³⁵ Conc. Laodic. can. 35. Οὐ δεῖ Χριστιανὸς ἐγκαταλείπειν τὴν ἐκκλησίαν τῷ Θεῷ, καὶ ἀπειναί, καὶ ἀγγέλους ὀνομάζειν, καὶ συνάξεις ποιεῖν, &c.

³⁶ Theod. in Col. iii. 17. ³⁷ Theod. in Col. ii. 18.

³⁸ Dallæ. de Objecto Cult. Relig. lib. 3. cap. 31.

³⁹ Apollon. ap. Euseb. lib. 5. cap. 18.

⁴⁰ Aug. de Hæres. cap. 1. Imagines et suam et ejusdem meretricis discipulis suis præbebat adorandas.

⁴¹ Minuc. Dial. p. 88. ⁴² Tertul. Apol. cap. 10, 12, 29.

⁴³ Clem. Protreptic. p. 26. ⁴⁴ Arnob. lib. 1. p. 32.

⁴⁵ Cyprian. de Idol. Vanit. p. 11.

⁴⁶ Dallæ. de Cultu Relig. lib. 3. cap. 25.

⁴⁷ Stilling. Defence of the Discourse of Idol. part 1. chap. 1.

⁴⁸ Aug. in Psal. xvi. t. 8. p. 445. Respondent, Non co-that they worshipped one Alexander, a martyr among them.³⁹ And St. Austin reckons it among the errors of Simon Magus,⁴⁰ that he left his own image, and the image of his harlot Selene, to his disciples, to be worshipped by them. They objected the same to the heathen, that they worshipped such gods as were only men, and dead men: as may be seen in all the apologies made by Minucius Felix,⁴¹ Tertullian,⁴² Clemens Alexandrinus,⁴³ Arnobius,⁴⁴ Cyprian,⁴⁵ and the rest that wrote against them: which had been a very weak argument, and easily retorted, had Christians worshipped their martyrs, whom they could not deny to be mortal men. The heathens further pretended, that their demons, or gods whom they worshipped, were good angels, and worshipped only as the ministers of the supreme God, and attendants of the court of heaven. Notwithstanding which pretence, they charge them with idolatry, as giving the worship of God to the creature. He that would see this argument managed to just advantage, may consult the learned discourses of Mr. Daille,⁴⁶ and Bishop Stillingfleet,⁴⁷ where he will find the pretences of the heathen, and the answers of the Christians, collected and set in their proper light. I shall only detain my reader with one citation out of St. Austin, as a specimen of all the rest, where he introduces the heathen making this apology for themselves: We do not worship wicked devils, say they; it is the angels you speak of that we worship,⁴⁸ the powers of the great God, the ministers of the great God. To which St. Austin answers, I wish you would worship them, for they would quickly teach you that they are not to be worshipped. Hear the instruction of an angel. He taught a certain disciple of Christ, and showed him many miracles in the Revelation of St. John; who having seen a certain miracle in a vision, was astonished, and cast himself down at the feet of the angel. But the angel, who sought nothing but the glory of his Lord, said, Arise; what dost thou? Worship God: for I am thy fellow servant, and of thy brethren. How is it then, my brethren? Let no one say, I fear lest the angel should be angry at me, if I do not worship him for my God. He is then only angry at thee, when thou art inclined to limus mala dæmonia. Angelos quos dicitis, ipsos et nos colimus, virtutes Dei magi, et ministeria Dei magni. Utinam ipsos colere velletis, facile ab ipsis disceretis non illos colere. Audite angelum doctorem. Docebat quendam discipulum Christi, et ostendebat illi multa miracula in Apocalypsi Joannis. Ille autem, quodam sibi demonstrato miraculo visionis, expavit, et misit se ad pedes angeli. Et ille angelus, qui non quærebat nisi gloriam Domini sui, Surge, quid facis? inquit, illum adora: nam et ego conservus tuus suum, et fratrum tuorum. Quid ergo, fratres mei? Nemo dicat, Timeo, ne irascatur mihi angelus, si non illum colo pro Deo meo. Tunc tibi irascitur, quando ipsum colere volueris. Bonus est enim, et Deum amat. Quomodo enim dæmones irascuntur, si non colantur: sic angeli indignantur, si pro Deo colantur.

worship him. For he is good, and loves God : and as the devils are angry, if they be not worshipped ; so the angels are highly displeased, if they be worshipped instead of God. At last he concludes with this admonition to the pagans : Let the pagans learn to adore God. They have a mind to adore angels : let them imitate angels, and adore him whom the angels adore.⁴⁹ And with these words I shall conclude this whole discourse of religious worship, knowing no better admonition that can be given to the angel-worshippers of the present age, than to advise them to imitate the angelical practice of the primitive church, who had God, and only God, for the object of their adoration.

CHAPTER IV.

THAT ANCIENTLY DIVINE SERVICE WAS ALWAYS PERFORMED IN THE VULGAR TONGUE, UNDERSTOOD BY THE PEOPLE.

HAVING thus considered the nature and object of Christian worship, I come now to speak of the circumstances and manner of performing Divine service. And here it will be proper to examine in what language the ancients performed their worship ; and to inquire into the use and original of what we commonly call liturgies, or set forms of prayer ; and to take notice of the habits, and modes, and gestures, and different rites and ceremonies observed without any breach of faith or Christian unity in different churches ; together with the solemn times of prayer and religious assemblies, whether weekly or daily, generally observed and set apart for the exercise of public devotion.

As to the first of these, there is nothing more certain in history, than that the service of the ancient church was always performed in the vulgar or common language of every country, that is, such as was either commonly spoken, or at least commonly understood. And so it continued for above a thousand years in the church. And it is even monstrous to think, that in so inquisitive an age as the present is, there should be any men of learning to defend, or whole nations so tamely to submit to, the imposition and tyranny of the contrary practice ; so absurd and unreasonable in itself ; so prejudicial to devotion ; so contrary to the use of speech, whose end is edification ; so reproachful to human nature, as if men were asses indeed, as Thomas Aquinas once made the comparison ; so derogatory to the Christian's birthright ; so flatly contradictory to the apostle's reasoning ; and so diametrically opposite to the universal practice of the church for so many ages. But I shall not think myself obliged to dispute against it upon all these topics, nor to say all that might be said in an historical way against it. He that pleases may see that done already in an excellent book¹ of Bishop Usher's, published by Mr. Wharton. I shall content myself to suggest a few things agreeable to the design of treating matters succinctly, which will be sufficient to satisfy any candid reader as to the sense and practice of the primitive church.

And first I observe, That the ancients declare unanimously, that Divine service was performed in the vulgar tongue of every nation. The Grecians, says Origen,² use the Greek language in their prayers, and the Romans the Roman, and so every one in his own dialect prays to God, and gives thanks as he is able ; and the God of all languages hears them that pray in all dialects, understanding their different languages as well as if they all spake with one tongue. This he says in answer to an objection of Celsus, who charged them with using of barbarous and unintelligible names and words in their prayers. Justin Martyr says,³ The Scriptures were first read in their assemblies to the people, and then the president made a discourse to them, exhorting them to observe and follow the good instructions they had heard out of the prophets and apostles. Which had been an absurd admonition, had not the lessons been read in a language which they understood. St. Jerom tells us,⁴ That at the funeral of the famous Lady Paula, the psalms were sung in Syriac, Greek, and Latin, because there were men of each language present at the solemnity. And for the same reason Casarius, bishop of Arles, is said⁵ to have appointed the people to sing the psalms and hymns, some in Greek, and some in Latin : no doubt, that the Divine service might be understood by men of different languages then present in the assembly. Aurelius Cassiodore, writing upon those words of the psalmist, " She shall be brought unto the king in raiment of divers colours," says, This variety signified that ⁴⁹ Aug. in Psal. xcvi. Discant pagani adorare Deum. Angelos volunt adorare: angelos imitentur, et illum adorant qui ab angelis adoratur.

¹ Usserii Historia Dogmatica de Scripturis et Sacris Vernaculis, cum Auctario H. Wharton. Lond. 1690, 4to.

² Orig. cont. Cels. lib. 8. p. 402. 'Εν ταῖς εὐχαῖς οἱ μὲν Ἕλληες Ἑλληνικοῖς χρῶνται, οἱ δὲ Ῥωμαῖοι Ῥωμαϊκοῖς, &c.

³ Justin. Apol. 2. p. 98.

⁴ Hieron. Epitaph. Paulæ. Græco, Latino, Syroque sermone psalmi in ordine personabant.

⁵ Cyprian. Vit. Cæsar. Arelat. apud Surium. Aug. 27. vol. 4. p. 947. Compulit laicos et populares homines psalmos et hymnos promere, altaque et modulata voce, instar clericorum, alios Græce, alios Latine, prosas et antiphonas decantare, &c.

diversity of tongues,⁶ wherewith every nation sang to God in the church, according to the difference of their own country language. And it being then the way of the church, that all offices should be performed with the understanding and edification of the people, Justinian provided for this in one of his laws, obliging all bishops⁷ and presbyters to repeat the prayers used in the communion and baptismal service, not in secret, but with an audible voice, so as the minds of the hearers might be raised to greater devotion, and stirred up to glorify the Lord God. For so the holy apostle directs in the First Epistle to the Corinthians, saying, "If thou blesseth only with the spirit, how shall he that occupieth the room of the unlearned, say the holy Amen to God at thy giving of thanks? For he knoweth not what thou sayest. For thou verily givest thanks well, but the other is not edified." It is plain by this, that Justinian thought all prayers which the people either could not hear, or could not understand, were equally blamed by the apostle, as not contributing to edification; and therefore, as he made a law against private muttering of prayers, which ought to be public; so he would no doubt have been as severe against praying in an unknown tongue, had there then been any occasion (as there was not) for the like prohibition in the liturgy of the church. Which may be collected from another of his laws, which was made upon occasion of a dispute which, in his time, arose among the Jews. Some of them, who were superstitiously inclined, were for having the law read only in Hebrew, though not understood by the people: others were for having it read in Greek, or any language which the people understood. The matter at last was brought before Justinian, and he determined in favour of the latter, that it should be read in Greek, or any other language,⁸ which the place where they lived had made more useful and known to the people. Hitherto therefore we are assured, this corruption had made no attempt to gain admittance in the service of the Christian church, since it was corrected by the civil magistrate as soon as it was observed to be creeping into the Jewish synagogue.

Secondly, As a further evidence of this matter, we may observe, that all the people anciently were allowed to join in psalmody and prayers, and make their proper responses. The learned and unlearned, nay, even women, young virgins, and children, in those times, bare a part in the public service of the church. St. Chrysostom⁹ and the author of the Constitutions,¹⁰ speak of children praying with the rest of the congregation for the catechumens and the faithful also. And St. Jerom¹¹ speaks of young virgins singing the Psalter at morning and evening, at the third, and sixth, and ninth hours, and at midnight, in their course: and says, they were obliged to learn the psalms, and some portion of Scripture, every day. St. Basil¹² and many others (as we shall see hereafter, when we speak of psalmody) say, all the people sung the psalms alternately: and Basil particularly takes notice¹³ of children performing this office in common with the rest of the people. And we shall meet with the people's prayers and responses almost in every part of the liturgy, such as the Κύριε, ἐλέησον, "Lord, have mercy," subjoined to every petition of the deacon's prayers; and in those mutual prayers of minister and people, "The Lord be with you: And with thy spirit. Lift up your hearts: We lift them up unto the Lord;" with abundance more that need not here be mentioned. All which suppose the service to be in the vulgar and known language; else it were absurd to think, that the people should know how and when to make their responses; or that children and young virgins should learn the psalms and Scripture by heart, and join in psalmody and other parts of the service of the church.

Thirdly, There is nothing more common among the ancients in their discourses to the people, than to admonish and exhort them both to hear, and read, and pray with understanding, attention, and fervency of spirit. Which had been very incongruous admonitions, obliging them to impracticable rules, had the lessons and prayers been in an unknown tongue. St. Basil thus exhorts his people,¹⁴ "Thou hast the psalms, thou hast the prophets, the precepts of the gospel, the preachings of the apostles; let thy tongue sing and thy mind search the meaning of what is spoken; that thou mayest sing with the spirit, and sing with understanding also. In another homily he tells them,¹⁵ That the Divine oracles were God's gifts to the church, to be read in every assembly, as the food

Sect. 3.
Thirdly, From the frequent exhortations of the fathers to the people, to hear, and read, and pray with understanding.

Sect. 2.
Secondly, From the people's joining in psalmody and prayer, and making their responses.

⁶ Cassiodor. in Psal. xlv. al. xlv. Hic varietatem aut linguas multiplices significat; quia omnis gens secundum suam patriam in ecclesia psallit auctori; aut virtutum pulcherrimam diversitatem.

⁷ Justin. Novel. 137. cap. 6. Jubemus omnes episcopos et presbyteros, non in secreto, sed cum ea voce quam a fidelissimo populo exaudiatur, Divinam oblationem, et precationem que fit in sancto baptisinate, facere; ut inde auditium animi in majorem devotionem, et Dei laudationem et benedictionem effertantur, &c.

⁸ Justin. Novel. 146. ⁹ Chrys. Hom. 71. in Mat. p. 624.

¹⁰ Constit. lib. 8. cap. 6.

¹¹ Hieron. Epitaph. Paulæ. Mane, hora tertia, sexta, nona, vespere, noctis medio, per ordinem Psalterium cantabant. Nec licebat cuiquam sororum ignorare psalmos, et non de Scripturis Sanctis quotidie aliquid discere.

¹² Basil. Ep. 63. ad Neocesarienses.

¹³ Basil. Proem. in Psalmos. Venet. Fortunat. lib. 2. Poem. in Laud. Cleri Parisiaci:

Pontificis monitis clerus, plebs psallit, et infans.

¹⁴ Basil. Hom. in Psal. xxviii. Sermon. I. t. 1. p. 154.

¹⁵ Ibid. Hom. in Psal. lix. p. 253.

which the Spirit afforded us for the nourishment of our souls. And in another place,¹⁶ putting the question, How a man prays with the spirit, whilst his understanding is unfruitful? he answers, That this was spoken of those that prayed in a tongue unknown to the hearers. For the apostle says, "If I pray in an unknown tongue, my spirit indeed prayeth, but my understanding is unfruitful." For when the words of the prayer are not known to them that are present, the understanding of him that prayeth is unfruitful, because his prayer is of no use or advantage: but when they that are present understand the prayer, which is of advantage to the hearers, then he that prays reaps the fruit of it, namely, the edification of those who receive benefit by it. And we are to conceive in like manner of all utterance of the words of God. For it is written, If any be useful for edification in the faith. By all this it is evident, the Scriptures and psalms and prayers were read in a known tongue; for otherwise it were in vain to exhort men to give diligence and attention to understand what they heard, if every thing was spoken in a language which they did not, or could not, understand.

Sect. 4. Fourthly, From the references made by the fathers to the prayers and lessons in the service of the church. Fourthly, The fathers in their sermons frequently refer to the prayers of the church, and to the lessons read before, as things the people were perfectly well acquainted with. They often argue from matters contained in the prayers, as Chrysostom does commonly from all parts of the liturgy: and their sermons, for the most part, were upon such portions of Scripture as had just been read before, as I shall show when I come to the office of preaching. Now this supposes, that both the prayers and lessons of Scripture were in a known tongue; else it were absurd for the preachers to appeal to their auditors as well acquainted with them, or draw arguments from thence, as motives grounded upon their own experience, if yet indeed they had no knowledge of them.

Sect. 5. Fifthly, From the Scriptures being translated into all languages from the first foundation of churches. Fifthly, This is evident from that pious care which the church took to have the Bible translated into all languages; and as soon as any nation was converted, that spake an uncommon tongue, immediately to procure a new version of the Scriptures into their language. Eusebius¹⁷ says, They were translated into all languages, both of Greeks and barbarians, throughout the world, and studied by all nations as the oracles of God, Chrysostom assures us, That the Syrians,¹⁸ the Egyptians, the Indians, the Persians, the Ethiopians, and a multitude of other nations, translated them into their own tongues, whereby barbarians learned to be philosophers, and women and children with the greatest ease imbibed the doctrine of the gospel. Theodoret¹⁹ says the same, That every nation under heaven had the Scripture in their own tongue: the Hebrew books were not only translated into Greek, but into the Roman, Egyptian, Persian, Indian, Armenian, Scythian, and Sauromatic languages, and, in a word, into all tongues used by all nations in his time. The like is attested by St. Jerom,²⁰ and St. Austin,²¹ and many others. Ulphilas is said, by all the historians,²² to have translated the whole Bible into the Gothic tongue. St. Jerom translated it into the Dalmatic, as he himself²³ seems to intimate, when he calls it his own tongue; as Scaliger and most others understand him; though Bishop Usher²⁴ thinks he meant the Latin rather by his own tongue. St. Chrysostom²⁵ sometimes mentions the Syriac translation; and he is said, by the author of his Life,²⁶ to have procured, during his exile at Cucusus in Armenia, a translation of the Psalms and New Testament for the use of the Armenian churches. Not to mention that of Methodius, or Cyril, into the Slavonian tongue, or any others of later ages. Of which the curious reader may find exact accounts in Bishop Usher,²⁷ Bishop Walton,²⁸ Dr. Milles,²⁹ and Hottinger,³⁰ and others, upon this peculiar subject of the Scripture versions.

As to the ancient practice, it may be evidenced further, and confirmed, Sect. 6. Sixthly, From the use of the order of interpreters in the church. from the use of interpreters in the church; whose office, as has been showed in another place,³¹ out of Epiphanius,³² and other writers, was to render one language into another, as there was occasion, both in reading the Scriptures and in the homilies that were made to the people. For it happened sometimes that there were men of different languages in the same church: as in the churches of Syria and Palestine, some understood Syriac only, and others Greek; and in the African churches, some spake Latin and others Punic: in which cases, whatever was said in one language, was immediately rendered into the other by the interpreter for the benefit of the people. In confirmation of which custom, to what has been said before, I shall here add the observation of ¹⁶ Regul. Brev. qu. 278.

¹⁷ Euseb. de Præpar. Evang. lib. 12. cap. 1. Præsertim de Laud. Constant. cap. 17. p. 662.

¹⁸ Chrys. Hom. 1. in Joan. al. 2. Edit. Savil. t. 2. p. 561.

¹⁹ Theod. de Curand. Græcor. Affect. Sermon. 5. t. 4. p. 555.

²⁰ Hieron. Præfat. in 4 Evangel.

²¹ Aug. Ep. 48. ad Vincent.

²² Socrat. lib. 4. cap. 33. Sozom. lib. 6. cap. 37.

²³ Hieron. Ep. 131. ad Sophronium.

²⁴ Usset. de Sacris Vernac. p. 220.

²⁵ Chrys. Hom. 3. in 2 Cor. p. 754.

²⁶ Gregor. Alexandrin. Vit. Chrys. n. 59. t. 8. Edit. Savil.

²⁷ Usset. de Script. Vernac. p. 220.

²⁸ Walton. Prolegom. cap. 5.

²⁹ Millii Prolegom. in Nov. Test.

³⁰ Hottinger. de Translat. Biblior. Heidelberg. 1660.

³¹ Book III. chap. 13. sect. 4.

³² Epiphanius. Expos. Fid. n. 21.

Theodoret³³ upon the practice of Chrysostom, who, by the help of such an interpreter, often preached to the Arian Goths in Constantinople, whom by that means he reduced to the catholic faith.

Another custom observed in the ancient church, was to have Bibles in the vulgar tongue laid in a convenient part of the church, for the people at their leisure to employ themselves, as they were piously inclined, in reading of the Scriptures before or after the times of Divine service. Of which custom those verses of Paulinus,³⁴ which he wrote upon the wall of the secretarium of the church of Nola, are an infallible proof, which were in these words :

Si quem sancta tenet meditandi in lege voluntas ;
Hic poterit residens sacris intendere libris :

If any one is piously disposed to meditate in God's law ; here he may sit, and employ himself in reading the holy books. Thus Constantine himself, as is observed by Eusebius,³⁵ was wont to employ himself in the church, partly by joining in the public prayers with the people, and partly by taking the books of the Divine oracles into his hands, and exercising his mind in the contemplation of them. And probably for this reason he ordered Eusebius to prepare fifty copies of the Bible for the use of the church of Constantinople,³⁶ as his letter to Eusebius witnesses : for it is observed and spoken to his praise by Eusebius in another place,³⁷ that by his means innumerable multitudes both of men and women exchanged the food of their bodies for that of their souls, that rational food, which was so agreeable to rational minds, and which they obtained by reading the Holy Scriptures. This must necessarily relate, either to their reading the Scriptures by the help and benefit of his copies in the church, or else will argue that they were encouraged by him to read them at home in their private houses ; which had been denied them under pain of banishment or death before, in the preceding reigns of the persecuting princes.

And this leads us to another plain evidence of the primitive practice ; which was, the privilege and encouragement all Christians had to read the Scriptures at home, for the exercise of themselves and families in private devotion, and better preparation for the public. None ever denied them this privilege, but those persecuting tyrants, who intended to destroy the name and faith of Christians, together with their Bibles, out of the world : for which reason they made the strictest search after them, and used all imaginable art and force to make them deliver them up to be burnt : which they who did, were branded by the infamous name of traditores, traitors, and betrayers of their religion. A certain argument, that then private Christians had the use of the Scriptures ; else they could not have been impeached for delivering them up to the enemy. It cannot be pleaded here, that the Scriptures were then only in the hands of the bishops, and readers, and others of the clergy : for Baronius himself has published the Acts of several martyrs, where not only private men, but women, confess to the inquisitors that they had the Holy Scriptures in their houses with them. I will give a single instance out of the Acts of Agape and Irene,³⁸ and their companions. Where the grand inquisitor asks this question of Irene, Who advised you to keep those parchments and Scriptures to this time ? To which Irene answered, God Almighty, who has commanded us to love him unto the death ; for which cause we durst not betray him ; but had rather be burnt alive, or suffer any other things that may befall us, than treacherously deliver up those writings. It is plain from this, that private Christians, both men and women, then enjoyed the Scriptures as their birthright, and none pretended to ravish them from them but only the persecuting heathens. The fathers of the church were so far from doing this, that, on the contrary, they used all manner of arguments to induce men to read and study them ; exhorting them not only to hear them with attention in the church, but to read them privately at home with their wives and families ; commending those that studied them, and reproving those that neglected them ; making large encomiums upon the use and excellency of them, and requiring men to peruse them privately as the best preparation for the public service and instruction : answering all objections and pretences that men could make to the contrary ; as, that they were ignorant and unlearned, and that the Scriptures were difficult and hard to be understood ; that they were only for the use of monks and religious, and not for secular men, and men of business : assuring them that the Scriptures were for the use of all men, and that it was the neglect of them that was the cause of all ignorance, heresies, errors, and irreligion. These were the general topics, upon which the fathers then pressed the common people to read the ³³ Theod. lib. 5. cap. 30. ³⁴ Paulin. Ep. 12. ad Severum.

³⁵ Euseb. Vit. Constant. lib. 4. cap. 17.

³⁶ Ap. Euseb. ibid. lib. 4. cap. 36. et ap. Theod. lib. 1. cap. 16. et Socrat. lib. 1. cap. 6.

³⁷ Euseb. Orat. de Laudibus Constant. cap. 17. p. 661.

³⁸ Acta Agapes et Sociarum, ap. Baron. an. 304. n. 46.

Quisnam tibi auctor fuit, ut membranas istas atque Scripturas in hodiernum usque diem custodies ? Irene inquit, Deus omnipotens, qui jussit nos ad mortem usque ipsum diligere, qua de causa non ausi sumus eum prodere, sed maluimus aut viventes comburi, aut, quæcunque alia nobis acciderint, perpeti, quam talia scripta prodere.

Scriptures, which are diametrically opposite to the arguments used in later ages to dissuade and deter men from the use of them. A man cannot look into the fathers, but he will see such arguments every where running through their writings. So that it is needless here to insist upon them: the reader that pleases, may see them collected together from first to last by Bishop Usher and Mr. Wharton. I shall only relate one passage of Chrysostom, out of his famous sermons upon Lazarus, where he at once proposes the several arguments, and answers the several objections, I have now mentioned. For this reason, says he,³⁹ we often acquaint you many days beforehand with the subject of our discourse, that, taking the Bible into your hands in the mean time, and running over the whole passage, you may have your minds better prepared to hear what is to be spoken. And this is the thing I have always advised, and shall still continue to exhort you to, that you should not only hear what is said in this place, but spend your time at home continually in reading the Holy Scriptures. And here let no one use those frigid and vain excuses, I am a man engaged in the business of the law, I am taken up with civil affairs, I am a tradesman, I have a wife, and children to breed up, I have the care of a family, I am a secular man: it belongs not to me to read the Scriptures, but to those that have bid adieu to the world, and are retired into the mountains, and have nothing else to do but to exercise themselves in such a way of living. What sayest thou, O man? Is it not thy business to read the Scriptures, because thou art distracted with a multitude of other cares? Yes, certainly, it belongs to thee more than them. For they have not so much need of the help of the Holy Scriptures, as you have, who are tossed in the waves of the multiplicity of business. Then, enumerating what sins and temptations secular men are exposed to, he infers, that they have perpetual need of Divine remedies, as well to cure the wounds they have already received, as to ward off those they are in danger of receiving; to quench the darts of the devil whilst they are at a distance, and drive them away, by continual reading of the Holy Scriptures. For it is impossible that a man should attain salvation without perpetual exercise in reading spiritual things. But some again will say, What if we cannot understand the things that are contained therein? Why, says he,⁴⁰ even in that case, though you do not understand every thing that is contained therein, yet by reading you shall obtain much sanctification. For it is impossible that you should be equally ignorant of all things in those books. For the grace of the Spirit so ordered it, that they should originally be composed and written by publicans:

and fishers, and tent-makers, and shepherds, and private and illiterate men, that none of the most ignorant and unlearned might have this excuse of difficulty to fly to; that the things there spoken might be easy to be looked into by all men; that the handicraftsman, the servant, the widow, the most illiterate and unlearned among men, might reap benefit and advantage by hearing them read. The apostles and prophets, he says, wrote not, like the philosophers of the Gentiles, in obscure terms, but made things plain to the understandings of all men, as being the common teachers of the world, that every man by himself might learn by reading alone the things that were spoken. To whom are not all things in the gospel manifest and plain? Who is there that, hearing those sayings, "Blessed are the meek, Blessed are the merciful, Blessed are the pure in heart," and the like, would desire a teacher, to understand the meaning of them? Moreover, the signs, and miracles, and histories, are they not all intelligible and plain to any ordinary reader? This, therefore, is only a pretence, and excuse, and cloak for idleness. Thou dost not understand the things contained in the Scripture. How shouldst thou understand them, when thou wilt not so much as look into them? Take the book into thy hands, read the whole history, and remember those things that are intelligible and easy; and those things that are more obscure and dark, read over and over again: and if thou canst not by frequent reading dive into the meaning of what is said, go to a wiser person, betake thyself to a teacher, and confer with him about any such passage; show thy diligence and desire to be informed. And when God sees thy willingness and readiness of mind, he will not despise thy vigilance and care; but though man inform thee not in the things about which thou makest inquiry, he himself will certainly reveal it unto thee. Remember the eunuch of the Ethiopian queen, who, though he was a barbarian, and immersed in a multitude of cares and business, and understood not what he read, yet he read for all that, sitting in his chariot. And if he showed so great diligence by the way, consider how he behaved himself at home. If he would not omit reading in the time of a journey, much less would he omit it when he sat quietly in his own house. If, when he understood nothing of it, he still continued to read, much more would he do it when he came to understand it. Wherefore, because he read when he had no guide, he quickly found a guide. God knew the willingness of his mind, and accepted his diligence, and presently sent him a teacher. But Philip you will say, does not now stand by us. No; but the Spirit that moved Philip is still by us. Let us not neglect our own salvation, beloved. These things were written for our salvation, upon whom the ends of the world are come. The reading of the Scriptures is our great guard against sin. Our ignorance of them is a dangerous precipice, and a deep gulf: it is an absolute betraying of our salvation, to know nothing of the Divine law. It is this that has brought forth so many heresies; this, that has brought so much corruption into our lives; this, that has turned all things into confusion.

³⁹ Chrys. Hom. 3. in Lazar. t. 5. p. 59.

⁴⁰ Chrys. Hom. 3. in. Lazar. t. 5. p. 62.

One would think St. Chrysostom had foreseen all the little pleas and sophistry of the Romish church, and was here disputing and inveighing against them. So apposite is every word to refute their trifling pretences; That ignorance is the mother of devotion; that the Scriptures are obscure; that there is need of an infallible guide on earth, besides the Spirit, to understand them; that the promiscuous use of them is the cause of all errors and heresies; that laymen and secular men are not fit to be intrusted with them: each of which positions is as plainly combated by St. Chrysostom, as if he had been directly disputing against the insufferable tyranny and frivolous pleas of the present church of Rome: and his whole discourse, with some hundreds of the like passages that might be alleged out of him and other writers, do irrefragably show, that it was as much the care and concern of the primitive church to have the service of God and the Scriptures to be understood by all, as now it is the concern of the Roman church to have them concealed from their knowledge, and locked up in a language which the unlearned do not understand.

For it is very observable further, that in the primitive church not only men and women, but children were encouraged and trained up from their infancy to the reading of the Holy Scriptures; and the catechumens were not only admitted to some of the prayers of the church peculiarly appropriated to their condition, but also obliged to learn the Scriptures, as part of their discipline and instruction. Of their obligation to learn the Scriptures, we have treated before,⁴¹ in speaking of the method of training them up for baptism: and of their admission to certain prayers of the church, we shall see more hereafter, in that part of the worship called the service of the catechumens.⁴² All, then, that is further here to be showed, is, that children were trained up to the use of the Holy Scriptures. And of this we have undoubted evidence from many eminent instances of their practice. Eusebius⁴³ remarks of the great care of Leonides the martyr, and father of Origen, in the education of his son, that he made him learn the Scriptures before he set him to the study of the liberal arts and polite learning. And Socrates⁴⁴ makes the like observation upon the education of Eusebius, surnamed Emisenus, who was born of noble parentage at Edessa, a city of Osroene in Mesopotamia, that he was first taught the Holy Scriptures from his infancy, and then human learning: and Sozomen,⁴⁵ in relating the same story, says, this was done κατὰ πατριῶν ἔθος, according to the custom of the country; which shows that it was no singular instance, but a general practice, to bring children up from their infancy to the use of the Holy Scriptures. Gregory Nyssen⁴⁶ notes it in the Life of his sister Macrina, That the first part of her instruction in her infancy, was to be taught the easy portions of Scripture, that were most suitable to her age: and he says also,⁴⁷ she did the same for her younger brother Peter, taking him from his mother's breasts, and instructing him in the Scriptures, that he might have no time to spend upon vain studies. It is noted by Sozomen⁴⁸ and Palladius, of Marcus the hermit, that he was so expert in the Scriptures when he was but a youth, that he could repeat all the Old and New Testament without book. And it is observable, that as there were many catechetical schools in those times for explaining the Scriptures to the catechumens, so there were also schools appointed in many churches to instruct the youth in the knowledge of the Scriptures. When Gregory, the apostle of the Armenians, first converted that nation, it is said in his Life,⁴⁹ That he set up schools in every city, and masters over them, by the king's command, to teach the Armenian children to read the Bible. And Theodoret⁵⁰ relates a remarkable story of Protogenes the scribe, That when Valens the Arian emperor banished him to Antinoe in Thebais, in the utmost parts of Egypt, he, finding the greatest part of the city to be heathens, set up a charity school among them, and taught them the Holy Scriptures; dictating to them in writing short-hand David's Psalms, and making them learn such doctrines of the apostolical writings, as were proper for them to understand; by which means he brought many, both of the children and parents, over to the Christian faith. And it has been observed before,⁵¹ that by the canons of some councils such sort of charity schools were appointed to be set up in cathedrals and other churches, where, no doubt, according to the custom of those days, children were taught to read the Scriptures.⁵² These rules were renewed in several councils under Charles the Great and the fol-

Sect. 9.
Ninthly, From the liberty granted to children and catechumens, to join in the public prayers and read the Scriptures.

⁴¹ Book X. chap. i. sect. 6.

⁴² Book XIV. chap. 5.

⁴³ Euseb. lib. 6. cap. 2.

⁴⁴ Socrat. lib. 2. cap. 9.

⁴⁵ Sozom. lib. 3. cap. 6.

⁴⁶ Nyssen. Vit. Macrin. t. 2. p. 179.

⁴⁷ Ibid. p. 185.

⁴⁸ Sozom. lib. 6. cap. 29. Pallad. Hist. Lausiaca, cap. 21.

⁴⁹ Acta Gregorii, ap. Simeon. Metaphrast. Sept. 30, cited by Bishop Usher.

⁵⁰ Theod. lib. 4. cap. 15. al. 18.

⁵¹ See Book VIII. chap. 7. sect. 12.

⁵² Conc. 6. General. can. 4 et 5.

lowing princes. Particularly in the second council of Chalons,⁵³ anno 813, it was appointed, That according to the order of Charles the emperor, bishops should set up schools to teach both grammar and the knowledge of the Scriptures. And in the council of Toul, or Savonieres,⁵⁴ in Lorrain, the decree was renewed, That schools of the Holy Scripture and human learning should be erected; forasmuch as, by the care of the religious emperors in former days, by this means both ecclesiastical knowledge and human learning had made a considerable progress in the world. And Mr. Wharton⁵⁵ will furnish the inquisitive reader with many other rules and canons, made about the same time, to promote and encourage the learning of the Scriptures.

I only observe one thing more, that the very form and tenor of the ordination of readers anciently did manifestly imply, that the service of the ancient church was always performed in a known tongue. For they were sometimes ordained with prayer to God for his Holy Spirit, to qualify them to read his word to the instruction and edification of the people. The form of their ordination in the book of the Constitutions, prays, That God⁵⁶ would give the reader wisdom, as he did to Esdras, to read his laws to the people. Now, it is well known how Esdras read the law to them, by causing them to understand the reading. Neh. viii. 7, 8, "They read in the book in the law of God distinctly, and gave the sense, and caused them to understand the reading." And if all readers read as Esdras did, they certainly either read, or interpreted the reading, in a known tongue. For he rendered that which was written in the Hebrew tongue, into the Chaldee or Syriac, which was, after the captivity, the common language of the people. Cyprian twice or thrice speaks of the ordination and office of readers, and he plainly intimates, that the people understood what they read out of the gospel to them. In one place, speaking of Celerinus the confessor, whom he had ordained a reader, he says, It was very fitting he should read the gospel,⁵⁷ who had so courageously and faithfully observed it; and that the same tongue which had confessed the Lord, should be daily heard to repeat what the Lord hath spoken; since there was nothing wherein a confessor could more advantage his brethren, than to have them hear the gospel read by the mouth of such a confessor and reader, whose faith was so brave an example. In another epistle,⁵⁸ speaking of Aurelius the confessor, whom he also ordained a reader, he says, There was nothing more agreeable than that that voice, which had so gloriously confessed the Lord, should sound forth in reading the lessons of the Lord: and after those lofty words, whereby he proclaimed the martyrdom of Christ, he should read the gospel of Christ, which makes martyrs. The gospel was then so read that the hearers might reap advantage by it, whilst they understood the doctrines and precepts that were read to them out of it. And such was the advantage which some hearers in those days reaped from the benefit of having the Scriptures read in their own tongue, that it is very remarkable what is related of one or two of them, that being men of good memories, they got the Scriptures by heart, without any knowledge of letters, only by hearing them constantly read in the church or elsewhere. St. Austin⁵⁹ remarks this of St. Antony, the famous Egyptian monk, that without being able to read himself, he made such a proficiency in the knowledge of the Scriptures, as both by hearing them read, to be able to repeat them, and by his own prudent meditation to understand them. And Gregory the Great⁶⁰ gives a like instance in one Servulus, a poor man at Rome, who, though he knew not a letter in the book, yet, purchasing a Bible, and entertaining religious men, he prevailed with them to read it continually to him, by which means he perfectly learned the Holy Scriptures. It is a yet more astonishing instance, which Eusebius⁶¹ gives in one of the martyrs of Palestine, a blind man, called John, who had so happy a memory, that he could repeat any part of the Bible as readily as others could read it. And he sometimes supplied the office of a reader in the church: and he did this to so great perfection, that Eusebius says, when he first heard him, he was perfectly amazed, and thought ⁵³ Conc. Cabillon. 2. can. 3. Oportet etiam, ut sicut dominus imperator Carolus præcepit, episcopi scholas constituent, in quibus et literaria solertia disciplinæ, et Sacra Scripturæ documenta discantur.

⁵⁴ Conc. Tullense, ad Saponarias, can. 10. Statuimus ut scholæ Sanctorum Scripturarum, et humanæ quoque literaturæ, &c. constituentur.

⁵⁵ Wharton. Auctarium ad Usseii Hist. Dogmat. cap. 4. p. 346.

⁵⁶ Constit. lib. 8. cap. 22.

⁵⁷ Cypr. Ep. 34. al. 39. p. 77. Legat præcepta et evangelium Domini, quæ fortiter ac fideliter sequitur; vox Domini confessa, in his quotidie, quæ Dominus locutus est, auditur.—Nihil est in quo magis confessor fratribus prosit, quam ut dum evangelica lectio de ore ejus auditur, lectoris fidem quisquis audierit, imitetur.

⁵⁸ Id. Ep. 38. al. 33. p. 75. Nihil magis congruit voci, quæ Dominum gloriosa prædicatione confessa est, quam celebrandis divinis lectionibus personale: post verba sublimia quæ Christi martyrium perlocuta sunt, evangelium Christi legere, unde martyres fiunt.

⁵⁹ Aug. de Doctrina Christiana in Prologo. t. 3. p. 3. Sine ulla scientia literarum Scripturas Divinas, et memoriter audiendo tenuisse, et prudenter cogitando intellexisse prædicatur.

⁶⁰ Greg. Hom. 15. in Evangelia, t. 3. p. 40. Nequaquam literas noverat, sed Scripturæ Sacræ sibi met codices emerat; et religiosos quosque in hospitalitatem suscipiens, hos coram se legere sine intermissione faciebat. Factumque est, ut quantum ad mensuram propriam attinet, plene Sacram Scripturam disceret; cum sicut dixi, literas funditus ignoraret.

⁶¹ Euseb. de Martyr. Palestin. cap. 13. p. 344.

he had heard one reading out of a book, till he came a little more curiously to examine him, and found that he did it only by the eyes of his understanding, having the Scriptures written not in books or tables of stone, but in the fleshy tables of his heart. These and such like examples, of which there are many⁶² in ancient story, are enough to raise in a man another sort of astonishment than that which Eusebius speaks of: I mean, it would amaze a man to think, that there should be a church in the world pretending to the height of purity and devotion, which yet runs counter to this indisputable practice of the ancient church, whose public readers never once pretended to read any part of Scripture in an unknown tongue: that being as much against the design of their ordination, as it is against the design of the Scripture itself; for the one was written, and the other ordained to read what was written, for men's learning and instruction. Yea, the very form of ordaining readers, as it stands still in the Roman Pontifical, shows as much: for it is much ancients than the corruption that is now crept into their service, and only stands there as a monument of their reproach, who oblige their readers to act directly contrary to the design of their office, and the very instructions that are given them in their ordination. For there the bishop still, in conferring the order of readers, uses this form: Study to pronounce⁶³ the word of God, that is, the sacred lessons, distinctly and plainly, to the understanding and edification of the faithful, without any error or falsehood; that ye may teach your hearers both by word and example. This was a very proper form of exhortation to be given to readers at their ordination, while the ancient custom continued of reading in a known tongue: but now it is no better than mockery, to tell men they are obliged by the vow of their ordination to read the Scriptures to the understanding, and instruction, and edification of the people; and at the same time tie up their mouths, that they shall not read a word that may be understood, but it must all be in an unknown tongue. This monstrous contradiction in their own practice, one would think, might bring men to see their error, and (what some in their communion⁶⁴ have been so long pleading for) oblige them to return to the useful and edifying practice of the primitive church.

CHAPTER V.

OF THE ORIGINAL AND USE OF LITURGIES, IN STATED AND SET FORMS OF PRAYER, IN THE PRIMITIVE CHURCH.

THE next inquiry is concerning the ancient manner of performing Divine service; whether they did it by stated liturgies, which we usually call set forms of prayer, or by unlimited liberty of prophesying and extempore conceptions? The question about set forms of worship has more disturbed the present church than any other; and yet, after all, there can be no public prayer, but it will be a set form, at least to the congregation. For though we suppose the minister to pray extempore, and vary the method, the form, and the phrase, every time he prays; yet to make it common prayer to a congregation, it will be a form to them, though a new form every time, in spite of all contradiction. And I have often wondered that discerning men should not observe this, before they charged all forms of prayer as void of the Spirit, or a stinting of the Spirit: since, if they were so, extempore forms would be as much stinting the spirit of the congregation as any other; and, perhaps, in some measure more so; since, in stated forms, which every one knows beforehand, men may be supposed to make them their own hearty prayers by preceding meditation; whereas in extempore forms every man must wait till he hears what is said, and then join in that form, or else not pray at all, but only privately by himself, not in any public or common prayer jointly with the rest of the congregation. For which reason I shall not here inquire simply, whether the public worship of the ancients was by a form or no? since it is impossible there should be any public worship of a congregation, as a congregation, joining in common prayer to God, without having a common form dictated to them some way or other for all to join in: but the question shall only be, whether they used stated forms of worship, or new extempore forms in every church assembly? And here we must distinguish, 1. Between Divine forms, and forms of human institution. 2. Between ordinary and extraordinary occasions. 3. Between the times of extraordinary gifts of the Spirit, and the times when those miraculous gifts abated. Now, there is no doubt to be made, but that the forms of Divine institution were always used in the church without any variation: as the form of baptism, the

Sect. 1.
Every bishop at liberty in the first ages to order the form of Divine service in his own church.

⁶² Vide Palladium, Vit. Chrysost. cap. 17. Socrat. lib. 7. cap. 22.

⁶³ Pontifical. Roman. Cap. de Ordinat. Lectorum. Studete verba Dei, videlicet lectiones sacras, distincte et aperte ad intelligentiam et ædificationem fidelium absque omni mendacio falsitatis proferre.—Quatenus auditores vestros verbo pariter et exemplo docere possitis.

⁶⁴ Vid. Frederic. Turius Ceriolanus de Libris Sacris in vernaculam linguam convertendis.

Lord's prayer, the singing of David's Psalms, the forms of benediction, such as, "The Lord be with you," "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ," &c. The constant use of the form of baptism has been demonstrated already.¹ The use of the Lord's prayer and the rest shall be showed hereafter.² As to forms of human institution, they were added by the bishops and governors of the church according to their wisdom and discretion. And this with relation to the ordinary service; for still they were at liberty to compose new forms for extraordinary emergencies and occasions. And whilst the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit continued, there is little doubt to be made, but that prayers and hymns, immediately dictated by the Spirit, made up a part of the ordinary service; still retaining such forms as were antecedently of Divine appointment. When the extraordinary Spirit of prophecy ceased, then the rulers of the church supplied this want by proper forms of their own composition, according to Christian prudence and discretion. And this seems to have been the true original of liturgies, or stated forms of Divine service. But why, then, have we none of these liturgies remaining entire and perfect to this day? I answer, there may be several reasons assigned for this. One is, that the bishops at first made every one their own liturgy for the private use, as we may call it, of their own particular churches. And therefore the use of them not extending further than the precincts of their own dioceses, there was little knowledge of them beyond the bounds of those churches, and not much care to preserve them but only for the use of such churches, for which they were particularly designed. That every bishop had at first this power and privilege to compose and order the form of Divine service for his own church, I have showed in another place,³ where I had occasion to discourse of the independency of bishops, and their absolute power in their own church: where, among other things, I observed, that as they had the privilege to write their own creeds, so they had the privilege to frame their own liturgy; which privilege they retained for several ages. As may be confirmed by this further and most certain observation, that when any new episcopal church was taken and erected out of another, the new erected church was not obliged to follow the model and prescriptions of the old church, but might frame to herself a form of Divine service agreeable to her own circumstances and condition. Of which Sozomen⁴ gives a clear evidence in the instance of Maiuma, a city raised from a village in Palestine, and once belonging to the diocese of Gaza: for as soon as it was erected into a distinct episcopal see, it was no longer obliged to observe precisely the rules and forms of the church of Gaza, but had, as he particularly remarks, a calendar for the festivals of its own martyrs, and commemorations of their own bishops and presbyters that had lived among them. Which is the same thing as to say, they had a liturgy and service of their own, independent of the church out of which they were taken.

In after ages bishops agreed by consent to conform their liturgy to the model of the metropolitan church of the province to which they belonged. And then it was enacted into a law by several councils, that the same order and uniformity should be observed in all churches. The rudiments of this discipline were first laid in the French churches. For in the council of Agde⁵ a canon was made about the year 506, That one and the same order should be equally observed in all churches of the province in all parts of Divine service. And in the council of Epone⁶ it is more expressly said, That in celebrating Divine offices, the provincial bishop should observe the same order as was observed by the metropolitan. And before these, the council of Vannes in Brittany, in the province of Tours, made a like order for that whole province, That one and the same⁷ custom in celebrating Divine service, and the same order of psalmody, should be kept in all churches; that as they held one faith and confession of the holy Trinity, so they should keep to one rule of Divine offices; lest if they varied in their observations, that variation should be interpreted as a disagreement in some point or other. And the same rule was made and concerted in the Spanish churches. For in the council of Girone, anno 517, a like decree was made for the whole province of Tarragone or Catalonia, That the same⁸ order of mass, and custom in psalmody, and other ministrations, should be observed in all churches of the province, as was observed in the metropolitan church. The fourth council of Toledo enlarged the order for uniformity in all churches of Spain and Galicia,⁹ obliging all priests to perform Divine offices in the same manner, that there might

Sect. 2.
In after ages the churches of a whole province by consent conform'd to the liturgy of the metropolitan.

¹ Book XI. chap. 3. ² Book XIII. chap. 7.

³ Book II. chap. 6. sect. 2. ⁴ Sozomen, lib. 5. cap. 3.

⁵ Conc. Agathens. can. 30. Quia convenit ordinem ecclesiæ ab omnibus æqualiter observari, studendum est ubique (sicut fit) et post antiphonas, collectiones per ordinem ab episcopis vel presbyteris dici, &c.

⁶ Conc. Epaunens. can. 27. Ad celebrandum divina officia, ordinem, quem metropolitani tenent, provinciales eorum observare debebunt.

⁷ Conc. Veneticum, can. 15. Rectum quoque duximus, ut vel intra provinciam nostram sacrorum ordo, et psallendi una sit consuetudo; ut sicut unam cum Trinitatis confessione fidem tenemus, unam et officiorum regulam teneamus: ne, variata observatione, in aliquo devotio nostra discrepare videatur.

⁸ Conc. Gerundense. can. 1. Ut institutio missarum, sicut in metropolitana ecclesia agitur, ita in Dei nomine in omni Tarraconensi provincia tam ipsius missæ ordo, quam psallendo vel ministrando, consuetudo servetur.

⁹ Conc. Tolet. 4. can. 2. Placuit omnes sacerdotes, qui be no diversity among them, and that such difference might neither offend the weak, nor look like a schism in the church to ignorant and carnal men. Therefore they appointed, that one order should be observed in praying and singing, and the same method be kept in the morning and evening service, because they were all of the same faith and the same kingdom. And the first council of Braga has four or five canons to the same purpose,¹⁰ appointing the same order of psalmody, and lessons, and salutations, and the same forms of celebrating baptism and the eucharist, to be observed in all churches. So that though every bishop at first had liberty to frame a liturgy for the use of his own church; yet in process of time they agreed by consent to take the liturgy of the metropolitanical church as a standard for the whole province: and when the Roman empire began to be cantonized and divided into different kingdoms, then came in the use of national liturgies, whose use was commensurate to the bounds and limits of their respective nations and kingdoms.

If it be inquired, why then none of the ancient liturgies are now remaining, as they were at first composed for the use of particular churches? I answer, several reasons may be assigned for this. 1. The very liberty which every bishop had to frame the liturgy of his own church, was one reason why none of these are now remaining perfect and entire, as they were at first composed for the use of such a particular church. For the design of them being only for the use of such a particular church, there was no great reason to be very solicitous, either to communicate and diffuse the knowledge of them to other churches, or to preserve them entire to posterity, who were not precisely tied up to the use of them, but might frame others at their own discretion. 2. It is not improbable, but that, as a late learned French writer¹¹ has observed, the ancient liturgies were for some ages only certain forms of worship committed to memory, and known by practice, rather than committed to writing, which is the only certain way of preserving such sort of monuments to late posterity. This seems very probable, because, in the persecutions under Diocletian and his associates, though a strict inquiry was made after the books of Scripture, and other things belonging to the church, which were often delivered up by the traditores to be burnt, yet we never read of any ritual books, or books of Divine service, delivered up among them. Which is an argument, that their forms of worship and administration of the sacraments were not then generally committed to writing, or at least not compiled in books distinct from the Psalms, or other books of Scripture: otherwise, it is very probable, that as the Scriptures, with other utensils and treasures of the church, were often found by the heathens, or betrayed by apostatizing Christians, and delivered up to be burnt; so we should have heard something of their books of Divine worship undergoing the same fate; since they who were so curious in inquiring after the cups, and lamps, and torches, and vestments, and other utensils and vessels of the church, (as in some of their calendars and breviates we find they were,) would hardly have omitted their books of worship, as being more proper objects of their spite and malice, had they found any such in the Christian churches. Mr. Daillé¹² argues well upon this foot against the use of images in the ancient church, because no such thing was ever found or betrayed to the heathen in the times of their most furious inquisition after any thing that related to the Christian church or religion: and I think the argument will hold as well against having their liturgies compiled into books and volumes, since it is scarce possible that such things in difficult times should have wholly escaped the notice and fury of their enemies. We are not hence to conclude, (as some weak men might perhaps be inclined to do,) that therefore they had no liturgies or set forms of Divine worship in these persecuting ages of the church; because there are undeniable evidences to the contrary, as we shall see by and by; but we are only to conclude, that they did not so generally compile them in books as in after ages, but used them by memory, and made them familiar to the people by known and constant practice, as many now use forms of prayer at this day without committing them to writing. And this is another reason, why none of those ancient liturgies are come to our hands perfect and entire, but only in scattered fragments, as the fathers had occasion to mention them incidentally in their writings. Nor need we wonder at this, since even those liturgies which were most certainly compiled in books in the following ages, are now in a great measure lost also by the injuries of time, as the old Gallican, Spanish, African, and Roman liturgies, of which there is nothing but catholicæ fidei unitatem complectimur, ut nihil ultra diversum aut dissonum in ecclesiasticis sacramentis agamus, ne quælibet nostra diversitas apud ignotos seu carnales schismatis errorem videatur ostendere, et multis existat in scandalum varietas ecclesiarum. Unus ergo orandi atque psallendi ordo a nobis per omnem Hispaniam atque Galliciam conservetur: unus modus in missarum solennitatibus, unus in vespertinis officiis: nec diversa sit ultra in nobis ecclesi-astica consuetudo, quia in una fide continemur et regno.

¹⁰ Conc. Braear. l. can. 19. Placuit ut unus atque idem psallendi ordo in matutinis vel vespertinis officiis teneatur, &c. Vid. can. 20—23. ibid.

¹¹ Renaudotius, Collectio Liturgiarum Orientalium. Dissertat. l. p. 9. t. 1. Paris, 1716.

¹² Dallæus, de Cultu Relig. lib. 1. cap. 25.

fragments and dismembered parcels now remaining : which is a third reason why none of those ancient liturgies are extant at this day. The fourth and last reason is, the interpolations and additions made to the ancient liturgies in future ages. For though those ancient liturgies which go under the name of St. Chrysostom and St. Basil might originally have something of their composition in them, yet so many additions and alterations have been made in them by the Greek church in following ages, that it is not easy to discern, after they have passed through so many hands, and so much new modelling, what was the genuine composition of the first authors. And therefore I have made little use of them in this work, but rather chosen to collect the fragments of the ancient liturgy from the scattered remains in the genuine writings of the fathers; joining with them such forms as we find in the ancient book, called the Apostolical Constitutions: which though it be not so ancient as the title pretends, nor of so venerable authority as Mr. Whiston contends for, who would have it to be truly apostolical, yet it is owned to be a good collection of the liturgy and rituals of the church in the third and fourth centuries, and less corrupted than any other liturgy that bears the name of an ancient writer; the true reason of which was, because it never being of that esteem as to be used as a standing liturgy in any church, the book came down to us with less alterations than other liturgies, which were new modelled, according to the different taste and sentiments of the ages they passed through, as all things of this kind are commonly revised and altered by several hands, when they are in constant use and practice. For proof of which we need go no further than the example of our own liturgy, which has received many reviews, alterations, and additions from the time it was first compiled in the days of King Edward. Upon this score, those liturgies which bear the names of ancient authors, are not to be depended on, as the genuine, unmixed liturgies of those authors, having undergone so many alterations, interpolations, and additions, by passing through various hands in succeeding ages. Forasmuch, therefore, as we have now no ancient liturgies perfect and entire, as they were first composed, we must take our accounts and estimate of them from other fountains: and by the providence of God there is so much of them remaining in the genuine writings of the ancient fathers, as both to show us in general that the church made use of stated forms of worship, and also what was the particular order and method of her worship in the most considerable parts of her sacred service and devotions. We will, therefore, first give some account of the use of liturgies and sacred rites in general, and then proceed to explain in order the several parts of the ancient service in the same natural method as we find it was performed, at several times, either in the daily or weekly assemblies for that purpose.

As to the use of liturgies in general, I shall begin with the apostolical times, and carry the history through the four first ages. The apostolical practice may be considered in a double respect; first, in their compliance with the stated forms settled among the Jews; and, secondly, in the new forms introduced into the Christian service. As to the former, there seems to be nothing more uncontested among learned men, than that the Jews had set forms of worship in all parts of Divine service, and that the apostles freely used these in all instances, in which they thought it necessary or becoming to join with them. Their ordinary service was of two sorts, the service of the temple, and the service of the synagogue. These differed in many respects, but both agreed in this, that the public prayers in both were offered up in a certain constant form of words. For their private prayers, which every man made particularly by himself, (which were like those silent prayers we shall hereafter¹³ meet with in the Christian church,) a late learned writer¹⁴ tells us, They had no public forms to pray by, nor any public ministers to officiate to them herein; but all prayed in private conceptions: but their public prayers were directed by public forms, both in the service of the temple and the synagogue. The temple service is very accurately described by Dr. Lightfoot, as it stood in the time of our Saviour: the sum of his description is this:¹⁵ First, before the offering of the sacrifice, the president called upon them to go to prayers, which they began with this form: Thou hast loved us, O Lord our God, with an everlasting love, with great and abundant compassion hast thou had mercy on us, O our Father, our King, for our fathers' sakes, who trusted in thee, and thou taughtest them statutes of life. So be gracious to us also, O our Father, O most merciful Father, O thou compassionate One, pity us. And put into our hearts to know, understand, obey, learn, teach, observe, do, and perform all the words of the doctrine of thy law in love, and enlighten our eyes by thy law, and cause our hearts to cleave to thy commandments, and unite our hearts to love and to fear thy name, &c. After this prayer, they rehearsed the ten commandments, and after the ten commandments they said over their phylacteries, in Hebrew called tephillin, which contained four portions of the law, written in four parchments. The first out of Exodus xiii.,

Sect. 4.
What forms were used in the apostles' days. Whereof the ancient forms used in the Jewish worship, and of the new forms introduced into the Christian service.

¹³ See Book XV. chap. 1.

¹⁴ Prideaux, Connexion of Scripture History, part 1.

chap. 6. p. 382.

¹⁵ Lightfoot, Temple Service, chap. 9. sect. 4. p. 108.

from ver. 3 to 10. The second out of Exod. xiii., from ver. 11 to 16. The third out of Deut. vi., from ver. 4 to 9. The fourth out of Deut. xi., from ver. 13 to 21. After this prayer, and rehearsal of the decalogue and of their phylacteries, at the time of offering incense, they had three or four prayers more: the first of which was in this form, referring to their phylacteries: Truth and stability, and firm and sure, and upright and faithful, and beloved and lovely and delightful, and fair and terrible and glorious, and ordered and acceptable, and good and beautiful, is this word for us for ever and ever. The truth of the everlasting God our King, the rock of Jacob, the shield of our salvation, for ever and ever. He is sure, and his name sure, and his throne settled, and his kingdom and truth established for evermore, &c.

The second prayer was in this form: Be pleased, O Lord our God, with thy people Israel, and with their prayer, and restore the service to the oracle of thy house, and accept the burnt offering of Israel, and their prayer in love and complacency; and let the service of thy people Israel be continually well-pleasing unto thee. And they concluded thus: We praise thee, who art the Lord our God, and the God of our fathers, the God of all flesh, our Creator, and the God of all creatures: glory and praise be to thy great and holy name, because thou hast preserved and kept us; so preserve and keep us, and bring back our captivity to the courts of thy holiness, &c.

A third prayer ran thus: Appoint peace, goodness, and blessing, grace, mercy, and compassion, for us, and for all Israel thy people. Bless us, O our Father, even all of us as one man, with the light of thy countenance; for in the light of thy countenance thou, O Lord our God, hast given us the law of life, and loving mercy and righteousness, and blessing and compassion, and life and peace: let it please thee to bless thy people Israel at all times. Let us, and all thy people the house of Israel, be remembered and written before thee in the book of life, with blessing and peace, &c.

A fourth prayer was used on the sabbath as a blessing, by the course that went out of their service, upon those that came in to do the service of the following week, in these words: He that caused his name to dwell in this house, cause love and brotherhood, and peace and friendship, to dwell among you.

After these things, the priests lifted up their hands, and blessed the people in that form of words, which is in Numb. vi. 24—26, "The Lord bless thee, and keep thee: the Lord make his face shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee: the Lord lift up his countenance upon thee, and give thee peace." To which the people answered, "Blessed be the Lord God, the God of Israel, from everlasting to everlasting."

After this blessing, the meat offering and the drink offering was offered, and then began the singing of psalms, and the music. The constant and ordinary psalms which they sung were these:

On the first day of the week, Psalm xxiv., "The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof," &c.

On the second day, Psalm xlvi.: "Great is the Lord, and greatly to be praised in the city of God," &c.

On the third day, Psalm lxxxii., "God standeth in the congregation of the mighty, and judgeth among gods," &c.

On the fourth day, Psalm xciv., "O Lord God, to whom vengeance belongeth," &c.

On the fifth day, Psalm lxxxii., "Sing aloud unto God our strength; make a joyful noise unto the God of Jacob."

On the sixth day, Psalm xciii., "The Lord reigneth; he is clothed with majesty."

On the sabbath day they sang Psalm xcii., which bears the title of "A Psalm or Song for the sabbath day," both in the Hebrew Bibles, and the translation of the Septuagint.

These were the known, and constant, and fixed psalms for the several days of the week throughout the year.¹⁶ But upon some certain days they had additional psalms and hymns. For on the sabbath, as there was an additional sacrifice appointed, Numb. xxviii. 9; so at the time of this additional sacrifice, the Levites sang the song of Moses, Deut. xxxii., "Hear, O heavens, and I will speak;" which they divided into six sabbaths for the morning service: and at the evening service they sang that other song of Moses, Exod. xv., "I will sing unto the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously: the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea," &c. By which custom of singing the songs of Moses upon the sabbath, Dr. Lightfoot observes,¹⁷ that that passage in Rev. xv. 3 may be illustrated, where the saints are said to "sing the song of Moses, the servant of God;" because they were now come to their everlasting sabbath, having "gotten the victory over the beast, and over his image, and over his mark, and over the number of his name," and having the harps of God in their hands. Which allusion to the sabbath service in the time of St. John, is a good argument for the antiquity of the practice.

Besides this, there was an additional sacrifice appointed on the first day of the year, called the Feast of Trumpets, Numb. xxix. 1; and at this time they sang the eighty-first Psalm, "Sing aloud unto God our strength," &c. And at the evening service of this day, the twenty-ninth Psalm, "The voice of the Lord shaketh the wilderness," &c.

¹⁶ Lightfoot, Temple Service, chap. 7. p. 59.

¹⁷ Ibid. p. 61.

Also at the Passover, besides many other forms, they were used to sing the hymn called the Egyptian Hallel, because it was sung in remembrance of their delivery out of Egypt: which consisted of Psalms cxiii. cxiv. cxv. cxvi. cxvii. and cxviii. And this, as some observe,¹⁸ was sung also at the beginning of every month, and on the Feast of Dedication, and the Feast of Weeks, and the Feast of Tabernacles. And the latter part of it is generally supposed to be the hymn which our Saviour sung with his disciples at the conclusion of his last supper.

This is the sum of the Jewish temple service, as it stood in our Saviour's time, with which, notwithstanding its stated forms, both he and his disciples complied, whenever they had occasion upon any such solemnities to frequent the temple.

The service of the synagogue was something different from that of the temple. For here were no sacrifices, but only these three things: 1. Prayers. 2. Reading of the Scriptures. 3. Preaching and expounding upon them. Their public prayers, like those of the temple, were all by stated forms. Among these, the most ancient and solemn were those which are called Shemoneh Eshreh, that is, the eighteen prayers, which are said to have been appointed by Ezra, and the great synagogue, from the time of the captivity. These have been lately translated and published by Dr. Prideaux, in his Connexion of Scripture History,¹⁹ which, because it is a work that deserves to be in every one's hands, I shall not here transcribe, but refer the reader thither for the knowledge of them. Only whereas he observes rightly, That another prayer, called the nineteenth, was added a little before the destruction of Jerusalem, against the Christians, who are therein meant under the names of apostates and heretics; I shall confirm his observation from a passage in Epiphanius,²⁰ who tells us, That the Jews in their synagogues were used to pray against the Christians in this form: Ἐπικατάρσσαι ὁ Θεὸς τοὺς Ναζαρηνοὺς, O God, curse the Nazarenes. And the same thing is intimated by Justin Martyr,²¹ who says, Immediately after our Saviour's resurrection, the Jews sent forth their chosen emissaries to all the synagogues in the world, to tell them, That there was a certain impious, lawless sect risen up under one Jesus, a Galilean impostor, whom they had crucified, but his disciples came by night, and stole him away out of the grave, and deceived men by saying, He was risen from the dead, and ascended into heaven: and he adds, That after their city was demolished they repented not, but even dared καταρᾶσθαι αὐτοῦ, to curse him, and all that believed on him. Which plainly refers to this additional prayer inserted into their liturgy against the Christians. But excepting this prayer, which was of later date, all the other seem to have been in use in the time of our Saviour and his apostles. And as we are sure they frequented the synagogues, so there is no doubt to be made, but that they joined in these usual forms of prayer, which were one part of the synagogue service.

The other parts of this service, were the reading of the law and the prophets, and expounding of them to the people. Which was also done by a certain rule and order. For the five books of Moses were divided into as many sections, or lessons, as there are weeks in the year, one of which was read every sabbath, and half of the same every Monday and Thursday, which were their days of assembly for the synagogue service. At these our Saviour was usually present, and sometimes assisted and officiated in reading, according to custom, as a member of the synagogue, as is expressly said of him, Luke iv. 16, and at other times taught in their synagogues, Mark i. 39; Luke iv. 15, 44; which is also noted of St. Paul, Acts xiii. 15; xvi. 13; xvii. 2; xviii. 4, that it was his manner on the sabbath days to go into the synagogues, where prayer was wont to be made, and there, after the reading of the law and the prophets, to preach to the people, and dispute or reason with them. So that, notwithstanding the public service of the synagogue was all performed by order and form, yet this was no reason to the apostles to refrain from it, as a thing simply sinful or unlawful; but they complied with it for some time, probably to gain upon the Jews the better, and make them lay aside their prejudices against the Christian doctrine.

But besides their compliance with the stated forms of the Jewish liturgy and worship, they had some forms of their own in constant use among themselves. Among which we may safely venture to reckon, 1. The Lord's prayer, as a form appointed by Christ to be used by all his disciples; of which the primitive Christians never made any dispute, as we shall see more fully hereafter. 2. The form of baptism, constantly used without any variation, as has been showed in a former²² Book. 3. The forms of professing their faith in baptism, or the forms of sound words settled in every church. 4. The forms of renouncing Satan and covenanting with Christ in baptism. 5. The forms of Scripture hymns and psalms, and glorifications of God. To which the ancients seem to add, 6thly, The forms of benediction, such as, "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ," &c. And lastly, The repetition of the history of Christ's institution of the last supper, as a necessary part of consecration, which, together with the ¹⁸ Otho. Lexicon. Rabbin. p. 236.

¹⁹ Part I. book 6. p. 375.

²⁰ Epiphan. Hær. 29. Nazaræor. in fine.

²¹ Justin. Dial. cum Tryph. p. 335. ²² Book XI. chap. iii.

use of the Lord's prayer in the celebration of the eucharist, is generally thought to descend from apostolical practice. These things are sufficient to show, that even the apostles themselves, notwithstanding the extraordinary gift of inspired prayer, whether in matter, or method, or words, or languages, sometimes confined themselves to forms, without any reflection on their gifts, or stinting of the Spirit, or want of edification to their hearers. If these things be rightly considered, some of them at least will evince, that the use of well chosen and well appointed forms, are no ways disagreeable to apostolical practice, since the apostles themselves both complied with the forms in use in the Jewish temple and synagogue, and used some others of Christian institution. I now proceed to carry this inquiry through the three or four following ages of the church.

And here, first, we may add what Josephus says of the Essenes,²³ That they were used to rise before the sun was up, and offer unto God παρισὶς τῶας εὐχάς, certain prayers, according to the custom of their forefathers, or such as they had received from them: and what Philo says²⁴ of the Therapeutæ of Alexandria, the ascetics, whether Jews or Christians, that lived there in his time, That the president among them, after he had made a sermon, first began to sing a hymn to the praise of God, either such as he had composed himself, or one taken out of the ancient prophets, in the close of which they all, both men and women, joined in concert with him. Again, in their vigils,²⁵ they divided themselves into two quires, the one of men, the other of women, each of which had their precentor; and so they sang hymns to the glory of God, composed in divers sorts of metre, sometimes one side singing and sometimes the other, in imitation of the children of Israel, under the conduct of Moses and Miriam, their precentors, at the Red Sea. This was so much a resemblance of the ancient Christian way of psalmody, that Eusebius,²⁶ who transcribes a great many things out of this curious tract of Philo, was clearly of opinion, that it was a description of the worship of such Jews as had embraced the Christian religion: in which opinion he is followed not only by St. Jerom,²⁷ but by many learned writers of this last age also. I shall not need to determine this question, whether they were Jews or Christians: it is sufficient to our present purpose, that their way of worshipping God by certain forms of praise, and those of human composition, was the same, or so much alike, that it was not easy to distinguish the one from the other.

In the beginning of the second century lived Pliny, a Roman proconsul in Bithynia, who giving Trajan the emperor an account of the Christian way of worship, which he had from the mouth of some apostates, says, They were used to meet on a certain day before it was light, and sing a hymn alternately to Christ as God, binding themselves by an oath or sacrament (not to any wicked thing, but) that they would not steal, nor rob, nor commit adultery, nor break their faith, nor withhold the pledge.²⁸ The word, carmen dicere, which Pliny uses, will signify a solemn form of prayer, as well as praises, as Vossius²⁹ and Brissonius³⁰ have observed out of the Roman writers: and then it will denote, that their whole Divine service was by a stated form. However, in the most restrained sense it implies, that they used certain forms in some part of their service in their alternate hymnody, which could not otherwise be performed but by composition and prescription. And that makes it probable, that the rest of their service was then of the same nature and order.

In the beginning of the same century, Ignatius is said by the ancient historians to have brought in the way of alternate singing³¹ into the church of Antioch; that is, hymns sung alternately to the praise of the holy Trinity. For they speak not of the alternate singing of David's Psalms, as introduced by Ignatius, but of hymns composed by him to set forth the Divinity of Christ: which appears to have been a very ancient practice, not only from what has been already observed out of the account given by Pliny, but from what is said by that ancient author in Eusebius,³² who wrote against the heresy of Artemon in the latter end of the second century; where, among other arguments which he brings for the church's constant belief of our Saviour's Divinity, he urges this for one, That from the beginning there were psalms and hymns composed by the brethren, and written by the faithful, setting forth the praises of Christ as the Word of God, and declaring the Divinity of his person. Among these hymns we may reckon those of Ignatius, composed for the service of the church of Antioch, which probably might continue in use till Paulus Samosatensis removed them out of the church, and introduced others in their room, as the fathers of the council of Antioch, mentioned in Eusebius,³³ object against him.

It is not improbable, likewise, but that Ignatius, as he made hymns, so might compose a whole form of prayers for the use of his own church, as was

Sect. 5.
What evidence
there is of the use of set forms in the second century.

²³ Joseph. de Bello Jud. lib. 2. cap. 12.

²⁴ Philo de Vita Contemplativa, t. 2. p. 1214.

²⁵ Philo, ibid. p. 1215.

²⁶ Euseb. lib. 2. cap. 17.

²⁷ Hieron. de Scriptor. cap. 21. ²⁸ Plin. lib. 10. Ep. 97.

²⁹ Voss. Comment. in loc. p. 97.

³⁰ Brisson. de Formulis, p. 97.

³¹ Socrat. lib. 6. cap. 8. Hist. Tripartita, lib. 10. cap. 9.

³² Euseb. lib. 5. cap. 28. See this cited before, chap. 2. sect. 3.

³³ Euseb. lib. 7. cap. 30.

customary for bishops to do in those days. To which custom he seems to refer in his epistle to the Magnesians, when he bids them do nothing without the bishops and the presbyters; nor attempt any thing seemingly agreeable to their private fancies; but when they met together,³⁴ to have one prayer and one supplication. Which not only forbids them to break out and divide into schisms and separate assemblies, but also to conform to the order of prayers agreed upon by the bishop and presbytery of the church.

Not long after Ignatius, we meet with the collateral evidence of Lucian the heathen, who had some knowledge of the Christian service. For in one of his dialogues, describing his coming into a religious assembly, he says, he there heard that prayer which began with the Father, and ended with the hymn of many names.³⁵ It is more than probable, that by the prayer beginning with the Father, he means the Lord's prayer, which was of known and general use in the eucharistical service: but it is not so clear what he means by the hymn of many names, that came after it. Bishop Wetenhall³⁶ takes it for the lesser or common doxology, "Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost:" Dr. Smith³⁷ and others, for the great doxology, "Glory be to God on high;" which I think more probable: though it is not necessary in our present inquiry, to determine what hymn it was; it being sufficient to our purpose, that he speaks of some prayers and hymns then of such common and vulgar use in the Christian worship, as that they were known to the very heathens.

Justin Martyr's authority is commonly alleged on both sides, both for and against liturgies. The defenders of prescribed forms urge his mentioning κοινὰς εὐχὰς, common prayers:³⁸ the opposers, with great vehemence, argue for extempore prayer, because he says, The bishop offered prayers and thanksgivings ὑση δύναμις, with all his might and power.³⁹ Now, to speak freely, I think there is no demonstration in either of these expressions: for they are both ambiguous. Common prayer does not always imply, that the minister prayed by a prescribed form: for inspired prayer was doubtless common prayer, when offered in a public congregation: and though it was then a form prescribed to the people, yet it was not so to the minister; but conceived by immediate inspiration. Therefore we cannot argue barely from the mentioning of common prayer, that the minister prayed by a prescribed form, unless it be added, as usually it is in Chrysostom, that the congregation prayed μῆ φωνῆ, with one voice, joining vocally in the whole prayer, or alternately, by way of responses, with the minister; for that implies, that the people understood beforehand the words of their common prayers, before they were uttered by the minister. On the other hand, there is no solidity in the argument brought against liturgies, from Justin's saying, That the bishop prayed and gave thanks, ὑση δύναμις, with all his ability or power. For this may not at all relate to the invention of words, but to the ardency and intenseness of devotion, which may be in the use of prescribed forms as well as those of immediate conception. And so it is plain the very same phrase is used by Nazianzen, when he exhorts the Christians to sing ὑση δύναμις, with all their might, that triumphal hymn⁴⁰ upon the death of Julian, which the children of Israel sang when the Egyptians were drowned in the Red Sea. Which was not an extempore hymn, but a form composed by Moses, and appointed to be sung alternately by the congregation of Israel, Exod. xv. So that, after all the pains that has been taken by some late writers to draw an argument against liturgies out of this passage of Justin, there is no reason for such a conclusion: and yet this is the only passage that is brought against them. But it is more material to consider, that Justin lived among the Jews, who certainly used set forms of prayer, one of which he condemns, as I have showed before, as an execration inserted against the Christians, but says nothing against the other, which yet doubtless he would have done, had he believed the use of liturgies to have been only a piece of Jewish superstition, unbecoming the spirit of a Christian. But he too well understood the practice of our Saviour and his apostles, in complying with the forms of the Jewish service, to put any such mark or brand of infamy upon them. And therefore this is of more weight with me, to persuade that Justin believed the known forms both of the Jewish and Christian service to be lawful, than any ambiguous expressions are to persuade the contrary.

Not long after Justin, lived Irenæus, bishop of Lyons in France. And he takes notice of a certain form used in the Christian worship, so well known to the Valentinian heretics, that they made use of it as an argument to prove their own fabulous doctrine of the æones: For, said they, you yourselves of the church, in your thanksgivings, say, For ages of ages,⁴¹ or æones of æones; thereby intimating the ³⁴ Ignat. Ep. ad Magnesians, n. 7. Μηδὲ πειράσητε εὐλογόν τι φαίνεσθαι ἰδίᾳ ὑμῖν· ἀλλ' ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτὸ μία προσευχή, μία δέησις.

³⁵ Lucian. Philopatris, p. 1128. Τὴν εὐχὴν ἀπὸ πατρὸς ἀρξάμενος, καὶ τὴν πολυώνυμον ᾠδὴν εἰς τέλος ἐπιθεῖς.

³⁶ Wetenhall's Gift of Singing, chap. 11. p. 273.

³⁷ Smith's Account of the Greek Church, p. 226. Comber, Orig. of Liturgies, chap. 2. p. 30, takes it for the trisagion.

³⁸ Justin. Apol. 2. p. 97.

³⁹ Justin. ibid. p. 98.

⁴⁰ Naz. Orat. 3. quæ est 1. Invectiv. cont. Julian. t. 1. p. 54.

⁴¹ Iren. lib. 1. c. 1. Ἄλλα καὶ ἡμᾶς ἐπὶ τῆς εὐχαριστίας λέγοντας, εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰῶνων, ἐκείνους τοὺς αἰῶνας σημαίνουσιν.

æones which we contend for. This plainly refers to some form of thanksgiving then of known use in the church. Dr. Comber and some others take it for the Gloria Patri, because it ends as that in Irenæus did, with the words, "world without end. Amen." But I rather conceive, with Dr. Grabe,⁴² that it was the conclusion of the great thanksgiving in the eucharist; where the glorification of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, ends with the words εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων, world without end; to which the people always answered, Amen, as appears from the form remaining in the Constitutions,⁴³ of which more in its proper place.

About the same time lived Clemens of Alexandria, who, speaking of the church, says, It was the congregation of those who prostrated themselves in prayers, having, as it were, φωνήν τὴν κοινήν, one common voice;⁴⁴ which implies, that their prayers were such as that they could join vocally in them, either by repeating the whole, or at least by alternate responses. He also mentions a form of prayer used over the penitents by the Valentinians, in imposition of hands, in the close of which were these words,⁴⁵ That they may obtain angelical absolution. Not to mention that common form of doxology, which he uses at the end of his Pædagogus, To whom be glory both now and for ever, world without end. Amen.

Next after him Tertullian often tells us, that they used the Lord's prayer as a form enjoined by Divine command, of which I shall say more in a following chapter.⁴⁶ He also says,⁴⁷ That the form of baptism was appointed and prescribed by Christ to be always in the "name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." And not only so, but to this the church added several other ceremonies and observations, which were not enjoined expressly in so many words by Christ. As the form of renouncing the devil,⁴⁸ and his pomp, and his angels; the trine immersion; the interrogatories and responses, which were made in a certain form to the articles of the creed; the giving of milk and honey to the newly baptized; the obligation to abstain from bathing for a whole week after: all which observations were only of ecclesiastical institution and prescription. So, again, their receiving the eucharist in their morning⁴⁹ assemblies before day, which Christ instituted after supper; their annual oblations and commemorations for the dead; their avoiding fasting, and refusing to pray kneeling, on the Lord's day, and the fifty days between Easter and Pentecost; their signing themselves with the sign of the cross upon all occasions; and their appointing of occasional fasts,⁵⁰ together with the fast of Lent, and stationary days. None of which were of express Divine command, but were instituted by the church, with many other observations of the like nature, for the edification of her children, as her rules of discipline, and psalmody, and singing a particular psalm at the eucharist, which is mentioned by our author.⁵¹ Again he intimates,⁵² that in all their assemblies they had not only sermons and prayers, but also the Scriptures read, and psalms sung to the glory of God. Which must be allowed to be forms of praise and glorification. Nor would it be material to suggest, that Tertullian, when he wrote this, was a Montanist; for both the church and heretics commonly agreed in singing of David's Psalms, and even vied in hymns of their own composition and prescription. Tertullian indeed does not expressly say, that their prayers, like their psalms, were offered in a certain form of words; but he says what may incline a man reasonably to believe it. For, as a proof of the Christians' loyalty, he says,⁵³ They met together, and as if they were drawn up in battle, did jointly set upon God with their prayers, which violence was acceptable to him. They prayed for the emperors, for their officers and powers, for the state of the world, for the peace of their government, and for the continuance of their empire. And again he says, They prayed constantly for all the emperors, that they might have a long life and quiet reign; that their family might be safe, their armies valiant, their senate faithful, their people virtuous, and that the whole world might be in peace. Now these, as we shall see hereafter, were known parts of the church's liturgy; and if they had not been of constant use, they had been but poor arguments of the Christians' loyalty, for which Tertullian here produces them. In another place, he expressly mentions the same doxology as Irenæus does before him; for, speaking against Christians frequenting the Roman theatres, he asks them, With what face they could go⁵⁴ from the church of God into the church of the devil? and ⁴² Grabe, Not. in loc. Irenæi.

⁴³ Constit. Apostol. lib. 8. cap. 12.

⁴⁴ Clem. Alex. Strom. 7. cap. 6. p. 818. Edit. Oxon.

⁴⁵ Clem. Epitome, p. 974. Ἐν τῇ χειροθεσίᾳ λέγουσιν ἐπὶ τῆλου, εἰς λύτρωσιν ἀγγελικῆν.

⁴⁶ Chap. 7.

⁴⁷ Tertul. de Bapt. cap. 13. Lex tinguendi imposita est, et forma præscripta. Itē, &c.

⁴⁸ Tertul. de Coron. Mil. cap. 3 et 13. It. de Bapt. cap. 6.

⁴⁹ Tertul. de Coron. cap. 3.

⁵⁰ Tertul. de Jejun. cap. 13.

⁵¹ Tertul. ibid.

⁵² Tertul. de Anima, cap. 9. Jam vero prout Scripturæ leguntur, aut psalmi canuntur, aut adlocutiones proferuntur, aut petitiones delegantur: ita inde materiæ visionibus subministrantur.

⁵³ Tertul. Apol. cap. 39. Coimus in cœtum et congregationem, ut ad Deum, quasi manu facta, precationibus ambiamus orantes. Hæc vis Deo grata est. Oramus etiam pro imperatoribus, pro ministris eorum et potestatibus, pro statu sæculi, pro rerum quiete, pro mora finis. It. cap. 30. Precantes sumus semper pro omnibus imperatoribus, &c.

⁵⁴ Tertul. de Spectac. cap. 25. Quale est enim de ecclesia Dei in diaboli ecclesiam tendere?—Ex ore illo, quo Amen with that mouth, wherewith they had said Amen at the consecration or reception of the eucharist, give testimony to a gladiator; or say, "world without end," to any besides God and Christ, or to any besides Christ their God? I do not take this, with some learned men, to mean that common form of doxology, "Glory be to the Father," &c., at the end of the psalms, but the conclusion of the consecration prayer in the communion service, which, as I noted before, always ended with those words, εἰς αἰῶνας, "world without end," to which the people subjoined their Amen. And then it is an evident proof, that the African churches had a certain form of prayer for consecrating the eucharist, the known words of which Tertullian could allege to the people as an argument to dissuade them from frequenting the heathen theatres. He also intimates, that they sang psalms and hymns alternately in private;⁵⁵ for, to dissuade Christian women from marrying heathen husbands, he uses this argument, What will such a husband sing to his wife, or the wife to her husband? but if they married Christian husbands, then they would sing psalms and hymns between themselves, and mutually provoke one another, and strive⁵⁶ who should make the sweetest melody to their God. And there is no doubt to be made, but that this private psalmody was an imitation of the public psalmody of the church. So when he says, That at their feasts of charity, after the communion was ended, in the close of all, when they had washed their hands, and brought in lights,⁵⁷ every one was excited either to sing something out of Scripture, or some hymn of his own composing; this as plainly argues, that they made use of forms in this part of their private devotions. For the psalms of Scripture are undoubtedly forms, and hymns of private composition are no less so, unless we will suppose every one that sings, has words suggested to him by immediate inspiration; which still will be a form to the congregation that hears it, though not to the person who is so extraordinarily inspired by the Holy Ghost.

But there is one expression in Tertullian which the opposers of liturgies lay great stress upon, because he says, The Christians prayed for the emperor,⁵⁸ sine monitore, quia de pectore, without any monitor, because they prayed from their heart; which they expound, praying extempore. But if this be interpreted rigidly, it will prove much more than the objectors design. For if they prayed simply without any monitor, then it will exclude even the minister's dictating to them his own conceptions, because these will be an admonition or direction to the people; and so all public prayer must cease, and all devotion be resolved into the private prayers of the people. Which is such an absurdity, as neither Tertullian ever thought of, nor the objectors themselves will allow. Whatever, therefore, be meant by this phrase, praying from the heart without a monitor, it cannot mean, that the people's prayers were simply their own conceptions. Among the many interpretations which are put upon these words by learned men, (which may be seen in Dr. Faulkner,⁵⁹ or Dr. Comber,) I take these two to be the most natural; either, first, That they prayed memoriter, saying their prayers by heart, and needing no prompter, as the heathens did; which is the sense that Rigaltius⁶⁰ and Bishop Fell⁶¹ put upon it: in which sense it is an argument for liturgies, and not against them: or, secondly, That they prayed sincerely from the heart, and freely out of the loyalty of their own heart without compulsion, as Hamon L'Estrange and Dr. Comber⁶² interpret it. Which seems to be the truest sense: for the heathens were neither sincere, nor hearty, nor zealous in their prayers for the emperor; but the Christians offered their prayers with all those due qualifications, as became the character of truly pious votaries and loyal subjects. The sense of this dark passage being thus cleared, it remains no argument against liturgies, unless a man will say, there can be no such thing as sincerity and heartiness in a form of prayer; which would be to condemn the whole catholic church in the time of Tertullian, from whose testimonies it is evident, that forms were generally used in most parts of Divine service.

I have nothing further to add in this century, but only one or two small observations out of the Acts of St. Perpetua and Felicitas, two African martyrs, who suffered in the latter end of this age. There it is remarked of Perpetua,⁶³ that seeming in a vision to receive the eucharist into her hands and eat it, all that stood round her said, Amen: alluding to the custom of saying Amen at the reception of it from the hands of the minister in the church. There is a like allusion to the use of the Trisagion, Holy, holy, holy, which the angels in sanctum protuleris, gladiatori testimonium reddere? εἰς αἰῶνας alii omnino dicere, nisi Deo Christo? or, as other copies have it, nisi Deo et Christo?

⁵⁵ Tertul. ad Uxor. lib. 2. cap. 6. Quid maritus suus illi, vel marito quid illa cantabit?

⁵⁶ Ibid. cap. 9. Sonant inter duos psalmi et hymni, et mutuo provocant, quis melius Deo suo canet.

⁵⁷ Tertul. Apol. cap. 39. Ut quisque de Scripturis Sanctis, vel de proprio ingenio potest, provocatur in medium Deo canere.

⁵⁸ Ibid. cap. 30.

⁵⁹ Faulkner, Libertas Eccles. Book I. chap. 4. sect. 2. Comber, Orig. of Liturgies, chap. 2. p. 47.

⁶⁰ Rigalt. in Tertul. cap. 30.

⁶¹ Fell. Not. in Cypr. de Orat. p. 152.

⁶² L'Estrange, Smectymniomastix, p. 5. Comber of Liturgies, p. 49.

⁶³ Passio Perpetuæ, ad calcem Lactant. de Mort. Persec. p. 10. Ego accepi junctis manibus, et manducavi: et universi circumstantes dixerunt, Amen.

used in heaven.⁶¹ And a further intimation of the solemn custom of giving the peace, and the kiss of peace, in the communion: for it is said,⁶² That Perpetua and her brother Saturus saluted one another with a kiss before they suffered, that they might consummate their martyrdom by the solemn rites of giving the peace.

In the beginning of the third century, about the year 220, lived Hippolytus the martyr, and bishop of Adana, or Portus Romanus in Arabia. Among other learned works, he wrote a book called, Ἀποστολικὴ Παράδοσις περὶ Χαρισμάτων, The Apostolical Tradition concerning Ecclesiastical Offices; which, according to the general opinion of the most learned critics, Dr. Bernard, Dr. Gale, and others,⁶³ is no other than the eighth book of those called the Apostolical Constitutions, which they think were compiled and published at Rome by this author. And if so, there can be no question what his opinion was about the use of forms in Divine service: for that book is nothing else but a collection of such forms, as either were in use, or made in imitation of those that were then in use in the church. I will not allege any of them here, because I do it in every part of this work, and it would be very needless and superfluous here to repeat them.

Besides this, Hippolytus wrote a book of odes or hymns upon several parts of Scripture, some of which most probably were of use in the public service. For in another treatise, of the Consummation of the World and Antichrist,⁶⁷ he commends the use of doxologies, and psalms, and spiritual odes; and makes it one of the signs of the reign of antichrist, that liturgy shall be extinguished, psalmody shall cease, and reading of the Scriptures shall not be heard. It is true indeed, some learned men, Bishop Usher,⁶⁸ Combefis, and Du Pin, reject this as a spurious tract, composed by some modern Greeks; but as learned critics, Labbe⁶⁹ and Bishop Bull,⁷⁰ have undertaken to defend it, and answer all the arguments that are produced against it. I will not enter into this debate, but only say, that as there is nothing in this passage now alleged dissonant to the sense of Hippolytus's other works, we may be allowed to cite it in this cause, till some clearer evidence can be produced against it. Hippolytus wrote also a book, called Canon Paschalis, which Scaliger⁷¹ and Gothofred⁷² take to be a calendar, showing what lessons were to be read on several festivals; as the first of St. Matthew, called Γένεσις, the generation of Christ, on the vigil of Christ's nativity; and the Πάθος, or the history of his sufferings out of the Gospel of St. Matthew, on the day of his crucifixion: and it is certain from many passages in St. Chrysostom, St. Austin, and others, that such calendars were used in the church, as shall be showed in another place,⁷³ when I come to speak of the ancient method of reading the Holy Scriptures by a certain rule and order in Divine service. But because Ægidius Bucherius, who has since republished this Paschal Cycle, and Dr. Cave,⁷⁴ give another interpretation of it, I will lay no greater stress upon it than it will bear, contenting myself in so critical a point to have suggested the sense of learned men, and leave the matter to the further disquisition of the curious reader; having otherwise given sufficient evidence, that the church in the time of Hippolytus used stated forms of prayer and praises in her public service.

Not long after Hippolytus, lived Origen, who was one of his scholars, and took some of his opinions from him. Now this writer, in his Homilies upon Jeremy,⁷⁵ expressly mentions one of the prayers of constant use in the church: We frequently say in our prayers, says he, Grant us, O Almighty God, grant us a part with thy prophets; grant us a part with the apostles of thy Christ; grant that we may be found at the feet of thy only begotten Son. Which is a testimony so clear, that the Centurators⁷⁶ made no scruple to conclude hence, that forms of prayer were undoubtedly used in the church in the time of Origen. He elsewhere⁷⁷ says, The Christians used the ordered or prescribed prayers, as became them, continually night and day, whereby they were preserved against the power of magic and the devil. For Celsus, in his spiteful way, had advanced an egregious calumny against the Christians, pretending that he had seen in the hands of some of their presbyters certain barbarous books, containing the names of the devils and their impostors; hereby insinuating, that the prayers which the Christian ⁶¹ Passio Perpetuæ, ad calcem Lactant. de Mort. Persec. p. 23. Introivimus et audivimus vocem unitam, Hagios, hagios, hagios, sine cessatione.

⁶² Ibid. p. 35. Ante jam osculati invicem, ut martyrium per solennia pacis consummarent.

⁶³ Vid. Cave, Hist. Literar. vol. 2. p. 45.

⁶⁷ Hippol. de Consummat. Mundi. Bibl. Patr. Gr. Lat. t. 2. p. 357 et 362.

⁶⁸ Usser. Biblioth. Theol. ap. Cave, Hist. Liter. t. 1. p. 70. Combefis, Auctarium, Bibl. Patr. p. 51. Du Pin, Biblioth. vol. 1. p. 104.

⁶⁹ Labb. de Scriptor. Eccl. p. 471.

⁷⁰ Bull. Defens. Fid. Nic. sect. 3. chap. 8. p. 369.

⁷¹ Scaliger, de Emendat. Temp. lib. 7. p. 726.

⁷² Gothofred. Not. in Cod. Theodos. lib. 15. Tit. 5. De Spectaculis, Leg. 5. p. 356.

⁷³ Book XIV. chap. 3. sect. 3.

⁷⁴ Vid. Cave, Hist. Literar. vol. 2. p. 47.

⁷⁵ Orig. Hom. 11. in Jerem. p. 606. Frequenter in oratione dicimus, Da Omnipotens, da nobis partem cum prophetis; da cum apostolis Christi tui; tribue ut inveniamur ad vestigia Unigeniti tui.

⁷⁶ Centur. Magdeburg. Cent. 3. cap. 6. p. 94.

⁷⁷ Orig. cont. Cels. lib. 6. p. 302. Ταῖς προσαχθείσαις τε εὐχαῖς συνεχίστερον καὶ δεόντως νυκτὸς καὶ ἡμέρας χράμενοι, &c.

presbyters had in their books, were only magical enchantments: which calumny Origen not only rejects with scorn, appealing to the experience of the world, which knew it to be a fiction; but also tells his adversary further, that the prayers which they used by order and appointment, were such as rendered them invincible, and proof against all the force of magic and power of the devils. Now, considering that the objection of Celsus lay against the service books of the Christian presbyters, it is reasonable to conclude, that Origen's answer relates to the same: for Origen does not deny that they had any such books, but only says, their prayers, which they were ordered to use, were of a different nature from what the adversary had represented them.

To this we may add what Origen says in his Comments upon Job, that by ancient custom of the church,⁷⁸ the Book of Job was always read in Lent, and particularly in the Passion Week, as most properly adapted to that occasion. The reader may find this passage at length hereafter,⁷⁹ and therefore it is sufficient to hint in this place, that the Scriptures in his time were methodized and brought under rule, being read by some certain order and prescription.

Not long after Origen, St. Cyprian testifies not only that the Lord's prayer was used as a form, and as a spiritual form, most acceptable to God, as we shall see hereafter; but also mentions several other forms of common and noted use in Divine service. As in the administration of baptism, every one was to renounce the devil and the world in a certain form of words,⁸⁰ then vulgarly known in the church; which Cyprian more than once has occasion to mention. They were likewise to make profession of the several articles of the Christian faith in a certain form of words, which every church had for that purpose, and for this particular use, collected into a creed. Cyprian⁸¹ often specifies both the interrogatories and the answers that were made upon this occasion; and he assures us, they were so precise to a form, that the Novatians themselves⁸² used the very same words in their questions and responses, as the catholics did: they observed the same rule as the church did: they baptized with the same creed; they asked the party, Whether he believed in Father, Son, and Holy Ghost? Whether he believed in the remission of sins, and eternal life, by the holy church? which were the first and last words in the creed. So they kept close to the same form of words, though they differed about the sense of them in some particulars relating to remission of sins, and the church: which is so clear an argument for the observation of a form in baptism, that I see not what can reasonably be replied to it.

Then, again, for the prayers in the administration of the eucharist, nothing can be more evident, than that the people bare a part in them. I will not insist on those expressions of his, that they had public and common prayer,⁸³ because they are capable of an evasion: but what he says of the people's answering to the priest, is not to be evaded. For, persuading the people to use diligence and attention in their prayers, he puts them in mind of a usual form of speech, which the whole church used to raise their souls to a spiritual and heavenly temper. The priest, says he, before prayer prepares the hearts⁸⁴ of the brethren, by premising a preface, and saying, "Lift up your hearts;" that whilst the people answer, "We lift them up unto the Lord," they may be admonished at that time to think of nothing but the Lord only. What Cyprian says here of this preface coming before the prayer, is not so to be understood, as if it came before all the prayers of the church, but immediately before the prayer of consecration in the communion service: for, as we shall see hereafter, there came before this both the prayers for the catechumens and penitents, and the prayers for the faithful, or the whole state of Christ's church; but when the solemn prayer of the oblation was to be made, then it was that the priest called upon the people in this form, "Lift up your hearts;" and they answered, "We lift them unto the Lord:" the priest went on again, and said, "Let us give thanks to our Lord God;" and the people answered, "It is just and right so to do." Then followed the eucharistical or consecration prayer, and the Lord's prayer; and after that the salutation, Pax vobis, "Peace be with you;" to which the people answered, "And with thy spirit." After which they gave one another mutually the kiss of peace, and then ⁷⁸ Origen. in Job, lib. 1. p. 366.

⁷⁹ Book XIV. chap. 3. sect. 3.

⁸⁰ Cypr. de Lapsis, p. 125. Stare illic potuit Dei servus, et loqui et renunciare Christo, qui jam diabolo renunciaret et sæculo? It. Ep. 7. al. 13. ad Rogat. p. 37. Sæculo renunciaveramus, cum baptizati sumus.

⁸¹ Ibid. Ep. 70. ad Episcopos Numidas, p. 190. Sed et ipsa interrogatio quæ fit in baptismo, testis est veritatis. Nam cum dicimus, Credis in vitam æternam, et remissionem peccatorum per sanctam ecclesiam? Intelligimus remissionem peccatorum non nisi in ecclesia dari, &c.

⁸² Ibid. Ep. 69. al. 76. ad Magnum. p. 183. Eandem Novatianum legem tenere, quam catholica ecclesia teneat eodem symbolo, quo et nos baptizare; eundem nosse Deum Patrem, eundem Filium Christum, eundem Spiritum Sanctum:—Dicunt, Credis remissionem peccatorum et vitam æternam per sanctam ecclesiam?

⁸³ Cypr. de Orat. Dom. p. 141. Publica nobis et communis oratio est. It. Ep. 8. al. 11. ad Cler. p. 26. Oratione communi et concordia prece pro omnibus jussit orare.

⁸⁴ Ibid. de Orat. Dom. p. 152. Ideo et sacerdos ante orationem, præfatione præmissa, parat fratrum mentes, dicendo, Sursum corda: ut dum respondet plebs, Habemus ad Dominum, admonetur, nihil aliud se quam Dominum cogitare debere.

proceeded to receive the holy sacrament. This was the form and order of the communion service in St. Austin's time in the African church; and it is very probable it might be much the same in the time of Cyprian: but Cyprian had no occasion to mention any other part of the prayers, but only that which related to his particular subject; which one is sufficient to prove, that stated forms of prayer were then allowed in the public service of the church of Carthage, and probably in the rest of the African churches.

At the same time with Cyprian lived Firmilian, bishop of Cæsarea in Cappadocia, who, having occasion to speak of a certain woman, an impostor, who pretended to the spirit of prophecy, he says, She took upon her⁸⁵ to consecrate the eucharist with the venerable invocation, and ceremony of predication then commonly used in the church: he means the commemoration of God's great blessings bestowed upon man, and the repetition of the history of the first institution of the Lord's supper, which by the ancients is called ἀνάμνησις, and solita prædicationis, a thing seldom or never omitted in the consecration of the eucharist. He adds also, that the same impostor baptized many, using the common and appointed interrogatories, that she might not seem to vary in any thing from the rule of the church. She made them answer to every article of the creed, the creed (as he calls it) of the holy Trinity; she put the usual questions to them prescribed by the church, that is, Whether they renounced the devil, his angels, his pomp, and his service? and, Whether they made a covenant with Christ? and she did every thing ad imaginem veritatis, according to the exact method and form that was observed in the church. Now, though all this was done by the devil, speaking in an impostor; yet, being done according to the exact rules of the church, it argues, that the church at that time had a stated rule and order for administering both the sacraments, and that the forms were so well known, that this woman could imitate them so exactly, as in nothing to vary from the usual solemnities either of prayers, or other ceremonies then observed in the church. And if we consider, that the administration of the two sacraments was then the most considerable part of the church's service, this is as clear an evidence as we can desire, to prove that prescribed forms were now in use in the Asiatic churches.

⁸⁵ Firmil. Ep. 75. ad Cypr. p. 223. Hoc frequenter ausa est, ut invocatione non contemptibili sanctificare se panem, et eucharistiam facere simularet, et sacrificium Domino non sine sacramento solitæ prædicationis offerret; baptizaret quoque multos, usitata et legitima verba interrogationis usurpans, ut nil discrepare ab ecclesiastica regula videretur. — Nunquid et hoc Stephanus, et qui illi consentiunt, comprobant? Maxime cui nec symbolum Trinitatis, nec interrogatio legitima et ecclesiastica deficit? Potest credi aut

Gregory Thaumaturgus, bishop of Neocæsarea in Pontus, was contemporary with Firmilian, and he was a man famous for working miracles by the Spirit, whence he had the name of Thaumaturgus, the wonder-worker. There is no doubt but that he prayed also by the Spirit, yet he prayed by a form; which shows, that praying by a form, and praying by the Spirit, are not inconsistent. As he was the founder of his church, (finding but seventeen Christians when he came thither, and leaving but seventeen heathens when he was taken from it,) so he left them a liturgy or form of Divine service, which they were so tenacious of, that, as St. Basil⁸⁶ testifies of them, they would not suffer one ceremony, or one word, or one mystical form, to be added to those which he had left among them. He settled the way of singing psalms, not alternately, but by the common voice of the people all joining together: and the clergy of Neocæsarea were such admirers of this rule, that when St. Basil had introduced the alternate way into his own church, they were offended at it, and objected against him, that it was not so in the days of Gregory the Great. Upon which St. Basil was forced to write an apologetical epistle to them in vindication of his practice, wherein he shows, That the way of alternate song was now conformable to the practice of all the Eastern churches, except that of Neocæsarea; and that, however tenacious that church had formerly been of the ways and forms of Gregory, yet in one particular they had now made an alteration: for in the days of Gregory they⁸⁷ had none of that peculiar form of prayers, called litanies, which now in St. Basil's time they had admitted into their service, and were very zealous in the use of it, notwithstanding that it was neither of St. Gregory's composition, nor used at all in his days. As this shows that the use of litanies was brought into the church of Neocæsarea some years after the time of St. Gregory; so it as evidently proves that their other forms were instituted by him, and derived their original from his composition, who was the first founder of the church.

Not long after this, we find a complaint made by the council of Antioch, anno 270, against Paulus Samosatensis, the heretical bishop of that place, that he had forbidden the use of such psalms⁸⁸ or hymns as were used to be sung in the church to the honour of our Lord Jesus Christ, under pretence that they were only the novel compositions of late remissio peccatorum data, aut lavacri salutaris regeneratio rite perfecta, ubi omnia quamvis ad imaginem veritatis, tamen per dæmonem gesta sunt, &c.

⁸⁶ Basil. de Spir. Sancto, cap. 29, p. 360. Οὐ πράξιν τινά, οὐ λόγον, οὐ τύπον τινά μυστικόν, παρ' ὧν ἐκείνοις κατέλιπε, τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ προσέθηκαν.

⁸⁷ Basil. Ep. 63. ad Neocæsar. Ἄλλ' οὐδὲ αἱ λίτανεῖαι ἐπὶ Γρηγορίου, ἃς ὑμεῖς νῦν ἐπιτηδεύετε.

⁸⁸ Conc. Antioch. ap. Euseb. lib. 7. cap. 30.

and modern authors. I have already produced this passage more at length⁸⁹ to prove the worship of our Saviour: and here it serves to prove, that they worshipped him by certain forms of praise, which the bishop cast out of the church, upon a pretence of novelty: which was but a mere pretence; for such forms of praise had been in use in the church ἀπαρχῆς, from the beginning, as the ancient writer against the heresy of Artemon in Eusebius⁹⁰ words it. And about the same time Nepos, an Egyptian bishop, composed hymns of the like nature for the service of the church, for which he is commended by Dionysius,⁹¹ bishop of Alexandria; who also himself used a certain form of doxology to the whole Trinity, as is reported by St. Basil,⁹² who also tells us, in the same place, That Athenogenes the martyr composed hymns to the glory of the Holy Ghost; and adds, that the hymn called Hymnus Lucernalis, the hymn to be sung at lighting of candles in the evening service, containing a glorification of the holy Trinity, was of ancient use in the church; so ancient, that he knew not who was the author of it. But I have already alleged these more at large⁹³ in vindicating the worship of our Saviour, and therefore content myself barely to hint them as accustomed forms of praise in this place.

I shall only note one thing more in this century, out of the epistle of Cornelius, bishop of Rome, to Fabian, bishop of Antioch, recorded by Eusebius: which is, That it was customary, in those days, for the minister to use a form of words at the delivery of the bread and wine in the eucharist, saying, The body of Christ, or the blood of Christ, to which the people always answered, Amen. For Cornelius,⁹⁴ speaking of the wickedness of Novatian, says, When he delivered the eucharist to the people, he obliged them, instead of saying Amen, at the naming of it, to swear by the body and blood of Christ, that they would not desert his party, nor return to Cornelius: which custom of saying Amen, in answer to the minister, when he named the body or blood of Christ, is both an ancient and universal practice. For Tertullian,⁹⁵ as has been showed already, mentions it long before; and we find it frequently in the writers of the next age, St. Ambrose, St. Cyril, St. Austin, St. Jerom, and the author of the Constitutions; of which I shall have occasion to speak more in another place.

In the beginning of the fourth century, Arnobius, apologizing for the Christian devotions, tells the heathens, Sect. 7. Evidence of the use of set forms in the fourth century. They might know that they worshipped the supreme God, and called upon him for what they desired, by the sound of their voice,⁹⁶ which they used in prayer. He says, they all prostrated themselves before him, adoring him with joint supplications.⁹⁷ And he gives us the general heads of their prayers, which are very agreeable to the ancient forms of the church, viz. That God would grant⁹⁸ peace and pardon to all men, to the magistrates, to the armies, and to the emperors; to their friends and to their enemies; to those that were alive, and those that were set at liberty from the bonds of the body. Which petitions are so conformable to the method and order of the ancient liturgies, that one might have imagined them to be offered by a form, though Arnobius had said nothing of their joint prayers, or vocal consent in their devotions.

Lactantius and Eusebius wrote after the great persecution under Diocletian and his associates was over; and they both take notice of forms of prayer appointed by the first Christian emperors for their soldiers to use, in imitation of those of the church. Lactantius says expressly, that when Licinius was about to join battle with Maximinus, Maximinus made a vow to Jupiter, that if he got the victory, he would utterly extinguish and blot out the very name of Christians. Upon which, the night after an angel of God came and stood by Licinius as he lay at rest, bidding him rise quickly, and pray to the most high God with all his army, promising him the victory if he did so. As soon as he heard this, he thought with himself that he arose and stood with the angel who gave him this warning, and who then taught him after what manner and in what words they should pray. Therefore, awaking out of sleep, he ordered a notary to be brought to him, to whom he dictated the prayer⁹⁹ in these very words, as he had heard them: O thou most high God, we beseech thee. O holy God, we beseech thee. We ⁸⁹ Chap. 2. sect. 3.

⁹⁰ Euseb. lib. 5. cap. 28.

⁹¹ Dionys. Epist. ap. Euseb. lib. 7. cap. 24.

⁹² Basil. de Spir. Sancto, cap. 29. ⁹³ See chap. 2. sect. 2.

⁹⁴ Cornel. Ep. ad Fabian. ap. Euseb. lib. 6. cap. 43. p. 245.

⁹⁵ Tertul. de Spectac. cap. 25.

⁹⁶ Arnob. lib. 1. p. 24. Summum invocare nos Deum, et ab eo quod postulamus orare, vel auribus poterit scire, vel ipsius vocis sono, qua utimur in precibus, noscitate.

⁹⁷ Ibid. p. 25. Huic omnes ex more prosternimur, hunc collatis precibus adoramus.

⁹⁸ Id. lib. 4. p. 181. Cur nostra meruerint immaniter conventicula dirui? In quibus summus oratur Deus, pax cunctis et venia postulatur, magistratibus, exercitibus, regibus, familiaribus, inimicis, adhuc vitam degentibus, et resolutis corporum vincione.

⁹⁹ Lact. de Mort. Persecut. cap. 46. Discusso somno notarium jussit asciri, et sicut audierat, hæc verba dictavit. Summe Deus, te rogamus. Sancte Deus, te rogamus. Omnem justitiam tibi commendamus; salutem nostram tibi commendamus; imperium nostrum tibi commendamus. Per te vivimus, per te victores et felices existimus. Summe sancte Deus, preces nostras exaudi. Brachia nostra ad te tendimus. Exaudi, sancte summe Deus. Scribuntur hæc in libellis pluribus, et per præpositos tribunosque mittuntur, ut suos quisque milites doceat. — Erat jam utraque acies in conspectu. Liciniani scuta deponunt, galeas resolvunt, ad cælum manus tendunt, præeuntibus præpositis, et post imperatorem precem dicunt: audit acies peritura precantium murmur. Illi oratione ter dicta, virtute jam pleni, &c.

commend all the justice of our cause to thee: we commend our safety unto thee: we commend our empire unto thee. By thee we live, by thee we are victorious and happy. O most high and holy God, hear our prayers. We stretch forth our arms unto thee. Hear us, O most high and holy God. These words were written in many books, and sent by the generals and tribunes, that they might teach them to their soldiers. When the day of battle came, the soldiers laid aside their shields, and put off their helmets, and lifting up their hands to heaven, said the prayer after the emperor, their generals repeating it before them. And this they did so loudly, that the adverse army, ready to be sacrificed, heard the echo of their prayer. Which when they had repeated three times, they were inspired with courage, and resuming their arms, though they were but a few, they without any loss gained a complete victory over their enemies; whom the most high God, says our author, delivered up to be slaughtered, as if they had come not to engage in battle, but as men devoted to death and destined to destruction.

It is not many years since this little golden tract of Lactantius came to light, and therefore probably this testimony may not very often have fallen under the observation of every ordinary reader. But as there is no dispute to be made of the truth of the relation upon the authority of Lactantius, so it is an illustrious evidence both of the opinion of Lactantius and the general sense of Christians, that they did not think forms of prayer unlawful, because they were written in a book, nor the repetition of them any offence, for this prayer was thrice repeated. If it should be said, that this prayer was dictated immediately by an angel, the same and more may be said of the Lord's prayer, that it was dictated by Christ himself, and the Psalms were written as forms of prayer and praise by an inspired penman; and yet there are those, who, for no other reason but because they are forms, despise the use of them, when inserted into any liturgy of the church.

Parallel to this testimony of Lactantius is that other relation of Eusebius concerning Constantine, That he ordered all his soldiers, as many of them as were heathens, to go forth into the field on the Lord's day, and there, with hands and hearts lift up to heaven, to offer up to God μεμελετημένην εὐχὴν,¹⁰⁰ a certain prayer which they had learned and premeditated before. The prayer was to be said in the Latin tongue, which was the vulgar language, and in this express form of words: We acknowledge thee to be the only God;¹⁰¹ we profess thee to be our King; we call upon thee as our helper. It is from thee we have our victories; by thee we are superior to our enemies. We give thee thanks for the by-past favours and benefits we have already received; and we hope in thee for those that are to come. We are all humble supplicants unto thee, beseeching thee to preserve Constantine our king, with all his pious children, and grant him long to reign over us with safety and victory. This was the prayer which he enjoined the heathens in his army to use every Lord's day.

As for those that were Christians, he commanded them to follow his own example, and attend the prayers of the church on the Lord's day, setting them a pattern in his own practice. He ordered his own palace after the manner of a church, first taking the Bible into his hands, and reading and meditating therein, and then repeating the prescribed prayers¹⁰² with all his royal family. Which shows that forms of prayer were then generally used in the church, since Constantine used the prescribed prayers in his own family, and thereby made it to resemble the church.

Eusebius highly extols and applauds Constantine for all this; which argues that Eusebius himself was no enemy to prescribed forms. And indeed we are beholden to his history both for the knowledge of this of Constantine, and many other forms, which had been lost, had it not been for his care and diligence in preserving them; of which any reader may be sensible, that considers how many things have already been alleged out of his treasury, especially the account which he gives of the Essenes, and their way of worship, out of Philo Judæus; for as it is evident that they worshipped God by certain forms, so it is as evident that Eusebius took them for Christians, and their worship for the way of worship settled by the first Christians at Alexandria.¹⁰³ It may not be improper also to observe, that Eusebius, in one of his letters recorded by Socrates,¹⁰⁴ expressly says, That in the church of Cæsarea, where he was bishop, they always had a creed in a certain form of words (which he there repeats) whereby their catechumens were to be instructed, and their answers in baptism to be made in the words of it; and that thus it was that he himself had been there both catechised and baptized. And if his church allowed a form in baptism, there is reason to believe, from what has been said, that she was not averse to it in other parts of Divine service. Moreover, from the time of the council of Nice, we are well assured, that the creed composed in that council was used in most of the Eastern churches, as a precise form by which all catechumens were to make their responses in bap-¹⁰⁰ Euseb. d. Vita Constant. lib. 4. cap. 19.

¹⁰¹ Ibid. cap. 20.

¹⁰² Ibid. cap. 17. Εἰτ' εὐχὰς ἐνθέστους σὺν τοῖς τὸν

βασίλειον οἶκον πληροῦσιν ἀπειδίδου.

¹⁰³ Vid. ibid. lib. 2. c. 17.

¹⁰⁴ Socrat. lib. 1. cap. 8.

tism, as I have proved¹⁰⁵ elsewhere upon another occasion, though it was not presently admitted as a form to be repeated, as now it is, in the ordinary service of the church; but its being allowed as a form in baptism, is an argument that the church had then no exception against forms, since she enjoined them in the administration of her sacraments, which are the most considerable part of Divine service.

Athanasius, as well as Eusebius, was a member of the council of Nice, and there are plain footsteps of a liturgy in his writings. In one place he declares, that when he said, Let us pray for the safety¹⁰⁶ of the most religious emperor Constantius, all the people immediately with one voice answered, Christ help Constantius. Which is exactly agreeable to the ancient way of praying for kings and others in the prayer for the whole state of Christ's church, where the people were used to answer to every petition, Κύριε, ἐλέησον, or σῶσον, Lord, have mercy upon them, or, Lord, save and help them, as will be showed in its proper place.

Again, speaking of the communion service,¹⁰⁷ he says, The people offered up their prayers with one voice, and without any manner of disagreement; and that in that great multitude there was but one voice, when they unanimously answered, Amen. It is evident also, that in his time psalmody was in great request at Alexandria; for Sozomen¹⁰⁸ takes notice, that it was by the advantage of this practice, that Athanasius, when he was beset in the church by his enemies, escaped their hands, whilst he got out secretly in the company of those that were singing psalms. St. Austin also speaks of it, and tells us,¹⁰⁹ That Athanasius made some regulation in the way of singing, and brought in the custom of plain song, ordering the readers of the psalms to pronounce their words with so little inflexion or variation of the tone, that it looked more like reading than singing. It is further observable out of Ruffinus¹¹⁰ and the other historians, who relate the story of Athanasius baptizing the catechumens whilst he was but a youth, that the questions and answers, and all other ceremonies of baptism, were then performed by such a certain rule and order in the church, that Athanasius was able to imitate them exactly, and omit nothing that was used to be done, but observed every rite to a tittle, as Alexander the bishop found upon inquiry, when he came more strictly to examine them. And this shows, that not only in the time of Athanasius, but in the days of Alexander his predecessor, such sort of forms were of constant use in the church. Athanasius himself also not only mentions their psalmody, but tells us, that it was so ordered, the people might bear a part in it. For though the antiphonal way of singing verse for verse, by way of alternate song, was not yet brought into the church in repeating David's Psalms, yet it was usual sometimes for the people to join in the close of a verse, and repeat it together with the reader. And this was called ὑπηχέειν, and ὑπακούειν, to come into the concert at the close. Whence Athanasius, speaking¹¹¹ of that great assault made upon his church, mentioned before by Socrates and Sozomen, says, He commanded the deacon to read a psalm, to which the people did ὑπακούειν, that is, not barely hearken, as the unskilful translator renders it, but repeat in the close these words, "For his mercy endureth for ever." Of which way of singing I shall say more hereafter in its proper place, Book XIV. chap. i. sect. 12. Here I shall only note further, that Athanasius, describing the great barbarities and indignities which the Arians showed to the matrons and virgins in the very church, mentions one virgin¹¹² whom they despitefully used, having her Psalter in her hand. Which no doubt she had to join in singing David's Psalms, according to the custom of the church. And the book De Interpretatione Psalmorum, is nothing else but a direction how to use the Psalms as forms of prayers and praises upon all particular occasions, where, among other things, he observes,¹¹³ That the 62nd or 63rd Psalm, "O God, my God, early will I seek thee," was always a psalm to be used at morning prayer. And the author of the book of Virginity,¹¹⁴ among his works, says the same; which is also mentioned by St. Chrysostom and some others about this time, of whom we shall have occasion to speak more particularly in considering the order and method of morning service, Book XIII. chap. x. sect. 2.

Athanasius lived forty-six years bishop of Alexandria, and continued in being till the year 371. During which interval, we have the concurrent testimony of Juvencus and Pachomius, and all the Egyptian monasteries; of Flavian, bishop of An-¹⁰⁵ Book X. chap. 4. sect. 17.

¹⁰⁶ Athanas. Apol. ad Constant. p. 679. Μόνον γὰρ ἐλεγον, Εὐξώμεθα περὶ τῆς σωτηρίας, &c. Καὶ πᾶς ὁ λαὸς εὐθὺς μιᾷ φωνῇ ἔβόα, Χριστὲ, βοήθει Κωνσταντίῳ.

¹⁰⁷ Athan. ibid. p. 683. Μίαν καὶ τὴν αὐτὴν μετὰ συμφωνίας τῶν λαῶν γενέσθαι τὴν φωνήν, &c.

¹⁰⁸ Sozom. lib. 3. cap. 6. Συμφώνου δὲ τῆς ψαλμωδίας γενομένης, &c. Vid. Socrat. lib. 2. cap. 11. Προστάξας διακόμῳ κηρύξαι εὐχὴν, &c. Theod. lib. 2. cap. 13.

¹⁰⁹ Aug. Confess. lib. 10. cap. 33. Tam modico flexu vocis faciebat sonare lectorem psalmi, ut pronuncianti vicinior esset quam canenti.

¹¹⁰ Ruffin. lib. 1. cap. 14. Diligenter inquirens, quid interrogati fuerint, quidve responderint, videt secundum religionis nostræ ritum cuncta constare, &c.

¹¹¹ Athan. Apol. ad Constant. p. 717. Προέτρεπον τὸν μὲν διάκονον ἀναγινώσκειν ψαλμὸν, τοὺς δὲ λαοὺς ὑπακούειν, ὅτι εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα τὸ ἔλεος αὐτοῦ, &c.

¹¹² Ibid. Epist. ad Orthodoxos, p. 947.

¹¹³ Ibid. de Interpr. Psalmor. ad Marcellin. t. 1. p. 975.

¹¹⁴ Ibid. de Virgin. p. 1075.

tioch; Cyril, bishop of Jerusalem, Hilary, bishop of Poitiers; Optatus, Epiphanius, Gregory Nazianzen, Ephrem Syrus, St. Basil and Apollinaris, the supposed author of the books under the name of Dionysius the Areopagite, together with the council of Laodicea. And not long after, St. Ambrose, St. Jerom, St. Austin, and St. Chrysostom, with several African councils, all within the compass of this fourth age, in which Athanasius lived.

Juvenus flourished under Constantine in Spain, and being a poet, turned the history of the gospel into verse; and St. Jerom adds, that he wrote a book¹¹⁵ in the same way, giving an account of the order of the sacraments of the church. Now, if we consider, what has been observed before,¹¹⁶ that, in ecclesiastical style, Ordo Sacramentorum commonly denotes a book of Divine offices, it is most probable that this work of Juvenus was no other but the offices or forms of Divine service turned into verse.

Pachomius, about the year 340, brought the Egyptian monks into communities, and settled them under rules; one of which was, to meet twice a day, and sing a certain number of psalms, with prayers intermixed, as may be seen in the accounts which Cassian,¹¹⁷ Palladius,¹¹⁸ and St. Jerom¹¹⁹ give of them. Now, it must be owned, that whatever their prayers were, their psalmody was matter of form, whether sung singly or alternately: and though they did not repeat the usual doxology, "Glory be to the Father," as was usual in the Western church, at the end of every psalm, yet they did it at other times at the end of their antiphonæ, as Cassian,¹²⁰ an eye witness of their service, informs us.

About the year 350, lived Flavian, first a presbyter, and then bishop of Antioch. Whilst he was presbyter, it happened that Leontius, the Arian bishop, made an alteration in the common doxology, "Glory be to the Father," &c., to make it favour his heresy. Upon this, Flavian and Diodorus withdrew from his communion, and assembled with the people at the monuments of the martyrs; where, dividing the people into two parts, they taught them to sing the Psalms of David alternately;¹²¹ which custom beginning first at Antioch, was from thence propagated all the world over. After this manner Theodoret relates the story; where it is easy to observe, 1. That the form of glorification was an ancient thing, and only Leontius made an innovation in it. 2. That the singing of David's Psalms was ancient too, which are forms both of prayers and praises; and Flavian was not the author of that service, but only of the alternate way of singing them. And whereas it is said by Socrates, that Ignatius had introduced the antiphonal way of singing before, that is not to be understood of David's Psalms, but of other hymns composed to the glory of the holy Trinity; which, as we have seen before, were always in use in the Christian church. And Theodoret adds, 3. That this way of singing was so taking to the people of Antioch, that they all deserted Leontius, and he was forced to beg of Flavian, that he would bring back this λευτουργία, this liturgy or service into the churches.

About the same time lived Cyril, bishop of Jerusalem, who, in his Catechetical Discourses to the newly baptized, takes notice of many forms that had been of ancient use in the church. In his first catechism,¹²² he tells them the meaning of the ceremonies used in baptism: Ye were first brought in, says he, into the ante-room of the baptistery, and placed towards the west in a standing posture, and then commanded to renounce Satan, by stretching out your hands against him, as if he had been present. A little after he explains the meaning of their doing this toward the west. The west, says he, is the place of darkness, and Satan is darkness, and his strength is in darkness. For this reason ye symbolically look toward the west, when ye renounce that prince of darkness and horror. For what did every one of you then say, standing? I renounce thee, Satan, and all thy works, and all thy pomp, and all thy worship and service. After this, he tells them,¹²³ they turned from the west to the east, which is the region of light and place of paradise, and then were commanded to say, I believe in the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost, and in one baptism of repentance. In his second discourse, he reminds them of their unction in the baptistery,¹²⁴ and their repeated confession of the holy Trinity, and their trine immersion. In his third discourse, he treats of¹²⁵ the second unction with the holy chrism, which was then used in confirmation, immediately after they were come out of the waters of baptism. In his fifth discourse, he treats of the ceremonies used in the communion service, where first he speaks¹²⁶ of the deacon's bringing water to the bishop and presbyters to wash their hands, in token of men's obligation to purify themselves from sin. Then the deacon cries out, Embrace and salute¹²⁷ one another with a holy kiss. After this, the priest cries out,¹²⁸ Lift up your hearts; and ye answer, We lift them up unto the Lord. He says again, Let us give thanks to the Lord; and ye answer, It is meet and just so to do.

¹¹⁵ Hieron. de Script. Eccl. cap. 84. Nonnulla eodem metro ad sacramentorum ordinem pertinentia composuit.

¹¹⁶ Book XIII. chap. i. sect. 6.

¹¹⁷ Cassian. Institut. lib. 2. cap. 5.

¹¹⁸ Pallad. Hist. Lausiæ. cap. 38.

¹¹⁹ Hieron. Ep. 22. ad Eustoch. c. 15.

¹²⁰ Cassian. lib. 2. cap. 8.

¹²¹ Theod. lib. 2. cap. 21.

¹²² Cyril. Catech. Myst. l. n. 2. p. 278.

¹²³ Ibid. n. 6. p. 283.

¹²⁴ Ibid. 2. n. 3 et 4.

¹²⁵ Ibid. 3. n. 2 et 3.

¹²⁶ Ibid. 5. n. 1.

¹²⁷ Ibid. n. 2.

¹²⁸ Ibid. n. 3.

After this, we make mention of heaven, and earth, and sea, the sun, moon, and stars, and the whole creation, rational and irrational, visible and invisible, angels and archangels, dignities, dominions, principalities and powers, thrones and cherubims, and with them we sing the seraphical hymn, Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of sabaoth. After which, we beseech the merciful God, that he would send forth his Spirit upon the elements, and make the bread the body of Christ, and the wine the blood of Christ. Then, after this spiritual and unbloody sacrifice and service is performed, we beseech God for the common peace of the church, for the tranquillity of the world, for kings and their armies and allies, for the sick and afflicted; and, in a word, for all that want assistance, saying, We beseech thee for them, and offer this sacrifice unto thee. Then we make mention of those that are fallen asleep, first, patriarchs, prophets, apostles, and martyrs, that God, through their prayers and intercessions, may receive our prayers; and after, we pray for our holy fathers and bishops, and all that are departed this life before us. Then we say that prayer, which our Saviour gave to his disciples, calling God by the name of Father, and saying, "Our Father which art in heaven." After which, the priest says, Holy things for those that are holy. And the people answer, There is one holy, one Lord Jesus Christ. Then one is appointed to sing those words of the thirty-third Psalm, "O taste and see that the Lord is gracious," as an excitement to receive the communion; and every one communicates, saying Amen twice, when first he receives the body of Christ into his hand, and afterward the cup of his blood. Finally, when all have communicated, he tells them, they are to wait for prayer again, and give God thanks for making them partakers of so great mysteries.

Now, one must be blind that cannot see the plain footsteps and forms of a stated liturgy in all this; and, therefore, I shall make no other descent upon them, but only this, that, undoubtedly, before St. Cyril wrote those lectures, there was a prescribed liturgy, and offices in form for the administration both of baptism and the eucharist, in the church of Jerusalem, and those handed down from their forefathers, though it be not possible to trace every thing precisely to its first original.

Contemporary with Cyril was Hilary, bishop of Poitiers, of whom St. Jerom¹²⁹ says, That he wrote a book of hymns and mysteries, which most probably were the forms of the holy offices then used in the church. It is certain, his hymns, together with those of St. Ambrose, were afterwards in great request in the church; and when some excepted against them, as only of human composition, the fourth council of Toledo ordered¹³⁰ them to be retained in the church's service, together with the hymns, "Glory be to the Father," and, "Glory be to God on high;" threatening excommunication to any who in the churches of Spain and Gallicia should reject them. Hilary himself plainly intimates, that both the prayers and hymns were such, as all the people with an audible voice might join in them. Let every profane hearer, says he,¹³¹ be terrified with the words of our confession: let us fight against the devil and his weapons with the sound of our prayers, and let the victory of our war be proclaimed with the voice of exultation. Let him that stands without the church hear the voice of the people praying; let him perceive the glorious sound of our hymns, and hear the responses of our devout confession in the offices of the Divine sacraments. He that can make out all this from the people's silent consent in heart only to the minister's prayer, without any vocal joining in forms of prayer and praises, may make any thing out of any thing, and it were not worth while to produce any manner of evidence for such a man's conviction. I only note further out of Hilary, that these prayers and hymns were both for morning and evening service:¹³² The church had her outgoings both morning and evening to praise God: she began the day with prayers, and ended the day with hymns to God.

Chronologers are not exactly agreed about the time of the council of Laodicea. Labbe and others place it before the council of Nice, about the year 319; Bishop Beverege, about the year 365; but on all hands it is agreed to be within this century. Now, here are several canons, which plainly show the use of prescribed forms in the service of the church. The seventh canon orders, That such as returned from the heresies of the Novatians, the Photinians, and the Quartadecimani, should first learn the creeds of the church, and be anointed with the holy chrism, before they were admitted to the communion of the holy mysteries. Which implies, that the creeds were then in a certain form, since ¹²⁹ Hieron. de Scriptor. cap. 140. Liber hymnorum et mysteriorum.

¹³⁰ Conc. Tolet. 4. can. 13. Quia nonnulli hymni humano studio in laudem Dei, atque apostolorum et martyrum triumphos compositi esse noscuntur, sicut hi, quos beatissimi doctores Hilarius atque Ambrosius ediderunt, quos tamen quidam specialiter reprobant, pro eo quod de scripturis sanctorum canonum, vel apostolica traditione non existunt, &c.

¹³¹ Hilary. in Psal. lxxv. p. 232. Terrendus est confessionis nostræ sermone omnis profanus auditor: et adversus diabolum armaque ejus orationum nostrarum sonitu certandum est, et belli nostri victoria exultationis voce monstranda est. Audiat orantis populi consistens quis extra ecclesiam vocem; spectet celebres hymnorum sonitus; et inter Divinorum quoque sacramentorum officia responsum devotæ confessionis accipiat.

¹³² Id. in Psal. lxxv. p. 231. Progressus ecclesiæ in matutinum (leg. matutinorum) et vespertinorum hymnorum delectatione maximum misericordiæ Dei signum est. Dies in orationibus Dei inchoatur, dies hymnis Dei clauditur.

they were obliged to learn them. The fifteenth canon orders, That none should sing in the church except the canonical singers, who went up into the ambo, or reading desk, and sang from a book, ἀπὸ διφθέρας. The seventeenth canon forbids the continuing of psalms one after another, and orders a lesson to be read after every psalm. The eighteenth orders the same liturgy of prayers to be used at the nones, that is, three o'clock in the afternoon, and at evening service. The nineteenth orders the method of Divine service, That after the bishop's sermon should follow the prayers for the catechumens; and after they were gone, the prayers for the penitents; and when they had been under the bishop's hand, and were retired, then the three prayers for the faithful or communicants; the first whereof were to be in silence, the second and third by way of bidding prayer and audible invocation. Then the presbyters were to give the kiss of peace to the bishop, and laymen to one another; after which, the holy oblation was to be made, those only of the clergy communicating within the rails of the altar. This canon plainly describes the order and method of the ancient service, as it was performed in that age; and though the several forms of prayer here mentioned are not set down, yet we are sure they were in use at that time; and therefore a brief reference, such as was suitable to the compass of a short canon, is made to them, as shall be showed more at large in another place.¹³⁵ The twenty-second canon orders, That the subdeacon shall not wear the orarium, which was a scarf or tippet belonging to the deacons, by which they were used to give the signal or directions to the people in the performance of the several parts of Divine service. The forty-sixth canon orders those that are to be baptized, to learn the creed, and on the Thursday before Easter to rehearse it to the bishop or presbyters. The forty-seventh canon appoints those that were baptized in sickness, afterwards to learn the creed also; which implies, that the creed was then in a certain form of words. The fifty-ninth canon orders, That no psalms composed by private men should be sung in the church; which argues, that hymns composed by private men were only to be discarded, but others were allowed that were authentic. And this is full proof, that forms of Divine service were in use at the time of this council.

About the year 368, Epiphanius was made bishop of Salamis, or Constantia, in Cyprus. And that he approved forms of prayer, appears from the frequent testimony he gives to the book called the Apostolical Constitutions, the eighth Book of which is nothing but a collection of such forms. Cotelierus¹³⁶ has compared the several places in the Constitutions, with those that Epiphanius alleges out of them, and showed them to be the same in substance: particularly he observes, that Epiphanius in one place¹³⁷ gives the Constitutions this character, That they contain all canonical order, and nothing contrary to the faith, or confession, or the administration and rules of the church. Which no man could say, that did not approve of the several forms of worship contained therein. And therefore when Epiphanius says¹³⁶ in another place, That the church observed her morning hymns and prayers, and her evening psalms and prayers, it is reasonable to suppose, that all these were according to prescribed forms, as it is certain at least the psalms and hymns were. But there is one place in Epiphanius's epistle to John, bishop of Jerusalem, which evidently proves that the communion service was then performed by a prescribed office and form. For Epiphanius having been accused to John, as if he had reflected on him in his prayers, saying thus, Lord, grant that John may believe aright: to clear himself of the accusation, he denies that ever he prayed so for him in public, (though he did so privately in his heart,) and for the truth of this, he appeals to the words of the communion offices then in public use: When we offer up prayers in the communion office, says he,¹³⁷ we use these words for all bishops, and for you also; Keep him who preacheth the truth: or certainly thus, Lord, grant our requests, and keep him that he may preach the word of truth; as the occasion of the words requires, and as the order of the office for prayer directs. To understand which aright, we are to consider, that anciently in the communion service there were two prayers where bishops were prayed for, one in the prayer for the whole state of Christ's church before the oblation, and the other in the prayer immediately after the oblation, when all states of men were again solemnly commemorated and recommended to God; as we shall see hereafter. Now, in reference to these two prayers, Epiphanius says, they prayed either thus or thus, as the occasion of the words required, and the order of the office directed. Which is a manifest reference to the two prayers in which these words were contained, and as plain an argument for prescribed forms as can be required. And indeed the word consequentia, which in Greek, ¹³⁵ Book XV. chap. 1.

¹³⁶ Cotelier. Testimonia Veterum præfixa Constitut. Apostol.

¹³⁷ Epiph. Hær. 70. Audianor. n. 10. Πᾶσα ἐν αὐτῇ κανονικῇ τάξει ἐμφέρεται, καὶ οὐδὲν παρακεχαραγμένον τῆς πίστεως, οὐδὲ τῆς οὐλολογίας, οὐδὲ τῆς ἐκκλησιαστικῆς διοικήσεως, καὶ κανόνος.

¹³⁶ Epiph. Expos. Fid. n. 23. t. 1. p. 1106.

¹³⁷ Epiphanius, Epist. ad Joan. Hierosol. t. 2. p. 313. Quando autem complemus orationem secundum ritum mysteriorum, et pro omnibus, et pro te quoque dicimus, Custodi illum qui prædicat veritatem: vel certe ita, Tu præsta, Domine, et custodi, ut ille verbum prædicet veritatis: sicut occasio sermonis se tulerit, et habuerit oratio consequentiam.

no doubt, was ἀκολουθία, shows as much; for that always signified a stated form or prescribed order of prayers. Of which the reader may find examples enough in Suicerus's Thesaurus, or Meursius's Glossary, which need not here be inserted.

Optatus, bishop of Milevis, was contemporary with Epiphanius, and he has a great many plain references to the forms then used in the public service. He tells the Donatists, that by confining the church to their own party they had frustrated the intent of the Holy Spirit, which had presigned that the name of God should be praised with psalms and hymns over all the earth, "from the rising of the sun to the going down thereof;" and that, in effect, they had defrauded God¹³⁸ of his praise; for if they only were the true church that was to praise him, the rest of the world, "from the rising of the sun to the going down thereof," must be silent: they had shut the mouth of Christian nations, and imposed silence upon all people, however desirous to praise God at the proper seasons. Which manifestly implies, that psalmody was then a part of the people's devotions all the world over, and that the Donatists were injurious to God, whose principles tended to defraud him of it. Again, he speaks of the prayer for the whole church in the time of the oblation, as a form so firmly established by law, that the Donatists themselves would not venture to make any alteration in it. Who doubts, says he,¹³⁹ but that you continue to use that settled form of words in the celebration of the sacrament, and never omit to say, that you offer for that one church which is diffused over all the world? He says the same of the use of the Lord's prayer¹⁴⁰ in the communion service, that the Donatists continued to use it as well as the catholics; for he observes, that though they gave imposition of hands and absolution to sinners in such a haughty and supercilious manner, as if they themselves had had no sin; yet not long after, when they turned to the altar, they could not omit the Lord's prayer, wherein they said, "Forgive us our trespasses and sins." The Lord's prayer, he says, was of one and the same use with them both. He says also, The common form of salutation, established by law, was likewise retained by the Donatists; for they could not omit saying, Peace be with you;¹⁴¹ they retained the name when they had lost the substance. He says further, That the catholics and Donatists used the same interrogatories in baptism; they asked the catechumen,¹⁴² whether he renounced the devil? and whether he believed in God? And he answered, I renounce, I believe. Only the Donatists did one thing amiss, in repeating these things over again, and rebaptizing those whom the catholics had baptized before. He seems also to hint something of the ancient form of exorcising catechumens before baptism, when he tells the Donatists, That by rebaptizing catholics, who were already baptized, and in whom¹⁴³ God dwelt, they said in effect to God, Go out, thou cursed one. For this was the phrase then used in exorcism, which was a prayer, as St. Cyril¹⁴⁴ calls it, for expelling Satan out of the catechumen: and these words of Optatus seem plainly to be taken out of the prayers of exorcism then commonly used in the church. There is one thing more very observable in Optatus: he says, A rumour was once spread in Africa, that the emperor's officers were to come and make strange alterations in the church, by placing images upon the altar in time of Divine service. Which flying report put the people into great consternation and confusion. But they were presently quieted again, when they saw those officers come, and no such alterations made by them, but the ancient purity and solemn custom¹⁴⁵ and usual rites were still observed, and nothing was either changed, or added, or diminished in the Divine sacrifice. Which shows, that the public service was then in a certain form, and not left to every man's liberty to make alterations in it, or lengthen or shorten it, by adding or diminishing at his pleasure.

About the year 370, St. Basil was made bishop of Cæsarea in Cappadocia; but before he was bishop he lived a presbyter in the same church, under Eusebius, his predecessor in the see. During which time, as Nazianzen assures us,¹⁴⁶ among other services done for that church, he composed forms of prayer and orders of decency for the communion service, which, by the consent and authority of his ¹³⁸ Optat. lib. 2. p. 47. Fraudatis aures Dei. Si vos soli laudatis, totus tacebit orbis, qui est ab ortu solis usque ad occasum. Clausistis ora omnium Christianarum gentium: indixistis silentium populis universis, Deum per momenta laudare cupientibus, &c.

¹³⁹ Ibid. p. 53. Quis dubitet vos illud legitimum in sacramentorum mysterio præterire non posse? Afferre vos dicitis pro una ecclesia, quæ sit in toto terrarum orbe diffusa.

¹⁴⁰ Ibid. p. 57. Inter vicina momenta, dum manus imponitis et delicta donatis, mox ad altare conversi, Dominicam orationem prætermittite non potestis, &c. It. lib. 3. p. 72. Oratio Dominica apud nos et apud vos una est.

¹⁴¹ Ibid. lib. 3. p. 73. Non potuistis omittere quod legitimum est: utique dixistis, Pax vobiscum.—Quid salutas, de quo non habes? Quid nominas quod exterminasti? Salutas de pace, qui non amas.

¹⁴² Ibid. lib. 5. p. 86. Quocunque interrogante, qui credidit, Deo credidit: et post illius unum credo, tu exigis alterum credo. It. p. 89. Interrogemus gentilem, an renunciet diabolo et credat Deo. Et dicat, Renuncio, et credo.

¹⁴³ Ibid. lib. 4. p. 79. Vos rebaptizando exorcizatis hominem fidelem, et dicitis Deo habitanti, Maledicte, exi foras.

¹⁴⁴ Cyril. Catech. 16. n. 9. p. 234. Ὁ καιμων, λογος εὐχης ἐκρατήθη.

¹⁴⁵ Optat. lib. 3. p. 75. Visa est puritas, et ritu solito sollemnis consuetudo perspecta est; cum viderent Divinis sacrificiis nec mutatum quicquam, nec additum, nec ablatum.

¹⁴⁶ Naz. Orat. 20. in Laud. Basil. p. 310. Εὐχῶν διατάξεις καὶ εὐκοσμίας τοῦ βήματος, &c.

bishop, Eusebius, were used in the church. We are not bound to assert, that any of the liturgies which now go under his name, are exactly the same with that. It is certain they have received many additions and alterations, and in many things differ from one another: and some things are alleged by ancient writers out of St. Basil's genuine liturgy, which a learned man¹⁴⁷ assures us are not to be found at present in any of these. As that prayer which is cited by Petrus Diaconus, who lived about the year 520, in whose time St. Basil's liturgy was used almost all the East over. For he says,¹⁴⁸ Among other things, they then prayed thus, according to St. Basil's liturgy: Grant us, Lord, thy defence and protection; we beseech thee, make the evil to become good, and keep those that are good in their goodness. For all things are possible unto thee, and no one can contradict thee: when thou pleasest, thou canst save, and there is no one that can resist thy will. Some fancy these words are to be found in the present copies, but whether that be so or not, we may be pretty well assured they were in the original liturgy of St. Basil, whence the author cites them. And that is an argument that St. Basil composed a liturgy, which was then of general use in the East, and known to the Africans also. Proclus, bishop of Constantinople, was within half an age of St. Basil's time, and he gives this account of his composing a liturgy: St. Basil, seeing men's sloth and degeneracy made them weary of a long liturgy, thought there was nothing unnecessary or tedious in that of St. James, which was used before; yet to prevent the weariness of priests and people, he delivered a shorter form.¹⁴⁹ And it is also cited under St. Basil's name by Leontius¹⁵⁰ and the council of Trullo.¹⁵¹ So that though many things be inserted into the present copies of St. Basil's liturgy, and others wanting in them; yet these are no arguments against the original composition, of which there is such clear evidence in the ancient writers.

But St. Basil not only composed a form for the communion service, but often speaks of other forms as generally used upon other occasions. In his sixty-third epistle he gives a large account of the people's joining in alternate psalmody and prayers, and of their repeating the psalm of confession, that is, the fifty-first psalm, at morning prayer. And he there also speaks of the liturgy of Gregory Thaumaturgus with approbation, and of the litanies which the church of Neocæsarea had admitted since the time of Gregory. In his two hundred and forty-first epistle he mentions several particulars of the usual prayer for the whole state of the church, telling his friend whom he writes to, that he must needs remember them in the deacon's bidding prayer, for all that were gone to travel; for the soldiers; for all that profess the name of Christ, &c. Which, as I shall show hereafter,¹⁵² were the usual forms of supplication in the prayers for all states of men in the church. In his sixty-eighth epistle he mentions other forms, which were as evidently parts of the ancient liturgies: We pray that the rest of our days may continue in peace; we desire that our death may also be in peace. We have heard him before¹⁵³ speak of the hymns of Athenogenes, and the evening hymn to the holy Trinity. And we shall hear him hereafter speaking¹⁵⁴ of particular psalms appointed for particular hours of canonical prayer. All which are such manifest indications of the use of stated forms, as nothing but prejudice can incline a man to except against them.

Gregory Nazianzen was St. Basil's dear friend, and of him it were enough to say, that he commends his friend for making forms of prayer for the use of the church, as we have heard already. But he also says, his own father¹⁵⁵ consecrated the eucharist with the solemn words that were wont to be used upon that occasion. And speaking of Julian the apostate, he says, He admired the church for her forms¹⁵⁶ of worship, which were anciently delivered and still preserved among them: and therefore he intended that his heathen priests should imitate the Christians, and have a form of prayers¹⁵⁷ in parts, that is, prayers so composed as that the people might make their responses. Which is also taken notice of by Sozomen, who says, That Julian, admiring the order of Christian worship, appointed that the heathen temples should be adorned after the same manner, with prescribed prayers¹⁵⁸ upon set days and hours. Nazianzen also mentions the usual form of renouncing the devil in baptism, and the solemn covenant or compact made with Christ, which he says¹⁵⁹ they did, καὶ τοῖς σχήμασι καὶ τοῖς ῥήμασι, both by words and gestures; that is, renouncing the devil ¹⁴⁷ Cave, Hist. Liter. vol. 1. p. 194.

¹⁴⁸ Petr. Diacon. de Incarnat. inter Fulgentii Opera, cap. 8. p. 633. Basilius Cæsariensis in oratione sacri altaris, quam pene universus frequentat Oriens, inter cætera, Dona, inquit, Domine, virtutem ac tutamentum; malos, quæsumus, bonos facito; bonos in bonitate conserva; omnia enim potes, et non est qui contradicat tibi; cum enim voleris, salvas, et nullus resistit voluntati tuæ.

¹⁴⁹ Proclus de Tradit. Divin. Liturg. cited by Comber, of Liturgies, p. 168.

¹⁵⁰ Leont. cont. Nestor. lib. 3. Bibl. Patr. t. 4. part 2. p. 1006.

¹⁵¹ Conc. Trull. can. 32.

¹⁵² Book XV. chap. 1. sect. 3.

¹⁵³ Book XIII. chap. ii.

¹⁵⁴ Basil. Regul. Majores, quæst. 37.

¹⁵⁵ Naz. Orat. 19. p. 305. Εἶτα ἐπειπὼν τὰ τῆς εὐχαριστίας ῥήματα οὕτως, ὡς συνηθές, &c.

¹⁵⁶ Ibid. Orat. 3. p. 101. Τοῖς παραδεδομένοις καὶ εἰς τὸδε τετηρημένοις τύποις τῆς ἐκκλησίας.

¹⁵⁷ Ibid. p. 102. Εὐχῶν τύπον ἐν μέρει.

¹⁵⁸ Sozom. lib. 5. cap. 16. Ὁρῶν τε ῥητῶν καὶ ἡμερῶν τεταγμέναις εὐχαῖς, &c.

¹⁵⁹ Naz. Orat. 40. de Bapt. p. 671.

with their faces to the west, and then turning about to the east, by which they signified their turning to Christ the Sun of righteousness. Both which words and gestures were evidently matter of form and ecclesiastical prescription. As was also the form of professing their faith, the triple immersion, and many other such rites and observances, which we meet with in Nazianzen, and all other ecclesiastical writers almost, that have any occasion to speak of the ancient manner of administering baptism.

There is one author more which was famous about this time, before the death of Athanasius, which was Ephrem, deacon of Edessa, commonly called the prophet of the Syrians. Theodoret¹⁶⁰ says, That he composed a great many hymns, in opposition to those that had been formerly made by Harmonius, the son of Bardesanes the heretic, and that they were used upon the festivals of the martyrs. Sozomen¹⁶¹ mentions his Divine hymns also, as well as those that were made upon the martyrs. And these, no doubt, were some of those famous writings of his, which St. Jerom¹⁶² says were used to be rehearsed in the church after the reading of the Scriptures.

Here it will not be improper also to observe, that the practice of heretics in endeavouring to corrupt and alter the ancient forms of the church, is often a manifest evidence and testimony of the antiquity of them. Thus Theodoret takes notice¹⁶³ that, in the beginning of this century, Arius, transgressing the ancient laws of giving glory to God, which had been handed down by those who lived and served in the ministry of the word from the beginning, introduced a new form, teaching those whom he deceived, to say, Glory be to the Father, by the Son, in the Holy Ghost: and that though he did not presume to alter the form of baptizing in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, yet he forbade to use the glorification according to the rule of baptism. Does not this prove, that the form of this doxology was long before Arius, since he presumed to introduce a new one? So again, when the same Theodoret¹⁶⁴ tells us, That Eunomius subverted the ancient law of baptism, delivered by Christ and his apostles, and brought in a contrary law, that men should not be baptized with a triple immersion, nor by invocation of the Trinity, but only by a single immersion in the name of Christ; does not this innovation as plainly prove, that the rite of trine immersion was the ancient form and custom of the church? as Tertullian,¹⁶⁵ and all that speak of it before Eunomius, have constantly asserted. So that whether we consider the testimonies of the catholics, or the practices and innovations made by heretics, they both concur to prove, that within this period of time, viz. during the life of Athanasius, the church made use of forms in every considerable part of Divine service, baptism, psalmody, and the most solemn worship at the Lord's table. And so she did also in her funeral rites, where nothing is more common than to hear of psalmody in their solemn processions to any interment, as may be seen in the writings of Gregory Nazianzen,¹⁶⁶ and the Constitutions,¹⁶⁷ to mention no other at present, that come not within the prefixed term of the life of Athanasius.

It was not above three years after the death of Athanasius, that St. Ambrose was made bishop of Milan, anno 374. He was a zealous defender of the catholic faith against the Arians, in opposition to whom he composed several hymns in Latin to the glory of the holy Trinity, for the people to sing in the church. Of which he himself gives this account in his tract against Auxentius: They accuse me, says he, for deceiving¹⁶⁸ and alluring the people with the poetry of my hymns. And I do not altogether deny the charge. For what can be more powerful and alluring than the confession of the Trinity, which is daily sung by the mouth of all the people? They all zealously strive to make profession of the faith; they all know how to celebrate the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost in verse. These hymns are mentioned also by Prosper in his Chronicon,¹⁶⁹ as the first that were sung in the church in Latin measures. St. Austin frequently speaks of them, and says,¹⁷⁰ They were sung as then the psalms were, in the alternate way, verse for verse, by the people, to alleviate the tediousness of their sorrow: and from this example the custom of alternate hymnody and psalmody spread almost all over the Western churches. One of these is particularly cited¹⁷¹ by him, as an evening hymn, and others are among ¹⁶⁰ Theod. lib. 4. cap. 29. ¹⁶¹ Sozom. lib. 3. cap. 16.

¹⁶² Hieron. de Scriptor. cap. 115. Ad tantam venit claritatem, ut post lectionem Scripturarum publice in quibusdam ecclesiis ejus scripta recitentur.

¹⁶³ Theod. Hæret. Fabul. lib. 4. cap. 1.

¹⁶⁴ Theod. ibid. cap. 3.

¹⁶⁵ Tertul. cont. Prax. cap. 26. It. de Coron. Mil. cap. 3. Vid. Con. Apostol. 49.

¹⁶⁶ Naz. Orat. 4. in Julian. p. 118.

¹⁶⁷ Vid. Constit. Apost. lib. 6. cap. 30.

¹⁶⁸ Ambr. Orat. cont. Auxent. ad calcem Epist. 32. Hymnorum quoque meorum carminibus deceptum populum ferunt. Plane ne hoc abnuo. Grande carmen istud est, quo nihil potentius. Quid enim potentius quam confessio Trinitatis, quæ quotidie totius populi ore celebratur? Certatim omnes student fidem fateri; Patrem et Filium et Spiritum Sanctum norunt versibus predicare.

¹⁶⁹ Prosper. Chronic. an. 336. ap. Pagi Critic. in Baron. an. 387. n. 7. Hymni Ambrosii compositi, qui nunquam ante in ecclesiis Latinis modulibus canebantur.

¹⁷⁰ Aug. Confess. lib. 9. cap. 7. Tunc hymni et psalmi ut canerentur secundum morem Orientalium partium, ne populus mæroris tædio contabesceret, institutum est; et ex illo in hodiernum retentum, multis jam ac pene omnibus gregibus tuis et per cætera orbis imitantibus.

¹⁷¹ Ibid. cap. 12. Recordatus sum veridicos versus Am-his works: and these we are sure in the following ages continued in use; for the¹⁷² hymns of St. Ambrose and St. Hilary are mentioned by the fourth council of Toledo, anno 633, as parts of the daily service in the Spanish churches. St. Ambrose himself also speaks of the use of that ancient hymn called the Trisagion, telling us, that in most of the Eastern and Western churches,¹⁷³ when the sacrifice was offered to God, the priest and people with one voice said, "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of hosts, all the earth is full of thy glory." He mentions also the common form of salutation, "The peace of God be with you."¹⁷⁴ He says the music spoken of in the parable of the prodigal son, Luke xv., means the whole church singing together the psalms alternately,¹⁷⁵ men, women, and children, with different voices, but all conspiring, as the strings of an instrument, in one harmonious concord. And this was the symphony which the apostle had reference to, when he said, "I will sing with the Spirit, and I will sing with the understanding also." His books De Sacramentis, if we allow them to be his, are so full of forms and ceremonies relating to the administration of baptism, confirmation, and the eucharist, that a man cannot look into them, but he must conclude, he wrote his accounts of these things from the known and settled forms of the church. For which reason I think it needless to recite any of them; but they that please may see them related in Dr. Comber.¹⁷⁶ If any one should except against these books, as none of St. Ambrose's genuine offspring, it is sufficient to have evidenced the use of forms from his undoubted writings. St. Jerom testifies concerning the use of the psalms, as forms of prayer and praises, that they were used both publicly and privately upon all occasions. In the Egyptian monasteries, he says,¹⁷⁷ the singing of the psalms was a principal part of their devotions at every solemn meeting. He directs *Rusticus*¹⁷⁸ to learn the Psalter by heart, and to repeat the psalm in his turn, as the monks were obliged to do one by one in their assemblies. He says of himself,¹⁷⁹ that he thus learned the psalms by heart, when he was young, and sung them when he was old every day. He directs Læta, a noble lady, so to accustom her daughter to the singing of psalms and hymns at all the canonical hours of prayer,¹⁸⁰ and teach her this by her own example. And after the same manner¹⁸¹ he writes to Demetrias, a virgin, to observe the order of psalmody and prayers at every such stated hour. There may be some dispute about the observation of canonical hours seven times a day in the public service of the church, but there is none about the use of psalmody in general; for St. Jerom, writing to Sabinianus,¹⁸² a deacon, who had been guilty of some indecent behaviour toward a consecrated virgin, reminds him of the immodest signs he had made to her even whilst he stood in the quire of the singers. And a little before¹⁸³ he speaks of the whole church sounding forth hymns to Christ their Lord in her nocturnal vigils, a great part of which, as we shall see hereafter, was always spent in psalmody. This was always a part of their funeral service: for, speaking of the great concourse of bishops and people at the funeral of the Lady Paula, he says,¹⁸⁴ Some of the bishops led up the quire of singers, and the people sounded forth the psalms in order, some in Greek, some in Latin, some in Syriac, according to the different language of every nation. He says the same in his Epitaph of Fabiola,¹⁸⁵ That the people made the gilded roof of the temple shake and echo again with their psalms and hallelujahs. It is also observable, that in St. Jerom's time, and long before, the church had a peculiar order among her clergy, called singers, which he himself mentions,¹⁸⁶ and of which I have given a more particular account¹⁸⁷ in a former Book. He also frequently speaks¹⁸⁸ of the clergy brosii: Deus Creator omnium, polique rector, vestiens diem decoro lumine, noctem soporis gratia: artus solutos ut quies reddat laboris usui, mentesque fessas allevet, luctusque solvat anxios. Vid. Retractionum. lib. 1. cap. 21.

¹⁷² Conc. Tolet. 4. can. 12.

¹⁷³ Ambros. de Spir. Sancto, cited by Comber, of Liturgies, p. 183.

¹⁷⁴ Ibid. de Dignit. Sacerd. cap. 5. Pronunciat episcopus hujusmodi ad populum, dicens, Pax vobis, &c.

¹⁷⁵ Ibid. lib. 7. in Luc. xv. t. 5. p. 125. Hæc est symphonia quando concinit in ecclesia diversarum ætatum atque virtutum, velut variarum chordarum indiscreta concordia, psalmus respondetur; Amen dicitur. Hæc est symphonia, quam scivit et Paulus; ideo ait, Psallam spiritu, psallam et mente.

¹⁷⁶ Comber, Origin of Liturg. p. 182.

¹⁷⁷ Hieron. Ep. 22. ad Eustoch. cap. 15. Post horam nam in commune concurrunt, Psalmi resonant, scripturæ recitantur ex more, &c. Vid. Ep. 27. cap. 10.

¹⁷⁸ Ep. 4. ad Rustic. Monach. Discatur Psalterium ad verbum.—Dicas psalmum in ordine tuo.

¹⁷⁹ Invect. 2. cont. Ruffin. c. 7. Psalmos jugiter canto. &c.

¹⁸⁰ Epist. 7. ad Lætiam. Assuescat exemplo ad orationes et psalmos nocte consurgere, manè hymnos canere, tertia, sexta, nona, &c.

¹⁸¹ Ep. 8. ad Demetr. Considerans propter psalmodum et orationis ordinem, quod tibi hora tertia, sexta, nona, ad vesperum, media nocte et mane semper est exercendum.

¹⁸² Ep. 48. cont. Sabinian. Stabas deinceps in choro psallentium, et impudicis nutibus loquebaris.

¹⁸³ Ibid. Tota ecclesia nocturnis vigiliis Christum Dominum personabat, &c.

¹⁸⁴ Hieron. Ep. 27. Epitaph. Paulæ. Alii choros psallentium ducunt in media ecclesia.—Græco, Latino, Syroque sermone psalmi in ordine personabant.

¹⁸⁵ Ibid. Ep. 30. Epitaph. Fabiolæ. Sonabant psalmi, et aurata tecta templorum reboans in sublime quatiebat Alleluia.

¹⁸⁶ Ibid. Com. in Ephes. v. 19. Audiant hæc adolescentuli: audiant hi, quibus psallendi in ecclesia officium est, &c.

¹⁸⁷ Book III. chap. 7.

¹⁸⁸ Hieron. Ep. 3. ad Heliodor. Ep. ad Præsidium. Com. in Ezech. c. xliv. lib. 2. cont. Pelag.

as ministering in a peculiar habit, a white garment, in imitation of the angels, of which more will be said hereafter. At present I only observe, that this could not be done without some rule or order, prescribing the ceremonies of decency in Divine worship. He does not say much of the other parts of the liturgy, yet he frequently mentions the form of renunciation used in baptism, and the use of the creed,¹⁸⁹ as does also Pelagius, in his Comments upon the Epistles of St. Paul, under the name of St. Jerom,¹⁹⁰ and Hilary the Roman deacon, under the name of St. Ambrose,¹⁹¹ whose authorities are good in this case, because they were contemporaries with these writers. He mentions also the use of the Lord's prayer in the communion office, as given by Christ to his apostles, from whom the church¹⁹² learned to use it every day in the sacrifice of his body. He speaks likewise of the Trisagion, or cherubical hymn, "Holy, holy, holy,¹⁸⁹ Lord God of sabaoth," which they sung as a confession of the holy Trinity. And he mentions a part of one of the church's prayers,¹⁹⁴ which was, Lord, grant us thy peace, for thou hast given us all things. And again,¹⁹⁵ Thus saith the church, In rest and in tribulation I have been mindful of thee: commenting on that psalm, which the ancients called their morning psalm, "My God, my God, early will I seek thee." And on another psalm,¹⁹⁶ the church says, "From the remembrance of our former sins, our hearts are hot within us." Speaking also of wicked priests, he says,¹⁹⁷ They act impiously against Christ, whilst they think that a good life is not as necessary to the eucharist, as the solemn prayer or words of the priest. Where he seems plainly to reflect on those, who trusted to the bare form of prayer without moral qualifications. He also mentions the solemn rite of giving each other the kiss of peace in the eucharist,¹⁹⁸ and the people's known custom of answering, Amen, at the reception of it. All which are plain indications of the use of certain forms in Divine worship; though St. Jerom only mentions them incidentally, and had no occasion to enlarge much upon them.

St. Austin and St. Chrysostom, as they are more voluminous-writers, so they are more copious and exact upon this subject. I have given the reader a specimen of what may be collected of the Eastern liturgy out of the writings of St. Chrysostom in the following chapter. And some learned men are of opinion, that if any one will be as curious in examining St. Austin's works, he may find the whole African liturgy in his writings. I will not pretend to be so exact in this collection, but only make some short references to what he says upon some parts of it. He divides the whole liturgy, or service of the church, into five parts,¹⁹⁹ viz. psalmody, reading of the Scriptures, preaching, prayers of the bishop, and the bidding prayers of the deacon. All which, except preaching, were done by certain forms and prescriptions. And, first, For psalmody, he says, it was the exercise of the people at all times, when no other part of the service was performing. For there was no time, he says, unseasonable for the people to sing holy psalms and hymns in the church, except when either the Scriptures were read, or the sermon was preached, or prayers were made by the bishop, or the common prayers were dictated by the voice of the deacon. We have heard him before speak with approbation of the ways of singing psalms and hymns introduced by Athanasius and St. Ambrose.²⁰⁰ Which argues, not only that he allowed the singing of psalms and hymns, that is, forms of prayer and praises, in general; but also that he liked the several ways of singing then in use, the plain song, and the symphoniacal concert at the conclusion of every verse, used by Athanasius, and the new alternate way introduced by St. Ambrose. Though he intimates that the plain way generally was more agreeable to the slow genius²⁰¹ of the African people, whose singing he vindicates from the scurrilous objections which the Donatists made against their practice. And he wrote a book particularly against one Hilarius, a secular tribune, who pretended to quarrel with the custom of the church of Carthage, for singing hymns²⁰² out of the ¹⁸⁹ Hieron. Com. in Amos vi. 14. et in Mat. v. 26. et Dial. cont. Lucifer.

¹⁹⁰ Pelag. Com. in 1 Tim. vi. 12.

¹⁹¹ Ambros. in 1 Tim. vi. 12.

¹⁹² Hieron. cont. Pelag. lib. 3. cap. 5. Sicut docuit apostolos suos, ut quotidie in corporis illius sacrificio credentes audeant loqui, Pater noster qui es in cœlis, &c.

¹⁹³ Ibid. de 42. Mansionibus, in initio. In confessionem sanctæ Trinitatis erumpimus, dicentes, Sanctus, sanctus, sanctus, Dominus Deus sabaoth.

¹⁹⁴ Ibid. Epist. 4. ad Rusticum. Utinam audiat vox ecclesiæ implorantis, Domine, pacem tuam da nobis: omnia enim dedisti nobis.

¹⁹⁵ Ibid. Com. in Psal. lxii. Dicit hæc ecclesia, Et in requie et in tribulatione non fui tui oblitus.

¹⁹⁶ In Psal. xxxviii. Concealuit cor meum intra me. Dicit ecclesia, A recordatione delictorum priorum.

¹⁹⁷ In Zephan. iii. Impie agunt in legem Christi, putantes εὐχαριστίαν imprecantis facere verba, non vitam; et necessariam esse tantum solennem orationem, et non sacerdotium merita.

¹⁹⁹ Hieron. Ep. 62. ad Theophil. cap. 1. Quisquamne inter sacras epulas, Judæ osculum porrigit?—Qua conscientia ad eucharistiam Christi accedam, et respondebo Amen, cum de charitate dubitem porrigentis?

¹⁹⁹ Aug. Epist. 119. ad Januar. cap. 18.

²⁰⁰ Ibid. Confes. lib. 9. cap. 7 et 12. lib. 10. cap. 33.

²⁰¹ Ibid. Ep. 119. ad Paulin. cap. 19. Donatistæ nos reprehendunt quod sobrie psallimus in ecclesia divina cantica prophetarum, &c.

²⁰² Ibid. Retractat. lib. 2. cap. 11. Hilarius quidam, vir tribunitius laicus—morem qui tunc esse apud Carthaginem cæperat, ut hymni ad altare dicerentur de psalorum libro, sive ante oblationem, sive cum distribueretur populo quod esset oblatum, maledica reprehensione, ubicunque poterat, lacerabat, &c.

Book of Psalms at the altar, either before the oblation of the eucharist was made, or whilst it was distributed to the people. This book of St. Austin's is now lost, but he mentions it in his Retractions. He also speaks²⁰³ of the evening hymns: and of the singing of the hallelujah²⁰⁴ in some churches every day, and in others, only the fifty days between Easter and Pentecost. And Possidius tells us in his Life,²⁰⁵ That in the great irruption of the Vandals into Africa, a little before his death, nothing grieved him more than to see the hymns and praises of God destroyed out of the churches, and the solemnities of God's worship, with the sacrifice and sacraments, to fail in the places where they were used to be celebrated. And he adds,²⁰⁶ That in his last sickness, he ordered some of the penitential Psalms of David to be written for him in large sheets, and hanged up against the wall, which he read and used as forms proper for penitential devotion. All which shows, that St. Austin thought the Psalms of David were not unlawful to be used as forms of prayers and praises in the service of God.

Secondly, For the reading of the Scriptures, he acquaints us in many places, that this was done by a certain rule and calendar, appointing proper lessons for particular occasions and seasons. There were some festival days, he says,²⁰⁷ on which they were bound to read certain appropriated lessons out of the Gospel, which were so fixed to those anniversary solemnities, that no other lessons might be read in their room. Thus, he says, in Easter week, they constantly read²⁰⁸ four days, one after another, the history of Christ's resurrection out of the four Gospels; on the first day St. Matthew, on the second St. Mark, on the third St. Luke, and on the fourth St. John. So likewise on the day of Christ's passion, he says, they read the history of his sufferings²⁰⁹ out of St. Matthew only, because it was all but one day: and when he would have had all the four Gospels read at that time also, the people were disturbed at it, because they had not been accustomed to it. In the time between Easter and Pentecost, he says,²¹⁰ they always read the Acts of the Apostles. St. Chrysostom will give us the reason of this hereafter: and we shall see that this was a universal custom, obtaining throughout the whole church, when we come to consider this rule more fully exemplified²¹¹ in the church's general practice.

Thirdly, For the prayers made by the bishop in the communion office, St. Austin gives us such a description of them, as shows they must needs be made by a certain order and form. For he thus describes one part of them, while he instructs the newly baptized in the method and meaning of them: Ye understand, says he, the sacrament in the order of its administration.²¹² First, after prayer, (meaning the prayer for the whole state of the church, which went before,) ye are taught to lift up your hearts. Therefore when it is said, "Lift up your hearts," ye answer, "We lift them up unto the Lord." The bishop or presbyter who officiates, goes on and says, "Let us give thanks to our Lord God:" and ye give in your attestation, and say, "It is meet and right so to do." Then, after the consecration of the sacrifice, we say the Lord's prayer. And after that, the priest says, "Peace be with you," and Christians salute one another with a holy kiss. Here we have not only the method of the communion service, but the several forms of it in order, one after another. And these forms are frequently mentioned by St. Austin in other places. The Lord's prayer, he says,²¹³ was always used by the whole church almost, as the close of the consecration service, and at other times as the daily prayer of the faithful,²¹⁴ peculiarly belonging to them, and not to the catechumens, as we shall show more fully hereafter.²¹⁵ The form, Sursum corda, "Lift up your hearts," &c., he says,²¹⁶ was used by all Christians throughout the world, who daily answered with one voice, "We lift up our hearts unto the ²⁰³ Aug. de Civ. Dei, lib. 22. cap. 8.

²⁰⁴ Ep. 119. ad Januar. c. 17. Ut autem halleluia per illos solos dies quinquaginta cantetur, non usquequaque observatur. Nam in aliis diebus varie cantatur alibi; ipsis autem diebus ubique.

²⁰⁵ Possid. Vit. Aug. cap. 28. Cernebat etiam hymnos Dei et laudes de ecclesiis deperisse: solennia quoque quæ Deo debentur, de propriis locis defecisse, &c.

²⁰⁶ Possid. ibid. cap. 30. Jusserat sibi Psalmos Davidicos, qui sunt paucissimi, de penitentia scribi, ipsosque quætionibus jacens in lecto contra parietem positos diebus suæ infirmitatis intuebatur et legebat, et jugiter ac ubertim flebat.

²⁰⁷ Aug. Expos. in 1 Joan. in Præfat. t. 9. p. 235. Interposita est solennitas sanctorum dierum, quibus certas ex evangelio lectiones oportet in ecclesia recitari, quæ ita sunt annuæ, ut alia esse non possint.

²⁰⁸ Serm. 139. de Temp. It. 140, 141, 144, 148.

²⁰⁹ Serm. 144. de Temp. p. 320. Passio, quia uno die legitur, non solet legi nisi secundum Mattheum, &c.

²¹⁰ Tract. 6. in Joan. Evang. t. 9. p. 24. Actus Apostolorum, &c. Anniversaria solennitate post passionem Domini nostris illum librum recitari. Vid. Aug. Hom. 227. Nov. Edit. Benedictin. quæ est 83. de Diversis.

²¹¹ Book XIV. chap. 3. sect. 3.

²¹² Aug. Hom. 83. de Diversis, t. 10. p. 556. Tenetis sacramentum ordine suo. Primo post orationem admonemini sursum habere cor, &c. Ideo cum dicitur, Sursum cor, respondetis, Habemus ad Dominum.—Sequitur episcopus vel presbyter, qui offert, et dicit, Gratias agamus Domino Deo nostro: et vos attestamini, Dignum et justum est, dicentes. Deinde post sanctificationem sacrificii dicimus orationem Dominicam. Post istam dicitur, Pax vobiscum: et osculantur se Christiani osculo sancto.

²¹³ Aug. Ep. 59. ad Paulin.

²¹⁴ Ep. 121. ad Probam. Enchirid. ad Laurent. cap. 71. Homil. 42. inter 50.

²¹⁵ Chap. 7. sect. 9.

²¹⁶ Aug. de Vera Relig. cap. 3. Serm. 54 et 64. De Temp. Ep. 156. ad Probam.

Lord," as he speaks in his book of True Religion, and other places. And to this he says the priests added that other form, "Let us give thanks to our Lord God:" to which the people answered, "It is meet and right so to do:" as he speaks in his epistles²¹⁷ to Dardanus and Honoratus, and in his book of the Gift of Perseverance, against the Pelagians, and de Spiritu et Litera, and de Bono Viduitatis; which being all to the same purpose, need not here be repeated. He also mentions in his other writings the solemn form of the priest's saying, "Peace be with you," and the people's giving one another thereupon the kiss of peace, which was a symbol²¹⁸ of that innocency and peace, which ought to be the qualification of true Christian doves. And this rite, he says, was observed not only by the catholics, but by the Donatists also.²¹⁹ So that here is unquestionable evidence for the use of all these forms in the writings of St. Austin. And though he does not give us the whole forms of the longer prayers made by the bishop at the altar, yet he mentions some parts of them, and makes such references and appeals to them both in his discourses to the orthodox, and confutations of heretics, as plainly shows they were common forms which they were well acquainted with, and by remembering them might understand the doctrine of the church. Thus, in his book of Perseverance,²²⁰ he says, Those of the church need not any operose disputations to convince them of the necessity of God's grace to persevere; they need only remember her daily prayers, how she prays, that infidels may believe, and that believers may persevere. And again,²²¹ he tells them, it is the safest way for weak men, in this dispute, to look upon these prayers, which the church always had, and always will have to the end of the world. For when did not the church pray for infidels and her enemies, that they might believe? Or, who ever, when he heard the priest praying over the faithful, and saying, Grant, O Lord, that they may persevere in thee unto the end, durst either in word or thought find fault with him, and not rather, with faith in his heart, and confession in his mouth, answer Amen to such a benediction? when the faithful pray no otherwise in the Lord's prayer, especially when they say, "Lead us not into temptation." By all which it appears, that both the larger and the shorter prayers in the communion office of the African church, in St. Austin's time, were offered up in such forms, as the people could easily remember, when he referred to them as evidence in some disputes, which this was an easy way to determine.

Fourthly, There was one sort of prayers more, which St. Austin distinguishes from the former, by the name of the common prayers dictated or indited to the people by the voice of the deacon. Now, these prayers, as I shall show more fully hereafter,²²² differed from the bishop's prayer in this, That the bishop's prayer was a direct and continued invocation of God, to which the people answered only Amen in the conclusion; but the deacon's prayer was a sort of bidding prayer, or direction to the people what particulars they were to pray for; the deacon going before them, and repeating every petition, to which they made answer, Lord, hear us, or, Lord, help us, or, Lord, have mercy, or the like. And this sort of prayer St. Austin expressly²²³ calls communis oratio voce diaconi indicta, common prayer dictated by the voice of the deacon. And he seems in one of his epistles²²⁴ to specify some of the particular petitions contained in that prayer. For, writing to one who was infected with the Pelagian doctrine, (maintaining that infidels were only to be preached to, and not prayed for, because faith was not the work of God's grace, but the effect of man's own free will,) he urges him with the known prayers of the church, which the man himself frequented. Exercise, says he, your disputations against the prayers of the church; and when you hear the priest of God at the altar exhorting the people of God to pray for unbelievers, that they may be converted to the faith; and for catechumens, that God would inspire them with a desire of regeneration; and for the faithful, that by his gift they may persevere in that wherein they have begun: mock at these pious words, and say, you do not do what you here are exhorted to do. And again, When you hear²²⁵ the priest of God at the altar exhorting the people to pray to God, or else hear him praying with an audible voice, that God would compel the unbelieving Gentiles to come in to his faith, do you not answer and say, Amen? These seem to be usual parts of the prayer for the whole ²¹⁷ Ep. 57. ad Dardanum, et Ep. 120. ad Honoratum. De Bono Persever. cap. 13. De Spiritu et Litera, lib. 1. c. 11. De Bono Viduitatis, cap. 16.

²¹⁸ Aug. Hom. 6. in Joan. t. 9. p. 21. Habere cum fratribus veram pacem, quam significant oscula columbarum, &c.

²¹⁹ Cont. Literas Petilian. lib. 2. cap. 23. Illum commemoro, (Optatum Gildonianum,) cui pacis osculum inter sacramenta copulabatur.

²²⁰ De Bono Perseverantiae, cap. 7. In hac re non operosas disputationes expectet ecclesia, sed attendat quotidianas orationes suas. Orat. ut credentes perseverent.

²²¹ Ibid. cap. 23. Ut magis intueatur orationes suas, quas semper habuit et habebit ecclesia.—Quando enim non oratum est in ecclesia pro infidelibus atque inimicis ejus, ut crederent?—Aut quis sacerdotem super fideles Dominum invocantem, si quando dixit, Da illis Domine in te perseverare usque in finem, non solum voce ausus est, sed saltem cogitatione reprehendere; ac non potius super ejus talem benedictionem, et corde credente et ore confitente respondit Amen: cum aliud in ipsa oratione Dominica non orant fideles, &c.

²²² Book XV. chap. 1. sect. 2.

²²³ Aug. Ep. 119. ad Paulin. cap. 18.

²²⁴ Ep. 107. ad Vitalem, p. 187.

²²⁵ Ibid. p. 191.

state of the world, in which infidels were prayed for as well as others, to which St. Austin refers, as things well known to all that frequented the prayers of the church.

Besides these, there were some occasional offices, such as the offices of exorcism, and the institution of the catechumens, and baptism, in which many forms, and rites, and ceremonies were observed, agreeable to the practice then obtaining in the church; but of these I have had occasion to speak largely out of St. Austin and other writers in a former Book,²²⁶ and therefore think it needless to repeat them in this place. All I shall further add, is two or three canons of the African councils held in St. Austin's time, at some of which he was present and assisted. He was a member of the third council of Carthage, in one of whose canons there are several orders and directions given concerning the public prayers,²²⁷ That no one in prayers should name the Father for the Son, or the Son for the Father. And when they stood at the altar, all prayers should be directed to the Father. And whatever prayers any one wrote out for himself, or from other books, he should not use them before they were examined by his more learned brethren. This is as plain an argument for set forms as can be given, and yet some, I know not by what means, make it an argument against them. The design of the canon was plainly to prevent all irregularities and corruptions creeping into the devotions of the church; and therefore the fathers made an order, That no bishop should use any prayers in his church but such as were first examined and approved by his fellow bishops in a council. As another canon in the African Code explains it,²²⁸ That such prayers should be used by all, as had been authorized and confirmed in synod, whether they were prefaces, or commendations, or impositions of hands; and that no other should be brought in against the faith, but those only be said which were collected or examined by men of greater abilities and understanding. And this is repeated again in the council of Milevis²²⁹ almost in the same words. These African fathers probably had observed, that there were some country bishops who had not sufficient abilities to compose orthodox forms for the use of their own churches; and therefore they a little restrained the ancient liberty which every bishop had of composing a form of prayer for his own church, and obliged them to use such as were composed by men of greater abilities, or such as had been approved in synod, that no heretical opinion might creep into the public worship, either by their ignorance or want of care in their compositions. By all this it appears, that the public devotions of the African church were at this time directed by certain forms of worship, and those not left to every bishop to compose for himself, but he must use such prayers as were first approved by his brethren, or established and confirmed in council. And this seems to be the first beginning of that custom, which afterward prevailed all over the church, as has been observed before in this chapter,²³⁰ that all provincial bishops should use the same form of prayer that was established in the churches of their metropolitans.

I need not now insist upon these same councils, speaking of the solemn interrogatories²³¹ and answers to be made in baptism; nor of their mentioning the Lord's prayer, as a form of so necessary and general a use,²³² that the Pelagians themselves, who did not like one petition in it unless interpreted to a very perverse sense, durst not presume to lay aside the use of it. For, as the first of these is a known practice, so the second will have a more particular handling, when we come to consider the use of the Lord's prayer in a chapter by itself. And so I put an end to this chapter, concerning the use of liturgies in the ancient church.

CHAPTER VI.

AN EXTRACT OF THE ANCIENT LITURGY OUT OF THE GENUINE WRITINGS OF ST. CHRYSOSTOM.

It has often been wished by learned men, that some one would represent the ancient liturgy, in its several parts and offices, as it may be collected out of the genuine and undoubted writings of St. Chrysostom; forasmuch as that liturgy which goes under his name, cannot be so certainly depended on as his genuine offspring: but there are a great many parts of ancient liturgy of unquestionable credit, which may be

Sect. 1.
Parts of the liturgy in the first tome.

²²⁶ Books IX. and X.

²²⁷ Conc. Carthag. 3. can. 23. Ut nemo in precibus vel Patrem pro Filio, vel Filium pro Patre nominet. Et cum ad altare assistitur, semper ad Patrem dirigatur oratio. Et quicumque sibi preces aliunde describit, (al. quascunque sibi preces aliquis describit) non eis utatur, prius quam eas cum instructoribus fratribus contulerit.

²²⁸ Cod. Afric. can. 3. "Ὡστε τὰς κεκυρωμένας ἐν τῇ συνόδῳ ἰκεσίας, εἴτε προοίμια, εἴτε παραθέσεις, εἴτε τὰς τῆς χειρὸς ἐπιθέσεις, ἀπὸ πάντων ἐπιτελεῖσθαι, καὶ παντελῶς ἄλλας κατὰ τῆς πίστεως μηδέποτε προνεχθῆναι.

ἀλλ' αἵτινες δῆποτε ἀπὸ τῶν συνετατέρων συνήχθησαν, λεχθήσονται.

²²⁹ Conc. Milevit. can. 12. Placuit etiam illud, ut preces vel orationes seu missæ, quæ probatæ fuerint in synodo, sive præfationes, sive commendationes, sive manus impositiones, ab omnibus celebrentur. Nec aliæ omnino dicantur in ecclesia, nisi quæ a prudentioribus tractatæ, vel comprobatæ in synodo fuerint, ne forte aliquid contra fidem, vel per ignorantiam, vel per minus studium sit compositum.

²³⁰ See before in this chap. sect. 2.

²³¹ Conc. Carthag. 3. can. 34. ²³² Conc. Milevit. can. 8.

gathered up out of his other discourses. Mr. Hales of Eton, a diligent reader of Chrysostom, is said to have designed such a collection, but he did not effect it. Therefore, till some one else pursues his design more completely, I think it not improper, for its relation to the present subject, to give the reader, in one view, a specimen of such passages as plainly refer to the several parts of the ancient liturgy, observing the order of St. Chrysostom's works according to the Paris edition, 1609, and that of Commelin, 1617.

In the first tome, Hom. I. p. 1, he plainly intimates, that the Scriptures were read then in some order by a stated rule of the church, because his sermon that day was upon a passage that had been read in the course of morning service, 1 Tim. v. 23, "Drink no longer water, but use a little wine." In his second homily, p. 32, he says again his text was taken out of the Epistle then read for the day, which was 2 Tim. vi. 17, "Charge them that are rich in this world, that they be not high minded." In his third homily, p. 45, he says, The Lord's prayer was by appointment of the church the peculiar privilege of those only who were baptized. For before their initiation in the holy mysteries, they were not allowed to use it. In his seventh homily, p. 106, he observes, That the Book of Genesis was always appointed to be read in Lent: and, accordingly, it was then read for the day, and he preached upon the first words of it, "In the beginning God created heaven and earth." In his fifteenth homily, p. 191, he says, The whole city met together, and with one common voice, τῆ μὲν κοινῇ φωνῇ, made their litany, or supplications to God. And in the same discourse he intimates, that a portion of the prophet Zechariah, chap. v., concerning the flying roll against swearers, had then been read for the day, which he accommodated to the subject of vain oaths, against which he was then discoursing. In his eighteenth homily, p. 226, he says, He preached upon the Epistle which had been read that day, Phil. iv. 4, "Rejoice in the Lord always, and again I say, rejoice." And in his sixteenth homily, p. 234, he notes the same, That the words upon which he preached out of the Epistle to Philemon, "Paul, the prisoner of Jesus Christ," &c., had been read that day. In his twenty-first homily, p. 266, he takes notice of the use of the hymn called the Trisagion, or cherubical hymn, "Holy, holy, holy," in the celebration of the eucharist; arguing to his hearers in this manner upon it: What an absurdity is it for a man, after he has heard that mystical song that was brought down from heaven, brought down, I say, by the cherubims, to pollute his ears with the songs of harlots, and the effeminate music of the theatre! In the same homily he twice takes notice of the form of renouncing the devil in baptism, p. 267: We are commanded to say, Ἀποτάσσομαι σοι, Σατανᾷ,

I renounce thee, O Satan, that we may never more return to him. And again, p. 273, Remember, says he, those words which you spake when you were initiated in the holy mysteries, I renounce thee, O Satan, and thy pomp, and thy worship and service. In his twenty-second homily, upon anger and forgiving enemies, he argues for the necessity of pardoning offences, from the necessary obligation that is laid upon all men to say the Lord's prayer. For this reason, says he, p. 287, we are commanded to say, "Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us." And again, p. 288, when you say, "Forgive us, as we forgive:" if you do not forgive, you ask nothing else of God, but that he would deprive you of all excuse and pardon. And whereas some pleaded, that they did not say the whole prayer, but omitted that clause, "as we forgive them that trespass against us," he rebukes them for it, and bids them not be so vainly cautious, as to think they were excused by curtailing the prayer, but advises them to use the whole prayer, as Christ appointed it to be used, that the necessity of this petition might daily terrify them from revenge, and compel them to grant pardon to their neighbours. In his twenty-fourth homily, of the baptism of Christ, p. 317, he again speaks of the cherubical hymn in the communion service. Do you think, says he, that you have any secular business at that hour? Do you then imagine yourself to be upon earth, or conversing among men? Whose heart is so stony, as to think, that at that time he stands upon the earth, and is not rather in a quire of angels, with whom you sing that mystical hymn, with whom you send up that triumphal song to God? In his twenty-eighth homily, (which is the third of the incomprehensible nature of God,) p. 363, he speaks of the common prayer, as sent up with one common voice of the whole congregation, speaking and crying aloud to God with one accord. Some would have excused themselves from these prayers of the church, by this frivolous plea, that they could pray at home, but they could not hear a sermon or discourse of instruction in their own houses; and therefore they would come to sermon, but not to prayers. To whom he makes this reply: You deceive yourself, O man; for though you may pray at home, yet you cannot pray there in that manner as you do in the church, where there are so many fathers together, and where the cry of your prayers is sent up to God with one consent. You are not heard so well, when you pray to God by yourself alone, as when you pray with your brethren. For there is something more here, consent of mind, and consent of voice, and the bond of charity, and the prayers of the priests together. For the priests for this very reason preside in the church, that the people's prayers, which are weaker of themselves, laying hold on those that are stronger, may together with them mount up to heaven. This is a plain description of such common prayers, wherein both priests and people joined not only in heart, but in one common form of words, whereby they cried aloud to God together. A little after, p. 365, he describes these prayers again by the people's sending up their tremendous cry all at once, βοῶσι τὴν φοικωδεσάτην βοήην. And he makes this difference between the manner of the energumens' supplicating God, and that of the people, that the one spake not a word, but only supplicated by the posture of their bodies, bowing down their heads; whilst the people, who were allowed to speak audibly in prayers, spake aloud for those who could not speak for themselves. For this reason, says he, the deacon at the time of the oblation brings forth the energumens, or those that are possessed with evil spirits, and bids them bow their heads only, and signify their supplications by this bodily gesture: for they are not permitted to pray with the common assembly of the brethren: therefore he presents them before the congregation, that you, pitying both their vexation, and their disability to speak for themselves, might, by the freedom and liberty of speech which is allowed you, grant them your patronage and assistance. From this it appears, that these prayers for the energumens were in a certain form, in which all the people vocally joined together. In his twenty-ninth homily, which is the fourth de Incomprehensibili, p. 374, he repeats the same account of the deacon's calling forth the energumens, and bidding them bow their heads, and the people's praying to God ὁμοθυμαδὸν καὶ μετὰ σφοδρᾶς βοῆς, with one consent and with strong cries, that he would show mercy on them. A little after, in the same homily, p. 375, he mentions another form used by the deacon, as the herald of the church, who was appointed to call upon the people every now and then, and excite them to fervency in devotion, by using this form of words, ὀρθοὶ ἑστέμεν καλῶς, Let us elevate our minds, and attend with decency to our devotions. For, as he there explains it, this admonition did not so much respect the body, as the mind. When the deacon, says he, calls upon us, and says, Let us stand elevated with decency, it was not without good reason that this admonition was by the rule of the church appointed, but that we should elevate our thoughts that lie grovelling upon the ground; that, casting away the distraction that arises from secular affairs, we should be able to present our souls upright and raised to a spiritual sense in the presence of God. Let no man therefore, adds he, join in those sacred and mystical hymns with remissness of mind; let no man entertain the thoughts of this life at that time; but driving away all earthly concerns, let him translate himself wholly into heaven, as standing then close by the throne of glory, and flying with the seraphims: and so let him offer up τὸν πανάγιον ὕμνον, that most holy hymn (meaning the Trisagion, or else the hymn called "Glory be to God on high") to the God of majesty and glory. It is upon this account we are called upon at this time, εἰσάναί καλῶς, to compose ourselves decently, as it becomes men who stand in the presence of God, with fear and trembling, with a vigilant and elevated soul. In his thirty-fourth homily, which is the first against the Jews, p. 440, he speaks of another form used by the deacon, and that frequently, before the participation of the holy mysteries: he then cried out, ἐπιγινώσκετε ἀλλήλους, Discern and know one another: which was an admonition to the people, that they should suffer no Jew, infidel, heretic, catechumen, or penitent, to communicate among them. In his fortieth homily, upon the martyrs, Juveninus and Maximus, p. 550, he says, The church kept her vigils all the night with continual psalmody, which was nothing but forms of prayers and praises out of the Holy Scriptures. In the forty-seventh homily, upon Julian the martyr, p. 613, he again mentions the solemn form of renunciation in baptism. You renounced, says he, all this kind of pomp, (harlots, songs, and obscene words used in the theatre,) and made a covenant with Christ, in that day when you were initiated in the holy mysteries. Remember, therefore, those words, and your covenant, and beware you do not transgress it. In his fifty-first homily, upon Bernice, p. 635, he says, They used hymns, and prayers, and psalms at the funerals of Christians; and particularly the words of Psalm cxvi., "Return unto thy rest, O my soul, for the Lord hath dealt bountifully with thee:" implying, that the death of a Christian was a kindness and a rest: "for he that is entered into that rest, hath ceased from his own works, as God did from his." In his fifty-fifth homily, which is the fifth of repentance, p. 672, he plainly intimates, that his discourse was made upon the Epistle that had been read for the day, 2 Cor. xii. 21, "Lest when I come again, I shall bewail many who have sinned, and have not repented." In his sixtieth homily, which is his catechetical instruction to those that were preparing for baptism, he takes notice of several forms and rules made by the church, relating to that matter, p. 797. As, first, the solemn words by which every man entered into covenant with Christ. For, speaking of the danger and ill consequents of deferring baptism to a sick bed, he says, When he that is baptized knows none that are about him, when he cannot hear a word that is spoken, when he cannot utter those words wherewith he should make the blessed covenant with our common Lord, but lies like a stock or a stone, differing nothing from a dead man; what advantage is it to such a one to be initiated in the holy mysteries in such a state of insensibility? This implies, that the party baptized was to make his compact with God in a solemn and usual form of words, which a man at the point of death was not able to utter. After this he goes on to show, that the church had appointed the time of Lent chiefly above other times for exorcism and baptism; and that the catechumens, after they were instructed, were remitted over to the exorcists, to have their exorcisms or prayers said over them; and that during this time they were obliged to walk discalceate, and wear only one coat: which were appointments of the church, he says, established for good reasons, and not without their mystical signification. In his seventy-fourth homily, in which is a panegyric upon the martyrs, p. 900, he speaks again of the Trisagion, or cherubical hymn, as used to be sung in the celebration of the eucharist. The martyrs, says he, are now joining in concert, and partaking in the mystical songs of the heavenly quire: for if, whilst they were in the body, whenever they communicated in the holy mysteries, they made part of that quire, singing with the cherubims the Trisagion hymn, "Holy, holy, holy;" as all ye that are initiated in those mysteries very well understand: much more now, being joined with them whose partners they were in the earthly quire, they do with greater freedom partake in those solemn blessings and glorifications of God in heaven above.

The second tome of St. Chrysostom's works, is his Homilies upon Genesis, which were preached in Lent, when that book was always read in the church, as appears from his first homily, p. 10, and from what has been observed before out of his seventh homily to the people of Antioch, in the foregoing section. In his twenty-seventh homily upon this book, he plainly intimates, that the Lord's prayer was always a part of the communion office. For, speaking of the duty of forgiving enemies, he says, p. 358, If we do this, we may then, with a pure conscience, come to this holy and tremendous table, and boldly say the words that are contained in that prayer. They who are initiated in the holy mysteries know what I mean. He covertly intends that petition of the Lord's prayer, "Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us." In his thirty-third homily, p. 478, he acquaints us, That though the Book of Genesis was by the order of the church read in Lent, yet when they came to the Thursday in the Passion Week, the day on which our Saviour was betrayed, then they had proper lessons for that day, and Good Friday, and Easter day, and all the time between Easter and Pentecost, when it was customary to read the Acts of the Apostles, as a demonstration of our Saviour's resurrection. In his fifty-fourth homily, p. 731, he says, Christ commanded the use of the Lord's prayer, prescribing us therein the bounds and rules of praying for temporal things, whilst he enjoins us to say those words, "Give us this day our daily bread." In his second homily upon the prayer of Hannah, in the same volume, p. 965, he says, When Christ commanded his disciples not to pray after the manner of the heathen, using vain repetitions, he also taught us the measure of prayer, meaning the form which he appointed. He repeats the same in the third homily upon Saul and David, p. 1053. Although, says he, you are guilty of a thousand crimes, yet if you sincerely offer up that prayer, which promises, that if you forgive your enemies, your Father will forgive your trespasses; you shall, with great confidence, obtain the remission of all your sins.

The third tome contains St. Chrysostom's Commentaries and Homilies on the Psalms and the Prophet Isaiah, Sect. 3. Parts of the ancient liturgy in the third tome. where he frequently refers to the known parts of the liturgy then in use in the church. In his Comment upon Psalm cxii., he three times mentions the necessary use of the Lord's prayer, p. 369. As Christ, says he, when he would induce us to unanimity and charity in our prayers, enjoins us to make common prayer, and obliges the whole church, as if it were but one person, to say, "Our Father;" and, "Give us this day our daily bread; and forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us; and lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil;" always using a word of the plural number, and commanding every one, whether he pray alone by himself, or in common with others, still to make prayer for his brethren: so here the prophet David calls all men to a consent in prayer, saying, "Praise the Lord, O ye servants: praise the name of the Lord." Again, p. 370, speaking of glorifying God, he says, Christ hath commanded us to pray for this, saying, whenever we pray, "Hallowed be thy name." And, p. 372, Christ, in his gospel, hath commanded us to pray, and say, "Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven." In like manner, on Psalm cxiv., p. 394, speaking of the life to come, and how we ought to desire it, and make all our actions tend that way, he adds, For this reason we are commanded to say in our prayer, "Thy kingdom come;" that we may always have respect to that day. He repeats the same words on Psalm cxix., p. 425. And on Psalm cxxvii., p. 465, We are commanded to use a prayer, in which there is but one petition relating to this life, "Give us this day our daily bread;" which he repeats again on Psalm cxl., p. 551. On Psalm cxliv., p. 595, he says, We are commanded to say in our prayer, "Hallowed be thy name." And on Psalm cxlix., p. 633, he calls it the prayer which was offered up by all in common, and always in the plural number, "Our Father," &c. On Psalm cl., p. 636, he says, This prayer was peculiar in its use to the sons of God only, who could call God their Father, by virtue

Sect. 2.
Parts of the liturgy
in the second tome of St. Chrysostom's works.

of their regeneration and adoption. Our prayer, says he, is prefaced with this title; for it belongs to them only to say, "Our Father," who can give him thanks for the gifts which they have received, and show forth them all in that name. For he that calls God his Father, confesses the adoption of sons: and he that confesses the adoption of sons, owns and declares both justification, and sanctification, and redemption, and remission of sins, and the gifts of the Holy Spirit. For all these must go before, that we may thereby enjoy the adoption of sons, and be thought worthy to call God our Father. By which reasoning of St. Chrysostom it appears, that he was so far from thinking the Lord's prayer a carnal form, not proper to be used by spiritual men, because it was a form, that, on the contrary, he thought none were truly qualified to use it, but such as were regenerate, and adopted, and endowed with the gifts of the Holy Spirit, who alone had the true title to call God their Father. And this, I shall show in the next chapter, was the general sense of all the ancient writers.

But to return to St. Chrysostom. In his Comment on Psalm cxvii., p. 406, he takes notice, that the people were used in their responses to return one verse of this psalm, which was, "This is the day which the Lord hath made, we will rejoice and be glad in it." This kind of responses he calls ὑπηχέειν, and ὑποψάλλειν, because it was the people's subjoining their response to something that the minister had read before out of the same psalm. And it seems to have been appointed for the service of Easter day, or Christmas day, or the Lord's day, because he adds, The people were wont to make this response chiefly on that spiritual assembly and heavenly festival; plainly referring to some eminent festival then well known to the people. And that this custom was introduced by a law and order of the church, is evident from what follows: for he says, Their forefathers had appointed the people to sing this verse, ὑπηχέειν ἐνομοθέτησαν, both because it was sonorous, and also contained a sublime doctrine, that forasmuch as they knew not the whole psalm, they might from this one verse be perfectly instructed in the mystery of it. This was the wisdom of the ancient church, according to Chrysostom, to teach the people the mysteries of religion, by obliging them to bear a part in the usual service.

In his Comment on Psalm cxxxvii., p. 518, he declares again, That the psalmody was performed partly by the priests, and partly by the people's joining with them: the priests began, and the people answered to them. On Psalm cxl. he notes, p. 544, That this psalm was constantly sung in the order of the daily evening service, whence it had the name of the evening psalm; as the lxii. had the name of the morning psalm, because it was always sung in the morning service. Of which, because I have given a more particular account hereafter,¹ I say no more in this place. On Psalm cxliv., p. 594, he acquaints us, that this psalm was always sung alternately by the priest and people at the Lord's table, chiefly upon the account of these words in it, "The eyes of all wait upon thee, and thou givest them their meat in due season." Of which custom we shall have another occasion to speak further in its proper place. See Book XV. chap. 5. sect. 10.

In his sermon on Psalm cxlv., p. 823, he tells us, That psalm was used to be sung in the Passion Week, "Praise the Lord, O my soul; while I live, will I praise the Lord," &c. In his first sermon on Isaiah, p. 834, he says, The Trisagion, or cherubical hymn, "Holy, holy, holy," was sung by the seraphims in heaven above, and by men on earth beneath. And, p. 836, he takes notice of the angelical doxology, "Glory be to God on high," as used in the church: and the forms, Κύριε, ἐλέησον, and σῶσον, "Lord, have mercy upon us," and, "Lord, save us," as usual prayers and responses of the people: and reproving the people's clamours, and negligence, and indecent gesticulations in the church, he reprimands them in this manner: How dare you mix the devil's sport with this doxology of angels? Why do you not revere the words, which you yourselves use in that place, "Serve the Lord in fear, and rejoice unto him with reverence?" Is this to serve him in fear, when you thus theatrically toss and stretch your bodies, and know not what you say yourselves for your disorderly vociferation? This plainly implies, that the people bare their part, though sometimes without a just decorum, in all these doxologies, prayers, and responses. In his sermon upon the seraphims, which is the sixth upon Isaiah, p. 890, he gives a large account again of the use of the seraphical hymn, "Holy, holy, holy," at the communion table: which, because I shall recite at length hereafter, I only just barely hint it in this place. See Book XV.

In his second homily upon the obscurity of the ancient prophecies, p. 946, in answer to that vulgar plea, that men could pray at home, he replies in such a manner, as shows that the people bare a part with their own tongues in the common prayers of the church. You may pray at home, says he, but your prayer is not of that efficacy and power, as when the whole body of the church, with one mind, and one voice, ὁμοθυμαδὸν μίᾳ φωνῇ, send up their prayers together, the priest assisting, and offering up the prayers of the whole multitude in common. He there also speaks of the deacon's form in bidding prayer for all orders of men in the world, which I shall not recite here, because I have done it more fully in its proper place. Book XV. chap. 1.

¹ See Book XIII. chap. 10. and 11.

The fourth volume of St. Chrysostom's works consists chiefly of private discourses, which have not much relation to the public liturgy of the church: yet some few passages are worthy to be noted among these. In his famous discourse upon Eutropius, p. 554, among other arguments, whereby he presses the people to lay aside their anger against him, and pardon the injury he had done them, he urges this: How will you otherwise, says he, take the holy sacrament into your hands, and use the words of that prayer, wherein we are commanded to say, "Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us," if you exact punishment of your debtor? This shows that the Lord's prayer was used then as a usual part of the communion service. In the third homily of repentance, p. 562, he speaks of the seraphical hymn under the title of μυστικὸν μέλος, the mystical song, because it was used in the celebration of the holy mysteries. And again, in his second epistle to Olympias, p. 715, he mentions it under the same title. And in his sermon after his return from banishment, p. 971, he speaks of the form Ειρήνη πᾶσι, Peace be to you all, as a solemn form used frequently in the church.

The fifth volume of his works affords us many more examples. Here he no less than eight times mentions the Lord's prayer as a form in common use by the commandment of Christ. In his sixth homily, upon Lazarus, p. 107: We are commanded in our prayer to say, "Forgive us our trespasses," that, by the continual use of that prayer, we may be put in mind that we are liable to punishment. In his eighth homily, on our Saviour's prayer, "Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me," p. 134, he says, Christ prayed, to teach his disciples to pray. But they were to learn not only to pray, but after what manner to pray: and therefore he delivered them a prayer in these words, commanding them and us to say, "Our Father which art in heaven," &c. In his tenth homily, p. 154, he says, Christ taught us what we are to say in prayer, and in a few words instructed us in all manner of virtue. In his sixteenth homily, upon those words, "If thine enemy hunger, feed him," p. 237, he urges forgiveness of injuries with this argument, For this reason we are taught to say, "Forgive us, as we forgive," that we may learn, that the measure of forgiveness takes its rise from ourselves. In his thirty-sixth homily, upon Pentecost, p. 552, he says praying by the Lord's prayer is praying by the Spirit: his words are these, If there was no Holy Ghost, we that are believers could not pray to God: for we say, "Our Father which art in heaven." As therefore we could not say, that Jesus was the Lord, so neither could we call God our Father, without the Holy Ghost. How does that appear? From the same apostle, who says, "Because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father." In his thirty-eighth homily, of repentance and the eucharist, p. 570, he thus again argues for forgiving enemies: When we go into the church, let us approach God as becomes his majesty; lest if we have designs of revenge in our hearts when we pray, we pray against ourselves, saying, "Forgive us, as we forgive them that trespass against us." These are terrible words, and the same as if one said to God, Lord, I have forgiven my enemy, forgive thou me; I have loosed him, loose thou me; I have pardoned my enemy, pardon me; if I have retained his sins, retain thou mine; if I have not loosed my neighbour, do not thou loose my offences; what measure I have meted to him, measure to me again. In his fifty-first homily, upon the prayers of Christ, p. 691, he says, Christ taught his disciples to pray both in words and actions; meaning the words of the Lord's prayer, together with his own example. And in the sixty-second homily, upon the paralytic, p. 934, he says, This prayer was the peculiar privilege of the faithful, and not allowed to any unbaptized catechumen: for before we have washed away our sins in the font of the holy waters, we cannot call God our Father; but when we return from thence, having put off the burden of our sins, then we say, "Our Father which art in heaven."

Besides this account of the various use of the Lord's prayer, he mentions several other parcels of the liturgy in this volume. In the sixteenth homily, p. 229, he takes notice of the use of the seraphical hymn in the eucharistical service. Consider, says he, you that are initiated, what a mystical service you have been employed in, with whom you have sent up that mystical song, with whom you have cried out Τρισάγιος, "Holy, holy, holy." In the thirty-sixth homily, upon Pentecost and the Holy Spirit, p. 553, he treats at large of that ancient form of salutation used in every office, "Peace be with you," or, "The Lord be with you;" and the people's answering always, "And with thy spirit." Our common father and teacher, says he, meaning the bishop, when he goes up into his throne, says, "Peace be to you all," and you all make answer with one common voice, "And with thy spirit." Neither do you make this answer only when he goes into his throne, or when he preaches to you, or when he prays for you, but when he stands by the holy table; when he is about to offer that tremendous sacrifice, (they that are initiated know what I say,) before he touches the elements lying upon the table, he prays, "The grace of the Lord be with you," and ye reply, "And with thy spirit:" reminding yourselves by this answer, that it is not the

Sect. 4.
Parts of the ancient liturgy in the fourth tome of St. Chrysostom's works.

Sect. 5.
In the fifth tome.

minister that effects any thing in this matter, neither is the consecration of the gifts the-work of human nature; but that it is the grace of the Spirit then present, and descending upon the elements, which consummates that mystical sacrifice. In the thirty-eighth homily, on the eucharist and repentance, p. 569, he takes notice of another known form in the communion service, where the priest says, "Let us lift up our minds and hearts," and the people answer, "We lift them up unto the Lord," Ἐχομεν πρὸς τὸν Κύριον. This is the same form as we have seen before in Cyprian, Sursum corda, and Habemus ad Dominum. In the forty-seventh homily, p. 632, he speaks again of the seraphical hymn, taken out of Isaiah, under the name of μυστικὸν μέλος, the mystical song. And homily fifty-second, in eos qui Pascha jejnant, p. 713, persuading men to peace and unity, he argues again from the frequent use of the form Εἰρήνη πᾶσιν, "Peace be with you all," in every office of the church. There is nothing, says he, can be compared with peace and concord. Therefore the bishop, when he first enters the church, before he goes up into his throne, prays, saying, "Peace be with you all:" and when he rises up, he does not begin to preach, before he says again, "Peace be with you all." And the priests, when they are about to say any prayer of benediction, do not begin the blessing before they have used the same form of salutation. And the deacon, when he bids men pray with others, enjoins them this in their prayers, that they should pray for the angel of peace,² and that all their purposes may be directed to a peaceable end: and when he dismisses you from this assembly, he prays thus, saying, Πορεύεσθε ἐν εἰρήνῃ, "Go in peace;" and nothing is said or done without this. So that it seems this was a form that had its return in every particular office, and was sometimes used six or seven times at one assembly of the church. In his thirty-fifth homily, upon the Ascension, p. 535, he more particularly takes notice of this form of the deacon's bidding men pray for the angel of peace. In his admonition to those that are scandalized at the evils which befall the church, cap. 4. p. 863, he has again occasion to mention the seraphical hymn, under the foresaid title of the mystical song of sanctification. In his sixty-third homily, p. 949, he shows us how, by the order of the church, on the day of our Saviour's passion, all such portions of Scripture were read as had any relation to the cross; and on the great sabbath, or Saturday following, such scriptures as contained the history of his being betrayed, crucified, dead, and buried. And he adds, p. 951, that on Easter day they read such passages as gave an account of his resurrection, and on every festival the things that happened at that season.

Only the Acts of the Apostles, which contain the history of the miracles done by the apostles after Pentecost, after the Holy Ghost was come upon them, were for a particular reason ordered to be read before Pentecost, that is, immediately after Easter, because the miracles of the apostles, contained in that book, were the great demonstration of our Saviour's resurrection; for which reason the church appointed the Book of the Acts always to be read in the time between Easter and Whitsuntide, immediately after the resurrection of Christ, to give men the evidences and proofs of that holy mystery, which was the completion of their redemption. Thus, according to Chrysostom, the church, in great wisdom, ordered and methodized her liturgy by exact rules, for the better instruction and edification of the people.

The sixth tome is chiefly made up of such tracts as do not acknowledge Sect. 6. In the sixth tome. Chrysostom for their author; and therefore among these we shall not be very curious in searching for the forms of the ancient liturgy. Some of them are supposed, by learned men, to be written by Severianus, bishop of Gabala, contemporary with Chrysostom, and these may be reckoned of the same authority as Chrysostom's own writings. Among the homilies of this sort is reckoned the thirty-seventh, upon the parable of the prodigal son, where the author, p. 375, commenting upon those words, "They began to be merry," thus discourses: Ye know what spiritual mirth is, who have tasted of it, who have been partakers of the holy mysteries, and have seen the deacons or ministers of Divine service, imitating the wings of angels with their little veils lying upon their left shoulders, and traversing the church, and crying, Let no catechumen be present, none of those that may not eat, no spy, none of those that may not see the feast of the fatted calf, none of those that may not look upon the heavenly blood shed for the remission of sins, no one that is unworthy of the living sacrifice, no one that is yet unbaptized, no one that may not with his polluted lips touch the tremendous mysteries: ye remember how, after this, the angels from heaven sing the hymns and praises, saying, Holy is the Father, who willed the fatted calf to be slain, who knew no sin, as saith the prophet Isaiah, "who did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth:" holy is the Son, the calf that is always willingly slain, and always lives: holy is the Comforter, the Holy Ghost, which perfects the sacrifice. These are plain references and allusions to the usual forms of the church, viz. to the deacons, vested in their proper habit and badge, calling to all non-communicants to withdraw; and to the seraphical hymn, "Holy, holy, holy," which was always sung in the communion service. The same writer, a little after, p. 377, as plainly alludes to the use of the Lord's prayer at the eucharist, when he brings in the father thus speaking to the elder son: Son, thou art ever with me: thou standest by the altar, and there criest out with freedom, "Our Father which art in heaven, hallowed be thy name." In the first homily in this volume, entitled, De Uno Legislatore, p. 10, there is mention made of the ceremony of laying the book of the Gospels upon a bishop's head at his ordination. For this reason, says the author, when priests are ordained in the church, the gospel of Christ is laid upon their heads, that he that is ordained, may learn that he receives the true tire or covering of the gospel; and that he may be taught, that though he be the head of all, yet he is subject to those laws; though he rules over all, he is under the rule of those laws; though he gives laws to all others, he is to be governed by the law himself. The critics are not agreed upon the author of this discourse. Du Pin³ rejects it as none of Chrysostom's: but Photius quotes it under his name, and Bishop Pearson⁴ has a long dissertation to vindicate the authority of it, out of Photius, and several other ancient writers before him, where he answers all the objections that Bishop Usher and some other learned men had raised against it. Without deciding this controversy, it is sufficient for our present purpose, that the homily either acknowledges Chrysostom or some such other ancient writer for its author; and the ceremony here spoken of was certainly a custom observed in the ordination of bishops in the time of Chrysostom, as appears not only from other places in Chrysostom, but also from the authors of the Constitutions and the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy, and the canon of the fourth council of Carthage, which I have had an occasion to produce in a former⁵ Book, to which I refer the reader, and go on with Chrysostom in order.

² See this form explained, Book XIV. chap. 5. sect. 4.

In the fifty-second homily, upon the Circus in this volume, p. 491, the author makes mention of that ancient custom of saying, Δόξα σοι, Κύριε, "Glory be to thee, O Lord," at the reading of the gospel. When we are met together, says he, in the ecclesiastical theatre, as soon as the deacon opens the book of the Gospels, we all look upon him with silence; and when he begins to read, we presently rise up, and say, "Glory be to thee, O Lord."

In his eleventh homily on St. Matthew, p. 108, he mentions the people's joining in psalmody and the accustomed prayers. When ye have borne your part in singing two or three psalms, δύο ψαλμούς ἢ τρεῖς ὑπηχήσαντες, and have made your usual prayers, τὰς συνήθεις ἐυχὰς ποιούμενοι, ye think ye have done enough for your salvation. In the thirty-third homily, p. 318, he notes the customary form of the minister's saying, Εἰρήνη ὑμῖν, "Peace be unto you all," when he first enters the church: and he forms this exhortation upon it: When I say, "Peace be unto you;" and ye answer again, "And with thy spirit;" do not say this only in words, but in mind; not with your mouth, but with your heart. For if you say here in the church, "Peace be with thy spirit;" but as soon as you are gone out, begin to oppugn me, despise me, accuse me, and load me with a thousand reproaches, what peace is this? In his sixty-ninth homily, p. 600, speaking of the monks, and their manner of worshipping God, he says, As soon as they were out of their beds, they made a quire, and sang hymns to God, συνφώνως ἅπαντες, ὡσπερ ἐξ ἐνὸς στόματος, all together with one voice, and as it were with one mouth: and among these they particularly addressed that angelical hymn to God, "Glory be to God on high, on earth peace, good will towards men. In his seventy-second homily, p. 624, he speaks of three prayers, one of which was for the demoniacs, the second for the penitents, and the third for the faithful, or communicants, all conceived in a certain form of words; which is evident from this circumstance, which he there subjoins, that in the last of these prayers the children of the church joined with the rest of the people in crying to God for mercy. The people prayed alone without the children, when they prayed for the demoniacs and penitents; but when they prayed for themselves, they strengthened their prayers with the cries and intercessions of their children, whose innocence and simplicity they esteemed to be prevailing motives with God to hear them. By this account it is plain, these prayers must be in certain forms known both to the people and the children; otherwise it is impossible to imagine, how they should all join vocally in crying to God for mercy. In his twentieth homily, which is upon the Lord's prayer, he not only mentions the use of this form of prayer, but says it was the peculiar privilege of communicants or baptized persons to use it. That this prayer, says he, p. 200, belongs to the faithful only, is evidenced both from the laws of the church, and the first words of the prayer itself; for no unbaptized person can call God his Father. In the same homily, he takes notice of the ceremonies used in the reception of the eucharist, particularly the custom of giving one another the holy kiss of peace. And in the seventh homily, p. 70, he alludes to the custom of the priest's saying, ἄγα τῷς ἁγίοις, in the celebration of the eucharist, when he says, Christ gives holy things to holy men.

The eighth tome of St. Chrysostom's works contains his Homilies on

Sect. 7.
In the seventh tome of his Homilies on St. Matthew.

Sect. 8.
In the eighth tome,

² Du Pin, Bibliothec. Cent. 5. p. 22.

⁴ Pearson, Vindic. Ignat. part 1. cap. 9. p. 311.

⁵ Book II. chap. 11. sect. 8.

on St. John and the Acts of the Apostles.

St. John and the Acts of the Apostles. In his preface to St. John, he mentions the form of renouncing the devil, and covenanting with Christ. Ye which are initiated, says he, know what compact ye made with us, or rather with Christ, when he admitted you to his holy mystery, what you said to him concerning the pomp of Satan; how, after you had renounced Satan and his angels, you renounced this also, and promised never to look toward it again.

Homily forty-second, he speaks of the Lord's prayer as a form of spiritual prayer, which Christ taught his disciples and all Christians.

Homily forty-fourth, he says, Every good Christian used this prayer daily, saying those holy words, "Thy kingdom come;" implying a belief of the resurrection.

Homily sixty-first, he makes mention of hymns and psalmody, as the honour of Christian funerals.

Homily seventy-seventh, he takes notice of the kiss of peace, and the common prayers made for the whole state of the world in the communion service. We salute one another, says he, in the holy mysteries, that being many, we may be made one; and we make common prayers for those that are unbaptized, and supplications for the sick, and for the fruits of the world, both by sea and land. Which plainly refers to the known forms then commonly used in the church.

In his nineteenth homily on the Acts of the Apostles, he speaks of several customary forms observed in the reading of the Scriptures: The deacon, the common minister of the church, first stood up, and cried with a loud voice, Πρόσχωμεν, Let us give attention: and this he repeated over and over again. After that, the reader names the prophet Esaias, or the like, and before he begins to read, he cries out, Τάδε λέγει ὁ Κύριος, Thus saith the Lord.

Homily twenty-first, he refers to the bidding prayer of the deacon, in which he was used to admonish the people in these words, among many other petitions, Let us pray for those that sleep in Christ, and for those that make commemorations for them, for the church, for the priests, for the people, for the martyrs, &c.

Homily twenty-fourth, he mentions the hymns that were used by all in common at the communion table. Know you not, that you then stand with angels, and sing with them, and send up hymns and praises to God with them? Meaning the Trisagion, or cherubical hymn, "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of hosts," &c., which was a known part of the eucharistical service.

The ninth tome of his works contains his Homilies on the Epistle to the Romans, and the First and Second to the Corinthians. In his seventh homily, on Romans, p. 68, he speaks of common prayer sent up to God with one voice for the energumens, or persons vexed with evil spirits. Which was by a certain form, as we have seen before, in his seventy-first homily on St. Matthew, and is evident from the very manner of expressing it here: for the people could not pray with one voice, unless a form of words was some way or other dictated to them. This dictating of prayers to be used by the whole assembly was commonly the office of the deacon, as Chrysostom informs us in the fourteenth homily upon this same epistle, p. 165, where he shows the different state of the church in the apostles' days from that of his own time. For, explaining those words, "The Spirit maketh intercession for us with groanings that cannot be uttered," he says, This was an obscure expression, because many of the miraculous gifts, which were then in being, were since ceased: as the gift of prophecy, the gift of wisdom, the gift of healing the sick, the gift of raising the dead, the gift of tongues; and among the rest, the gift of prayer, which was then distinguished by the name of the Spirit: and he that had this gift, prayed for the whole congregation. Upon which account, the apostle gives the name of the Spirit both to this gift, and to the soul that was endowed with it, who made intercession with groanings unto God, asking of God such things as were of general use and advantage to the whole congregation: the image or symbol of which is now the deacon, who offers up prayers for the people. Here, according to Chrysostom, the spirit of praying was an extraordinary gift, like that of tongues; and the difference between the apostolical age and his own was this, that at first both the matter and words of their prayers were inspired in an extraordinary way, but afterward the deacons prayed by ordinary forms, without any such immediate inspiration.

In his Comments upon the First Epistle to the Corinthians, homily twenty-four, p. 532, he rehearses the heads of the solemn thanksgiving at the consecration of the eucharist. We rehearse, says he, over the cup the ineffable blessings of God, and whatever benefits we enjoy; and so we offer it at the holy table, and communicate, giving him thanks that he hath delivered mankind from error; that when we were afar off, he hath made us near; that when we had no hope, and were without God, he hath made us brethren and fellow heirs with himself: for these and all the like blessings we give him thanks, and so come to his holy table. Homily thirty-five, p. 640, he notes the words, εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων, for ever and ever, to be the common conclusion of their eucharistical thanksgivings, to which a layman, if they were said in an unknown tongue, could not answer Amen. In his thirty-sixth homily, p. 652, he mentions the form, "Peace be with you all," to which the people answered, "And with thy spirit;" which he derives from apostolical practice, when both minister and people were used to speak by immediate inspiration of the Holy Ghost. He further observes, p. 653, that they all sang in common, both in the apostles' days, and in his own time; and that the bishop, at the entrance into the church, said always, "Peace be to you all," as a proper salutation when he came into his Father's house; though he laments, that whilst they retained the name of peace, they had lost the thing. Again, p. 655, he takes notice, that when a single reader sung the psalms, all the people, as it were with one mouth, did ὑπηχεῖν, return their answer to him, that is, either by singing the verses alternately, or by joining in the close of every verse; of which more in the next Book, chap. 1. Homily forty, p. 688, he observes, that every person at his baptism was, by the rule of the church, obliged to make profession of his faith in the solemn words of the creed; and among other articles, particularly said, "I believe the resurrection of the dead:" by which form of profession Chrysostom explains that noted passage of St. Paul, "Why are they then baptized for the dead?" That is, if the dead rise not, why do they profess at their baptism, that they "believe the resurrection of the dead?" Homily forty-one, p. 702, he mentions part of the solemn form of prayer for the dead, then in use in the church. It is not without reason, says he, that he that stands at the altar, when the holy mysteries are celebrated, says, We offer for all those who are dead in Christ, and for all those who make commemorations for them. And a little after, We at that time also make prayers for the whole world, and name the dead with martyrs, and confessors, and priests: for we are all one body, though some members exceed other members in glory.

Sect. 9.
In the ninth tome, on Romans, and First and Second to the Corinthians.

In his second homily upon the Second Epistle to the Corinthians, p. 740, he styles the Lord's prayer εὐχὴν νενομισμένην, the prayer which Christ brought in, and established by law in his church; and says it was the peculiar privilege of the faithful to use it, for the catechumens were not allowed so great a favour before baptism. There also he mentions several forms of the deacons calling upon the people to pray: as that, Στῶμεν καλῶς, δεηθῶμεν, Let us stand devoutly, and pray: which, he says, was addressed not only to the priests, but also to the people: and again, Let us pray ardently for the catechumens: after which admonition the deacon recited the particular petitions they were to make for them, which Chrysostom there relates at length in the very form that was used, which I shall omit to recite here, because the reader may find it whole hereafter in the service of the catechumens, Book XIV. chap. 5. A little after, in this same homily, p. 743, he mentions the usual form of renunciation in baptism: Ye that are initiated, says he, know what I say; for ye easily remember those words, whereby ye renounce the tyranny of the devil, falling upon your knees, and going over to Christ your King, and uttering those tremendous words, whereby we are taught to pay no manner of obedience to the tyrant. And, p. 745, he adds, That in the service of the faithful, that is, the communion service, the deacon again bid them supplicate and address God for bishops, for presbyters, for kings, for emperors, for all by sea and land, for the temperature of the air, and for the whole world. Which are but so many hints of the deacons bidding prayer in the service of the faithful, more fully related in Book XV. chap. 1. Homily fifth, p. 775, he speaks of the obligation men have to use the Lord's prayer. Homily eighteenth, p. 872, he intimates a form of prayer used by the people at the time of ordaining ministers. The suffrage of the people, says he, is no little ornament to those who are called to any spiritual dignity. And therefore he that performs the office of ordination, then requires their prayers, and they join their suffrage, and cry out those words, which they that are initiated know, for it is not lawful to speak all things before the unbaptized. A little after, p. 873, he says, The people had a considerable share in the prayers of the church. For common prayers were made both by priest and people for the energumens and penitents, and they all say one and the same prayer for them, the prayer is so full of mercy. Again, when we dismiss those who may not participate of the holy table, another prayer is to be made, in which we all fall down upon the ground together, and all rise together. He means the prayer for the whole state of Christ's church, which was said jointly by the priest and people together. Again, when the salutation of peace is mutually to be given and received, we all in like manner use this salutation. He means either the kiss of peace, or the form of salutation used between priest and people, "The peace of God be with you, And with thy spirit." But more probably he means the former, because it immediately follows after, When we come to the tremendous mysteries; then, as the priest prays for the people, so the people pray for the priest; for these words, "And with thy spirit," signify nothing else. Again, that prayer wherein we give thanks, is common to both. For not only the priest gives thanks, but all the people. For he first receives their answer, they rejoicing, "It is meet and right so to do," and then he begins the thanksgiving. And why should any man wonder that the people should speak together with the priest, when they even join with cherubims and the powers above to send up in common those sacred hymns to heaven? meaning the hymns, "Holy, holy, holy," and, "Glory be to God on high," which were sung by all the people in the communion service. Chrysostom has a good remark upon all these forms, and the people's obligation to bear a part in them, which, therefore, I may not here omit, because it shows us the reason why the ancient church so ordered her service. I have mentioned all these things, says he, on purpose to excite the vigilance of those that are in an inferior station, that we may learn that we are all one body, and only differ as one member may differ from another; and that we should not cast all upon the priests, but ourselves be concerned in the care of the whole church, as of one common body.

Sect. 10.
In the tenth tome.

The last volume of St. Chrysostom's works contains his homilies upon the remaining Epistles of St. Paul. In his first homily on the Ephesians, p. 1037, he speaks of the forms of profession used in baptism: What is more gracious, says he, than those words by which we renounce the devil? by which we covenant with Christ? What more gracious than that profession which we make both before and after baptism? In the third homily, p. 1051, he tells us the deacons were wont to use this form of words to all those that were under the church's censures, to withdraw from the Lord's table, Ye that are in the state of penance, depart. And, p. 1052, when they were gone they said again to the communicants, Let us pray in common all together. And there also he speaks of the hymns that were sung at the Lord's table. Homily fourteenth, p. 1127, he argues from the use of the Lord's prayer, that men should not revile those whom they therein owned to be their brethren. If he is not thy brother, how dost thou say, "Our Father?" for that word, "our," denotes many persons. And further to show the indecency of such contumelious language, he reminds them of their known custom in singing the sacred hymns with cherubims and seraphims at the communion. Consider with whom you stand in the time of the holy mysteries. With cherubims, with seraphims. For the seraphims use no reviling. Their mouth is continually employed in fulfilling one necessary office, that of glorifying and praising God. How then can you say with them, "Holy, holy, holy," who use your mouth to revile your brethren? He adds, You say, "Our Father;" and what follows that? "which art in heaven." As soon as you say, "Our Father which art in heaven," the word raises you up, and gives wings to your soul, and shows that you have a Father in heaven. Therefore do nothing, say nothing of those things that are upon earth. You stand in heaven, and do you use reviling? You converse with angels, and do you use reviling? You are honoured with the kiss of the Lord, and do you use reviling? God adorns your mouth so many ways with angelical hymns, with meat, not angelical, but above angels, with his own kisses and embraces, and do you still accustom yourself to reviling?

Homily twenty-third, p. 1190, he says, Jesus, the Son of the living God, hath brought down to us the celestial hymns. For what the cherubims say above, he hath commanded us to say, "Holy, holy, holy."

On the Philippians, homily fifteenth, p. 1311, he positively asserts, that Christ delivered the Lord's prayer as a form of prayer, ἁρὸν εὐχῆς, teaching us to say, "Give us this day our daily bread."

On the Colossians, homily third, p. 1337, We pray, saying, "Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven." We give thanks, saying, "Glory be to God on high, on earth peace, good will towards men." We petition in our prayers for the angel of peace, and we pray for peace upon all occasions, for nothing can be compared unto it. The bishop in the church gives the benediction of peace, saying in every office, in prayers, in supplications, in his homilies, once, twice, thrice, and oftener, "Peace be with you all." Again, p. 1338, When the bishop enters the church, he immediately says, "Peace be with you all:" when he preaches, "Peace be with you all:" when he gives the blessing, "Peace be with you all:" when he bids you salute one another, "Peace be with you all:" when the sacrifice is offered, "Peace be with you all:" and in the intervals, "Grace and peace be with you." Is it not, therefore, absurd, that when we so often hear peace mentioned, we should still be at war among ourselves? We receive the salutation of peace, and return it to him that gives it, and yet are at war with him. You answer, "And with thy spirit;" yet, as soon as you are gone out of the church, you calumniate and revile him. He adds, p. 1339, That it was not the bishop, properly speaking, that gave the peace, but Christ, that vouchsafes to speak by his mouth.

Homily sixth in Colossians, p. 1358, he compares the forms of renunciation in baptism, and covenanting with Christ, to a hand-writing or bond, saying, Let us beware that we be not convicted by it, after we have said those words, "We renounce thee, Satan, and we make a covenant with thee, O Christ." Again, p. 1359, You are taught to say, "I renounce thee, and thy pomp, and thy worship, and thy angels." He adds, That every new baptized person, as soon as he came up out of the water, was appointed to say, "Our Father which art in heaven. Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven."

Homily ninth in Coloss., p. 1380, on those words, "Admonishing one another in psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs," he says, The faithful know what is the hymn of the spirits above; what the cherubims above say; what the angels said, "Glory be to God on high:" meaning that these two hymns were sung by the faithful in the communion service.

Homily tenth, p. 1385, he gives the Lord's prayer the title of εὐχὴ πιστῶν, "the prayer of the faithful," because it was their peculiar privilege to use it.

Homily third in 2 Thess., p. 1502, he mentions two usual forms, relating to the reading of the lessons in the church. When the reader rises up, and says, "Thus saith the Lord;" and the deacon, standing up, commands all men to keep silence; he does not say this to honour the reader, but God, who speaks to all by him.

Homily sixth in 1 Tim., p. 1553, he proves, that infidels are prayed for as well as others, from the use of the Lord's prayer. For when he that prays says, "Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven," the meaning is, that as there is no infidel in heaven, so we pray, that there may be none on earth neither.

Homily second in 2 Tim., p. 1638, he says, The words whereby the priests consecrate the eucharist, were the same that Christ spake.

Homily fourth on Hebrews, p. 1785, he intimates, that they had set psalms in their funeral service. Consider, says he, what you sing at that time, "Turn again unto thy rest, O my soul, for the Lord hath rewarded thee." And again, "I will fear no evil, for thou art with me." And again, "Thou art my refuge from tribulation, which compasses me about." Consider what those psalms mean. You say, "Turn again unto thy rest, O my soul;" and do you still weep? Is not this mere pageantry and hypocrisy? If you believe the things to be true, which you say, it is superfluous to lament.

Homily fourteenth, p. 1852, speaking of the hymns sung at the eucharist, he says, Do not we sing the same celestial hymns, which the quires of incorporeal powers sing above?

Homily seventeenth, p. 1870, he mentions a part of the oblation prayer: In the oblation we offer, or bear and confess our sins, and say, "Forgive us our transgressions," whether voluntary or involuntary: that is, we first remember them, and then ask pardon. There also, p. 1872, he mentions the deacon's solemn form of words, admonishing the people to come holy to the holy sacrament: for this reason, the deacon cries out, and calls upon the saints, and by these words prompts all men to consider their offences, that no one come unprepared.

Homily twenty-second, p. 1898, he tacitly refers to the form, Sursum corda, "Let us lift up our hearts." For having mentioned those words of the psalmist, "Let the lifting up of my hands be an evening sacrifice," he adds, With our hands let us also lift up our hearts. Ye which are initiated, know what I say; you perhaps understand what is spoken, and perceive what I have obscurely hinted. "Let us lift up our souls on high."

Beside these passages collected out of Chrysostom's works, published by Fronto Ducaeus, there are several others in those homilies, which Sir Henry Savil set forth in Greek, and others in the Latin editions only. Neither of which I have had opportunity perfectly to examine, and therefore I shall leave them to the more diligent inquiry of the curious reader; only noting, that in the sixth homily of repentance,¹⁰ he observes this difference between David's Psalms and the rest of the Scriptures, that the others were read only twice a week in public, but the Psalms were used by all sorts of men, in all places, and upon all occasions. In ecclesiis pernoctantibus primus et medius, et novissimus est David. When they held their vigils all night in the church, David's Psalms were in the beginning, and middle, and end of all their service. The same was observed in their morning prayer; in their funeral obsequies; by virgins at their needle; by the illiterate and unlearned, who could not read a letter in the book, yet could repeat David's Psalms by heart. David was always in their mouths, not only in the cities and the churches, but in the courts, in the monasteries, in the deserts and the wilderness. He turned earth into heaven, and men into angels, being adapted to all orders, and all capacities, children, young men, virgins, old men, and sinners. In the beginning of the same homily, he says the Book of Genesis was by appointment of the church read only once a year, at a certain season, which was the time of Lent; as we have heard before in several places of this author, and as we shall see more fully demonstrated from other writers in the next Book.

Among those published in Greek by Sir H. Savil, the hundred and twenty-third homily, t. 5. p. 809, speaks of the priests using this form of admonition to all communicants, in the time when the holy mysteries were celebrated, "Ἅγια τοῖς ἁγίοις, "Holy things are only for holy men." And whoever will bestow the pains to peruse the rest of the homilies which are in that edition, may doubtless find many other such fragments of the ancient liturgy, which, as appears from this collection, so much abound in this celebrated writer.

CHAPTER VII.

OF THE USE OF THE LORD'S PRAYER IN THE LITURGY OF THE ANCIENT CHURCH.

IF there were no other argument to prove the lawfulness of set forms of prayer in the judgment of the ancients, the opinion which they had of the Lord's prayer, and their practice pursuant to that opinion, would sufficiently do

Sect. I.
The Lord's prayer by all the ancients esteemed a form, given by Christ to be used by his disciples.

¹⁰ De Pœnitent. Hom. 6. t. 7. p. 146. Basil. 1525.

it. And therefore, though several things have been occasionally hinted already about this matter, yet it will not be amiss to give it a distinct handling in this chapter. And first of all I observe, that the ancients did not only esteem it as a rule and pattern to conform our prayers to, but looked upon it as a particular form of prayer, which Christ enjoined all his disciples to use in the same words that he delivered it. Tertullian says,¹ Our Lord prescribed a new form of prayer for his new disciples of the New Testament: and that though John had taught his disciples a form of prayer, yet all that he did was only as a forerunner of Christ: when Christ was increased, (as John had foretold, "He must increase, but I must decrease,") then the whole work of the servant passed over to the Lord. And therefore it is not so much as extant now in what words John taught his disciples to pray, because earthly things were to give way to heavenly. So again, The religion of prayer was ordained by Christ himself, and this prayer being animated by his Spirit from the time that it came out of his heavenly mouth, ascends up to heaven with a privilege, commending to the Father what the Son taught. But because our Lord, who foresaw the necessities of man, after he had given this rule of praying, said also, "Ask, and ye shall receive;" and there are many things which men's particular circumstances oblige every one to ask; therefore we have a right to make additional requests, and build other prayers upon this, always premising this appointed and ordinary prayer as the foundation. So that, according to Tertullian,² it was not only a rule prescribing the method and matter of prayer, but a form to be used in the words in which Christ delivered it, and to be added to all other prayers as the foundation of a superstructure. After the same manner St. Cyprian says, That Christ, among other wholesome admonitions and Divine precepts, by which he provided for the salvation of his people, has given us also a form of prayer,³ teaching and admonishing us what we are to pray for. And a little after,⁴ We are to learn from our Lord's information, what we are to pray for; for he said, Pray thus, "Our Father which art in heaven, hallowed be thy name," &c. St. Austin assures us, That as the church always used this prayer, so she used it by the command of Christ.⁵ He said, Pray thus: he said to his disciples, Pray thus: he said to his disciples, he said to his apostles, and to us who are the lambs he said, and to the rams of his flock he said, Pray thus. In another place, This prayer⁶ is necessary for all, which the Lord gave to the rams of his flock, that is, to his apostles, that every one of them should say, "Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us." For if there is any one to whom these words in the prayer are not necessary, he must be said to be without sin. And if Christ had foreseen that there would have been any such, so much better than his apostles, he would have taught them another prayer, in which they should not have asked forgiveness of sins for themselves, who had already obtained remission of all in baptism. Again he says,⁷ If any one say that this prayer is not necessary in this life for every saint of God, that knows and does the will of God, except one, the Holy of holies, he is in a manifest error, and pleases not that God whom he pretends to praise. For this prayer which we use,⁸ was given as a rule to the apostles by the heavenly lawgiver, who said to them, Pray thus. He enjoined the rams of his flock, the leaders of his sheep, the chief members of the great Shepherd, to use it; and they thence learned to say, "Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us." In his *Retractions*⁹ he confirms all this, calling

¹ Tertul. de Orat. cap. 1. Dominus noster novis discipulis Novi Testamenti novam orationis formam determinavit.—Docuerat et Joannes discipulos suos orare. Sed omnia Joannis Christo præstruebantur, donec ipso aucto (sicut idem Joannes prænuñciabat, illum augeri oportere, se vero diminui) totum præministri opus cum ipso Spiritu transiret ad Dominum. Ideo nec extat, in quæ verba docuerit Joannes orare, quod terrena celestibus cesserint.

² Ibid. cap. 9. Ab ipso ordinata est religio orationis, et de Spiritu ipsius jam tunc, cum ex ore Divino ferretur, animata suo privilegio ascendit in cælum, commendans Patri quæ Filii docuit. Quoniam tamen Dominus prospector humanarum necessitatum, seorsum post traditam orandi disciplinam, Petite, inquit, et accipietis, et sunt, quæ petantur pro circumstantia cujusque, præmissa legitima et ordinaria oratione quasi fundamento, accidentium jus est desideriorum, jus est superstruendi extrinsecus petitiones.

³ Cypr. de Orat. Domin. p. 139. Inter cætera salutaria sua monita et præcepta Divina, quibus populo suo consuluit ad salutem, etiam orandi ipse formam dedit; ipse quid precaremur, monuit et instruxit.

⁴ Ibid. p. 141. Cognoscamus, docente Domino, et quid oremus. Sic, inquit, orate, Pater noster qui es in cælis, &c.

⁵ Aug. Hom. 29. de Verbis Apost. t. 10. p. 150. Ecclesie oratio est, vox est de magisterio Domini veniens. Ipse dixit: Sic orate: discipulis dixit, Sic orate: discipulis dixit, apostolis dixit, et nobis, qualescunque agniculi sumus, dixit, arietibus gregis dixit, Sic orate.

⁶ Aug. Ep. 89. ad Hilarium. Omnibus necessaria est oratio Dominica, quam etiam ipsis arietibus gregis, id est, apostolis suis Dominus dedit, ut unusquisque Deo dicat, Dimitte nobis debita nostra, sicut nos dimittimus debitoribus nostris, &c.

⁷ Aug. de Peccator. Meritis, lib. 3. cap. 13. Quam orationem quisquis culibet etiam homini sancto, et Dei voluntatem scienti atque facienti, præter unum sanctum sanctorum, dicit in hac vita necessariam non fuisse, multum errat, nec potest illi ipsi placere quem laudat.

⁸ Aug. in Psal. cxlii. p. 675. Ipsi didicerunt orare quod oramus, ipsis data est regula postulandi a jurisperito cælesti. Sic orate, inquit, &c.

⁹ Aug. Retractions, lib. 1. cap. 19. In eisdem mandatis est etiam quod jubemur dicere, Dimitte nobis debita nostra, &c. Quam orationem usque ad finem sæculi tota dicit ecclesia.

it one of Christ's commands to use this prayer, which the whole church will continue to use to the end of the world. St. Chrysostom, in two volumes of his works, the third and fifth, repeats this almost twenty times, that the Lord's prayer was a common form in use among them by the express command of Christ. And there are many other scattered passages throughout his writings to the same purpose, which, because I have produced them at large in the last chapter, I need not here repeat them.

Evident it is beyond dispute, that the whole primitive church constantly used it in all her holy offices, out of consciousness and regard to Christ's command. This, as we have heard Tertullian word it, was laid as the foundation of all other prayers.¹⁰ It is the prayer of the church: the whole church says, "Forgive us our trespasses," as we have it before in the testimony of¹¹ St. Austin. And the practice was so universal and well known from the beginning, that Lucian the heathen is thought to refer to it in one of his dialogues,¹² where he speaks, in the person of a Christian, of the prayer which began ἀπὸ τοῦ Πατρὸς, with "Our Father." But we have more certain evidence from the records and offices of the church. For there was no considerable Divine office, in the celebration of which this prayer did not always make a solemn part. Particularly in baptism, as soon as the person baptized came up out of the water, he was enjoined to say, "Our Father which art in heaven." Immediately after this, says the author of the Constitutions,¹³ let him stand and pray the prayer which the Lord hath taught us. And so Chrysostom,¹⁴ As soon as he rises out of the water, he says those words, "Our Father which art in heaven," &c.

In like manner in the celebration of the other sacrament of Christ's body and blood, it was commonly used at the close of the consecration prayer. So it is expressly more than once noted by St. Austin: After the sanctification of the sacrifice¹⁵ we say the Lord's prayer: and again,¹⁶ The whole church almost concludes the prayer of benediction and sanctification with the Lord's prayer. Upon this account he tells his hearers, that all who were communicants¹⁷ heard this prayer said daily at the altar. And he expressly makes this difference between the Lord's prayer and the creed, that men might remember the former by hearing it daily repeated at the altar; but the creed was not so, for as yet it was never publicly used, but only in the occasional service of baptism; whereas the Lord's prayer was of constant use by being a daily part of the communion service. Cyril, in his Mystagogical Catechism to the illuminated,¹⁸ gives the same account of it: After the oblation prayer we say that prayer which our Saviour delivered to his disciples, calling God our Father with a pure conscience, and saying, "Our Father which art in heaven." And St. Jerom,¹⁹ though he do not so precisely note what part of the communion office it was used in, yet, in general, he says Christ taught his apostles this prayer, that believers might every day in the sacrifice of his body have boldness to say, "Our Father which art in heaven." And St. Chrysostom²⁰ in a covert way intimates the same, when he tells his hearers, that if they forgive their enemies, they may come with a pure conscience to the holy and tremendous table, and boldly say the words that are contained in the prayer. The initiated know what I mean. He means that petition of the Lord's prayer, "Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us." Which he expresses thus covertly, because of non-communicants, catechumens, or infidels, that might be present at a popular discourse in a general assembly. He speaks more plainly in his sermon upon Eutropius,²¹ where, pressing the people to forgive the injury which that great statesman had done the church, he uses this argument to them: How otherwise will you take the holy sacrament into your hands, and use the words of that prayer, wherein we are commanded to say, "Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us?" This plainly shows, that the Lord's prayer was then used as an ordinary and constant part of the communion service. Only with this difference, that in the Greek church and the Gallian church it was said by the priest and all the people together, as Mabillon²² proves out of Gregory of Tours, and Leontius, in the Life of Joannes Eleemosynarius, bishop of Alexandria, and the epistles of Gregory the Great, who expressly notes the difference between the Greek and Latin church in this particular: Among the Greeks the Lord's prayer²³ is said by all the people, but with us by the priest

¹⁰ Tertul. de Orat. cap. 9. cited above.

¹¹ Aug. Hom. 29. de Verbis Apost. p. 150.

¹² Lucian. Philopatris.

¹³ Constit. Apost. lib. 7. cap. 41.

¹⁴ Chrys. Hom. 6. in Colos. p. 1359. It. Hom. 62. in Paralyticum, t. 5. p. 934.

¹⁵ Aug. Hom. 83. de Diversis, p. 556. Post sanctificationem sacrificii dicimus orationem Dominicam.

¹⁶ Aug. Ep. 59. ad Paulin. quest. 5. Quam totam petitionem fere omnis ecclesia Dominica oratione concludit.

¹⁷ Hom. 42. inter 50. t. 10. p. 197. In ecclesia ad altare quotidie dicitur ista oratio Dominica, et audiunt illam fideles.

¹⁸ Cyril. Catech. Myst. 5. p. 298.

¹⁹ Hieron. lib. 3. cont. Pelag. cap. 3. * Docuit apostolos suos, ut quotidie in corporis illius sacrificio credentes audent loqui, Pater noster qui es in cœlis, &c.

²⁰ Chrys. Hom. 27. in Genes. p. 358.

²¹ Chrys. Hom. in Eutrop. t. 4. p. 554.

²² Mabill. de Liturg. Gallic. lib. 1. cap. 5. n. 22. ex Gregor. Turon. de Mirac. Martini, lib. 2. cap. 30.

²³ Greg. lib. 7. Ep. 64. Sed et Dominica oratio apud Græcos ab omni populo dicitur: apud nos vero a solo sacerdote.

alone. And in this the Gallican church chose to follow the way of the Greek church, as we now follow the Gallican church, and not the Roman. The manner of the Mosarabic liturgy in Spain, is noted also by Mabillon to be different from both these; for there the priest repeated every petition by itself, and the people answered to each petition separately, "Amen." But these differences in the manner of using it only serve to confirm the use of it in general, and show us that it was never omitted by any church in the public service of the altar, at least from the beginning of the fourth century, when Cyril of Jerusalem lived, whose Mystical Catechisms are a clear evidence for it.

It also made a part in their daily morning and evening prayers, distinct from the communion office. Of which we have instances in the canons of the councils of Giron²¹ and Toledo,²² which shall be recited hereafter, when we come to consider more exactly the several parts of the morning and evening service.

They used it also in their private devotions. As is evident from that passage in St. Chrysostom upon the 112th Psalm, where he says,²³ That Christ, to induce us to unanimity and charity, enjoins us to make common prayer, and obliges the whole church, as if it were but one person, to say, "Our Father;" and, "Give us this day our daily bread; and forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us; and lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil;" always using a word of the plural number, and commanding every one, whether he pray alone by himself, or in common with others, still to make prayer for his brethren. This implies, that in their private devotions, as well as public, they thought themselves obliged, by the command of Christ, to use the Lord's prayer. In another place he gives us an instance in the practice of a holy man, who, to the form of his private devotions, (which he also there recites,) always added the Lord's prayer, or the prayer of the faithful,²⁷ as he styles it, for a particular reason, of which more by and by; making it both the conclusion and uniting tie of all his other prayers for all men. In compliance with this general practice it is, that the author of the Constitutions²⁸ orders every one to use the Lord's prayer three times a day. And this, Cotelierius thinks, was done in honour of the holy Trinity,²⁹ citing Theodoret and Isidore for his opinion. St. Ambrose also, writing instructions to virgins,³⁰ directs them to sing psalms in bed, and say the Lord's prayer between every psalm. And the fourth council of Toledo makes it deprivation for any clergyman to omit³¹ using the Lord's prayer daily, either in his public or private offices of devotion, censuring him as a proud contemner of the Lord's injunction.

Now, this being the constant use that was daily made of the Lord's prayer, it hence took the name of oratio quotidiana, the daily prayer, as is observed in the foresaid canon of that council. And so we find it styled in Cyprian, who thought that petition in the Lord's prayer, "Give us this day our daily bread," might be taken in a spiritual as well as a literal sense, and refer to the eucharist, or the body and blood of Christ, the celestial bread,³² which they then desired to receive every day. And the council of Toledo cites St. Hilary to the same purpose:³³ "Give us this day our daily bread." God desires nothing so much as that Christ may dwell in us daily, who is the Bread of life, and the Bread that comes from heaven. And because this is our daily prayer, we therefore pray daily that this bread may be given us. St. Austin also³⁴ means the Lord's prayer, when he says, That the Christian's daily prayer makes satisfaction for those lesser and daily failings, without which no man lives. Upon which account he says in another place,³⁵ That this daily prayer is a sort of daily baptism, because in the pious use of it men obtain daily remission of sins, as they did at first in baptism. Possidius also³⁶

²¹ Conc. Gerundens. can. 10.

²² Conc. Toletan. 4. can. 9.

²³ Chrys. Com. in Psal. cxii. p. 369.

²⁴ Chrys. Hom. 10. in Coloss. p. 1385. Ἐπιθείς τὴν εὐχὴν τῶν πιστῶν, ὡς κορωνίδα τινὰ καὶ σύνδεσμον ὑπὲρ πάντων εὐχῶν ποιησάμενος.

²⁵ Constit. lib. 7. cap. 24. Τρις τῆς ἡμέρας οὕτω προσεύχεσθαι.

²⁶ Cotelier. in loc. ex Theodor. Ep. 145. et Isidor. Orig. lib. 6. cap. ult.

²⁷ Ambros. de Virgin. lib. 3. p. 115. In ipso cubili volo psalmos cum oratione Dominica frequenti contextos vice.

²⁸ Conc. Tolet. 4. can. 9. Quisquis ergo sacerdotum vel subjaentium clericorum hanc orationem Dominicam quotidie aut in publico aut in privato officio præterierit, propter superbiam judicatus, ordinis sui honore privetur.

²⁹ Cyp. de Orat. Dom. p. 147. Hunc panem dari nobis quotidie postulamus, ne, qui in Christo sumus, et eucharistiam quotidie ad cibum salutis accipimus, a Christi corpore separemur.

³⁰ Conc. Tolet. 4. can. 9. Sanctus Hilarius dicit, Panem nostrum quotidianum da nobis hodie. Quid enim tam vult Deus quam ut quotidie Christus habitet in nobis, qui est Panis vitæ et Panis e cælo? Et quia quotidiana oratio est, quotidie quoque ut detur, oratur.

³¹ Aug. Enchirid. cap. 71. De quotidianis autem brevibus levibusque peccatis, sine quibus hæc vita non ducitur, quotidiana oratio fidelium satisfacit. Eorum enim est dicere, Pater noster, qui es in cælis, &c.

³² Aug. Hom. 119. De Tempore, p. 306. Remissio peccatorum non est in sola ablutione baptismatis sacri, sed etiam in oratione Dominica et quotidiana. In illa invenietis quasi quotidianum baptismum.

³³ Possid. Vit. Aug. cap. 27. De bono Domino se dicit magis quam de meritis suis confidere. Cui etiam in oratione quotidiana Dominica dicebat, Dimitte nobis debita nostra, &c.

makes this remark in his Life, upon his practice and that of St. Ambrose, that they both trusted more in God's mercy than their own merits, being used to pray in the words of our Lord's daily prayer, "Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us." From all which, and much more that might be alleged upon this head, it appears, that this prayer, in the very words which Christ delivered it in, was not only an allowed form, but a prayer of daily use both in their public and private devotions.

Neither were there any sects or heresies, that pretended in those times to object the least thing against the use of it. The Donatists broke off from the church, and set up conventicles of their own, but they did not alter the way of worship: they still thought themselves obliged, as Optatus says, to use the Lord's prayer at the altar.³⁷ The Pelagians could not relish well one petition in it, "Forgive us our trespasses;" for they proudly thought the saints were without sin, and had nothing to ask forgiveness of: yet they also continued to use it, and accounted for their practice, by putting this false gloss upon it, that they then prayed not for their own sins, but the sins of others. We find this often objected to them in the African councils,³⁸ but never any charge brought against them, as if they omitted the Lord's prayer in whole, or even this single petition in it. St. Austin indeed often says, that their impious tenets and disputations tended³⁹ to take away the use of the Lord's prayer; but then he explains himself to mean, not that they laid aside the use of it, but that they taught that a man might come to such perfection in righteousness in this life, by observing all the commands, and that by his own free-will, without the help of the grace of Christ, that he needed not to say, "Forgive us our trespasses," for himself, but only for others. They owned,⁴⁰ that the apostles used the Lord's prayer; but then they said, they were so holy and perfect without all manner of sin, that they did not say for themselves, "Forgive us our trespasses," but only for other sinners that were yet imperfect. St. Chrysostom mentions another sort of men, who were also offended at this petition because of the condition that was in it, "Forgive us, as we forgive others;" and therefore they curtailed the prayer by dropping this petition when they said it: but he rebukes them⁴¹ for this, and bids them not be so vainly cautious, as to think they were excused by curtailing the prayer, but advises them to use the whole prayer, as Christ appointed it to be used, that the necessity of this petition might daily terrify them from revenge, and compel them to grant pardon to their neighbours. So that though there were some heretics and other ill men, who did not like this one petition for different reasons, yet they all continued to use the prayer either in whole or in part, and there is no instance of any that totally rejected it.

There was no objection against it in those days, that it was a form, or that it was not a spiritual prayer, because it was used in the very words in which Christ had delivered it; but on the contrary, it was recommended as the most spiritual and prevalent prayer that could be used, because of the dignity of its Author. St. Cyprian thus argues for the use of it: Christ, says he, had foretold, that the hour was coming, when the true worshippers should worship the Father in spirit and in truth: and he fulfilled what he had promised before, that we who had received the Spirit and truth by his sanctification, might worship in spirit and truth by his tradition, or the prayer which he delivered to us. For what prayer can be more spiritual, than that which is given us⁴² by Christ, by whom the Holy Spirit is sent to us? What can be esteemed a truer prayer with the Father, than that which came out of the mouth of his Son, who is truth itself? So that to pray otherwise than he has taught us, is not only ignorance, but a crime, since he has laid it down, and said, "Ye reject the commandment of God, to establish your own tradition." Let us therefore, my dearly beloved brethren, pray as our God and Master taught us. It is a friendly and familiar way of praying, to beseech God in his own words, to let the prayer of his Son come up to his ears. Let the Father hear and acknowledge the words of his Son: when we make our prayers, let him that dwells in our heart, be also in our voice. And forasmuch as we have him our Advocate with the Father for ³⁷ Optat. lib. 2. p. 57. Ad altare conversi Dominicam orationem prætermittere non potestis. It. lib. 3. p. 72. Oratio Dominica apud nos et apud vos una est.

³⁸ Conc. Milevitan. can. 8. Quicumque dixerit, in oratione Dominica ideo dicere sanctos, Dimitte nobis debita nostra, ut non pro seipsis hoc dicant, quia non est eis jam necessaria ista petitio, sed pro aliis, qui sunt in populo peccatores. Et ideo non dicere unumquemque sanctorum, Dimitte mihi debita mea, sed, Dimitte nobis debita nostra, ut hoc pro aliis potius, quam pro se justus petere intelligatur, anathema sit. Vid. can. 9. ibid. et Cod. Can. African. c. 115, 116.

³⁹ Aug. Ep. 92. ad Innocent. Nobis etiam Dominicam

orationem impiis disputationibus conantur auferre.—Dicunt posse hominem in hac vita, præceptis Dei cognitis, ad tantam perfectionem justitiæ sine adjutorio gratiæ salvatoris per solum liberum voluntatis arbitrium pervenire, ut ei non sit jam necessarium dicere, Dimitte nobis debita nostra.

⁴⁰ Id. de Peccator. Meritis, lib. 2. cap. 10. Quidam contra orationem Dominicam argumentantur: quia etsi orabant eam, inquit, sancti et perfecti jam apostoli, nullum omnino habentes peccatum, non tamen pro seipsis, sed pro imperfectis adhuc peccatoribus dicebant, Dimitte nobis, &c. Vid. Aug. Ep. 94. ad Hilarium.

⁴¹ Chrys. Hom. 22. t. 1. p. 288.

⁴² Cypr. de Orat. Dom. p. 139.

our sins, when we sinners pray for the pardon of our sins, let us bring forth the words of our Advocate. For since he has said, that "whatever we ask the Father in his name, he will give it us;" how much more efficaciously shall we obtain what we ask in the name of Christ, if we ask it in his prayer! He introduces all this discourse with these words: He that made us live, taught us to pray, by the same kindness that he confers all other things upon us; that whilst we speak to the Father in the prayer and orison which the Son taught us, we should more easily be heard. So far was this holy man from thinking the Lord's prayer a dead form, that could not be offered with the true spirit of prayer, that, on the contrary, he labours with all his might to convince men, that no prayer could be more justly styled worshipping God in spirit and in truth, or with greater efficacy and advantages be presented to the Father. St. Chrysostom was of the same mind, that praying by the Lord's prayer might justly be termed, praying by the Spirit. For he uses this as an argument for the Holy Spirit's operation upon us. If there were no Holy Ghost,⁴³ says he, we that are believers could not pray to God; for we say, "Our Father which art in heaven." As therefore we could not say, that Jesus was the Lord, so neither could we call God our Father without the Holy Ghost. How does that appear? From the same apostle, who says, "Because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father." And St. Austin,⁴⁴ expounding those words of the apostle, Rom. viii. 26, "We know not what to pray for as we ought; but the Spirit helpeth our infirmities;" concludes, that the Spirit's helping and teaching them to pray as they ought, could not mean his helping them to new words and expressions; for both the apostle, and they to whom he wrote, were well acquainted already with the Lord's prayer; so that there could be no want of the Spirit's assistance in that respect: but the want was this; men are commonly ignorant of the real benefit of temporal tribulation and affliction, which tends either to cure the tumour of pride, or exercise and try men's patience, and crown it with a greater reward, or else to chastise and abolish such other sins as they are subject to: men being ignorant of these advantages, are usually most inclined to ask a perfect freedom and immunity from temporal affliction. But the Spirit corrects this ignorance, and helps this infirmity, and teaches men rather to ask patience of God, and submission to his will, that they may not think themselves neglected of God, though he do not remove such afflictions, but with a devout and pious patience hope for greater good arising from them. This is St. Austin's exposition of that famous passage of the apostle, concerning the assistance of the Spirit in prayer: by which he is so far from derogating from the Lord's prayer, as void of the Spirit, that he supposes the very knowledge of it to be antecedently a work of the Spirit: and he says further,⁴⁵ That when men believe, and hope, and desire, and consider the things they ask of God in the Lord's prayer, they are then qualified with those graces of the Spirit, faith, hope, and charity, which are necessary to bring a pious votary unto God. Men that say such things as these of the Lord's prayer, could not conceive any mean thing about it, derogatory to the spirit of prayer; but must be presumed to entertain the most high and venerable notions of it, of any that can possibly be imagined.

And that they did so, is evident from one thing further, very observable in the ancient discipline and practice; that is, that then the use of the Lord's prayer was not a mark of infamy or reproach, but an honorary privilege, allowed to none but communicants, or complete and perfect Christians. For, as I have had occasion to remark once or twice⁴⁶ in former parts of this work, all catechumens, or persons unbaptized, were absolutely debarred from the use of this prayer; they were not allowed to call God, "Our Father," till they were regenerated and made sons by the waters of baptism. I have noted several passages out of St. Austin, St. Chrysostom, and Theodoret to this purpose, which need not here be repeated. To these I shall only add one passage out of Chrysostom,⁴⁷ in his homily upon the paralytic, where, speaking of baptism, he says, Before we have washed away our sins in the font of the holy waters, we cannot call God, "Our Father;" but when we return from thence, having put off the load of our sins, then we say, "Our Father which art in heaven." And upon this account, as has been also noted before, this prayer was peculiarly called ἐκκλησιαστικὴ, the prayer of communicants or believers, because none had a right to use this prayer, but only such as had a right to communicate at the altar, and there hear it daily repeated.

Sect. 9.
And the use of it
a peculiar privilege allowed only to communicants and perfect Christians.

⁴³ Chrys. Hom. 36. in Pentecost. t. 5. p. 552.

⁴⁴ Aug. Ep. 121. ad Proban, cap. 14. Neque enim ullo modo credendum est, vel ipsum, vel quibus ista dicebat, Dominicam nescisse orationem.

⁴⁵ Ibid. cap. 13. Fides, ergo, et spes et charitas ad Deum perducunt orantem, hoc est, credentem, sperantem, desiderantem, et quæ petat a Domino in Dominica oratione considerantem.

⁴⁶ Book I. chap. 4. sect. 7. and Book X. chap. 5. sect. 9.

⁴⁷ Chrys. Hom. 62. t. 5. p. 934.

CHAPTER VIII.

OF THE USE OF HABITS, AND GESTURE, AND OTHER RITES AND CEREMONIES IN THE SERVICE OF THE ANCIENT CHURCH.

Sect. 1.
No certain evidence for the use of distinct habits in the apostolical age, or the two following.

THE next things to be spoken of, are the circumstances and ceremonies of habits, gestures, and times appropriated to Divine service. Of all these it may be said in general, that as they are matters of indifferent usage in their own nature, so the church used her liberty in the appointment and observation of them. The writers of the Romish church, Baronius, Du Saussay, and Bona, who will have every ceremony to be apostolical, pretend that the apostles themselves wore a distinct habit in all their sacred ministrations. Bona is very confident¹ that St. Paul's cloak which he left at Troas, was a sacerdotal vestment. And others speak of St. Peter's planeta, which is said to be sent from Antioch to Paris, and kept there as a sacred relic in the temple of St. Genouesa. And others mention St. John's, which is said to be sent to Gregory the Great. But Bona himself will not undertake to vouch for these, because of the silence of all ancient writers about them.² Yet he is very angry with Nicholas Alemanius, for saying, that neither the apostles nor apostolical men used any sacred vestments,³ and that the opinion which maintains it, is to be exploded as ridiculous, and as what is rejected by learned men. Vicecomes was a diligent inquirer into antiquity, and yet he could find no ground for this assertion, but has some arguments against it, which Bona is put to answer. And till some better arguments can be produced to support it, I think it most prudent to leave uncertain tradition to shift for itself, and proceed to an age wherein we have more light and certainty in the matter.

Sect. 2.
What evidence there is for them in the fourth century.

In the beginning, then, of the fourth age, when the church was quietly composed by Constantine, and settled in peace, we are sure a distinction was made in the habits and vestments of Divine service. For Constantine himself is said⁴ to have given a rich vestment embroidered with gold to Macarius, bishop of

Jerusalem, to be worn by him when he celebrated the service of baptism. And it was one of the accusations that the Arians afterward brought against Cyril, that he had sold it. Valesius thinks that it was not intended for an ordinary habit, whenever the bishop celebrated the office of baptism, but only when he performed the service of the great day of our Lord's baptism, which was the festival of Epiphany, held in great veneration at Jerusalem. This is not so likely in my opinion, but be it as it will, it makes no alteration in the case; for still it was a sacred vestment to be used in the celebration of the liturgy or Divine service, which is enough to the present purpose. Not long after, we find Athanasius accused by his enemies for laying a tax upon the Egyptians, to raise a fund for the linen vestments of the church. The thing is mentioned both by Athanasius himself⁵ and Sozomen,⁶ the one calling them linen sticharia, and the other linen tunicles, which are the same thing. Where we are to observe, that the accusation was not that he used such vestments in the church, but only that he laid a tax upon the people to provide them; which supposes them to be in use, else there had been no colour or foundation for such a charge against him. St. Jerom often mentions this distinction of habits as generally observed in his time. I urge not those words which he has in his Commentary upon Ezekiel, The religion of God has one habit in its ministry,⁷ and another for the common uses of life; because I think he is there speaking of the Jewish priests in opposition to the idol-priests of Isis and Serapis. But what he says in his book against Pelagius, plainly relates to the Christians: What harm or enmity, I pray, is it against God, if I use a more cleanly garment? If a bishop, presbyter, or deacon, or any other of the ecclesiastical order, come forth in a white⁸ vestment, when they administer the sacraments? He says also in his epitaph upon Nepotian, that Nepotian for his ordinary wearing used the pallium, the cloak that was in common use among Christian philosophers: but in his ministrations he used a tunicle,⁹ which he ordered his uncle Heliodore to send as his legacy to St. Jerom. St. Chrysostom also intimates that the deacons wore a peculiar habit in their ministrations, when he says, Their honour, crown, and glory, did not consist so much in their

¹ Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. 1. cap. 24. n. 1.

² Ibid. lib. 1. cap. 5. n. 2.

³ Aleman. de Parietinis Lateran. cap. 9. ap. Bonam, ibid.

⁴ Theod. lib. 2. cap. 27. Τὴν ἱερὰν τολὴν, ἕνα ταύτην περιβαλλόμενος, τὴν τῷ θεοῦ βαπτίσματος λειτουργίαν ἐπιτελεῖ, &c.

⁵ Athan. Apol. 2. p. 778. Πλάττονται πρώτην κατηγορίαν περὶ τιχαρίων λινῶν, ὡς ἐμὴ κανόνα τοῖς Αἰγυπτίοις ἐπιβάλλουτος.

⁶ Sozom. lib. 2. cap. 22. Πρώτην ὑπομένει γραφὴν, ὡς χιτωνίων λινῶν φόρον ἐπιτιθεῖς Αἰγυπτίοις.

⁷ Hieron. Com. in Ezek. cap. xliv. p. 668. Religio divina alterum habitum habet in ministerio, alterum in usu vitæque communi.

⁸ Id. lib. 1. cont. Pelag. Quæ sunt, rogo, inimicitia contra Deum, si tunicam habuero mundiorem? Si episcopus, presbyter, diaconus, et reliquus ordo ecclesiasticus in administratione sacramentorum candida veste processerint?

⁹ Id. Ep. 3. ad Heliodor. Hanc tunicam, qua utebar in ministerio Christi, mitte dilectissimo, &c. It. Epist. ad Præsidium Diaconum. Difficile est locum Stephani implere, et populos subjacentes candenti desuper veste despicere.

walking about the church¹⁰ in a white and shining garment, as in their power to repel unworthy communicants from the Lord's table. This implies that they had a distinct habit when they ministered in Divine service. And so it is remarked by Sozomen,¹¹ when speaking of the assault that was made upon the church by the enemies of Chrysostom, he says, The priests and deacons were beaten and driven out of the church, as they were in the vestments of their ministration. And there is among St. Chrysostom's works a homily upon the prodigal son, written by Severianus, bishop of Gabala, contemporary with St. Chrysostom, who, speaking of the deacons ministering in the sacred mysteries, says, They resembled¹² the wings of angels, with their veils or tippets on their left shoulders, running about the church, and crying out, Let none of the catechumens be present at the celebration of the mysteries, &c. In like manner Nazianzen, in his Vision of the Church of Anastasia, represents the deacons standing¹³ ἐν εἵμασι παμφανόουσιν, in their bright and shining garments. And in his will he leaves to his deacon Evagrius a κάμασον and a σχάριον, which were then the common names for these surplices or white garments used in Divine¹⁴ service. The council of Laodicea has two canons concerning the little habit called the orarium,¹⁵ which was a scarf or tippet to be worn upon the shoulders, and might be used by bishops, presbyters, and deacons, but not by subdeacons, singers, or readers, who are expressly debarred the use of it in that council. The fourth council of Carthage¹⁶ speaks of the alba or surplice, which the deacon is ordered to wear when the oblation is made, or the lessons are read. The council of Narbo¹⁷ mentions the same. The first council of Braga speaks of the tunica and the *orarium*¹⁸ as both belonging to deacons. And the third council of Braga¹⁹ orders priests to wear the orarium on both shoulders when they ministered at the altar. By which we learn, that the tunica or surplice was common to all the clergy, the orarium on the left shoulder proper to deacons, and on both shoulders the distinguishing badge of priests.

¹⁰ Chrys. Hom. 82. al. 83. in Mat. p. 705. Λευκὸν χιτῶνίσκου καὶ ἀποστίλβοντα περιβαλλόμενοι, &c.

¹¹ Sozom. lib. 8. cap. 21. Ἱερῶν δὲ καὶ διακόνων τυπτομένων τε, καὶ πρὸς βίαν, ὡς εἶχον σχήματος, ἐλαυνομένων.

¹² Chrys. Hom. 37. de Filio Prodigio, t. 6. p. 375. Τῶν μιμουμένων τὰς τῶν ἀγγέλων πτέρυγας ταῖς λεπταῖς ὀθόναις ταῖς ἐπὶ τῶν ἀριτερώων ὤμων κειμέναις, &c.

¹³ Naz. Sominium Anastas. t. 2. p. 78.

¹⁴ Id. in Testamento, ap. Brisson. de Formul. lib. 7.

¹⁵ Conc. Laodic. can. 22 et 23.

¹⁶ Conc. Carth. 4. can. 41. Ut diaconus in tempore oblationis tantum vel lectionis alba induatur.

¹⁷ Conc. Narbon. an. 589. can. 12.

¹⁸ Conc. Bracar. 1. can. 27. Quia diacones absconsis infra tunicam utuntur orariis, ita ut nihil differre a subdiacono videantur, de cætero superposito scapulæ, sicut decet, utan-

The fourth council of Toledo is most particular in these distinctions. For in one canon it says, That if a bishop, presbyter, or deacon be unjustly degraded, and be found innocent by a synod, yet they shall not be what they were before, unless they receive the degrees they had lost from the hands of the bishops before the altar. If he be a bishop, he must receive²⁰ his orarium, his ring, and his staff; if a presbyter, his orarium and planeta; if a deacon, his orarium and alba. And in another canon,²¹ that the deacon shall wear but one orarium; and that upon his left shoulder, wherewith he is to give the signal of prayers to the people. Where we may observe also the reason of the name orarium in the ecclesiastical sense, ab orando, from praying; though in common acceptation it signifies no more than a handkerchief to wipe the face, and so comes from ore, in which signification it is sometimes used by St. Ambrose,²² and St. Austin,²³ as well as by the old Roman authors. But here we take it in the ecclesiastical sense, for a sacred habit appropriated to bishops, priests, and deacons in the solemnities of Divine service, in which sense it appears to have been a habit distinct from that of civil and common use, by all the authorities that have been mentioned. The author of the Questions upon the Old and New Testament, under the name of St. Austin, speaks also of the dalmatica,²⁴ as worn both by bishops and deacons: but whether it was then a garment of sacred use, is not said by him or any other ancient writer, that I know of; and therefore I content myself with the proofs already alleged, as sufficient to show that in the fourth age a plain distinction of habits was made in the sacred service of the church.

The next considerable circumstance in their worship, was the posture observed in their addresses and adorations of God; and of this we find four kinds generally practised and allowed, viz. standing, kneeling, bowing, and prostration: for sitting, which some add as a fifth sort, was never allowed by the ancients as an ordinary posture of devotion. Standing was the

Sect. 3.
Four postures of devotion allowed by the ancients. First, standing, which was particularly enjoined on the Lord's day, and all the time between Easter and Pentecost.

tur orario.

¹⁹ Conc. Bracar. 3. can. 3. Non aliter accedat quam orario utroque humero circumseptus.

²⁰ Conc. Tolet. 4. can. 28. Episcopus, presbyter, aut diaconus, si a gradu suo injuste dejectus, in sancta synodo innocens reperiat, non potest esse quod fuerat, nisi gradus amissos recipiat coram altario de manu episcoporum. Si episcopus est, orarium, annulum, et baculum. Si presbyter, orarium et planetam. Si diaconus, orarium et albam.

²¹ Can. 40. Unum orarium oportet levitatem gestare in sinistro humero, propter quod orat, id est, prædicat.

²² Ambros. de Obitu Satyri Fratris. Et Epist. 54.

²³ Aug. de Civ. Dei, lib. 22. cap. 8. Vid. Pontium Vit. Cyprian.

²⁴ Aug. Quæst. Vet. et Nov. Test. qu. 4. t. 4. Quasi non hodie diaconi dalmaticis induantur sicut episcopi.

general observation of the whole church on the Lord's day, and the fifty days between Easter and Pentecost, in memory of our Saviour's resurrection. This custom may be traced as high as Irenæus, who derives it from apostolical authority. For the author under the name of Justin Martyr²⁵ gives this account of the use of both postures in prayer: Forasmuch as we ought to remember both our fall by sin, and the grace of Christ, by which we rise again from our fall; therefore we pray kneeling six days, as a symbol of our fall by sin: but our not kneeling on the Lord's day is a symbol of the resurrection, whereby through the grace of Christ we are delivered from our sins, and from death, that is mortified thereby. And this custom took its original from the times of the apostles, as St. Irenæus says in his book concerning Easter, wherein he also makes mention of Pentecost, during which time we kneel not, because it is of the same nature with the Lord's day, according to the reason that has been given. Not long after, Tertullian speaks of it,²⁶ as an observation, among many others, handed down from ancient tradition. And Cyprian may be supposed to hint it,²⁷ when he speaks of their standing in prayer.

It is mentioned also by Clemens of Alexandria,²⁸ and Peter, bishop of Alexandria,²⁹ who died some years before the council of Nice. He says, We keep the Lord's day as a day of joy, because then our Lord rose from the dead, and our tradition is not to kneel on that day. In the time of the council of Nice there was some disagreement about this practice, and therefore that council made a canon to bring all churches to a uniformity in this matter:³⁰ Because there are some who kneel on the Lord's day, and in the days of Pentecost; that all things may be uniformly performed in every parish or diocese, it seems good to the holy synod, that prayers be made to God standing. After this St. Hilary³¹ speaks of it again as an apostolical practice, neither to fast nor worship kneeling on the Lord's day, or the fifty days between Easter and Pentecost. Epiphanius says,³² that on the appointed days they prayed kneeling, but during the whole fifty days of Pentecost they neither fasted nor kneeled. St. Jerom reckons it³³ among the traditions of the universal church, neither to fast nor kneel on the Lord's day or Pentecost. St. Austin is a little doubtful as to the practice of the church universal,³⁴ but he assures us, that as far as he knew, all churches in Africa forbore fasting, and prayed standing, and sung hallelujah at the altar every Lord's day, and all the days of Pentecost, in token of our Saviour's resurrection. We find the same in St. Basil,³⁵ who derives it from apostolical practice. And Cassian³⁶ testifies of the Egyptian churches, that from Saturday night to Sunday night, and all the days of Pentecost, they neither kneeled nor fasted. And in another place³⁷ he gives the reason of this, because kneeling was a sign of deep repentance and mourning, which they omitted on those days out of respect and reverence to our Saviour's resurrection. Hence it was, that the author of the Constitutions³⁸ makes it one of his apostolical orders, that all men should pray three times, or three prayers, on the Lord's day standing, in memory of him who rose the third day from the dead. And from hence came that usual form so often mentioned by St. Chrysostom³⁹ and others, of the deacon's calling upon the people in prayer, Ὁρθῶς σῶμεν καλῶς, Let us stand upright with reverence and decency; alluding to the posture then commonly used in prayer on the Lord's day. How long this custom continued in the church, is not easy to determine: but we may observe it to be mentioned by Martin Bracarenis⁴⁰ in the sixth century, and the council of Trullo⁴¹ in the seventh century, and the third council of Tours⁴² in the time of Charles the Great. Nor do we meet with any exception to this rule all this time, save only one relating to the penitents, or those that were under the discipline of the church; who being, by their falling into scandalous sins, reduced to a ²⁵ Justin. Quæst. et Respons. ad Orthodox. qu. 115.

²⁶ Tertul. de Coron. Mil. cap. 3. Die Dominico jejuni-um nefas ducimus, vel de geniculis adorare. Eadem immunitate a die Paschæ in Pentecosten usque gaudemus.

²⁷ Cypr. de Orat. p. 152. Quando stamus ad orationem, &c.

²⁸ Clem. Strom. 7. p. 854.

²⁹ Pet. Alex. can. 15.

³⁰ Conc. Nic. can. 20.

³¹ Hilar. Prolog. in Psal. p. 189. Et hæc quidem sabbata sabbatorum ea ab apostolis religione celebrata sunt, ut his quinquagesimæ diebus nullus neque in terram strato corpore adoraret, neque jejuni-um festivitatem spiritualis hujus beatitudinis impediret: quod id ipsum etiam extrinsecus in diebus Dominicis est constitutum, &c.

³² Epiphanius. Expos. Fid. n. 22 et 24.

³³ Hieron. Dial. cont. Lucifer. cap. 4. Die Dominico et per omnem Pentecosten, nec de geniculis adorare, et jejuni-um solvere soleant.

³⁴ Aug. Ep. 119. ad Januarium, cap. 17. Ut autem stantes in illis diebus et omnibus Dominicis oremus, utrum ubique servetur ignoro. Ibid. cap. 15. Propter hoc et jejuni-um relaxantur, et stantes oramus; quod est signum resurrectionis. Unde etiam omnibus diebus Dominicis id ad altare observatur, et halleluia canitur.

³⁵ Basil. de Spir. Sanct. cap. 27.

³⁶ Cassian. Institut. lib. 2. cap. 18. Hoc quoque nosse debemus, a vespera sabbati, quæ lucescit in diem Dominicam, usque in vesperam sequentem apud Ægyptios genua non curvari; sed nec totis quinquagesimæ diebus, &c.

³⁷ Cassian. Collat. lib. 21. cap. 20. Ideo in ipsis diebus nec genua in oratione curvantur, quia inflexio genuum velut poenitentia ac luctus indicium est, &c.

³⁸ Constitut. lib. 2. cap. 59. Τρίς vel τρεῖς εὐχάς ἐπὶ ἅ τις ἐπιτελεῖται, ἀνίμης χάριν τῆ διὰ τριῶν ἀναστάτος ἡμερῶν.

³⁹ Chrys. Hom. 29. al. 4. de Incomprehensibili Dei Natura, t. 1. p. 375. Hom. 2. in 2 Cor. p. 740.

⁴⁰ Martin. Bracar. Collect. Canon. cap. 57.

⁴¹ Conc. Trull. can. 90.

⁴² Conc. Turon. 3. can. 37

state of penance, were not allowed this privilege of standing at prayers on the Lord's day, but were obliged in token of their humiliation to kneel at all times, not excepting the days of relaxation, as the fourth council of Carthage⁴³ words it in a canon made in this behalf. And so we have seen the concurrent testimony of all writers for the antiquity and universality of this practice.

At other times kneeling was the most common and ordinary posture of devotion. This may be concluded from the former exception of the Lord's day and Pentecost from this posture; for that implies, that at other times they used a different posture in their addresses to God. This was the usual posture of their ordinary morning and evening service on the weekly days, and on the stationary or fast days, which were called stationary days, not from their standing at prayer, but from their continuing and prolonging the exercise, in imitation of the military stations. The only difference between these days and the Lord's day was, that on the Lord's day all prayers were performed standing, but on other days some were said standing, some kneeling. In this sense we must understand St. Chrysostom,⁴⁴ when he speaks of the people's falling on the ground when they said the prayer for the whole state of the church, and their rising again at the bishop's invocation. And so the author of the Constitutions⁴⁵ represents them kneeling at the first prayer, and standing up at the second. In like manner Cassian⁴⁶ says the people performed their private prayers kneeling, and then rose up to the minister's collect or prayer, in which all joined standing. This is to be understood of their prayers on ordinary days, and not of the Lord's day, on which (as we have seen before) all their prayers were performed standing. As to the posture of kneeling upon other occasions, it would be endless to cite all the testimonies that may be alleged for it. It was so common among them, that the author of The Acts of Thecla⁴⁷ gives prayer the name of κλίσις γονάτων, bending the knees. And Arnobius, when he would describe to the heathen the manner of Christians performing their divine offices to God, does it by saying, They all fell down⁴⁸ upon the earth, as their custom was, and made their common prayers to him. Eusebius,⁴⁹ speaking of the great devotion of St. James, bishop of Jerusalem, says, He was wont to go into the temple alone, and there pray assiduously upon his knees, making intercession for the sins of the people, till his knees were grown as hard and callous as those of camels, by continual exercise of his devotions. And so again, speaking of the thundering legion, (who in the time of Marcus Aurelius procured rain by their prayers, to save the Roman army, and thunder to destroy their enemies,) he says, They fell upon their knees, as was the usual⁵⁰ custom of Christians in their prayers, and so made their supplications to God at the head of the army as it was going forth to battle. Tertullian had his eye upon this very story, when he tells Scapula,⁵¹ That the geniculations, or prayers on the bended knee, together with the fastings of Christians, were always effectual in driving away drought and famine. It were easy to give a thousand other instances⁵² of the like practice out of the ancient writers; but in a case so clear and uncontested, I think it next to impertinence to trouble my reader with them. I only note, that though these two postures of prayer were very indifferent in their own nature, yet it was always esteemed an instance of great negligence, or great perverseness, to interchange them unseasonably one for the other; that is, to pray kneeling on the Lord's day, when the church required standing; or standing on other days, when the rules and custom of the church required men to kneel. And therefore, as the canons of Nice and Trullo reflect upon those who were superstitiously bent upon kneeling on the Lord's day; so others, with equal severity, complain of the remissness and negligence of such, as refused to kneel at other times, when the church appointed it. It is a very indecent and irregular thing, says Cæsarius of Arles,⁵³ that when the deacon cries out, Let us bend the knee, the people should then stand erect as pillars in the church. These were but small observations in themselves, but of great consequence, we see, when done perversely, to the scandal and disorder of the church, whose great rule in all such cases, is that of the apostle, "Let all things be done decently and in order."

A third posture of devotion was bowing down the head, or an inclination of the body between the postures

Sect. 5.
Thirdly, bowing down the head.

⁴³ Conc. Carthag. 4. can. 82. Pœnitentes etiam diebus remissionis genua flectant.

⁴⁴ Chrys. Hom. 18. in 2 Cor. p. 873. Πάντες ὁμοίως ἐπ' ἰδάφης κείμεθα, καὶ πάντες ὁμοίως ἀνιστάμεθα.

⁴⁵ Constit. lib. 8. cap. 9. Ὅσοι πιστοὶ, κλίνωμεν γόνυ. It. cap. 10. Ἐγειρώμεθα δεηθέντες, &c.

⁴⁶ Cassian. Institut. lib. 2. cap. 7. Cum is qui orationem collecturum est, e terra surrexerit, omnes pariter surgunt, &c.

⁴⁷ Acta Theclæ, ap. Grabe, Spicileg. t. 1. p. 96.

⁴⁸ Arnob. lib. 1. p. 25. Hic propositus terminus divinatorum officiorum, hic finis, huic omnes ex more prosternimur, hunc collatis precibus adoramus.

⁴⁹ Euseb. l. 2. cap. 23. Κείμενος ἐπὶ τοῖς γόνασι, &c.

⁵⁰ Euseb. lib. 5. cap. 5. Γόνυ σέυτας ἐπὶ τὴν γῆν κατὰ τὸ οἰκεῖον ἡμῖν τῶν εὐχῶν ἔθος, &c.

⁵¹ Tertul. ad Scapul. cap. 4. Quando non geniculationibus et jejunationibus nostris etiam siccitates sunt depulsæ?

⁵² Vid. Hermis Pastor. part 1. Vision. l. n. 1. Genibus positus, &c. Clem. Roman. Ep. 1. ad Corinth. n. 48. Προσπέσωμεν, &c. Passio Ignatii, t. 2. p. 176. Cum genuflexione, &c. Passio Cypriani, p. 13. Euseb. Vit. Constant. lib. 4. cap. 61. Aug. de Civ. Dei, lib. 22. cap. 8. Chrys. Hom. 22. de Ira, t. 1. p. 278. Prudent. Cathemerin. Hymn. 2.

⁵³ Cæsar. Arelatens. Hom. 34.

of standing and kneeling. This was chiefly used in receiving the bishop's or priest's benedictions, in all direct and formal addresses to God for his mercy and favour upon the people, whether catechumens, penitents, or any other. Thus we find in the Constitutions,⁵⁴ the catechumens are bid to bow the head in order to receive the bishop's benediction in a form of invocation there appointed to be said over them. So likewise the energumens⁵⁵ have the same direction: Bow down your heads, ye energumens, and receive the benediction. In like manner the candidates of baptism⁵⁶ and the penitents⁵⁷ are bid to rise up, after the deacon's prayer, and bow their heads to receive the benediction. And this may be confirmed out of Chrysostom, who says,⁵⁸ The deacon in the time of the oblation presented the energumens, and bid them bow their heads only, to indicate, at least by the habit and gesture of the body, that they were in a praying posture. And this he repeats⁵⁹ in other places, where he particularly speaks of those that were possessed of evil spirits.

The last posture of devotion was prostration, or lying along in the humblest manner upon the ground. This seems to have been the proper posture for extraordinary humiliations, when men had some singular request more earnestly to recommend to God. We often read of Moses and other saints falling upon their faces in Scripture, when they were to make some extraordinary intercession for the sins of the people. And in imitation of them the same gesture was sometimes used in the Christian church. Some lapsers, when they sued for admission to a state of penance, did not only fall down upon their knees, but prostrate themselves before the faithful, to beg their prayers as they entered into the church. Which is particularly noted by Socrates⁶⁰ of Eccebiolus the sophist, who having lapsed in the time of Julian, desired favour under Jovian; and the more to move compassion, he put himself into the mournfullest posture, falling upon his face before the gate of the church, and crying out, Calcate me ut sal insipidum, Tread me under foot as salt that has lost its savour. But this was not the only case in which they used this mournful posture, but they also practised it upon other occasions, whenever any great necessity urged them with greater ardeny to prefer their petitions to God. Thus Socrates observes of Alexander, bishop of Constantinople,⁶¹ That when he was in a great strait about the admission of Arius into the church, he prostrated himself upon his face under the communion table, and there prayed to God for some days and nights together, that God would give some token to determine which of their doctrine was true: if the doctrine of Arius was true, he desired that he himself might not live to see the day appointed for the disputation: but if his own were true, then he desired that Arius might suffer the punishment due to his impiety. Which he accordingly did, voiding his entrails as he had occasion to go to stool, whilst he was going triumphantly to the church. Theodoret⁶² makes a like a remark upon the behaviour of Theodosius the Great, That when he first entered the church, after he had been for some time excluded by St. Ambrose, he would neither pray to God standing, nor kneeling, but prostrate with his face to the ground; using those words of the psalmist, "My soul cleaveth to the dust, O quicken thou me according to thy word." By which we learn, that this posture was chiefly appropriated to deep humiliations, and expressions of shame or sorrow upon some very remarkable occasion, but scarce ever used as a general practice of the church.

There is one posture more, which some plead for as a posture of adoration; but it never had any allowance in the practice of the ancient church: that is, sitting, which Cardinal Perron and some others in the Romish church pretend was the posture in which the apostles received the communion at its first institution, and this was then a common posture of adoration used among the heathens. But the learned Mr. Daillé⁶³ has abundantly exposed this pretence, and showed the falsity of it in every particular. For neither did the heathens sit at their devotions, as the cardinal imposed upon himself by a false interpretation of Plutarch and Tertullian; neither did the apostles communicate sitting, but lying along on beds or couches, which all men know to be a different posture; neither did they worship the eucharist in any posture; neither did the primitive Christians ever use or take sitting for a posture of devotion. Tertullian indeed says,⁶⁴ There were some superstitious persons in his time, admirers of the book called Hermes Pastor, who made it

Sect. 6. Fourthly, prostration.

Sect. 7. Sitting, no allowed posture of devotion.

⁵⁴ Constit. lib. 8. cap. 6. Κλιόντων δὲ αὐτῶν τὰς κεφαλὰς, εὐλογεῖτω αὐτοὺς ὁ ἐπίσκοπος εὐλογίαν τοιάνδε, &c.
⁵⁵ Ibid. Κλίνατε οἱ ἐνεργόμενοι, καὶ εὐλογεῖσθε.
⁵⁶ Ibid. cap. 7. Κλίναυτες εὐλογεῖσθωσαν, &c.
⁵⁷ Ibid. cap. 8. Ἀναπάντες κλίνατε καὶ εὐλογεῖσθε.
⁵⁸ Chrys. Hom. 28. sive 3. de Incomprehensibili, t. 1. p. 365. Κελεύει κλίναί τὴν κεφαλὴν μόνον, καὶ τῷ σχήματι ποιεῖσθαι τὸ σώματος τὰς ἱκετερίας.
⁵⁹ Chrys. Hom. 29. t. 1. p. 374.
⁶⁰ Socrat. lib. 3. cap. 13. Ῥίψας ἑαυτὸν πρηνῆ πρὸ τῆς πύλης τῆ εὐκτηρίῳ οἴκῳ, πατήσατέ με, ἔξοα, τὸ ἄλλας τὸ ἀνάσθητον.

⁶¹ Socrat. lib. 1. cap. 37. Ὑπὸ τὴν ἱερὰν τράπεζαν ἑαυτὸν ἐπὶ σόμα ἐκτείνας, εὐχεται, &c.
⁶² Theod. lib. 5. c. 19. Πρηνῆς ἐπὶ τῆ δαπέδῳ κείμενος, &c.
⁶³ Dallæ. de Objecto Cultus Relig. lib. 2. cap. 2.
⁶⁴ Tertul. de Orat. cap. 12. Item, quod adsignata oratione assidendi mos est quibusdam, non perspicio rationem, nisi si Hermas ille, eujus scriptura fere Pastor inscribitur, transacta oratione non super lectum assedisset, verum aliud quid fecisset, id quoque ad observationem vindicarem, &c.

a matter of conscience to sit down for some time assignata oratione, that is, not in time of prayer, as some falsely render it, but when prayer was ended, because they found the example of the pastor in that book to that purpose. For as he sat down upon a bed after prayer, so they thought themselves obliged to do the same in compliance with his example. But this is no proof of their sitting at prayer, but only after prayer was ended: and that too grounded upon a very weak and superstitious opinion, that every circumstance of an action or narration, however indifferent in itself, was to be drawn into example, and to be made matter of necessary duty. According to which way of reasoning, as Tertullian observes, they must have worshipped no where but where there was a bed, nor sat upon a chair or bench, because this would have been a deviation from their example. He adds, That the heathens only were used to sit after prayer before their idols, and for that very reason it was not fit for Christians to imitate⁶⁵ their practice. All which shows, that the Christians then were so far from using sitting as a posture of devotion, that they did not think it proper to sit even after prayer in the presence of God, whilst the angel of prayer (it is his phrase) stood by them; and because it looked more like a heathenish than a Christian practice.

Tertullian in the same book takes notice of some other superstitious observations, which some ran into in their devotions in imitation of the heathen. Some thought it necessary to put off their cloaks when they went to prayer, which he condemns as symbolizing with idolaters; for so the heathen⁶⁶ were used to do in reverence to their idols. This was superstition, not religion; and more an affectation and curiosity, than any thing of rational and manly service. Others would not pray without washing the whole body in water, as if that made them more acceptable to God; whereas the true purity was that of the spirit, to lift up holy hands, free from deceit, murder, cruelty, witchcraft, idolatry, and other such corruptions⁶⁷ which defile both flesh and spirit. A man that is free from these, is always clean, being once washed in the blood of Christ: but he that is inwardly polluted, is unclean, though he wash every member of his body every day. It is the superstition of these practices that Tertullian complains of:

⁶⁵ Tertul. de Orat. cap. 12. Porro cum perinde faciant nationes adoratis sigillaribus suis residendo, vel propterea in nobis reprehendi meretur, quod apud idola celebratur, &c.

⁶⁶ Tertul. ibid. Hujusmodi non religioni, sed superstitioni deputantur, coacta et affectata, et curiosi potius quam rationalis officii, certe vel eo coercenda, quod gentilibus adequent. Ut est quorundam positus penulis orationem facere: sic enim adeunt ad idola nationes.

⁶⁷ Tertul. ibid. cap. 11. Hæ sunt veræ munditiæ, non quas plerique superstitiose curant, ad omnem orationem etiam cum lavacro totius corporis aquam sumentes, &c for otherwise, the Christians themselves had their fountains before the church in many places, for men to wash their hands, as a matter of decency, before they went to worship God, as has been showed⁶⁸ in another place. And the evil of such practices consists not in the bare use of such things, but in laying the opinion of necessity upon them, and affixing holiness to the usage, and making them become essential parts of Divine service.

Such practices, therefore, as were attended with superstition, they disclaimed; but retained such other rites and ceremonies, as were either proper expressions of decency in their own nature, or by their significancy and symbolical use might be improved to a spiritual advantage. They prayed with the head uncovered, according to the apostle's direction, as esteeming it a great indecency to do otherwise. So Chrysostom, in his comment on the place. Tertullian adds another reason in his Apology to the Gentiles,⁶⁹ We pray uncovered, because we are not ashamed to appear with open face; making it a sort of testimony and symbol of their innocency in their addressing God without covering. On the other hand, as both nature and custom had made it decent for women to be covered, so they were very precise in requiring this to be observed especially in religious assemblies. Some pleaded an exemption for virgins in the case, which gave occasion to Tertullian to write his book De Velandis Virginibus, wherein⁷⁰ he argues both virgins and matrons to be under the same obligation of being veiled or covered in time of Divine service; and he severely inveighs against those who hanged a fringe or riband about their heads, and pretended to call that a covering. But some learned persons⁷¹ think he was too severe in this reflection, and almost singular in applying it to the case of virgins, who were then allowed a greater liberty in this matter above matrons or married women, by the general discipline of the African church.

It is more uncontested, what Tertullian observes of another ceremony, that they usually prayed with their arms expanded, and their hands lift up⁷² to heaven, and that sometimes in the form of a cross, to represent our Saviour's passion. For this is also noted by Minucius, when he says, They

Sect. 9.
That the ancients uncovered their head in their devotions.

Sect. 10.
And lift up their hands toward heaven, sometimes in the form of a cross.

⁶⁸ Book VIII. chap. 3. sect. 6.

⁶⁹ Tertul. Apol. cap. 30. Capite nudo, quia non erubescimus, precantes sumus semper, &c.

⁷⁰ Tertul. de Veland. Virgin. cap. 17. Quantam castigationem merebuntur etiam illæ, quæ inter psalmos, vel in quacunque Dei mentione relectæ perseverant? &c.

⁷¹ Vid. Du Pin, Bibliothec. t. 1. p. 95.

⁷² Tertul. Apol. cap. 30. Manibus expansis, quia innocuis, &c. It. de Orat. cap. 11. Nos vero non attollimus tantum, sed etiam expandimus, et Dominicæ passionis modulantes, et orantes Christo confitemur.

worshipped God with a pure mind, and their hands stretched forth in the form of a cross.⁷³ And by Asterius Amasenus, in a fragment of his homily concerning prayer, preserved in Photius,⁷⁴ who says, The Christian represents the passion of the cross by his gesture, whilst he expands his arms and lifts them up in the figure of a cross. After this manner Paulinus describes St. Ambrose,⁷⁵ in his last minutes, praying to God with his hands expanded in the form of a cross. And Prudentius, relating the passion of Fructuosus, a Spanish bishop and martyr in the time of Gallienus, says, The bands which tied his arms were first burnt off without touching his skin; for they durst not restrain those arms which were to be lift up to the Father⁷⁶ in the manner of a cross. And this probably is St. Chrysostom's meaning, when he says, The sign of the cross was used even by the emperors upon all occasions, on their purple, on their diadems, in their⁷⁷ prayers, on their arms, and at the holy table. And in reference to this gesture it is that Eusebius tells us, that Constantine ordered his own image to be stamped on his golden medals, representing him⁷⁸ in the posture of a supplicant, looking up to heaven, with his arms stretched forth to God. Origen says,⁷⁹ this was to represent the lifting up of their hearts to God in the heavens. And Chrysostom⁸⁰ more largely sets forth the use of it in explaining those words of the psalmist, "Let the lifting up of my hands be an evening sacrifice." What means, says he, the stretching forth our hands in prayer? Because they are instrumental in many sorts of wickedness, as fighting, murder, robbery, and rapacious avarice, therefore we are commanded to lift them up, that the ministry of prayer may tie them up from vice, and deliver them from wickedness: that when you are inclined to rob, or plunder, or smite your neighbour, you should then remember, that these hands are the advocates, as it were, which you are to send forth to God, and by which you are to offer the spiritual sacrifice of prayer to him; and therefore you ought not to dishonour them, and destroy their confidence, by letting them minister to wicked actions; but rather cleanse them by alms-deeds, and humanity, and assistance of those that are in want, and so lift them up to God in prayer. For if you cannot endure to lift up unwashen hands, how much less should you think it meet to defile them with sin! By all this it appears, that these ceremonies, both of washing hands, and lifting them up in prayer, were of spiritual use, and designed for pious ends, to put men in mind of internal purity by external symbols; and that this significancy was the chief thing that could justify and account for the use of them, as ceremonies in Divine service.

But as they allowed of such decent and significant ceremonies as those Sect. 11. But yet were great enemies to all theatrical gestures. that have been mentioned, so they were great enemies to all light and theatrical gestures. They required a modest, and grave, and well-composed behaviour in all external deportment, as thinking no other becoming the majesty of God, or the character of those that were to address him. Upon this account, Tertullian⁸¹ requires a modesty and humility in his votaries, even in lifting up their hands in prayer, that they should not toss them up indecently on high, nor appear with a countenance expressing elation and boldness: because the publican's humility and dejection was more commendable than the audaciousness of the Pharisee. He requires also a gentle and submissive voice, since God did not hear men for the sound of their words, or the strength of their lungs or arteries, but the fervency of their hearts. And they that were loud in prayer, he tells them, did nothing else but hinder their neighbour's devotion. St. Cyprian⁸² expresses himself much after the same way in his directions about the manner of praying: Let them that pray, says he, do it with an orderly voice, expressing quietness and modesty. Let us consider ourselves as standing in the sight of God, and that we are to please the Divine eyes both with the habit or gesture of our body, and with the manner of our voice. For as it is a sign of an impudent man to make a clamorous noise, so it becomes a modest man to use modesty in his prayers. Therefore when we meet together with our brethren, and celebrate the Divine sacrifices with the priest of God, we ought to be mindful of reverence and discipline; not tossing out our prayers with a rude and disorderly voice, nor with a tumultuous loquacity pouring forth those petitions, which ought to be recommended modestly to God. For God is not the hearer of the voice, but the heart: neither needs he to be re-⁷³ Minuc. Dial. p. 90. Crucis signum est, cum homo correctis manibus Deum pura mente veneratur.

⁷⁴ Aster. ap. Phot. Cod. 271. Ἐκτεταμένως προβαλλόμενος τὰς χεῖρας, τὸ τοῦ σταύρου πάθος ἐν τῷ σχήματι ἐξεικονίσει.

⁷⁵ Paulin. Vit. Ambros. p. 12. Ab hora undecima diei usque ad illam horam qua emisit Spiritum, expansis manibus in modum crucis orabat.

⁷⁶ Prudent. Peri Stephan. Hymn. 6. in Fructuos. Non ausa est cohobere pœna palmas, in morem crucis ad Patrem levandas.

⁷⁷ Chrysost. Demonstrat. quod Christus sit Deus, cap. 8.

t. 5. p. 838. Ἐπὶ εὐχῶν σταυρός, ἐπὶ ὕπλῳ σταυρός, &c.

⁷⁸ Euseb. Vit. Constant. lib. 4. cap. 15. Ὡς ἄνω βλέπειν δοκεῖν ἀνατεταμένως πρὸς Θεόν, τρόπου εὐχομένου.

⁷⁹ Orig. περὶ εὐχῆς. n. 20.

⁸⁰ Chrys. in Psal. cxl. p. 550. Vid. Clem. Alex. Strom. 7. p. 854.

⁸¹ Tertul. de Orat. cap. 13. Cum modestia et humilitate adorantes, magis commendamus Deo preces nostras, ne ipsis quidem manibus sublimius elatis, sed temperate ac probe elatis. Ne vultu quidem in audaciam erecto, &c.

⁸² Cypr. de Orat. Dom. p. 140.

mind by noise and clamour, who sees the thoughts of men. It appears from these cautions, that men were apt to run into disorders and excesses in the manner of expressing the external part of their devotions, which needed such rules and admonitions to direct them in the purest ages. And it appears yet more from St. Chrysostom, who has several sharp and severe invectives against some, who accustomed themselves to see the Roman games and plays, brought the manners of the stage into the church, and corrupted their devotions with theatrical gestures. It will be sufficient to relate a few words out of a single passage⁸³ in one of his homilies to this purpose. O unhappy wretch, says he, thou oughtest with reverence and fear to send up the angelical hymn, and with trembling make confession to God, and thereby ask pardon of thy offences. Instead of this, thou bringest into the church the manners of mimics and dancers, by a disorderly tossing up thy hands, and beating with thy feet, and agitation of thy whole body. Dost thou not consider, that the Lord himself is present, who measures every man's motions, and examines their consciences? Dost thou not consider, that the angels stand by this tremendous table, and surround it with fear? But thou considerest none of these things, because thy mind is blinded with what thou hast heard and seen in the theatres; and the things which are done there thou bringest into the rites and ceremonies of the church, and with insignificant clamours bewrayest the disorder of thy soul. How canst thou expect to incline God to mercy, who offerest thy prayer with such contempt? Thou sayest, Lord, have mercy on me, whilst thy behaviour proclaims itself a stranger to mercy. Thou criest out, Lord, save me, whilst the whole department of thy body is in opposition to salvation. For what can those hands, which are always tossed up on high, and disorderly rolled about, contribute toward prayer? What use can there be in vehement clamour, and violent impulse of spirit, that has nothing in it but sound and noise without signification? These are more the practices of strumpets on the high-way, or actors on the theatre. And how darest thou to mingle the sports of devils with that doxology, whereby angels glorify God? Thus far St. Chrysostom in his warmth and zeal against the corruptions that were creeping in upon devotion by absurd and ridiculous gestures. And this shows us abundantly, that as the ancients were no way averse to any rites and ceremonies, habits or gestures, that were decent and significant in their own nature, and had any real tendency toward piety; so they were utter enemies to such as were insignificant and trivial, light and theatrical, and discountenanced them as the effects of superstition or vanity, arising from misapprehensions of religion or evil customs of the world, which they laboured to extirpate, but could not always conquer; men's corrupt inclinations disposing them to commute the great things of religion for those that were small in comparison, and sometimes for those which were a real detriment and disadvantage to it, as in the cases now before us.

But to pass by irregularities, and proceed with the observations of the church. This were a proper place to take notice of several other usages, whereby they expressed their reverence to God at their first entrance into the church. But because some of these have been already considered in a former Book,⁸⁴ where we speak of the respect and reverence which the primitive Christians paid to their churches, I shall but just name them in this place. Such was the ceremony of respect used by kings and emperors, who laid aside their crowns and arms and guards, when they entered into the house of the King of kings. Of which I have only this further to observe here, that probably it was done in imitation of the old Roman magistrates, who, as some authors tell us,⁸⁵ were wont to lay aside their fasces and other ensigns of honour, whenever they went into the schools of philosophy at Athens. Such was that other custom of respect observed by the monks of Egypt, who put off their shoes when they went into the house of God: but this, I showed, was only a topical custom peculiar to that nation, and not a general one reaching the whole church. I observed also, that there are some reasons to believe the ancients used the ceremony of bowing towards the altar at their first entrance into the church, though the arguments amount only to a probability, not a demonstration.

It is more certain, that the bishop saluted the people in the usual form, Pax vobis, Peace be with you, at his first entrance into the church. For this is often mentioned by St. Chrysostom,⁸⁶ who derives it from apostolical practice.

St. Chrysostom also mentions another very laudable custom, and he uses all his rhetoric to promote and encourage the practice of it; which was, the people's giving alms to the poor, at their first entrance into the church. For this reason, says he, our forefathers appointed the poor to stand before the doors of our churches, that the sight of them might provoke the most backward

Sect. 12.
Of ceremonies used at their entrance into the church.

Sect. 13.
That the bishop saluted the people with Pax vobis, at his entrance into the church.

Sect. 14.
And the people gave alms to the poor, who stood before the gates of the church for this purpose.

⁸³ Chrys. Hom. 1. de Verbis Esai. t. 3. p. 836. Vid. Hom. 19. in Mat. p. 195.

⁸⁴ Book VIII. chap. 10.

⁸⁵ Vid. Pool, Synops. Criticor. in 2 Reg. v. 9.

⁸⁶ Chrys. Hom. 36. in 1 Cor. p. 652. Hom. 3. in Colos. p. 1338.

and inhuman soul to compassion.⁸⁷ And as by law and custom we have fountains before our oratories, that they who go in to worship God, may first wash their hands, and so lift them up in prayer; so our ancestors, instead of fountains and cisterns, placed the poor before the doors of the church; that as we wash our hands in water, so we should cleanse our souls by beneficence and charity first, and then go and offer up our prayers. For water is not more adapted by nature to wash away the spots of the body, than the power of alms-deeds is to cleanse the filth of the soul. As, therefore, you dare not go in to pray with unwashed hands, though this be but a small offence; so neither should you without alms ever enter the church for prayer. You, many times, when your hands are clean, will not lift them up to God, before you have washed them in water; so prevalent is the force of custom with us: let us therefore do the same with respect to alms-deeds: and though we are not conscious to ourselves of any great and heinous crimes, yet let us by charity clear our consciences of lesser spots and blemishes, which we contract in our daily business and conversation. So again in another place,⁸⁸ expounding those words, "Thou shalt not appear before the Lord empty:" These things, says he, were spoken to the Jews; and how much more to us! Therefore the poor stand before the doors of the church, that no one should go in empty, but enter securely with charity for his companion. You go into the church to obtain mercy: first, show mercy: make God your debtor, and then you may ask of him, and receive with usury. We are not heard barely for the lifting up our hands. Stretch forth your hands, not only to heaven, but to the hands of the poor: if you stretch out your hands to the poor, you touch the very height of heaven. For He that sits there, receives your alms: but if you lift up barren hands, it profits nothing. He repeats the same⁸⁹ in other places, which shows, that it was an excellent custom prevailing among them, and carefully recommended as a just preparation for prayer, among many other moral qualifications for this duty, which being vulgar and commonly known, I need not insist upon them in this place.

There was one observation more, which must not be omitted, because it was a ceremony almost of general use and practice: and that was, the cus-

Sect. 15.
That they worshipped toward the east. With the reasons for this practice.

tom of turning their faces to the east in their solemn adorations. The original of this custom seems to be derived from the ceremonies of baptism, in which, as has been showed before,⁹⁰ it was usual to renounce the devil with their faces to the west, and then turn about to the east, and make their covenant with Christ; from whence, I conceive, it became their common custom to worship God after the same way that they had first entered into covenant with him. The ancients give several reasons for this custom, but they all seem to glance at this one. Some say, the east was the symbol of Christ, who was called the Orient, and Light, and Sun of righteousness, in Scripture: and therefore, since they must worship toward some quarter of the world, they chose that which led them to Christ by symbolical representation. As Tertullian tells us in one place,⁹¹ that in fact they worshipped toward the east, which made the heathen suspect that they worshipped the rising sun; so in another place⁹² he says, The east was the figure of Christ, and therefore both their churches and their prayers were directed that way. Clemens Alexandrinus⁹³ says, They worshipped toward the east, because the east is the image of our spiritual nativity, and from thence the light first arises and shines out of darkness, and the day of true knowledge, after the manner of the sun, arises upon those who lie buried in ignorance. And St. Austin,⁹⁴ When we stand at our prayers, we turn to the east, whence the heavens, or the light of heaven arises: not as if God was only there, and had forsaken all other parts of the world, but to put ourselves in mind of turning to a more excellent nature, that is, to the Lord. This reason exactly falls in with that which is given for turning to the east, when they covenanted with Christ in the solemnities of baptism.

2. Another reason given for it by some, is, that the east was the place of paradise, our ancient habitation and country, which we lost in the first Adam by the fall, and whither we hope to be restored again, as to our native abode and rest, in the Second Adam, Christ our Saviour. This reason is given by Gregory Nyssen⁹⁵ and St. Basil,⁹⁶ and by the author of the Constitutions,⁹⁷ and the author of the Questions and Answers to Antiochus among the works of Athanasius,⁹⁸ together with Chrysostom, (as he is cited by Cotelerius⁹⁹ and Gregentius,¹⁰⁰) and many ⁸⁷ Chrys. Hom. 25. de Verbis Apost. t. 5. p. 369.

⁸⁸ Chrys. Hom. 1. in 2 Tim. p. 1631.

⁸⁹ Chrys. Hom. 9. de Pœnitent. t. 1. p. 704.

⁹⁰ Book XI. chap. vii. sect. 4.

⁹¹ Tertul. Apol. cap. 16. Inde suspicio, quod innotuerit nos ad orientis regionem precari.

⁹² Id. cont. Valentin. cap. 3. Nostræ columbæ domus simplex, etiam in editis semper et apertis et ad lucem: amat figuram Spiritus Sancti, orientem Christi figuram.

⁹³ Clem. Alex. Strom. 7. p. 856.

⁹⁴ Aug. de Serm. Dom. in Monte, lib. 2. cap. 5. Cum ad orationes stamus, ad orientem convertimur, unde cœlum surgit, &c. ut admoneatur animus ad naturam excellentiorem se convertere, id est, ad Dominum.

⁹⁵ Nyss. Hom. 5. de Orat. Dom. t. 1. p. 755.

⁹⁶ Basil, de Spir. Sanct. cap. 27.

⁹⁷ Constit. lib. 2. cap. 57.

⁹⁸ Athan. Quæst. ad Antioch. qu. 37.

⁹⁹ Coteler. Not. in Constitut. lib. 2. cap. 57. Ex Chrys. in Dan. vi. 10.

¹⁰⁰ Gregent. Disput. cum Herbaso Judæo. Bibl. Patr. t. 1. p. 217. Gr. Lat.

others. Now, this is the very reason assigned by St. Cyril for turning to the east, when they covenanted with Christ, and celebrated the mysteries of baptism. So that hitherto we find a clear relation of these ceremonies one to the other, and a perfect agreement between them.

3. Another reason assigned for this custom, was, that the east was the most honourable part of the creation, as being the seat of light and brightness. The author of the Questions and Answers to the Orthodox¹⁰¹ gives this reason for it: We set apart, says he, the most honourable things to the honour of God: and the east, in the opinion of men, is the most honourable part of the creation: we therefore in time of prayer turn our faces to the east; as we sign those in the name of Christ, that need consignation, with the right hand, because it is deemed more honourable than the left, though it differ only in position, not in nature. And Lactantius, without taking any particular notice of this custom, makes this general observation, That the east was¹⁰² more peculiarly ascribed to God, because he was the fountain of light, and illuminator of all things, and because he makes us rise to eternal life. But the west was ascribed to that wicked and depraved spirit the devil, because he hides the light, and induces darkness always upon men, and makes them fall and perish in their sins. Now, this is a reason that equally holds for turning to the east in baptism, as well as their daily devotion.

4. There is one reason more assigned for it, which is, that Christ made his appearance on earth in the East, and there ascended into heaven, and there will appear again at the last day. This is one of the three answers, which the author of the Questions to Antiochus, under the name of Athanasius,¹⁰³ orders to be given to this question: If a Christian ask the question, he is to be told, They looked toward paradise, beseeching God to restore them to their ancient country and region, from whence they were expelled. If a heathen put the question, the answer should be, Because God is the true Light, for which reason, when they looked upon the created light, they did not worship it, but the Creator of it. If the question was proposed by a Jew, he should be told, They did it because the Holy Ghost had said by David, "We will worship toward the place where thy feet stood, O Lord," Psal. cxxxii. 7, meaning the place where Christ was born, and lived, and was crucified, and rose again, and ascended into heaven. Which seems also to be intimated by St. Hilary on those words of the 67th Psalm, according to the translation of the Septuagint, "Sing unto God, who ascended above the heaven of heavens" in the east. The honour of God, says he,¹⁰⁴ who ascended above the heaven of heavens in the east, is now reasonably required: and for that reason toward the east, because he, according to the prophet, is the East or Morning from on high; that he, returning to the place whence he descended, might be known to be the Orient Light, who shall hereafter be the Author of men's rising to the same ascent of a celestial habitation.

These several reasons have all a peculiar reference to Christ: and therefore, as Christians first used the ceremony of turning to the east, when they entered into covenant with Christ in baptism; so it is probable, that from thence they derived this custom of turning to the east in all their solemn adorations. But whether this were so or not, we are sure there was such a general custom among them, and that it was founded upon some or all the reasons that have been mentioned; which is as much as is necessary to be said here for the illustration of it.

CHAPTER IX.

OF THE TIMES OF THEIR RELIGIOUS ASSEMBLIES, AND THE SEVERAL PARTS OF DIVINE SERVICE PERFORMED IN THEM.

THERE remains one circumstance more of Divine worship, which I have purposely reserved for this place, because the consideration of it will lead us to the several parts of the worship itself; that is, the circumstance of time: concerning which it may be inquired, how often they met in a week, and how often they met in a day, for Divine worship? Now, no general answer can be given to these questions, because the times of their assemblies varied according to the different state and ages of the church. At first, learned men think, they held assemblies every day in the apostles' time, and whilst the Jewish temple stood; for we read of the apostles going up to the temple at the ninth hour, being the hour of prayer, Acts iii. 1. And of their "continuing daily with one accord in the temple, and breaking bread from house to house," or in their house, mean-

Sect. 1.
No certain rule
for meeting in public, except upon the Lord's day, in times of persecution, for the two first ages.

¹⁰¹ Justin. Quæst. ad Orthodox. qu. 118.

¹⁰² Lact. lib. 2. cap. 10. Oriens Deo accensetur, quia ipse luminis fons, et illustrator est rerum, et quod oriri nos faciat ad vitam æternam. Occidens autem conturbatæ illi pravæque menti ascribitur, quod lumen abscondat, quod tenebras semper inducat, et quod homines faciat occidere ac intire peccatis.

¹⁰³ Athan. Quæst. ad Antioch. qu. 37.

¹⁰⁴ Hilar. in Psal. lxxvii. p. 242. Competenter nunc ascendentis super cælum cæli ad orientem Dei honor poscitur. — Ad orientem vero idcirco, quia ipse secundum prophetam oriens ex alto sit: ut regressus eo unde descenderat, oriens nosceretur, ipseque sit hominibus in hunc cælestis sedis ascensum rursus autor oriundi.

ing the church, or house of prayer, as others render it, Acts ii. 46. Though their most solemn meetings were on "the first day of the week," or the Lord's day, Acts xx. 7; 1 Cor. xvi. 2. In after ages, when the persecutions grew warm, they are thought to have confined themselves to the Lord's day. For the confession which Pliny¹ took from the mouths of some apostatizing Christians, mentions no other: they confessed to him, that the sum of their crime or error was, that they were used to meet on a certain stated day, before it was light, and sing a hymn to Christ, as to their God; and to bind themselves by a covenant or sacrament, not unto any wickedness, but that they would not commit any theft, or robbery, or adultery, or break their faith, or deny what was committed to their trust; after which they were used to break up their assembly, and return again to a common feast. Which is a plain description of their worship, and communion and love-feast, called agape, on the Lord's day, but no other. And so Justin Martyr,² describing the Christian worship, says, That on the day called Sunday, there was a general meeting of all that lived both in city and country, when they had the Scriptures read, and a sermon preached, and prayers, and the communion; but he mentions no assembly for public worship on any other day: whence learned men³ have concluded, that in his time the church observed no other days of solemn assemblies, but only the Lord's day. His silence as to all others, is a negative argument against them, unless perhaps some distinction may be made between the general assembly of both city and country on the Lord's day, and the particular assemblies of the city Christians (who had better opportunities to meet) on other days: which distinction we often meet with in the following ages, when Christianity was come to its maturity and perfection.

However, it was not long after Justin Martyr's time before, we are sure, the church observed the custom of meeting solemnly for Divine worship on Wednesdays and Fridays, which days are commonly called stationary days, because they continued their assemblies on these days to a great length, till three o'clock in the afternoon; for which reason they had also the name of semi-jejunia, or half-fasts, in opposition to the Lent fast, which always held till evening; and jejunia quartæ and sextæ feriæ, the fasts of the fourth and sixth days of the week, that is, Wednesdays and Fridays. These are first mentioned by Tertullian, and Clemens Alexandrinus, and Origen, and after them, by most other writers, as fast-days generally observed by the church. But I consider them not here as fasts, (which will be more properly done under another head, when we come to speak of the fasts and festivals of the church,) but here only look upon them as days of religious assembly, to discover what public Divine worship was performed on them. And for this we are chiefly beholden to Tertullian, who assures us, That on these days they always celebrated the communion; from whence we may infer, that the same service was performed on these days as on the Lord's day, unless perhaps the sermon was wanting. Some there were, he says, who objected against receiving the communion on these days, because they were scrupulously afraid they should break their fast by eating and drinking the bread and wine in the eucharist; and therefore they chose⁴ rather to absent themselves from the oblation prayers, than break their fast, as they imagined, by receiving the eucharist. Whom he undeceives by telling them, that to receive the eucharist on such days would be no infringement of their fast, but bind them closer to God; their station would be so much the more solemn for their standing at the altar of God; they might receive the body of the Lord, and preserve their fast too; and so both would be safe, whilst they both participated of the sacrifice and discharged their other obligation. Since, therefore, they received the eucharist on these days, we may conclude they had all the prayers of the communion office, and what other offices were wont to go before them, as the psalmody, and reading of the Scriptures, and prayers for the catechumens and penitents, which, together with the sermons, were the whole service for the Lord's day. But, because even all this could not take up near so much time, as must needs be spent in these stations, it seems most probable, that in two particulars they much enlarged their service on these days, that is, in their psalmody, and private prayers and confession of their sins. The psalms, as we shall see hereafter, were sometimes lengthened to an indefinite number, twenty, thirty, forty, fifty, or more, as the occasion of a vigil or a fast required, and between every psalm they had liberty to meditate and

Sect. 2.
The original of the stationary days, or church assemblies, on Wednesdays and Fridays, and what Divine service was performed on those days.

¹ Plin. lib. 10. Ep. 97. Affirmabant, autem, hanc fuisse summam vel culpæ suæ, vel erroris, quod essent soliti stato die ante lucem convenire: carmenque Christo, quasi Deo, dicere secum invicem; seque sacramento non in scelus aliquod obstringere, sed ne furta, ne latrocinia, ne adulteria committerent: quibus peractis, morem sibi discendendi fuisse, rursusque coeundi ad capiendum cibum, &c.

² Justin. Apol. 2. p. 98. Τῇ τοῦ ἡλίου λεγομένη ἡμέρᾳ πάντων κατὰ πόλεις ἢ ἀγροῦς μενόντων ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτὸ συνέλευσις γίνεται, &c.

³ Coteler. in Constitut. Apost. lib. 2. cap. 59.

⁴ Tertul. de Oratione, cap. 14. Similiter de stationum diebus non putant plerique sacrificiorum orationibus interveniendum, quod statio solvenda sit accepto corpore Domini. Ergo devotum Deo obsequium eucharistia resolvit, an magis Deo obligat? Nonne solennior erit statio tua, si et ad aram Dei steteris? Accepto corpore Domini, et re servata, utrumque salvum est, et participatio sacrificii et executio officii. Some editions read it, reservato, instead of re servata.

fall to their private prayers: and by these two exercises, so lengthened and repeated, it is easy to conceive how the longest station might be employed. Socrates⁵ says, At Alexandria on these days they had sermons and all other service used at other times, except the communion. But admitting they had the whole service entire, as on the Lord's day, yet it was not commensurate to the time of their stations, unless we suppose their psalmody and private devotions in the church to be enlarged on those days to a greater length, than was usual in ordinary service.

St. Basil⁶ agrees with Tertullian in making these days not only fasts, but communion days; for, reckoning up how many days in the week they received the communion, he makes Wednesday and Friday to be two of the number. Yet still it is hard to conceive what business they could have to detain them so long in the church; since their collects and public prayers were but few in comparison; and therefore it seems most probable, that a competent share of this time was spent in psalmody, and, as I find a learned person⁷ inclined to think, in private devotions, which always had a share in their service, and was generally intermixed with their singing of psalms, as shall be showed in their proper places. See Book XIV. chap. 1. Book XV. chap. 1. sect. 1.

We also find in ancient writers frequent mention made of religious assemblies on the Saturday, or seventh day of the week, which was the Jewish sabbath. It is not easy to tell either the original of this practice, or the reasons of it, because the writers of the first ages are altogether silent about it. In the Latin churches (excepting Milan) it was kept as a fast; but in all the Greek churches as a festival: I consider it here only as a day of public Divine service, on which, as the authors who mention it assure us, all the same offices were performed as were used to be on the Lord's day. For Athanasius,⁸ who is one of the first that mentions it, says, They met on the sabbath, not that they were infected with Judaism, but to worship Jesus, the Lord of the sabbath. And Timotheus, one of his successors in the see of Alexandria, says, The communion⁹ was administered on this day, as on the Lord's day. Which were the only days in the week that the communion was received by the Christians of his time at Alexandria. Socrates¹⁰ is a little more particular about the service: for he says, In their assemblies on this day they celebrated the communion; only the churches of Egypt and Thebais differed in this from the rest of the world, and even from their neighbours at Alexandria, that they had the communion at evening service. In another place, speaking of the churches of Constantinople in the time of Chrysostom, he reckons Saturday¹¹ and Lord's day the two great weekly festivals, on which they always held church assemblies. And Cassian¹² takes notice of the Egyptian churches, that among them the service of the Lord's day and the sabbath was always the same; for they had the lessons then read out of the New Testament only, one out of the Gospels, and the other out of the Epistles or the Acts of the Apostles; whereas, on other days they had them partly out of the Old Testament and partly out of the New. In another place he observes,¹³ That in the monasteries of Egypt and Thebais, they had no public assemblies on other days, besides morning and evening, except upon Saturday and the Lord's day, when they met at three o'clock, that is, nine in the morning, to celebrate the communion. In the council of Laodicea there are three canons to the same purpose. One¹⁴ appoints the Gospels, with the *σ*ner Scriptures, to be read upon this day. Another,¹⁵ That the oblation of the bread in the eucharist shall not be made all the time of Lent, except on the sabbath and the Lord's day. Which implies that those were communion days, and kept as festivals, even in Lent itself. And for the same reason a third canon¹⁶ orders, That no festivals of martyrs should be kept in Lent, but only commemorations of the martyrs be made on the sabbath and the Lord's day. The only difference that was then made between the sabbath and the Lord's day, was, that Christians were not obliged to rest from bodily¹⁷ labour on the sabbath, but might work on that day, (so far as Divine service would permit,) giving preference in this respect to the Lord's day, whereon they were to rest as Christians. And if any transgressed these rules about working on the sabbath, they were to be

Sect. 3.
Saturday, or the seventh day, anciently observed with great solemnity, as a day of public devotion.

⁵ Socrat. lib. 5. cap. 22. ⁶ Basil. Ep. 289. t. 3. p. 278.

⁷ Stillingfleet, Orig. Britan. p. 224.

⁸ Homil. de Semente, t. 1. p. 1060.

⁹ Timoth. Ep. Canon. can. 13. ap. Bevereg. Pandect. t. 2.

¹⁰ Socrat. lib. 5. cap. 22. ¹¹ Ibid. lib. 6. cap. 8.

¹² Cassian. Institut. lib. 2. cap. 6. In die vero sabbati vel Dominico utrasque lectiones de Novo recitant Testamento, id est, unam de Apostolo vel Actibus Apostolorum, et aliam de Evangeliiis.

¹³ Cassian. lib. 3. cap. 2. Exceptis vespertinis horis ac nocturnis congregationibus, nulla apud eos per diem solennitas, absque die sabbati vel Dominica, in quibus hora tertia sacrae communionis obtentu conveniunt.

¹⁴ Conc. Laodic. can. 16. Περὶ τοῦ ἐν σαββάτῳ εὐαγγελίου μετὰ ἑτέρων γραφῶν ἀναγινώσκεισθαι.

¹⁵ Ibid. can. 49. Ὅτι οὐ δεῖ τῆ τεσσαρακοστῆ ἄρτον προσφέρειν, εἰ μὴ ἐν σαββάτῳ καὶ κυριακῇ μόνον.

¹⁶ Can. 51. Ὅτι οὐ δεῖ ἐν τεσσαρακοστῇ μαρτύρων γενέθλιον ἐπιτελεῖν, ἀλλὰ τῶν ἀγίων μαρτύρων μνείαν ποιεῖν ἐν τοῖς σαββάτοις καὶ κυριακαῖς.

¹⁷ Can. 29. Ὅτι οὐ δεῖ Χριστιανοὺς Ἰουδαΐζειν, καὶ ἐν τῷ σαββάτῳ σχολάζειν, ἀλλὰ ἐργάζεσθαι αὐτοὺς ἐν τῇ αὐτῇ ἡμέρᾳ τὴν δὲ κυριακὴν προτιμῶντας, σχολάζειν ὡς Χριστιανοί· εἰ δὲ εὐρέθειεν Ἰουδαῖσται, ἕστωσαν ἀνάθεμα παρὰ Χριστοῦ.

deemed Judaizers, and are ordered to be anathematized by another canon of the same council. By which it appears that Saturday was kept weekly as a day of public worship, but not as a Jewish sabbath. Epiphanius¹⁸ mentions it likewise as a day of public assemblies in some places, but not in all. St. Basil¹⁹ says it was one of the four days in the week, on which in his time they received the communion. By all which we may perceive that the author of the Constitutions had a plain regard to the practice of the Eastern church, when he prescribed, that on every sabbath save one, (that is, the Saturday before Easter day,) and on every Lord's day,²⁰ they should hold religious assemblies, and keep them as the weekly festivals; that is, not only with psalmody, and reading the Scriptures, and common prayers, which was the ordinary service of the morning and evening of every day; but with sermons also, or preaching the gospel, and the offering of the oblation, and reception of the holy food; as he describes the service of the sabbath and Lord's day in another place.²¹

Now, as these were the two great festivals of every week, so they were commonly ushered in by the attendance of preceding pernoctations or vigils, which, as harbingers, went before to make preparation for the solemnities of the following days. These vigils were much of the same nature as the common nocturnal, or daily morning prayer, which was early, before it was light; and they only differed from the usual antelucan service in this, that whereas the usual morning service never began till after midnight, towards cock-crowing in the morning, these vigils were a longer service, that kept the congregation at church the greatest part of the night. These the Greeks called παννυχίδες; and the Latins, pernoctationes and pervigilia, watchings all the night. St. Chrysostom often speaks of these: Go into the church, says he, and there see the poor continuing from midnight to break of day; go, and see the holy pernoctations²² joining day and night together: behold the people of Christ, fearing neither by night, nor by day, the tyranny of sleep or the necessities of poverty. In another place²³ he calls them πάννυχτοι και διηρκείς πάσεις, the continued and perfect night stations, in opposition to the stations by day, which were but partial and imperfect. By these, he adds, you imitate the station of the angelical choir, whilst you offer up ἀκατάπαντον ἕμνολογίαν, psalmody and hymnody without ceasing to your Creator. Oh the wonderful gifts of Christ! The armies of angels sing glory to God above: and on earth men, keeping their choral stations in the church, sing the same doxology after their example. The cherubims above cry aloud, "Holy, holy, holy," in the Trisagion hymn; and the congregation of men on earth below send up the same: and so a common general assembly is made of the inhabitants of heaven and earth together. Their thanksgiving is one and the same, their exultation the same, their joyful choral station the very same. In which words he plainly gives us to understand, that the angelical hymn, "Glory be to God on high," and the cherubical hymn, or the Trisagion, as it was called from the cherubims thrice repeating the first words, "Holy, holy, holy," were part of their sacred service in these night stations: which, as I observed before, were but an earlier oblation of the ordinary morning service, wherein we shall find the angelical hymn amongst other parts of Divine worship always appointed to be used.

It were easy to make a long discourse here of the several sorts of these night stations, or completer vigils holding all the night through; for they were sometimes held upon extraordinary occasions of prayer, upon great emergencies and necessities of the church; instances of which the curious reader may find several in Chrysostom,²⁴ and St. Austin,²⁵ and Ruffin,²⁶ and Socrates,²⁷ and Sozomen,²⁸ and Theodoret.²⁹ Sometimes, again, they were kept as anniversary vigils to usher in the greater festivals of the Nativity, Epiphany, Resurrection, and Ascension of Christ, and the descent of the Holy Ghost at Pentecost; of which sort there is mention made in Tertullian,³⁰ Lactantius,³¹ Chrysostom,³² Socrates,³³ and many others. But the vigils we are here concerned to speak of, are only such as have some relation to the weekly service, of which number we may reckon those vigils of the sabbath and Lord's day the chief, because they returned constantly in the weekly revolution. Concerning which we have not only the forementioned authority of Chrysostom, but several others. For Socrates, giving an account of Athanasius's escape ¹⁸ Epiphanius. Epitom. t. 1. p. 1107. "Ἐν τισὶ δὲ τόποις καὶ ἐν τοῖς ἀββάσι συνάξεις ἐπιτελοῦσιν.

¹⁹ Basil. Ep. 289. ad Cæsaream Patriciam. So Austin, Ep. 118. Alibi nullus dies omittitur, quo non offeratur, alibi sabbato tantum et Dominico.

²⁰ Constit. lib. 5. cap. 20. It. lib. 8. cap. 23.

²¹ Ibid. lib. 2. cap. 59. p. 268.

²² Chrys. Hom. 4. de Verbis Esaiæ, t. 3. p. 865. Βλέπε παννυχίδας ἱερὰς ἡμέρα καὶ νυκτὶ συναφθεῖσας.

²³ Id. Hom. 1. de Verb. Esai. p. 834.

²⁴ Chrys. Hom. 20. de Statuis, t. 1. p. 252. et Hom. 40. in Juventinum, t. 1. 550.

²⁵ Aug. Confess. lib. 9. cap. 7. Ep. 119. ad Januarium.

²⁶ Ruffin. lib. 1. cap. 12. lib. 2. cap. 16.

²⁷ Socrat. lib. 1. cap. 37. lib. 5. cap. 11.

²⁸ Sozom. lib. 2. cap. 29. lib. 3. cap. 6.

²⁹ Theod. lib. 1. cap. 14.

³⁰ Tertul. ad Uxor. lib. 2. cap. 4.

³¹ Lactant. lib. 7. cap. 19.

³² Chrys. Hom. 30. in Genes. p. 421.

³³ Socrat. lib. 7. cap. 5. Vid. Euseb. de Vit. Constant. lib. 4. cap. 57. Hieronym. Com. in Mat. xxv.

out of the church of Alexandria in the night,³⁴ when the church was beset with soldiers to take him, says, It was evening, and the people were keeping their nocturnal vigils, because the next day was to be a synaxis, or church assembly. Therefore Athanasius, fearing lest the people should suffer upon his account, bid the deacon give the signal or call to prayer, and he commanded a psalm to be sung, and whilst they were singing their psalmody, the soldiers were quiet, and they all meanwhile went out at one door of the church, and Athanasius in the midst of the singers escaped untouched and fled to Rome. Athanasius himself³⁵ has the same story in his Apology for his Flight, where he says, some of the people were keeping their night vigil, expecting an assembly the next day. And Socrates in another place, speaking of these nocturnal vigils kept both by the Arians and catholics, says, they held them against the weekly festivals, the sabbath and the Lord's day,³⁶ on which days there were used to be general assemblies of the church. And because the Arians were allowed no churches within the walls, they sung their hymns in the streets and porticos of the city till the morning light, and then went out to their meeting-places without the gates. And the historian observes, That Chrysostom, fearing the Arians might gain ground upon the church by this practice, and draw away some of the more simple people, appointed some of his own people, who were used to nocturnal hymnody, to meet in the streets after the same manner; and to make the solemnity more splendid, the empress gave them silver crosses to set their lamps in, appointing one of her own eunuchs, called Brison, to be their protector: which so provoked the Arians, that they fell to blows upon it, and Brison and some others were slain in the engagement; which occasioned the emperor wholly to put down those Arian meetings, and leave the catholics quietly to go on with their vigils in the churches, as they had done before. From these accounts we may easily collect, both that there were such weekly vigils frequented by the more zealous and religious sort of people in all parts of the East, and also that psalms and hymns and prayers were the exercises, where-with they entertained themselves to the morning light. I might add many other testimonies out of Nazianzen³⁷ and other Greek writers, but these are abundantly sufficient to show us the practice of the Oriental church.

For the Latin church we have the authority of St. Jerom, who, interpreting the word "watcher," in Daniel, says, it signifies the angels, who always watch, and are ready to obey the commands of God: and he adds,³⁸ We also, by our frequent pernoctations or night-watches, imitate the office of angels. And it appears from him further, that women and virgins frequented this service, as well as men; for he advises Læta³⁹ to inure her daughter to these solemn pernoctations; only cautioning her to keep a guard upon her, and not let her wander from her side; for the same reason, I presume, for which the council of Eliberis⁴⁰ thought fit wholly to forbid women the observation of these vigils, because many, under pretence of prayer, were found to commit wickedness. There are many other passages in St. Austin, and St. Hilary, and other Latin writers, which speak of vigils; but because they may be understood either of private watchings in prayers at home, or of the common vigils of the ordinary morning prayer before day, I omit them in this place; only alleging that of St. Ambrose,⁴¹ where he seems to find this practice upon the imitation of Christ's example: The Lord Jesus, says he, continued all night in prayer, not that he wanted the help of prayer, but to set thee an example to copy after: he continued all night praying for thee, that thou mightest learn after what manner to pray for thyself.

But besides these stated vigils of the two weekly festivals, there was another sort of incidental ones, which came almost every week throughout the year, or at least were very frequent in some parts of it: those were the vigils of the festivals or anniversaries of the martyrs. Those anniversaries, as we shall see by and by, were always in great repute, and observed with the same solemnities of Divine worship, as the sabbath or the Lord's day; and therefore their vigils were also celebrated with the same ceremony, as the vigils or night stations of the two great weekly festivals. St. Chrysostom⁴² is an undoubted witness of this; for in a homily made upon one of these festivals, he takes notice of the preceding vigil, that had continued all the ³⁴ Socrat. lib. 2. cap. 11.

³⁵ Athan. Apol. de Fuga, t. 1. p. 716. Τοῦ λαοῦ τινες ἐπαννύχτιον, προσδοκωμένης συνάξεως, &c.

³⁶ Socrat. lib. 6. cap. 8.

³⁷ Naz. Carm. Iambic. 18. t. 2. p. 218. Orat. 11. de Gorgonia, t. 1. p. 183.

³⁸ Hieron. Com. in Dan. iv. 13. Significat autem angelos, quod semper vigilant, et ad Dei imperium sint parati. Unde et nos crebris pernoctationibus imitatur angelorum officia.

³⁹ Id. Ep. 7. ad Lætiam. Vigilium dies et solennes pernoctationes sic virguncula nostra celebret, ut ne transverso quidem ungue a matre discadat.

⁴⁰ Conc. Eliber. can. 35. Placuit prohiberi, ne fœminæ in cœmiterio pervigilent; eo quod sæpe sub obtentu orationis latenter scelera committant.

⁴¹ Ambr. Serm. 19. in Psal. cxviii. ver. 147. p. 740. Pernoctabat in oratione Dominus Jesus, non indigens precatio-nis auxilio, sed statuens tibi imitationis exemplum. Ille pro te rogans pernoctabat, ut tu disceres quomodo pro te rogares.

⁴² Chrys. Hom. 59. in Martyres, t. 5. p. 779. Ἐποιήσατε τὴν νύκτα ἡμέραν διὰ τῶν παννυχίδων τῶν ἱερῶν· μὴ ποιήσατε πάλιν τὴν ἡμέραν νύκτα διὰ τῆς μέθης, &c.

night: Ye have turned, says he, the night into day by keeping your holy stations all the night: do not now turn the day into night again by surfeiting, and drunkenness, and lascivious songs. And Sidonius Apollinaris⁴³ will testify the same, at least for some part of the western church; for, writing about the festival of Justus, bishop of Lyons, he thus describes both the observation of the day, and the preceding vigil: We met, says he, at the grave of St. Justus; it was a morning procession before day; it was an anniversary solemnity; the confluence of people of both sexes was so great, that the church, though very capacious and surrounded with cloisters, would not contain them. When the service of the vigil was ended, which the monks and clerical singers performed with alternate melody, we separated for some time, but went not very far away, as being to meet again at three o'clock, that is, nine in the morning, when the priests were to perform Divine service, that is, the service of the communion, as on a festival.

Sect. 5.
Of the festivals of martyrs. Their original, and what Divine service was performed on them.

And now that we have mentioned the festivals of martyrs, as days of public religious worship, we must take notice of their original, to find out how early they became days of solemn addresses to God, and in what offices of Divine service their observation consisted. These festivals were grown so numerous in the time of Chrysostom and Theodoret, that they tell us, it was not once, or twice, or five times in a year that they celebrated their memorials, but they had oftentimes one or two in the same week,⁴⁴ which occasioned frequent solemnities. The original of them is at least to be carried as high as the time of Polycarp, who suffered about the year 168. For the church of Smyrna, (whereof he was bishop,) in their epistle to the church of Philomelium, recorded by Eusebius,⁴⁵ tell them, That they intended, if God would permit, to meet at his tomb, and celebrate his birth-day, that is, the day of his martyrdom, with joy and gladness, as well for the memory of the sufferer, as for example to posterity. Tertullian speaks of these anniversary festivals, as observed in his time. We offer, says he, oblations for those that are dead, for their⁴⁶ natiivities on their anniversary day. And Cyprian⁴⁷ orders his clergy to note down the days of their decease, that a commemoration of them might be celebrated amongst the memories of the martyrs. And in another place⁴⁸ he says, They offered sacrifices for them, as often as they celebrated their passions, or days of martyrdom, by an anniversary commemoration. These sacrifices were the sacrifices of prayer, and thanksgiving to God for the examples of the martyrs, and the celebration of the eucharist on these days, and the offerings of alms and oblations for the poor, which, together with a panegyric oration or sermon, and reading the acts or passion of the martyr, if they had any such recorded, were the exercises and special acts of devotion, in which they spent these days. For these were always esteemed high festivals, and therefore the same service that was performed on the sabbath and Lord's day was always performed on them. They never passed without a full assembly, nor without a sermon or a communion, as appears from some of Chrysostom's homilies upon such occasions. To dissuade the people from intemperance, he bids them consider how absurd it was,⁴⁹ after such a meeting, after a whole night's vigil, after hearing the Holy Scriptures, after participating of the Divine mysteries, after such a spiritual repast, for a man or a woman to be found spending whole days in a tavern. The foundation of his argument is built upon this supposition, that they had received the eucharist in the church before, in celebrating the memorial of a martyr. And so Sidonius Apollinaris represents the matter in the passage just now cited from him,⁵⁰ That after they had kept the vigil of St. Justus the night preceding, they assembled again by day at nine in the morning, when the priests did rem divinam facere, offer the oblation, or consecrate the eucharist, as Savaro⁵¹ rightly interprets it.

But besides the usual solemnities of other festivals, there was one thing peculiar to these festivals of the martyrs: which was, that the history of their passions, as they were taken by the notaries appointed by the church for this purpose, were commonly read in the assembly upon such occasions. It was at least the common practice of the African churches. For St. Austin⁵² speaks of it as a usual

⁴³ Sidon. lib. 5. Epist. 17. Conveneramus ad Sancti Justi sepulchrum.—Processio fuerat antelucana, solennitas anniversaria, populus ingens sexu ex utroque, quem capacissima basilica non caperet, et quamlibet cincta diffusis cryptoporticibus. Cultu peracto vigilarum, quas alternate mulcedine monachi clericique psalmicines concelebraverant, quisque in diversa secessimus, non procul tamen, utpote ad tertiam præsto futuri, cum sacerdotibus res Divina facienda.

⁴⁴ Vid. Chrys. Hom. 40. in Juveninum, t. 1. p. 546. Theod. Serm. 8. de Martyribus, t. 4. p. 605. Chrys. Hom. 65. de Martyr. t. 4. p. 971.

⁴⁵ Euseb. lib. 4. cap. 15.

⁴⁶ Tertul. de Coron. Mil. cap. 3. Oblationes pro defunctis pro nataliis, annua die facimus.

⁴⁷ Cypr. Ep. 12. al. 37. Denique et dies eorum quibus excedunt annotæ, ut commemorationes eorum inter memorias martyrum celebrare possimus.

⁴⁸ Id. Ep. 39. al. 34. p. 77. Sacrificia pro eis semper, ut meministis, offerimus, quoties martyrum passiones et dies anniversaria commemoratione celebramus.

⁴⁹ Chrys. Hom. 59. de Martyribus, t. 5. p. 779.

⁵⁰ Sidon. Apoll. lib. 5. Ep. 17.

⁵¹ Savaro, Comment. in Sidon.

⁵² Aug. Hom. 26. ex 50. t. 10. p. 174. Quando aut passiones prolaxæ, aut certe aliqua lectiones longiores, qui stare non possunt, humiliter et cum silentio sedentes, attentis auribus audiant quæ leguntur.

thing, indulging his people liberty to sit, whilst they heard them read, because they were sometimes of a considerable length. And the third council of Carthage⁵³ made a canon to encourage the reading of them. Mabillon⁵⁴ gives several other instances out of Alcimus Avitus, Cæsarius Arelatensis, and Ferreolus, to show that they were read also in the French churches. Only they were forbidden in the Roman church by the decree of Pope Gelasius,⁵⁵ in his synod of seventy bishops, under pretence that they were written by anonymous authors, and sometimes by ignorant heathens, and sometimes by heretical authors, as the Passions of Cyricus, Julitta, and St. George. For which reason they had, by ancient custom, prohibited the reading of them in the Roman church. But this rule, it seems, did not then prescribe to other churches.

It may be further observed, that during the whole forty days of Lent, they had continual assemblies not only for prayers, but preaching also: as is evident from Chrysostom's sermons, many of which were preached by him successively one day after another throughout the greatest part of that season; as his homilies upon Genesis, and those famous discourses, called his Ἀνδράνες, preached at Antioch, in Lent, upon the occasion of a tumult, wherein the emperor's statues were demolished. And many other instances may be given of the same practice, of which more hereafter, under the head of preaching, in the next Book.⁵⁶ It is true, indeed, they did not always consecrate the eucharist in Lent, but only upon the sabbath and Lord's day, as we learn from the council of Laodicea,⁵⁷ which expressly forbids the oblation of the bread in Lent upon any other day besides the sabbath and the Lord's day. The reason of which was, that these two days were observed as festivals even in Lent itself; and they did not ordinarily consecrate the eucharist upon the solemn fasts in the time of this council: but instead of the consecration service, they had probably that which in the following ages is called προηγιασμένων λειτουργία, missa præsanctificationum, the office of the præsanctified elements, which was a shorter service for communicating on fast days in the elements that were consecrated before on the Lord's day festival, about which there is a particular direction in the council of Trullo, can. 52. So that one way or other they seem to have had both a communion and a sermon every day in Lent.

Then, again, the fifty days between Easter and Whitsuntide were a sort of perpetual festival, and observed with great solemnity, as days of joy, from the time of Tertullian, who mentions it, and triumphs over the heathen upon it, That besides the Sunday, which returned once in eight days, this one continued festival⁵⁸ of Pentecost was more than all the festivals the heathen could pretend to reckon up in a whole year. He does not tell us here, indeed, with what solemnity they observed this time, but in another place he assures us⁵⁹ they had solemn worship every day, and paid the same respect to it as they did to the Lord's day, in that they neither fasted nor prayed kneeling on any day during this whole interval, which was the commemoration of our Saviour's resurrection and ascension. Whence it is no improbable conjecture, that during this season they might have the same complete worship every day, that they had upon the Lord's day.

And this consideration will lead us to fix the date of the setting up morning and evening prayer daily in the church. For if the persecutions would give leave in Tertullian's time to keep fifty days together as solemn festivals; there is no reason to imagine that they could not as well meet every day for their ordinary devotions. And if Wednesdays and Fridays were then observed as stationary days, with more than ordinary attendance, as we have heard him declare before; there is little reason to question, but that every day might have an ordinary vigil or morning assembly. It was not long after Tertullian's time, that Cyprian⁶⁰ assures us, They received the eucharist every day; and he thinks, that petition in the Lord's prayer may bear this sense, when we say, "Give us this day our daily bread:" which was also Tertullian's sense of it before him.⁶¹ Now this is demonstration, then, that they had assemblies for public worship every day, since

Sect. 6.
Solemn assemblies for preaching and other acts of Divine worship held every day, during the whole forty days of Lent, and the fifty days between Easter and Whitsuntide.

Sect. 7.
Public prayer morning and evening every day in the third century.

⁵³ Con. Carth. 3. can. 47. Liceat etiam legi passiones martyrum, cum anniversarii dies eorum celebrantur.

⁵⁴ Mabillon, de Cursu Gallicano, p. 403, &c.

⁵⁵ Gelas. Decret. ap. Crab. t. 1. p. 992. Singularem cautela, secundum antiquam consuetudinem, in sancta Romana ecclesia non leguntur, quia et eorum qui conscribere nomina penitus ignorantur; et ab infidelibus idiotis superflua, aut minus apta, quam rei ordo fuerit, scripta esse putantur, sicut ejusdem Cyrici et Julite, sicut Georgii aliorumque hujusmodi passiones, que ab hæreticis perhibentur compositæ.

⁵⁶ Book XIV. chap. 4.

⁵⁷ Conc. Laodic. can. 49. "Ὅτι οὐ δεῖ τῆ τεσσαρακοστῆ ἡρτον προσφέρειν, εἰ μὴ ἐν σαββάτῳ καὶ κυριακῇ μόνον.

⁵⁸ Tertul. de Idololat. cap. 14. Ethnicis semel annuus dies quisque festus est: tibi octavo quoque die. Excerpe singulas solennitates nationum, et in ordinem texe, Pentecosten implere non poterunt.

⁵⁹ Tertul. de Coron. Mil. cap. 3. Die Dominico jejuniū nefas ducimus, vel de geniculis adorare. Eadem immunitate a die Paschæ in Pentecosten usque gaudemus.

⁶⁰ Cypr. de Orat. Dómin. p. 147. Hunc panem dari nobis quotidie postulamus, ne qui in Christo sumus, et quotidie eucharistiam ad cibum salutis accipimus, intercedente aliquo graviore delicto— a Christi corpore separemur.

⁶¹ Tertul. de Orat. cap. 6. Corpus ejus in pane censetur: Hoc est corpus meum: itaque petendo panem quotidianum, perpetuitatem postulamus in Christo, et individuitatem a corpore ejus.

they received the eucharist every day, which they did not use to consecrate but in public assemblies of the church. From this time therefore there is no dispute about the church's daily sacrifice of prayer in her morning assemblies; which, in after ages, are commonly called cætus antelucani, and vigiliae, and horæ nocturnæ, because they were a sort of ordinary vigils, or night assemblies, held before it was light, though not so early as those other sort of vigils, or night stations, before the sabbath and Lord's day, which were of longer duration, as has been noted already of them in its proper place.

As to evening prayer, public in the church, Mr. Mede⁶² thinks there is no mention made of it in Cyprian or Tertullian, nor in any writers before the author of the Constitutions and the council of Laodicea: he thinks the ninth hour of prayer, mentioned by Cyprian,⁶³ relates only to private prayer; which is very probable: and that Tertullian's nocturnæ convocaciones mean not evening, but morning prayers early before day; which is undoubtedly true: but then he seems not to have considered, that in Cyprian's time there was a custom among some of communicating after supper; for he plainly mentions it,⁶⁴ though he did not like the custom: and this custom continued among the Egyptians till the time of Socrates,⁶⁵ who speaks of it then as something peculiar to those churches. Now, if there was a custom in Cyprian's time of communicating after supper, there is no doubt to be made of evening prayer at the same time. Rigaltius,⁶⁶ and after him Bishop Fell⁶⁷ and Dr. Cave,⁶⁸ carry this custom of communicating after supper as high as Tertullian; but I think they mistake his words; for he does not say, that they communicated after supper,⁶⁹ but that Christ, at supper time, gave the command for the sacrament of the eucharist to all, though then they communicated in their morning assemblies, and received it from the hands of none but their governors. I lay no stress therefore upon this proof, but think the proof of evening prayer may be rationally deduced from that of Cyprian. After whom the author of the Constitutions not only speaks of it,⁷⁰ but gives us the order both of their morning and evening service, with which I shall present the reader in the following chapters. The council of Laodicea speaks of the evening service,⁷¹ together with that of the nones, or three in the afternoon, and orders the same service to be used in both. The Greeks commonly call it λυχνασία, and the Latins, lucernarium, because it commonly began at the time when the day went off, and when they lighted candles for the night. It is likewise frequently styled sacrificium vespertinum, the evening sacrifice, and missa vespertina, as those names are used to signify, in general, the service or prayers of the church. And these two, evening and morning, are the most celebrated times of the ancient daily service, which are to be found almost in every ecclesiastical writer; so that it is altogether needless here to insist any further upon them.

There remains one question more concerning those times of prayer, which are commonly called the canonical hours, that is, besides the forementioned evening and morning prayer, those that are called the first, the third, the sixth, and the ninth hours, with the completorium, or bed-time. They who have made the most exact inquiries into the original of these as fixed hours of public prayer, can find no footsteps of them in the three first ages, but conclude they came first into the church with the monastic life. So Mr. Mede,⁷² and Bishop Pearson,⁷³ who observes that Tertullian mentions the third, sixth, and ninth hours of prayer; but then he is disputing, as a Montanist,⁷⁴ against the catholics, and urging the necessity of observing the rules of the Montanists in all the heights of their austerities, and pretences of mortification and devotion above the church. And he does not intimate, that either the Montanists or the catholics observed these hours for public assemblies. Cyprian indeed recommends⁷⁵ these hours of prayer from the example of Daniel, and other arguments, to Christians, in their private devotions: but he does not so much as once suggest, that the church had then by any rule made these the stated hours of public devotion. That which evidently confirms this opinion, is an observation to be made out of Cassian, who particularly describes the devotions of these canonical hours, and the gradual rise of them. For they had not all their original at the same time. The first monks of Egypt, who were the founders of the monastic life, he assures us, never observed any other canonical hours for public devotion, but only evening and morning early⁷⁶ before day: all

Sect. 8.
The original of the canonical hours of prayer. No notice of them for public prayer, but only for private, in the three first ages.

⁶² Mede, Epist. 66. p. 840.

⁶³ Cypr. de Orat. Dom. p. 154.

⁶⁴ Cypr. Ep. 63. Ad Cæcilium, p. 156. An illa sibi aliquis contemplatione blanditur, quod etsi mane aqua sola offerri videtur, tamen cum ad cœnandum venimus, mixtum calicem offerimus?

⁶⁵ Socrat. lib. 5. cap. 22. ⁶⁶ Rigalt. in Cypr. Ep. 63.

⁶⁷ Fell, in dictum Cypriani locum.

⁶⁸ Cave, Prim. Christ. par. 1. cap. 11. p. 338.

⁶⁹ Tertul. de Cor. Mil. cap. 3. Eucharistiæ sacramentum et in tempore victus, et omnibus mandatum a Domino, etiam antelucanis cœtibus, nec de aliorum manu quam presidentium sumimus.

⁷⁰ Constit. lib. 8. c. 35.

⁷¹ Conc. Laodic. can. 18. Περὶ τοῦ, τὴν αὐτὴν λειτουργίαν τῶν εὐχῶν πάντοτε καὶ ἐν ταῖς ἑννάταις καὶ ἐν ταῖς ἰσπέραις ὀφείλει γενέσθαι.

⁷² Mede, Epist. 66.

⁷³ Pearson, Prelect. 2. in Act. Apost. num. 3. 4.

⁷⁴ Tertul. de Jejun. cap. 10.

⁷⁵ Cypr. de Orat. Domin. p. 154.

⁷⁶ Cassian. Institut. lib. 3. cap. 2.

the rest of their time they spent at work privately, joining private meditation of the Scriptures, singing of psalms, and prayers, continually with their labour. Not long after, the monasteries of Mesopotamia and Palestine set up the practice of meeting publicly at the third, sixth, and ninth hours for performing their psalmody⁷⁷ and devotions. But as yet there was no new morning service distinct from that of the old morning service before day. This was first begun in the monastery of Bethleem,⁷⁸ and thence propagated into others, but not received in all. And the completorium, or bed-time service, was utterly unknown to the ancients, as distinct from the lucernaris, or evening service, as Bona⁷⁹ himself proves against Bellarmine. So that these canonical hours came gradually into the church, and are all of them owing to the rules of the Eastern monasteries for their original. Therefore what a learned man⁸⁰ among ourselves says, must be taken with a little qualification, else it will not be true: "That the universal church anciently observed certain set hours of prayer, that all Christians throughout the world might at the same time join together to glorify God: and some of them⁸¹ were of opinion, that the angelical host, being acquainted with those hours, took that time to join their prayers and praises with those of the church." If this be understood of any rule or custom of the universal church for hours of public prayer, besides those of morning and evening, in the three first ages, it will not be true: but if it only mean, that there were directions given for the encouragement of private prayer at those set times, and that Christians generally observed them in private, it may be allowed; since not only Origen, but Cyprian, as we have heard before, writes in favour of them, and Clemens Alexandrinus⁸² says, some allotted set hours for prayer, the third, sixth, and ninth. So necessary is it to distinguish between public and private devotions, and between the first and the following ages, when we speak of canonical hours of prayer as appointed by the church universal. For even after they were set up in the monasteries, they were not immediately observed in all the churches. For Epiphanius,⁸³ speaking of the customs of the catholic church, mentions the morning hymns and prayers, and the evening psalms and prayers, but no other. So Chrysostom often mentions the daily service in the church⁸⁴ morning and evening; and at the most never speaks of above three times⁸⁵ a day for public assemblies. For thus he brings in a secular man complaining, and saying, How is it possible for me, who am a secular man, and pinned down to the courts of law, to run to church, and pray at the three hours of the day? In answer to which Chrysostom does not say, that the church had these three hours of prayer for laymen, and more for others; but he tells the man of business, that if he could not come to church, because he was so fettered to the court, yet he might pray even as he stood there; since it was the mind and the voice, and the elevation of the soul, rather than the lifting up of the hands, that was to be regarded in prayer. For Hannah's prayer was not heard for her loud voice, but because she cried aloud inwardly in her soul. This seems to intimate, that the church then only observed three hours of prayer, that is, the evening and morning, and, as I conceive, the nones, or three in the afternoon. For by this time, in some places, the church had received that hour as a stated hour of prayer, of which more by and by. Yet it was some time after this before these hours were admitted in the Gallican and Spanish churches. For Mabillon shows⁸⁶ out of Gregory Turonensis, that the sixth and ninth hours of prayer were not introduced into the church of Tours till the time of Bishop Injuriosus, which was not till the year 530. And it appears from one of the canons of Martin Bracarenis, that they were not in his time admitted into the Spanish churches. For he calls only⁸⁷ the morning and evening service the daily sacrifice of psalmody, at which all clerks were obliged to be present, under pain of deposition without amendment. This argues, that as yet the other hours were not established in the churches (but only in the monasteries) as canonical parts of the daily service. And it is observable further, that most of the writers of the fourth age, who speak of six or seven hours of prayer, speak of the observations of the monks only, and not of the whole body of the church. As St. Jerom,⁸⁸ where he describes the institutions of the monasteries erected by the famous Lady Paula, says, They sung the psalter in order, in the morning, at the third, and sixth, and ninth hours, and at evening, and at midnight. And giving directions in another place to Læta, how to educate her daughter in the monastic life, he prescribes the ⁷⁷ Cass. lib. 3. cap. 3.

⁷⁸ Ibid. cap. 4.

⁷⁹ Bona de Psalm. cap. 11. sect. 1. n. 2.

⁸⁰ Patrick of Prayer, part 2. chap. 11. p. 109.

⁸¹ Origen. περι εὐχῆς. n. 33, 35.

⁸² Clem. Alex. Strom. 7. p. 854. Ed. Oxon.

⁸³ Epiphanius. Εἰρημ. Fid. n. 23. t. 1. p. 1106. Ἐωθινοὶ τε ἤμωροι ἐν αὐτῇ τῇ ἁγίᾳ ἐκκλησίᾳ διηλεκτεῖς γίνονται, καὶ προσευχαὶ ἑωθιναὶ, λυχνικοὶ τε ἅμα ψαλμοὶ καὶ προσευχαί.

⁸⁴ Chrys. Hom. 18. in Act. p. 174, 176. Hom. 6. in 1 Tim. p. 1550.

⁸⁵ Ibid. Hom. 4. de Anna, t. 2. p. 995. Πῶς δυνατὸν, ἀνθρώπων βιωτικόν, δικαστηρίῳ προσηλωμένον, κατὰ τρεῖς ὥρας εὐχεσθαι τῆς ἡμέρας, καὶ εἰς ἐκκλησίαν ἐκτρέχειν, &c.

⁸⁶ Mabil. de Cursu Gallicano, p. 409.

⁸⁷ Martin. Bracar. Capitul. Synod. cap. 64. Si quis clericus intra civitatem fuerit, aut in quolibet loco, in quo ecclesia est, et ad quotidianum psallendi sacrificium non convenerit; deponatur a clero, &c.

⁸⁸ Hieron. Epitaph. Paulæ, Epist. 27. cap. 10. Mane, hora tertia, sexta, nona, vespere, noctis medio, per ordinem psalterium cantabant.

same hours to be observed in devotion.⁸⁹ And the like may be seen in St. Basil, Gregory Nyssen, Cassian, Cassiodore, and most other writers, nay, even St. Chrysostom himself, who speaks but of three solemn hours of prayer in the church, yet when he has occasion to speak of the monks and their institutions, he gives in much the same number of canonical hours as others do. He tells us,⁹⁰ they had their midnight hymns, their morning prayers, their third, and sixth, and ninth hours, and last of all their evening prayers. But I will not deny that by this time these hours of prayers might in some places of the East be admitted into the churches. For the author of the Constitutions has different directions upon this point: in some places⁹¹ he speaks only of morning and evening prayer in the church; but in another he prescribes this rule to be observed by the bishops in the church: Ye shall make prayers⁹² in the morning, and at the third hour, and the sixth, and the ninth, and at evening, and at cock-crowing. In the morning giving thanks to the Lord for that he hath enlightened you, removing the night, and bringing in the day: at the third hour, because at that time the Lord received sentence of condemnation from Pilate: at the sixth hour, because at that time, after the Lord was crucified, all things were shaken and moved with horror and astonishment at the audacious fact of the impious Jews, detesting the affront that was put upon their Lord: at evening giving thanks to God, who hath given the night to be a rest from our daily labours: at cock-crowing, because that hour brings the welcome news of the day, to work the works of light. If you cannot go to church because of the infidels, you shall assemble in a house: or if you can neither assemble in a house, nor in the church, then let every one sing, read, and pray by himself; or two or three together: "For where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them." One may conjecture from this passage, that this author, living in the time when these canonical hours began to be in request, in the beginning of the fourth century, found them to be admitted into the usage of some churches, and therefore drew his scheme of directions in conformity to their practice.

And it being allowed, that about this time they began gradually to take place in the church, it will not be amiss to take a short view of them in particular, and examine what parts of Divine service were performed in each of them. Cassian, speaking of the first institution of them in the monasteries of Mesopotamia and Palestine, where they had their first birth, says⁹³ they were appointed to be celebrated with the singing of three psalms at every meeting. And these, intermixed with some prayers, were the whole service. So that these were but short offices in comparison of the ancient morning and evening service. And there is reason to believe, that the church did not precisely follow these monastic rules, but made proper offices for herself to be used upon these occasions, partly because the monastic offices were very different from one another, and not always chosen with the greatest discretion. Of which I need but give one proof here out of the council of Braga, which made a canon to this purpose,⁹⁴ That by common consent one and the same order of singing should be observed in the morning and evening offices, and that the private and different customs of the monasteries should not be mingled with the rules of the church.

The Gallican church, in the time of the second council of Tours, it is certain, had a very different rule from that of the Eastern monasteries about the number of psalms, hymns, and antiphonas to be said at the several hours and times of prayer. For in one of the canons of that council,⁹⁵ about the year 567, a very peculiar order was made, that the method of psalmody and number of hymns should be in proportion to the number of the hours or months in which they were used: the new morning service was to be performed with six antiphonas and two psalms in the height of summer; in September, there were to be seven antiphonas and two psalms; in October, eight antiphonas and three psalms; in November, nine and three psalms; in December, ten and three psalms; and the same in January and February, until Easter. So again at the sixth hour there were to be six psalms and the hallelujah, and at the twelfth hour twelve psalms

Sect. 9.
What service was allotted to these canonical hours by the church.

⁸⁹ Hieron. Ep. 7. ad Lætam. Assuescat exemplo ad orationes et psalmos nocte consurgere, mane hymnos canere, tertia, sexta, nona hora stare in acie, quasi bellatricem Christi; accensaque lucerna reddere sacrificium vespertinum.

⁹⁰ Chrys. Hom. 14. in 1 Tim. p. 1599.

⁹¹ Constit. lib. 2. cap. 59. lib. 8. cap. 35.

⁹² Ibid. cap. 34.

⁹³ Cassian. Institut. lib. 3. cap. 3. Itaque in Palæstinæ vel Mesopotamiæ monasteriis, ac totius Orientis, supradictarum horarum solemnitates trinis psalmis quotidie finiuntur.

⁹⁴ Conc. Bracarens. I. can. 19. Placuit omnibus communi consensu, ut unus atque idem psallendi ordo in matutinis vel vespertinis officiis teneatur, et non diversæ ac privatæ monasteriorum consuetudines contra ecclesiasticas regulas sint permixtæ, vel cum ecclesiasticis regulis sint permixtæ.

⁹⁵ Conc. Turon. 2. can. 19. Iste ordo psallendi servetur, ut in diebus æstivis ad matutinum sex antiphonæ binis psalmis explicentur. Toto augusto manicationes fiant, quia festivitates sunt et missæ. Septembri septem antiphonæ explicentur binis psalmis; Octobri octo ternis psalmis; Novembri novem ternis psalmis: Decembri decem ternis psalmis: Januario et Febuario, itidem usque ad Pascha.— Superest, ut vel duodecim psalmi expediuntur ad matutinum, quia patrum statuta præceperunt ut ad sextam sex psalmi dicantur cum alleluia; et ad duodecimam duodecim, itemque cum alleluia, &c.

and the hallelujah. And in the whole month of August, there should be manications, that is, as Mabillon⁹⁶ explains it out of Aimoinus,⁹⁷ early manins, or morning service, without any psalms, because it was harvest time, and men were in haste to be gone to their labour, when they had performed the solemnity of the festivals, which in that month were frequent above others. This shows, that no certain rule was at first observed about these canonical hours, but that they varied both as to their number and service in their first original.

The first of these offices was the matutina, or prima, the new morning service, so called in contradistinction to the old morning service, which was always early before day; whereas this was after the day was begun. Cassian⁹⁸ tells us, this was first set up in the monastery of Bethleem, for till that time the morning service used to end with the old nocturnal psalms and prayers and the daily vigils, after which they used to betake themselves to rest till the third hour, which was the first hour of diurnal prayer, till this new office of morning prayer was set up within Cassian's memory, to prevent some inconveniences, which he there mentions. He often gives it the name therefore of novella sollemnitatis, the new solemnity, as being so lately invented. And this is the true reason why, in most of the writers before Cassian, such as St. Jerom, the author of the Constitutions, St. Basil, and others who speak particularly of the canonical hours, there is no mention of this first hour, but they always reckon them up after this manner, the morning, meaning the morning vigil before day, the third, the sixth, the ninth, without mentioning the first, because it was not in their time as yet become an accustomed hour of prayer. But when it was once made a canonical hour, to complete the number of seven times a day, then there were psalms particularly appointed for this service, which Cassian⁹⁹ says were these three, the fiftieth, sixty-second, and eighty-ninth; which, according to our computation, are the fifty-first, sixty-third, and ninetieth. The first of which, is that which the ancients called properly the psalm of confession, or penitential psalm, which begins, "Have mercy upon me, O God, after thy great goodness: according to the multitude of thy mercies, do away mine offences." This, Cassian says in the same place, was used by all the churches of Italy in his time as the close of this morning service. The second of these psalms is that which the ancients called by a peculiar name, the morning psalm, as we shall see hereafter, because it begins with those words, "O God, my God, early will I awake unto thee," or, "early will I seek thee;" and was always used in the old antelucan service before this new service was set up. The third of these psalms, which is the ninetieth, seems to be taken into this service upon the account of those words in it suiting the state of human life, "In the morning it is green, and groweth up, but in the evening it is cut down, dried up, and withered:" and, "So teach us to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom."

Next after this, in all such churches as admitted the first, was the tertia, or third hour, that is, nine in the morning: this is mentioned by all the writers that say any thing of hours of prayer; some saying it was to be observed in regard¹⁰⁰ to our Saviour's being condemned by Pilate at that time; and others, in memory of the Holy Ghost's coming upon the apostles¹⁰¹ at that hour: that men might with one mind worship the Holy Spirit, and beg of him the same sanctification, direction, and protection, imitating David's prayer, in saying, "Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me," Psal. li.: in another place, "Let thy loving Spirit lead me forth into the land of righteousness," Psal. cxliii. This is the reason assigned by Cassian and St. Basil for this solemnity. But whether any particular psalms were appropriated to this service, we are not told, but only in general Cassian says, three psalms, together with prayers, were appointed for every hour. But on all festivals this service was omitted, because on Sundays the communion service was used, which always began at this hour.

The next hour was the sixth, or noon-day service. At which time, St. Basil says,¹⁰² they used the 90th or 91st Psalm, praying for protection against the incursions of the noon-day devil, δαμονίε μισημβρινοῦ, for so the Septuagint and other translations render the words of that Psalm, "Thou shalt not be afraid for any terror by night, nor for the arrow that flieth by day; nor for the pestilence that walketh in darkness, nor for the sickness, nor the devil destroying at noon-day." What other psalms they ⁹⁶ Mabil. de Cursu Gallicano, n. 54. p. 422.

⁹⁷ Aimoin. Hist. Francor. lib. 3. cap. 81. Porro toto Augusto, propter crebras festivitates, maniciones fiebant. Manicare autem mane surgere dicitur.

⁹⁸ Cassian. Institut. lib. 3. cap. 4. Sciendum tamen hanc matutinam, quæ nunc observatur in Occiduis vel maxime regionibus, canonicam functionem, nostro tempore, in nostro quoque monasterio primitus institutam, ubi Dominus noster Jesus Christus natus ex virgine.—Usque ad illud enim tempus, hac sollemnitate matutina, quæ expletis noc-turnis psalmis et orationibus post modicum temporis intervallum solet in Gallia monasteriis celebrari, cum quotidianis vigiliis pariter consummata, reliquas horas reflectioni corporum deputatas, a majoribus nostris invenimus.

⁹⁹ Cassian. lib. 3. cap. 6. Quinquagesimum vero psalmum, et sexagesimum secundum, et octogesimum nonum huic novellæ sollemnitati novimus fuisse deputatos.

¹⁰⁰ See the author of the Constitutions, lib. 8. c. 34.

¹⁰¹ Basil. Regul. Major. qu. 37. Cassian. Institut. lib. 3. c. 3.

¹⁰² Basil. ibid.

Sect. 10.
Of the matutina,
or prima, called the
new morning service.

Sect. 11.
Of the tertia, or third hour of prayer.

Sect. 12.
Of the sixth hour,
or noon-day service.

used he tells us not, but probably they might be some that had relation to the death of Christ, because it is agreed by all, that this service was appointed in commemoration of our Saviour's immaculate sacrifice to the Father at this hour.

The last hour of prayer in the day-time, was the ninth hour, that is, three in the afternoon, at which time our Saviour expired upon the cross, and by his death triumphed over death and hell. At this hour Cornelius was praying, when he was visited by an angel: as Peter was at the sixth hour, when he had the vision of the sheet let down from heaven. This was the hour when Peter and John went up into the temple, "at the ninth hour, being the hour of prayer," and the usual time of the Jewish evening sacrifice. In regard to all which the church seems to have taken this hour for a solemn time of public prayer before the two last mentioned. For the council of Laodicea¹⁰³ expressly mentions the ninth hour of prayer, and orders that the same service should be used in that as was appointed for evening prayer. And St. Chrysostom, speaking of three hours¹⁰⁴ of public prayer in the day, may most reasonably be understood to intend this ninth hour as the third of them; because in another place he seems¹⁰⁵ to recommend it as such: for, speaking of the apostles going into the temple at the ninth hour, being the hour of prayer, he says, They observed this hour not without very good reason: for I have often told you concerning this hour, that it was the time when paradise was opened, and the thief entered into it; this the time when the curse was taken away, when the sacrifice of the world was offered, when the darkness was dissolved, and the light, as well sensible as spiritual, shone forth. It was at the ninth hour, when others, after dinner and drunkenness, sleep a deep sleep, that they then, being sober and vigilant, and fervent in love, made haste to prayer. And if they needed to be so exact and assiduous in prayer, who had such boldness, and were conscious of no evil; what shall we do, who are overrun with wounds and sores, and neglect to use the medicine of prayer? This character here given of the ninth hour, makes it probable to me, that this was one of those three famous hours of prayer, which in the former place he exhorts all men to frequent in public. We have no particular account in any writer, of the psalms or prayers to be used at this hour, but only what we have heard before out of the council of Laodicea, that it was to be the same with the evening service; and therefore we must draw our accounts of it from thence. Now, because we have a more ample and distinct account of the morning and evening daily service, than of any other stated hours of prayer in the ancient church, (as being both more ancient and more celebrated than the rest,) I shall give a more particular and exact description of the several parts, and method of performing those offices, from such records as may be depended on for their truth and fidelity; and have therefore reserved the consideration of these for the two following chapters.

CHAPTER X.

THE ORDER OF THEIR DAILY MORNING SERVICE.

THE most noted and usual times of meeting, besides those of the Lord's day, were the morning and evening of every day, which in times of peace were constantly and regularly observed. I will describe the order of these services, as they are laid down in the Constitutions, and compare the several parts of them with the memorials and accounts that are left us by other ancient writers. The order for the morning service begins with the appointment of the ψαλμός ὀρθρινός, the morning psalm, as the author of the Constitutions terms it.¹ He names not what psalm it was in this place, but in another place he calls it the sixty-second; that is, in our division, the sixty-third. Which (to show how proper it was to begin their morning service with, both in relation to the night past and the day approaching) I think it not improper to recite in this place, according to our old version, which comes nearest to the translation of the Septuagint used in the ancient church.

Sect. 1. The order of morning service, as described in the Constitutions. This began with the sixty-third Psalm.

PSALM LXIII.

- 1 O God, thou art my God: early will I seek thee.
- 2 My soul thirsteth for thee, my flesh also longeth after thee, in a barren and dry land, where no water is.
- 3 Thus have I looked for thee in holiness; that I might behold thy power and glory.
- 4 For thy lovingkindness is better than the life itself: my lips shall praise thee.
- 5 As long as I live will I magnify thee on this manner, and lift up my hands in thy name.
- 6 My soul shall be satisfied even as it were with marrow and fatness, when my mouth praiseth thee with joyful lips.
- 7 Have I not remembered thee in my bed, and thought upon thee when I was waking?
- 8 Because thou hast been my helper, therefore under the shadow of thy wings will I rejoice.

¹⁰³ Conc. Laodic. can. 18.

¹⁰⁴ Chrys. Hom. 14. in 1 Tim. p. 1599.

¹⁰⁵ Ibid. Hom. 12. De Inscriptiōne Act. Apost. t. 5. p. 176.

¹ Constit. lib. 8. cap. 37. Confer. lib. 2. c. 59.

9 My soul hangeth upon thee: thy right hand hath upholden me.

10 These also that seek the hurt of my soul, they shall go under the earth.

11 Let them fall (Septuagint, They shall fall) upon the edge of the sword, that they may be a portion for foxes.

12 But the king shall rejoice in God; all they also that swear by him shall be commended: but the mouth of them that speak lies shall be stopped.

Sect. 2.
What notice we have of this morning psalm in other writers.

St. Chrysostom shows that the author of the Constitutions does not impose upon us in this morning psalm: for he says,² The fathers of the church appointed it to be said every morning, as a spiritual song and medicine to blot out our sins; to kindle in us a desire of God; to raise our souls, and inflame them with a mighty fire of devotion; to make us overflow with goodness and love, and send us with such preparation to approach and appear before God. He names not the psalm, but he repeats the first words, "O God, my God, early will I awake unto thee. My soul thirsteth for thee." And, "Thus have I appeared before thee in holiness, that I might behold thy power and glory." By which we may know that it is the same psalm. He says, he had before made an exposition upon this psalm; and refers his reader thither for a larger account of it: but that, by injury of time, is now lost, and we are beholden to this passage by the by for all the notice we have of this morning psalm out of him, upon the occasion of his commenting upon the evening psalm; of which more hereafter, in its proper place. Besides Chrysostom, we have the testimony of Cassian for the use of this psalm; for, speaking of the several hours of prayer, and assigning reasons out of Scripture for them, he makes this to be one reason for morning prayer, that the psalm, which was daily sung in that office,³ did properly instruct men about their obligations to this duty, saying, "O God, my God, early will I seek thee." And Athanasius also once or twice recommends this psalm to virgins and others, as proper to be said privately in their morning devotions. Rising early in the morning, says he to Marcellinus,⁴ sing the sixty-second Psalm. And again,⁵ to the virgins, In the morning sing this psalm, "O God, my God, early will I seek thee." These were but private directions, indeed, but probably might be suited to the orders and measures of public worship; it being evident, from the forced authors, that this psalm was the usual introduction to their morning devotions.

Immediately after this morning psalm, without mention of any other psalmody, or reading any lessons out of the Old or New Testament, follow the prayers for the several orders of catechumens, energumens, candidates of baptism, and penitents, as in the general service of the Lord's day, which, because I shall recite them at large in that service,⁶ I omit to mention any further in this place. Only observing, that these prayers were performed partly by the deacons προσφώνησις, bidding the people pray, and repeating the several petitions they were to make for those several orders of men; and partly by the bishop's invocation or benediction said over them, as they bowed down to receive the blessing before their dismissal.

When these several orders were sent away, there followed the prayers which, on the Lord's day, began the communion service, and which upon that account were usually styled εὐχαὶ πιστῶν, the prayers of the faithful, or communicants, because none but they who had a right to communicate in the eucharist might be present at them. These were the prayers for the peace of the world, and all orders of men in the church, which always went before the consecration of the eucharist. And though there were no consecration of the eucharist on these ordinary days, yet these general prayers were always used in the daily morning service. I omit the reciting of them here for the same reason as I do the former, because the reader may find them rehearsed at large hereafter,⁷ in the entrance on the communion service.

I only observe here, that there is mention made, in other writers as well as the Constitutions, of these prayers for the whole state of the world, and all orders of men in the church. For Chrysostom, writing upon those words of St. Paul, "I exhort, therefore, that first of all, supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks, be made for all men; for kings, and all that are in authority;" says, This word, "first of all," relates to the daily worship; wherein they that were initiated knew what was done every day, morning and evening;⁸ how we make supplication to God for the whole world, for kings and all that are in authority. This clearly shows, that such prayers were not only made on communion days at

Sect. 3.
Next to the psalm followed the prayers for the catechumens, energumens, candidates, and penitents.

Sect. 4.
Then the prayers for the faithful, the peace of the world, and the whole state of Christ's church.

Sect. 5.
What notice we have of these prayers in other writers.

² Chrys. Com. in Psal. cxl. t. 3. p. 545. Τοιοῦτός ἐστι καὶ ὁ ἑωθινὸς ψαλμὸς, &c.

³ Cassian. Institut. lib. 3. cap. 3. De matutina vero solennitate etiam illud nos instruit, quod in ipsa quotidie decantari solet, Deus meus ad te de luce vigilo.

⁴ Athan. Ep. ad Marcellinum, t. 1. p. 975. Ὁρθρίζων ψάλλε τὸν ἐξηκοστὸν δεῦτερον.

⁵ Id. de Virginit. t. 1. p. 1057. Πρὸς ὄρθρον δὲ τὸν ψαλμὸν τούτων λέγετε, Ὁ Θεὸς, Θεὸς μου, πρὸς σὲ ὀρθρίζω.

⁶ See Book XIV. chap. 5. ⁷ See Book XV. chap. 1.

⁸ Chrys. Hom. 6. in 1 Tim. p. 1550. Τούτο ἴσασιν ὁ μῦται, πῶς καδ' ἐκάστην ἡμέραν γίνεται καὶ ἐν ἐσπέρα καὶ πρωΐα, πῶς ὑπὲρ παντὸς τοῦ κόσμου, καὶ βασιλείων, καὶ πάντων τῶν ἐν ὑπεροχῇ ὄντων ποιούμεθα τὴν δέησιν

the celebration of the eucharist, but every day, both morning and evening also, when it is certain there could be no sacrifice but only that of their prayers; for the consecration of the eucharist in that age was never made at evening prayer. In this sense we may understand many of the ancient apologists, when they speak of making prayers continually for the Roman government. Thus Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, tells Æmylian the prefect, We worship the one God, Maker of all things, who gave the empire to Valerian and Gallienus our divine governors: to Him we pray⁹ continually for their kingdom, that it may be preserved free from disturbance and commotion. And so Tertullian¹⁰ acquaints Scapula: We offer sacrifice for the emperor's safety, but to no other god but our God and his; and in that manner as God has appointed, that is to say, by prayer alone without blood. In like manner Cyprian tells Demetrian:¹¹ We continually pour forth supplications and prayers for driving away your enemies, and procuring rain, and either for removing or moderating your calamities; and we pray instantly and incessantly day and night for your peace and safety, appeasing God and rendering him propitious unto you. Origen also,¹² answering the objection of Celsus, that the Christians were wanting in their duty to the emperor, in that they gave him no aid in his wars, and refused to fight for him, among other things tells him, That they gave him the most seasonable assistance, procuring him the Divine aid, and defending him with the whole armour of God. And this they did in obedience to the apostle's admonition, "I exhort, therefore, first of all, that supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks, be made for all men, for kings, and all that are in authority." He adds, That keeping their hands pure, they fought in their prayers to God for their lawful sovereign and those that fought lawfully under him, that all opposition and enemies might fall before them, whilst they were lawfully employed. They by their prayers enervated the power of devils, the authors of war, and confounders of leagues, and disturbers of peace; and in doing this they did the emperor more effectual service, than they that bare arms for him. Athenagoras tells the emperors themselves, in his address to them,¹³ That the Christians prayed for their government and the royal progeny, that the son might succeed the father in his kingdom according to right, and that their empire might be extended and enlarged, all things succeeding according to their desire: and this they did, both that they might lead a quiet and peaceable life, and cheerfully observe all that was commanded them. Now, though in all these passages there is no express mention made of morning and evening prayer in the church; yet their continual prayer, and their praying day and night, may reasonably be presumed to include these, without any prejudice to other times of public or private devotion. I now go on again with the order of morning prayer in the Constitutions.

After the prayer for the whole state of the church was ended, and the deacon had said, "Keep us, O God, and preserve us by thy grace;" which concludes the former prayer; he exhorted the people to pray for peace and prosperity the day ensuing and all their lives, in this manner:

Sect. 6. After the general prayer for the whole state of the church, followed a short bidding prayer for preservation in the ensuing day.

"Let us beg of God his mercies and compassions, that this morning and this day, and all the time of our pilgrimage, may be passed by us in peace and without sin: let us beg of God, that he would send us the angel of peace, and give us a Christian end, and be gracious and merciful unto us. Let us commend ourselves and one another to the living God by his only begotten Son."

What is here said concerning the angel of peace, is a petition that came often in the devotions of the ancient church, both when they prayed for themselves and others. For we shall meet with it again in the evening service, and in the prayer for the catechumens¹⁴ mentioned by St. Chrysostom in several places of his writings, where he often speaks of the deacon's bidding men pray for the angel of peace, and that all their purposes may be directed to a peaceable end. Which agree very well with this prayer of the deacon in the Constitutions.

Immediately after this common prayer of the deacon and people together, (the deacon having bid the people commend themselves to God,) the bishop makes this commendatory prayer, which is there called εὐχαριστία ὀρθρινή, the morning thanksgiving,¹⁵ and is in the following words:

Sect. 7. Then the bishop's commendation, or thanksgiving.

"O God, the God of spirits and of all flesh, with whom no one can compare, whom no one can approach, that givest the sun to govern the day, and the moon and the stars to govern the night; look

⁹ Dionys. Epist. ap. Euseb. lib. 7. c. 11. Τούτῳ διηλεκῶς ὑπὲρ τῆς βασιλείας αὐτῶν, ὅπως ἀσάλευτος διαμένη, προσευχόμεθα.

¹⁰ Tertull. ad Scapulam, cap. 2. Sacrificamus pro salute imperatoris, sed Deo nostro et ipsius: sed quomodo præcepit Deus, pura prece. Vid. Apol. cap. 30, 31, et 39.

¹¹ Cypr. ad Demetrian. p. 193. Pro arcendis hostibus et imbris impetrandis, et vel auferendis vel temperandis ad- versis, rogamus semper et preces fundimus: et pro pace ac salute vestra propitiantes ac placantes Deum, diebus ac noctibus jugiter atque instanter oramus.

¹² Orig. cont. Cels. lib. 8. p. 426.

¹³ Athenag. Legatio pro Christianis, p. 39.

¹⁴ See these places of Chrysostom cited Book XIV. chap. 5. sect. 4.

¹⁵ Constit. lib. 8. cap. 37.

down now upon us with the eyes of thy favour, and receive our morning thanksgivings, and have mercy on us. For we have not spread forth our hands to any strange god. For there is not any new god among us, but thou, our eternal and immortal God, who hast given us our being through Christ, and our well-being through him also. Vouchsafe by him to bring us to everlasting life; with whom unto thee be glory, honour, and adoration, in the Holy Ghost, world without end. Amen."

Sect. 8.
And his imposition of hands or benediction. After this the deacon bids them bow their heads and receive the imposition of hands, or the bishop's benediction, which follows under the title of χειροθεσία ὀρθρινή, the imposition of hands in morning prayer, in the form of words here annexed.

"O God, faithful and true, that showest mercy to thousands and ten thousands of them that love thee; who art the friend of the humble, and defender of the poor, whose aid all things stand in need of, because all things serve thee: look down upon this thy people, who bow their heads unto thee, and bless them with thy spiritual benediction; keep them as the apple of the eye; preserve them in piety and righteousness, and vouchsafe to bring them to eternal life, in Christ Jesus thy beloved Son, with whom unto thee be glory, honour, and adoration, in the Holy Ghost, now and for ever, world without end. Amen."

This said, the deacon dismisses the congregation with the usual form, Προέιθετε ἐν εἰρήνῃ, "Depart in peace." Which Chrysostom takes notice of as the solemn word for dismissing every church assembly. For, speaking of the frequent use of the salutation, Pax vobis, "Peace be unto you," he observes, that as it was used in the beginning of every sacred action, prayer, preaching, blessing, &c., and sometimes in the middle of prayers too, so particularly at the bishop's entrance into the church, and the deacon's final dismissal of the assembly: The deacon, says he, when he sends you away¹⁶ from this meeting, does it with this prayer, Πορεύεσθε ἐν εἰρήνῃ, "Go in peace."

Sect. 9.
Whether the morning
hymn was part of the public service
every day. But besides this order of morning prayer laid down in this place by the author of the Constitutions, there is, in another place, a prayer or hymn appointed for the morning, but whether for public or private use, is not said; I suppose he intended it only for private devotion, because it is placed among many other private prayers. He gives it the name of προσευχὴ ἑωθινή, the morning prayer. Other writers call it the hymn, and the angelical hymn, and the great doxology, from the first words of it, "Glory be to God on high," which was the angels' hymn at our Saviour's birth. The form of it in this author runs in these words: "

"Glory be to God on high, in earth peace, good will towards men. We praise thee, we laud thee, we bless thee, we glorify thee, we worship thee by the great High Priest, thee the true God, the only unbegotten, whom no one can approach, for thy great glory, O Lord, heavenly King, God the Father almighty: Lord God, the Father of Christ, the immaculate Lamb, who taketh away the sin of the world, receive our prayer, thou that sittest upon the cherubims. For thou only art holy, thou only Lord Jesus, the Christ of God, the God of every created being, and our King. By whom unto thee be glory, honour, and adoration.

This same hymn is mentioned also by Athanasius, in his book of Virginité, but he gives it only as a direction to virgins in their private devotions: Early in the morning, says he, sing this psalm, "O God, my God, early will I awake unto thee. My soul thirsteth for thee." (That is the 63rd Psalm.) When it is light, say, "Bless ye the Lord, all ye works of the Lord." (That is the Song of the Three Children.) And,¹⁸ "Glory be to God on high, on earth peace, good will towards men. We laud thee, we bless thee, we worship thee;" and what follows. It is great pity this author did not give us the whole hymn, that we might have compared it with that in the Constitutions. It was always used in the communion service, though not exactly in the same form, as we shall see hereafter. But St. Chrysostom¹⁹ speaks of it as used also daily at morning prayer. For, describing the devotions of those who led an ascetic life, he says, As soon as they rose out of bed, they met together and made a quire, and as it were with one mouth sang hymns to God, praising him, and giving him thanks for all his blessings both general and particular; and, among other things, like angels on earth, singing, "Glory be to God on high, and on earth peace, good will towards men." And Mabillon²⁰ observes out of the Rules of Cæsarius Arelatensis and Aurelian in the beginning of the sixth century, that it is there appointed to be sung at matins, or morning prayer, every Lord's day, and on Easter day, and such other noted festivals. Which shows, that, at least in some churches, it was used in other offices besides the communion service, and among the monks as an ordinary hymn in their daily morning service. And so it is now used among the modern Greeks, as a learned searcher of their rituals²¹ informs us in his account of the Greek church.

¹⁶ Chrys. Hom. 52. in eos qui Pascha jejnant, t. 5. p. 713.

¹⁷ Constit. lib. 7. cap. 47.

¹⁸ Athan. de Virgin. t. 1, p. 1057.

¹⁹ Chrys. Hom. 69. in Matt. p. 600.

²⁰ Mabil. de Cursu Gallicano, p. 407.

²¹ Smith of the Greek Church, p. 224.

Sect. 10.
Whether the psalms and lessons were read at the daily morning service.

But it seems a little more difficult to account for another thing, which is omitted in the Constitutions. For there is no order there either for psalms or lessons to be read in the morning service, besides that one psalm, which was particularly styled the morning psalm. Whereas other authors, and particularly Cassian, speak of three psalms read at every assembly through all the canonical hours of the day;²² and he remarks precisely for the morning service the very psalms²³ that were used, namely, the 50th, that is, our 51st, which they commonly called the penitential psalm: "Have mercy upon me, O God, after thy great goodness: according to the multitude of thy mercies, do away my offences:" and together with that, the 62nd Psalm, that is, the 63rd in our division, which was commonly called the morning psalm, as we have noted before: and the 89th, that is, our 90th Psalm, which is appropriated to the funeral office, but is as proper for the service of every day, and fit to be used by all men whenever they begin a new day, because of those excellent petitions in it for God's protection and favour, and for wisdom to consider our latter end; "So teach us to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom:" and for that it so familiarly puts us in mind of our mortality, comparing our life to a sleep, which fades away suddenly like the grass; "In the morning it is green and groweth up, but in the evening it is cut down, dried up, and withered." By which we may judge both of the wisdom and piety of the ancients in appointing this psalm to be used constantly in the daily course of morning service. Cassian observes further in the same place,²⁴ that in his time, throughout all the churches of Italy, their morning hymns were concluded with the penitential psalm, that is, the 50th according to his account, but with us the 51st. And St. Basil²⁵ remarks the same thing for many of the churches of the East, that their vigils, or nocturnal psalmody, was concluded, when the morning appeared, with the psalm of confession, by which he means no other but this same 51st, or penitential psalm, as I have evidently showed in another²⁶ place. What shall we say then to the author of the Constitutions, who speaks but of one psalm in the morning service? I answer, 1. No doubt there were different customs in different churches, and in nothing did the practice vary more than in the rules and measures about psalmody, as we shall see more clearly hereafter. So that both accounts may be very true, only applying them to the state and practice of different churches. 2. I have observed before,²⁷ That the primitive morning service, in times of persecution especially, was no other but the conclusion of the vigils, or antelucan or nocturnal service, which concluded towards break of day with some proper morning psalm, such as the 51st, or 63rd, or 90th, and certain prayers or collects proper to the occasion; the preceding part of the morning having been spent in psalms and hymns to a greater measure and number, sometimes ten, twelve, eighteen, or twenty, and these intermingled with lessons of Scripture, and public or private prayers between them; but when the morning service was made a distinct office from the vigils, as it began to be in the fourth or fifth century, then some other psalms were added to the morning psalm, and three psalms at least were read in this as well as in all other offices; and that is the reason why we meet with but one psalm in the order for morning service in the Constitutions, and three in others, which were of later appointment. Cassian himself, who gives the best account of these things of any other writer, plainly favours this observation: for he tells us in one place,²⁸ that the Egyptians never admitted of any morning office distinct from their nocturnal vigils, nor of any other times of public worship besides the evening hours and nocturnal assemblies, except on the sabbath and the Lord's day, when they met also at the third hour, that is, at nine in the morning, to celebrate the communion on those days. All other times they spent in labouring privately in their cells, joining continual meditation of the Psalms and other Scriptures with their labour, and mingling short prayers and ejaculations with them; so making the whole day but one continued office of devotion, which others performed by intervals of time, and distinction of stated hours of prayer. In another place²⁹ he tells us, That they who first ²² Cassian. Institut. lib. 3. cap. 3. In Palæstinæ et Mesopotamiæ monasteriis ac totius Orientis supradictarum horarum solennitates tribus psalmis quotidie finiuntur.

²³ Id. lib. 3. cap. 6. Quinquagesimum vero psalmum et sexagesimum secundum et octogesimum nonum huic novellæ solennitati novimus fuisse deputatos.

²⁴ Cassian. ibid. Denique per Italiam hodieque consummatis matutinalibus hymnis quinquagesimus psalmus in universis ecclesiis canitur.

²⁵ Basil. Ep. 63. ad Neocæsar. t. 3. p. 96. Ἡμέρας ἤδη ὑπολαμπέσης — πάντες τὸν τῆς ἐξομολογήσεως ψαλμὸν ἀναφέρωσι τῷ Κυρίῳ.

²⁶ See below, sect. 13. of this chapter.

²⁷ Book XIII. chap. 9. sect. 4 and 10.

²⁸ Cassian. Institut. lib. 3. cap. 2. Apud illos hæc officia, quæ Domino solvere per distinctiones horarum et temporis intervalla cum admonitione compulsoris adigimur, per totum diei spacium jugiter cum operis adjectione spontanea celebrantur.—Quamobrem exceptis vespertinis horis ac nocturnis congregationibus, nulla apud eos per diem publica solennitas absque die sabbati vel Dominicæ celebratur, in quibus hora tertia sacræ communionis obtentu conveniunt.

²⁹ Cass. lib. 3. cap. 6. Illud quoque nosse debemus, nihil a senioribus nostris, qui eandem matutinam solennitatem addi debere censuerunt, de antiqua psalmodiarum consuetudine immutatum: sed eodem ordine missam, quo prius in nocturnis conventibus celebratam. Etenim hymnos, quos in hac regione ad matutinam exceperet solennitatem, in fine nocturnarum vigiliarum, quas post gallos cantum ante auroram finire solent, similiter hodieque decantant, id est, brought in this new morning office, distinct from the nocturnal, did not diminish aught of the ancient psalmody from the nocturnal service; for they continued still to conclude their vigils before break of day with the same psalms as they were used to do before; that is, with 148th, 149th, 150th Psalms; only they set apart the 51st, 63rd, and 90th Psalms for this new office of morning service. From all which it seems very probable, that, according to the difference of times and places, the number of psalms for the morning service might vary, since there were such different methods in the observation of this solemnity, and an old and a new office, that both went by the name of morning service.

Having thus far described the order of the old morning service, as it lies in the Constitutions; and hinted, that the morning assemblies were originally the very same with the nocturnal or antelucan meetings for Divine service, which we so often read of in ancient writers; for the further illustration of this part of the Christian worship, it will be proper to inquire a little more narrowly into the nature and management of them from their first original; which is known to have had its rise from the severity of the heathen persecutions. For the Christians, being afraid to meet publicly on the Lord's day for Divine worship, were forced to hold their assemblies in the night, meeting early in the morning before day, to avoid the observation of their enemies. This appears from that early account of Pliny, which he had from the mouths of some apostatizing Christians, who confessed to him,³⁰ that the sum of their crime or error was, that they were used to meet together on a certain day before it was light, and sing a hymn to Christ, as to their God. Hence it is, that the heathen in Minucius more than once³¹ objects to them their night assemblies, and calls them a sculking generation, that fled from the light, being mute in public, but free in discourse with one another, when they were got into their private corners. Celsus³² seems to mean the same thing, when he objects to them their holding of elanular meetings, συνθήκας κρύβδην. And Tertullian, to show Christian women the inconvenience of marrying heathens, puts them in mind of these night assemblies: What husband, says he,³³ will be willing to suffer his wife to rise from his side, and go to the night assemblies. And Prudentius, describing the martyrdom of St. Laurence, introduces the heathen judge³⁴ telling him, that he had heard how they sacrificed in silver, and had their wax-lights set in gold for the use of their night assemblies. And this was the true original of lamps, and oil, and tapers for the use of such meetings in time of persecution.

Now, though it was necessity which first gave rise to these assemblies; yet the church in after ages thought fit to continue them, (transferring them from the Lord's day to all other days,) partly to keep up the spirit of devotion in the ascetics, or such as had betaken themselves to a stricter life; partly to give leisure and opportunity to men of a secular life to observe a seasonable time of devotion, which they might do early in the morning without any distraction; and partly to guard her children against the temptations and seduction of the Arian sect, who with great zeal endeavoured to promote their heresy by their psalmody in such meetings, as appears from what Socrates³⁵ and Sozomen³⁶ say of them, and what Sidonius Apollinaris particularly notes³⁷ of Theodoric, king of the Goths, that he was so eager a promoter of the Arian cause, that in his zeal for them he frequented their morning assemblies before day, with a small guard attending him. Now, the catholics having so many reasons to keep up these assemblies, not only continued them, but with great zeal encouraged them in their discourses. St. Chrysostom³⁸ commends the widows and virgins for frequenting the church night and day, and singing psalms in these assemblies. He says, Men ought³⁹ to come to the sanctuary in the night, and pour out their prayers there. In another place, speaking of the excellency of the city of Antioch, he says, It consisted not in its fine buildings or pillars, but in the morals of the men. Go into the church,⁴⁰ and there see the excellency of the city. Go into the church, and see the poor continuing there from midnight to the morning light. And it is remarkable what Socrates⁴¹ says of him, when he was bishop of Constantinople, That he made additional prayers for the nocturnal hymns, on purpose to counter-

Psalmum 148, et reliquos qui sequuntur: quinquagesimum vero psalmum, et sexagesimum secundum, et octogesimum nonum huic novellæ solennitati novimus fuisse deputatos.

³⁰ Plin. lib. 10. Ep. 97. Affirmabant autem hanc fuisse summam vel culpæ suæ, vel erroris, quod essent soliti stato die ante lucem convenire: carmenque Christo, quasi Deo, dicere secum invicem.

³¹ Minuc. de Idol. Vanit. p. 25. Nocturnis congregationibus—fæderantur. Latebrosa et lucifugax natio, in publicum muta, in angulis garrula. It. p. 27. Occultis ac nocturnis sacris apposita suspicio.

³² Origen. cont. Cels. lib. 1. p. 4.

³³ Tertul. ad Uxor. lib. 2. cap. 4. Quis nocturnis convo-cationibus, si ita oportuerit, a latere suo eximi libenter feret? It. de Coron. Mil. cap. 3.

³⁴ Prudent. Hymn. 2. de Laurentio. Argenteis scyphis ferunt fumare sacrum sanguinem, auroque nocturnis sacris adstare fixos cereos.

³⁵ Socrat. lib. 6. cap. 8.

³⁶ Sozom. lib. 8. cap. 8.

³⁷ Sidon. lib. 1. Ep. 2. Antelucanos sacerdotum suorum cætus minimo comitatu expetit.

³⁸ Chrys. Hom. 30. in 1 Cor. p. 591.

³⁹ Chrys. Com. in Psal. cxxxiii. t. 3. p. 488.

⁴⁰ Chrys. Hom. 4. de Verbis Esaiæ, t. 3. p. 865.

⁴¹ Socrat. lib. 6. cap. 7. Ἡΰξησε πρῶτος καὶ τὰς περὶ τοὺς νυκτερινοὺς ἕμνους εὐχάς.

mine the practice of the Arians. But I must not stand to repeat all that is said of these famous morning assemblies; for there is scarce an ecclesiastical writer⁴² that has not given some hint of them, which I need not recite, but rather go on to show what were the chief exercises of these meetings, which usually began soon after midnight, and continued to the morning light.

St. Basil, in one of his epistles, gives us a pretty clear description of them, though but in general terms, whilst he makes an apology for the practices of his own church, against some who charged them with innovation. His words are these: The customs, says he, which now prevail among us,⁴³ are consonant and agreeable to all the churches of God. For with us the people, rising early, whilst it is night, come to the house of prayer, and there, with much labour and affliction, and contrition and tears, make confession of their sins to God. When this is done, they rise from prayers, and dispose themselves to psalmody: sometimes dividing themselves into two parts, they answer one another in singing, or sing alternately, ἀντιβάλλουσιν ἀλλήλοις: after this again they permit one alone to begin the psalm, and the rest join in the close of every verse, ὑπηχοῦσι. And thus with this variety of psalmody they carry on the night, praying betwixt whiles, or intermingling prayers with their psalms, μεταξὺ προσευχόμενοι. At last, when the day begins to break forth, they all in common, as with one mouth and one heart, offer up to God the psalm of confession, τὸν τῆς ἐξομολογήσεως ψαλμὸν τῷ Κυρίῳ ἀναφέρουσι, every one making the words of this psalm to be the expression of his own repentance. Here we have the plain order of these nocturnal or morning devotions. 1. Confession of sins. 2. Psalms sung alternately. 3. Psalms sung by one alone. 4. Prayers between the psalms. 5. Lastly, The common psalm of confession, or the penitential psalm, in the close of all. Whether the first confession of sins was a public or private one, is not very certain; some learned persons⁴⁴ take it for a public confession, like that in the beginning of our liturgy; but I rather think it was a private confession, with which we are sure their offices generally began, as appears from a canon of the council of Laodicea,⁴⁵ where it is called the silent prayer, εὐχή διὰ σιωπῆς, of which I have given a fuller account in the communion service.⁴⁶ The latter confession was plainly a public one, made by a certain form, being no other but the 51st Psalm, "Have mercy on me, O God, after thy great goodness: according to the multitude of thy mercies, do away mine offences." For this psalm was particularly noted among the ancients by the name of the psalm of confession. Athanasius gives it⁴⁷ this title, telling us that the 50th Psalm, which is the 51st in our division, is ψαλμὸς ἐξομολογήσεως, the psalm of confession. And what further confirms this interpretation is, that this very psalm by name is appointed to be used in the close of the matins, or morning service, which the Western churches introduced as distinct from the nocturnal service, as Cassian⁴⁸ relates, who was an eye-witness of it. See before, sect. 10.

What number of psalms or prayers was used in this service, is not particularly noted by St. Basil; nor perhaps was it stinted to any certain number, but according as the length of the psalms or time required. But in the Egyptian churches they reduced it to the precise number of twelve psalms, from whence some other churches afterwards took their model, as Cassian informs us,⁴⁹ who says, That in other regions there were different rules and appointments: for some recited no less than twenty psalms, and these by way of antiphonal or alternate melody; others exceeded this number; others had eighteen; so that there were almost as many ways and rules as there were monasteries and cells. Nay, in Egypt, before the rule was settled, some were for having⁵⁰ fifty, some sixty psalms; but at last, upon mature advice, they fixed upon⁵¹ the certain number of twelve psalms both for their evening and morning service, interposing a prayer between each psalm, and adding two lessons, one out of the Old Testament, and the other out of the New; which was their custom on all days, except Saturdays and Sundays, when they repeated them both out of the New Testament, the one out of St. Paul's Epistles or the Acts of the Apostles, and the other out of the Gospels, as they did also for the whole term of fifty days between Easter and Whitsuntide. He adds further, That they did not use the alternate way of singing in Egypt, but only one amongst them sung with a plain and even voice, the rest sitting by, and attending to what was said. Neither did they answer, "Glory be to the⁵² Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost," at the end of every psalm, but inter-

Sect. 13.
The order of Divine service which was performed in them, as described by St. Basil.

Sect. 14.
The account of them out of Cassian.

⁴² Vid. Epiphanius in fine Panarii. Hieronymus. Ep. 7. ad Laetam. Hilar. in Psal. lxiv. p. 231.

⁴³ Basil. Ep. 63. ad Neocæsarem. t. 3. p. 96.

⁴⁴ Hamon. L'Estrange, Alliance of Divine Office. cap. 3. p. 75.

⁴⁵ Conc. Laodicen. can. 19.

⁴⁶ See Book XV. chap. 1. sect. 1.

⁴⁷ Athanasius. Ep. ad Marcellinum, de Interpretatione Psalmorum. t. 1. p. 975.

⁴⁸ Cassian. Institut. lib. 3. cap. 6.

⁴⁹ Cassian. lib. 2. cap. 2. Quidam vicenos psalmos, et hos ipsos antiphonarum protelatos melodis, et adjunctione quarundam modulationum debere dici singulis noctibus censuerunt, &c.

⁵⁰ Cass. ibid. cap. 5.

⁵¹ Id. cap. 6.

⁵² Cassian. lib. 2. cap. 8. Illud etiam quod in hac provincia (Gallia) vidimus, ut uno cantante, in clausula psalmi omnes astantes concinant cum clamore; Gloria Patri, et posed a prayer (which was the custom of all the East); and then at the end of the last psalm, which they called the hallelujah, they subjoined the glorification of the Trinity, which they never used but at the end of that antiphona, as they called the hallelujah in the Eastern church. When the psalms were very long, they sometimes divided them into two or three parts, and at the end of every part made a stop to interpose a prayer,⁵³ thinking it better to use frequent and short prayers to keep up the fervour of devotion. It does not appear, that these were public prayers, but rather private, at the end of which the chief minister officiating is said colligere precem, to make a collect or prayer, recapitulating the prayers that were made before by the assembly in private; of which I shall have occasion to give a fuller account in another place. See Book XV. chap. i. sect. 1. It is noted further by Cassian,⁵⁴ concerning the last of their psalms, called the antiphona, or hallelujah, that no psalm was ever used in this place but only one of those which had the inscription of hallelujah prefixed in the title of it, such as the 145th, and those that follow, one of which was commonly the concluding psalm, repeated by way of antiphona or responses. It was something particular in the manner of performing this psalmody in those Egyptian monasteries, that he that sung the psalms only stood up, but the rest heard them sitting: which Cassian⁵⁵ observes to be matter of indulgence in regard to their continual watchings and hard labour. And it was no less peculiar, that never above four persons were allowed to repeat the twelve psalms in one assembly, and that by course, every one singing three in order after one another. Or if there were but three, then each sung four psalms; and if but two, each of them sung six.

And thus far of the nocturnal psalmody, which was the old morning service of the church. I only add, that though this service was very early in the morning, yet it was frequented, not by the clergy and monks only, but by the people also. For, as we have seen before, St. Basil takes notice, that the people came to church to celebrate these morning devotions; and Sidonius has told us also, that Theodoric, king of the Goths, was a constant observer of them. So here it is also remarked by

Filio, et Spiritui Sancto; nusquam per omnem Orientem audivimus; sed cum omnium silentio, ab eo qui cantat finito psalmo, orationem succedere: hanc vero glorificationem Trinitatis tantummodo solere antiphona terminari. (Leg. antiphonam terminare. Vel, ut legit Mabillon, glorificatione, &c. antiphona terminari.)

⁵³ Cassian. Instit. lib. 2. cap. 11. Ne psalmos quidem ipsos, quos in congregationibus decantant, continuata student pronuntiatione concludere: sed eos pro numero versuum duabus vel tribus intercessionibus cum orationum interjectione divisos distinctimque consummant.

Cassian,⁵⁶ that this part of the church's devotions was with great exactness observed by many secular men, who, rising early before day, would not engage themselves in any of their most necessary and ordinary worldly business, before they had consecrated the first-fruits of all their actions and labours to God, by going to church, and presenting themselves in the Divine presence. A worthy example, fit to be recorded in letters of gold, to excite the emulation of the present age, wherein the daily worship of God at religious assemblies is so little frequented, and by many so much despised; though the same service with that of the ancients for substance is still retained, with some improvements, and none of the corruptions which the superstition of darker ages brought into the devotions of the church; as any one may satisfy himself, that will compare what has been delivered in this chapter with the daily service of our church.

CHAPTER XI.

THE ORDER OF THEIR DAILY EVENING SERVICE.

THE evening service, which was called the hora lucernaris, because it began at the time of lighting candles towards the close of the day, was in most parts the same with that of the morning, only with such variation of psalms, and hymns, and prayers, as were proper to the occasion. The prayers for the catechumens, energumens, candidates of baptism, and penitents were all the same; so were the prayers for the faithful or communicants, called the prayers for the peace of the world, and the whole state of the catholic church, which are described at large in the following Books, to which the reader may have recourse.

The first thing wherein they differed was, the initial psalm: for as the morning service began with the 63rd Psalm, so the evening service is appointed to begin with the 140th Psalm, which we reckon the 141st. "Lord, I call upon thee, haste thee unto me, and consider my

Sect. 1.
The evening service in most things conformed to that of the morning.

Sect. 2.
But they differed, first, in that a proper psalm was appointed for the evening, called the evening psalm by the author of the Constitutions.

⁵⁴ Cassian. ibid. Illud quoque apud eos omni observantia custoditur, ut in responsione alleluia nullus dicatur psalmus, nisi is, qui in titulo suo alleluia inscriptione prenotatur.

⁵⁵ Id. lib. 2. cap. 11 et 12.

⁵⁶ Cassian. Collation. 21. cap. 26. Quod devotionis genus multi etiam saecularium summa cautione custodiunt, qui ante lucem vel diluculo consurgentes, nequaquam familiaribus ac necessariis mundi hujus actibus implicantur, priusquam cunctorum actuum suorum operationumque primitias, ad ecclesiam concurrentes, divino studeant consecrare conspectui.

voice when I cry unto thee. Let my prayer be set forth in thy sight as the incense, and let the lifting up of my hands be an evening sacrifice," &c. This psalm the author of the Constitutions calls emphatically τὸν ἐπιλύχριον ψαλμὸν,¹ the evening psalm, in the place where he describes the order of this service. And though he does not in that place either name the psalm, or mention any words in it; yet he infallibly means the psalm now spoken of, because in another place² he expressly calls it the 140th Psalm, requiring it to be used in public assemblies at the daily evening service.

And that which puts the matter beyond all dispute, is, that Chrysostom, in his Comment upon this psalm, takes notice of the use of it in the church upon this particular occasion. Harken diligently, says he,³ for it was not without reason that our fathers appointed this psalm to be said every evening; not barely for the sake of that single expression, "Let the lifting up of my hands be an evening sacrifice;" for other psalms have expressions of the same nature, as that which says, "At evening, and morning, and noon-day will I show forth thy praise:" and again, "The day is thine, and the night is thine:" and again, "Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning:" and many other such like psalms may one find, that are proper for the evening season. Therefore our fathers did not order this psalm to be said upon the account of this expression, but they appointed the reading of it, as a sort of salutary medicine to cleanse us from sin; that whatever defilement we may have contracted throughout the whole day, either abroad, in the market, or at home, or in whatsoever place, when the evening comes, we might put it all off by this spiritual charm, or song, which is a medicine to purge away all such corruption.

After this psalm was ended, there followed the same prayers for the catechumens, energumens, penitents, and common prayers for the world and the church, that were used in the morning service; but after them the deacon bid the people pray in a certain form proper for the evening, which the author of the Constitutions⁴ styles προσφώνησις ἐπιλύχριος, the evening bidding prayer, and it runs in these words: "Let us pray to the Lord for his mercies and compassions; and entreat him to send us the angel of peace, and all good things convenient for us, and that he would grant us to make a Christian end. Let us pray, that this evening and night may pass in peace, and without sin, and all the time of our life unblamable and without rebuke. Let us commend ourselves and one another to the living God through his Christ."

This said, the bishop, if present, made this commendatory collect, which is there styled ἐπιλύχριος εὐχαριστία, the evening thanksgiving, and is conceived in the following words: "O God, who art without beginning and without end, the Maker and Governor of all things through Christ, the God and Father of him before all things, the Lord of the Spirit, and King of all things both intellectual and sensible; that hast made the day for works of light, and the night to give rest to our weakness: for the day is thine, and the night is thine; thou hast prepared the light and the sun: do thou now, most kind and gracious Lord, receive this our evening thanksgiving. Thou that hast led us through the length of the day, and brought us to the beginning of the night, keep and preserve us by thy Christ; grant that we may pass this evening in peace, and this night without sin; and vouchsafe to bring us to eternal life through thy Christ; by whom be glory, honour, and adoration unto thee in the Holy Spirit, world without end. Amen."

After this, the deacon bids the people κλίνετε τῇ χειροθεσίᾳ, bow down to receive the benediction with imposition of hands, and then the bishop makes this following prayer: "O God of our fathers, and Lord of mercy, that hast created man by thy wisdom a rational being, and of all thy creatures upon earth dearest unto thee, that hast given him dominion over the earth, and hast made us by thy pleasure to be kings and priests, the one to secure our lives, and the other to preserve thy lawful worship: be pleased now, O Lord Almighty, to bow down and show the light of thy countenance upon thy people, who bow the neck of their heart before thee; and bless them by Christ, by whom thou hast enlightened us with the light of knowledge, and revealed thyself unto us: with whom is due unto thee and the Holy Ghost the Comforter, all worthy adoration from every rational and holy nature, world without end. Amen."

There are two expressions in these prayers, which may seem a little unusual to a modern reader; one, where prayer is made for the angel of peace; and the other, which styles God the Father, Lord of the Spirit: but both these occur in the morning prayers for the catechumens, hereafter,⁵ where I show out of Chrysostom, that prayer for the angel of peace was a common petition in many of the known forms of the church: and for that other expression, which styles the Father, Lord of the Spirit, which is a harsh way of speaking, and looks like Macedonianism, as Cotelerius remarks upon it, I have showed out of Bishop Bull, that it may fairly be interpreted to a sound and catholic sense from parallel expressions in Justin Martyr. So that we ¹ Constit. lib. 8. cap. 35.

² Id. lib. 2. cap. 59.

³ Chrys. Hom. in Psal. cxl. t. 3. p. 544.

⁴ Constit. lib. 8. cap. 36.

⁵ Ibid. cap. 37.

⁶ Book XIV. chap. 5. sect. 3.

need not condemn this author as an Arian or Macedonian heretic, only allowing him the favour of a candid interpretation.

To return, therefore, to the prayers themselves: the deacon, after these collects made by the bishop, dismisses the people with the usual form, as in the morning service, Προέλθετε ἐν εἰρήνῃ, "Depart in peace." And this is the conclusion of the evening service, according to our author in this place.

But in another place⁷ he speaks also of an evening hymn, which he styles εὐχὴ ἑσπερινός, an evening prayer or thanksgiving, which is a sort of doxology to God, like that used before in the morning prayer. The form is in these words: "Praise the Lord, ye servants, O praise the name of the Lord. We praise thee, we laud thee, we bless thee, for thy great glory, O Lord and King, the Father of Christ the unspotted Lamb, that taketh away the sin of the world. All praises, and hymns, and glory, are justly rendered unto thee our God and Father, by thy Son, in the most Holy Spirit, for all ages, world without end. Amen. Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy word: for mine eyes have seen thy salvation, which thou hast prepared before the face of all people; to be a light to lighten the Gentiles, and to be the glory of thy people Israel."

It is not here said, whether this hymn was for public or private use. However, that there were such sort of hymns in use among the ancients at the first bringing in of candles in the evening, is evident from St. Basil, who mentions one part of such a hymn, which he styles ἐπιλόχνιος εὐχαριστία, the thanksgiving at setting up lights. It seemed good, says he, to our forefathers⁸ not to receive the gift of the evening light altogether with silence, but to give thanks immediately upon its appearance. We cannot certainly tell who was the first author of that thanksgiving at setting up lights; but this we are sure of, that the people have of old used this form of words, (and no one ever charged them with impiety for so doing,) Αἰνοῦμεν Πατέρα, καὶ Υἱόν, καὶ Ἅγιον Πνεῦμα Θεοῦ, We praise the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit of God.

Bishop Usher⁹ and Dr. Smith¹⁰ have given us an ancient form of this kind more at large, out of the Alexandrian Manuscript of the Septuagint, and some other ancient copies of the Psalter in Greek, which it may not be improper to insert in this place. It goes in some books under the title of ἕμνος ἑσπερινός, the evening hymn; and in others it is called ἕμνος τοῦ λυχνικοῦ, the hymn said at setting up lights. We cannot certainly say this is the same that St. Basil refers to, but all that St. Basil mentions out of that ancient hymn, is now found in this; which makes it probable that they are the very same. It is as follows:¹¹ "O Jesus Christ, thou joyful light of the sacred glory of the immortal, heavenly, holy, blessed Father! we now, being come to the setting of the sun, and seeing the evening light, do laud and praise the Father, and Son, and Holy Spirit of God (or the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, that is God). Thou art worthy to have hymns at all times sung unto thee with holy voices, O Son of God that givest life. Therefore the world glorifies thee." Bishop Usher, by mistake, says this hymn was the same as the ψαλμὸς ἐπιλόχνιος, the evening psalm mentioned in the Constitutions, lib. 8. cap. 35. Whereas indeed that evening psalm was quite another thing from this evening hymn; that being one of David's Psalms, as I showed before out of Chrysostom and the Constitutions themselves; and this a hymn of human composition. Neither is it the same form with the evening hymn related before out of the Constitutions, but seems more likely to be that mentioned by St. Basil, which, I conceive, was not a form for public, but only private devotion, to be used at home by all Christians, as a pious ejaculation or hymn to Christ, "the true Light that enlightens every man that comes into the world." But I only offer this as a conjecture, because I find not this hymn mentioned, as inserted into the public offices, either by the author of the Constitutions, or St. Basil, or any other.

But then it may be asked, Were there no hymns used in the evening service? Were there no lessons read, nor psalms, besides that called the evening psalm, sung in the church?

I answer, No doubt there were in many churches; for the customs of churches varied in this matter; and though the author of the Constitutions mentions them not in the rituals of the churches he describes, yet other accounts do. For Cassian,¹² describing the customary service of the Egyptian monasteries, says, They sung twelve psalms every morning and evening in their solemn meetings, and had two lessons read, one out of the Old Testament, and the other out of the New, and had pray-

Sect. 6.
Whether there were any hymns, or psalms, or lessons, read in the evening service besides the 141st Psalm.

⁷ Constit. lib. 7. cap. 48.

⁸ Basil. de Spir. Sancto, cap. 29.

⁹ Usserii Diatriba de Symbolis, p. 35.

¹⁰ Smith's Account of the Greek Church, p. 302.

¹¹ Φῶς ἱλαρὸν ἁγίας δόξης ἀθανάτου Πατρὸς, οὐρανοῦ, ἁγίου, μάκαρος, Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ· ἐλθόντες ἐπὶ τοῦ ἡλίου ὄσαν, ἰδοῦτες φῶς ἑσπερινόν, ὑμνοῦμεν Πατέρα καὶ Υἱόν καὶ Ἅγιον Πνεῦμα Θεοῦ. (al. Θεόν.) Ἄξιός ἐστιν ἐν παντί καιροῖς ὑμνεῖσθαι φωναῖς ὁσίαις, Ὑιὲ Θεοῦ, ζῶν ὁ διδοὺς διὸ ὁ κόσμος σε δοξάζει.

¹² Cassian. Institut. lib. 2. cap. 6. Exin venerabilis Patrum senatus—decrevit hunc numerum (12 psalorum) tam in vespertinis, quam in nocturnis conventiculis custodiri, quibus lectiones geminas adjungentes, id est, unam Veteris et aliam Novi Testamenti, &c. Vid. cap. 8.

ers also between the psalms; and sung the Gloria Patri at the end of the last psalm. St. Jerom confirms this account, and adds, that they had a sermon made by the abbot (who was always a presbyter) every day after evening prayer. For thus he describes their evening devotions: At nine o'clock they meet together, then the psalms are sung, and the Scriptures are read;¹³ and prayers being ended, they all sit down, and one among them, whom they call their father, begins to discourse to them, whom they hear with the profoundest silence and veneration. But it may be said, this perhaps was only the custom of the monasteries, and not of the churches. In answer to which Epiphanius assures us,¹⁴ it was the custom of the church to have psalms and hymns continually both at morning and evening prayer. St. Austin also mentions hymns¹⁵ as well as prayers at evening service; which implies, that they had more psalms than one sung upon that occasion. St. Hilary, upon those words of the psalmist, "The outgoings of the morning and evening shall praise thee;" shows the same, when he says, The progression of the church to her morning and evening hymns with delight, is a great sign of God's mercy. The day¹⁶ is begun with prayers, and the day is closed with hymns to God. St. Hilary himself is said to be the author of some of those hymns, and St. Ambrose of others, which were of public use in the church: and though some would have rejected them, because they were only of human composure, and not to be found in Scripture, yet the fourth council of Toledo¹⁷ ordered them to be retained in the public service of the church, together with the hymns, "Glory be to the Father," and "Glory be to God on high," which were likewise of human composition. For the Eastern churches, the like is said by Chrysostom,¹⁸ that they had hymns at night in their evening prayer, as well as morning. In the Gallican churches they had, besides their collects and prayers, both hymns and antiphonas, or chapters, as they called them, collected out of the Psalms, to be said by way of responses, as appears from the council of Agde.¹⁹ And the second council of Tours orders, That at evening prayer, which they call the twelfth hour of prayer, twelve psalms should be sung;²⁰ answerable to the order of morning service, which had twelve psalms, as the sixth hour of prayer had six psalms, with the additional psalm called the Hallelujah. From all which it is apparent, that a considerable number of psalms and hymns were used together with the prayers, to make up the daily course of evening as well as morning service in many churches.

And in some churches the Lord's prayer was always made a part of the daily worship both morning and evening. For the council of Girone²¹ made a general decree for the Spanish churches, that the Lord's prayer should constantly be used by every priest at the close of the matins and vespers in the daily service. It had always been used before on Sundays in the communion office; but it being, in the very title and tenor of it, quotidiana oratio, a quotidian or daily prayer, they thought it proper to make it a standing part of their daily offices. And when some priests neglected to obey this order, and still confined the use of it to the Lord's day, the fourth council of Toledo²² made a decree, That all such of the clergy as contumaciously refused to use it daily both in their public and private offices, should be degraded.

In the French churches the practice was the same. For by a canon of the third council of Orleans,²³ the people are obliged to stay at Divine service till the Lord's prayer was said; and if the

Sect. 7.
The Lord's prayer used in some churches as the conclusion of the daily, both morning and evening service.

¹³ Hieron. Ep. 22. ad Eustochium, cap. 15. Post horam nonam in commune concurrunt, psalmi resonant, Scripturæ recitantur ex more. Et completis orationibus, cunctisque residentibus, medius quem patrem vocant, incipit disputare, &c.

¹⁴ Epiphani. Exposit. Fidei, n. 23. p. 1106. Ἐσθινοὶ τε ὕμνοι ἐν αὐτῇ τῇ ἀγίᾳ ἐκκλησίᾳ διηρηκεῖς γίνονται, καὶ προσευχαὶ ἑσθινοὶ, λυχνικοὶ τε ἅμα ψαλμοὶ καὶ προσευχαί.

¹⁵ Aug. de Civ. Dei, lib. 22. cap. 8. p. 1485. Ad vespertinos illic hymnos et orationes cum ancillis suis et quibusdam sanctimonialibus ex more Domina possessionis intravit, atque hymnos cantare cœperunt.

¹⁶ Hilar. in Psalm. lxxv. p. 231. Progressus ecclesiæ in matutinum (leg. matutinarum) et vespertinarum hymnorum delectatione maximum misericordiæ Dei signum est. Dies in orationibus Dei inchoatur, dies hymnis Dei clauditur.

¹⁷ Conc. Tolet. 4. can. 12.

¹⁸ Chrys. Hom. 18. in Act. p. 174.

¹⁹ Conc. Agathen. can. 30. In conclusione matutinarum vel vespertinarum missarum, post hymnos, capitella de psalmis dici, et plebem, collecta oratione, ad vesperam ab episcopo cum benedictione dimitti.

²⁰ Conc. Turon. 2. can. 18. Patrum statuta præceperunt, ut ad sextam sex psalmi dicantur cum alleluia; et ad duodecimam duodecim, itemque cum alleluia. It. can. 24. Et licet Ambrosianos habeamus hymnos in canone, &c.

²¹ Conc. Gerundense, can. 10. Item nobis semper placuit observari, ut omnibus diebus post matutinas et vespers oratio Dominica a sacerdote proferatur.

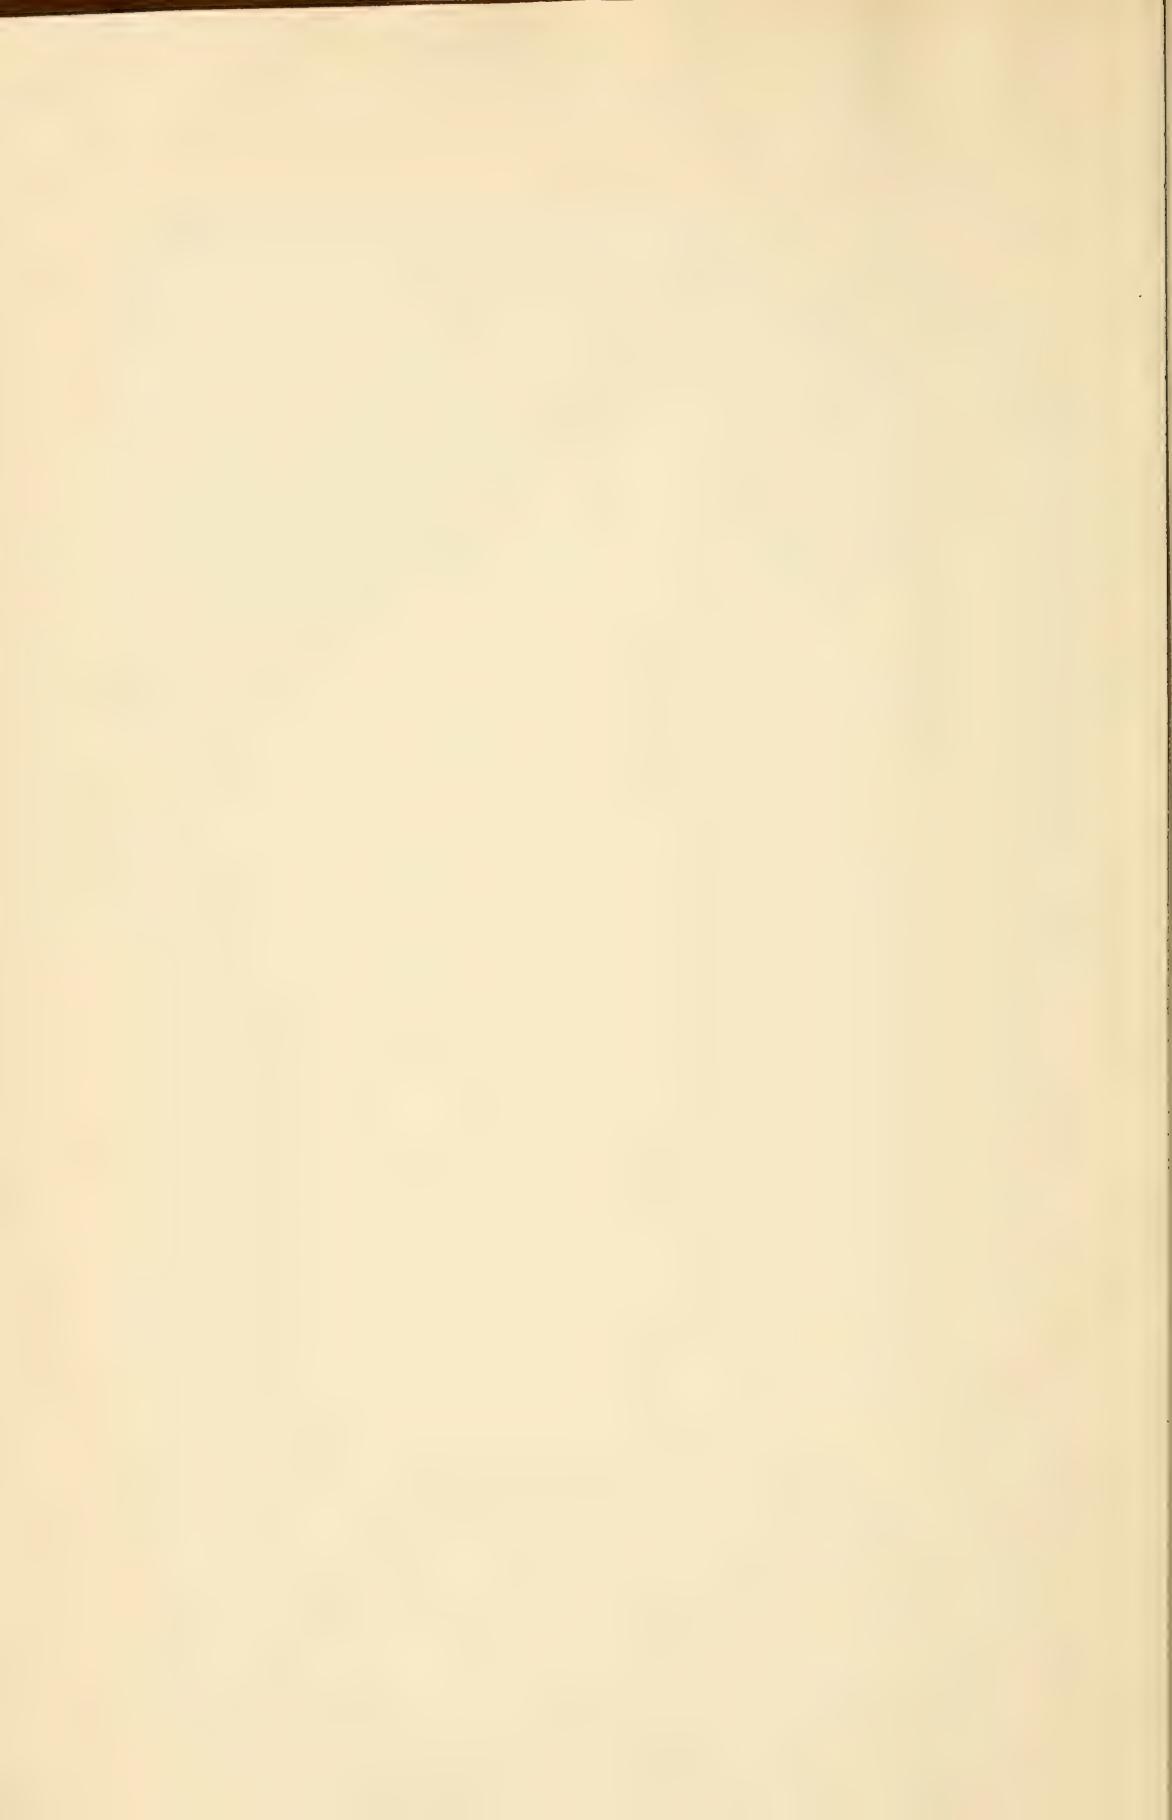

²² Conc. Tolet. 4. can. 9. Nonnulli sacerdotum in Hispaniis reperiuntur, qui Dominicam orationem, quam Salvator noster docuit et præcepit, non quotidie, sed tantum die Dominica dicant.—Quisquis ergo sacerdotum, vel subjacentium clericorum, hanc orationem Dominicam quotidie aut in publico aut in privato officio præterierit, propter superbiam judicatus, ordinis sui honore privetur.

²³ Conc. Aurel. 3. can. 28. De missis nullus laicorum ante discedat, quam Dominica dicatur oratio. Et si episcopus præsens fuerit, ejus benedictio expectetur. Sacrificia vero matutina (leg. matutinarum) missarum, vel vespertinarum, ne quis cum armis pertinentibus ad bellorum usum, expectat.

ishop was present, to wait for him to pronounce the benediction, which shows that it was the conclusion of the prayers, since nothing came after but the benediction. It is true, the word used for Divine service in this canon, is missa; which might seem to mean the communion service, where the Lord's prayer was always used: but it has been showed before, in the first chapter of this Book, that missa is a general name for any part of Divine service; and in this canon is particularly taken for the morning and evening sacrifice of prayers. For it immediately follows, that no one should come to the sacrifice of morning or evening mass, that is, morning or evening prayers, with his arms or weapons, which only appertained to the use of war.

Besides, that in the communion service, as we shall see hereafter, the Lord's prayer came always in the middle, and not, as in the conclusion of the service.

This is the substance of what I have observed concerning the several parts and order of the daily morning and evening service in the writings of the fathers and the canons of the councils, which are at present the chief rituals of the ancient church: and I have been the more careful to separate these offices from the great service of the Lord's day, because they are too often confounded in the accounts of modern authors. I now proceed to the offices and service of the Lord's day, which must be the subject of the two following Books.

BW150 .B61 1845 v.1
Origines ecclesiasticae : the

Princeton Theological Seminary-Speer Library

1 1012 00056 1144